"It doesn't help when your blood sugar is out of whack." There was a rap on the door, and Sara walked over, taking a handful of insulin pens from the nurse. She shut the door and told Faith, "You have to take this seriously."

"I know I do."

"Postponing dealing with it isn't going to work. Take two hours out of your day to see Delia so that you can get yourself right and focus on your work."

"I will."

"Mood swings, sudden tempers—these are all symptoms of your disease."

Faith felt like her mother had just scolded her, but maybe that's exactly what she needed right now. "Thank you."

Sara put her hands on the bassinet. "I'll leave you to it."

"Wait," Faith said. "You deal with young girls, right?"

Sara shrugged. "I used to a lot more when I had my private practice. Why?"

"What do you know about thinspo?"

"Not a lot," the doctor admitted. "I know it's a word for pro-anorexia propaganda, usually on the Internet."

"Three of our victims have a connection to it."

"Anna's still very thin," Sara observed. "Her liver and kidney functions are off, but I thought that was because of what she'd been through, not anything she'd done to herself."

"Could she be anorexic?"

"It's possible. I really didn't consider the disorder because of her age. Anorexia is generally a teenage issue." Sara recalled, "Pete flagged up something similar during Jacquelyn Zabel's autopsy. She was very thin, but then again, she was starved and denied water for at least two weeks. I just assumed she had started out slightly underweight. Her frame was small." She leaned down to Balthazar and stroked the side of his cheek. "Anna couldn't have had a baby if she was starving herself. Not without serious complications."

"Maybe she got it under control long enough to have him," Faith guessed. "I'm never quite sure which is which—is anorexia where they throw up?"

"That's bulimia. Anorexia denotes starvation. Sometimes anorexics use laxatives, but they don't purge. There's growing evidence about genetic determinism—chromosomal blips that predispose them to the disorder. Usually, there's some kind of environmental trigger that sets it off."

"Like child abuse?"

"Could be. Sometimes it's bullying. Sometimes it's body dysmorphia. Some people blame magazines and movie stars, but it's far more complicated than just one thing. Boys are starting to get it more, too. It's extremely difficult to treat because of the psychological component."

Faith thought about their victims. "Is there a certain type of personality that's drawn to it?"

Sara considered the question before replying. "I can only tell you that the handful of patients I dealt with who suffered from the disease got extreme pleasure from starving themselves. It takes a huge amount of willpower to fight the body's physiological imperative for food. They might feel like everything else in their life is out of whack, and the only thing they can manipulate is whether or not they put food in their mouths. There's also a physical response to starvation—light-headedness, euphoria, sometimes hallucinations. It can duplicate the same type of high you get from opiates, and the feeling can be incredibly addictive."

Faith tried to remember how many times she'd made jokes about wishing she had the willpower to be anorexic for a week.

Sara added, "The biggest problem with treatment is that it's much more socially acceptable for a woman to be too thin than it is for a woman to be overweight."

"I have yet to meet a woman who is happy with her weight."

Sara gave a rueful laugh. "My sister is, actually."

"Is she some kind of saint?"

Faith had been joking, but Sara surprised her, answering, "Close. She's a missionary. She married a preacher a few years ago. They're helping AIDS babies in Africa."

"Good God, I hate her and I've never even met her."

"Trust me, she has her faults," Sara confided. "You said three victims. Does that mean another woman has been taken?"

Faith realized that Olivia Tanner's status hadn't yet hit the news. "Yes. Keep that under wraps if you can."

"Of course."

"Two of them seemed to take a lot of aspirin. The new one we found out about today had six jumbo bottles in her house. Jacquelyn Zabel had a large bottle by her bed."

Sara nodded, like something was starting to make sense. "It's an emetic in high doses. That would explain why Zabel's stomach was so ulcerated." She added, "And it would explain why she was still bleeding when Will found her. You should tell him that. He was upset about not getting there in time."

Will had a hell of a lot more than that to be upset about right now. Still, Faith remembered, "He needs your apartment number."

"Why?" Sara answered her own question. "Oh, his wife's dog."

"Right," Faith said, thinking the lie was the least she could do for Will.

"Twelve. It's on the directory." She put her hands back on the edge of the bassinet. "I should take this boy to his mother."

Faith held open the door and Sara rolled out the bassinet. The hum of the hallway buzzed in her ears until Faith shut the door. She sat on the stool by the counter and lifted her skirt, looking for a spot that wasn't already black and blue from the needles. The diabetes pamphlet had said to move the injection sites around, so Faith checked her stomach, where she found a pristine roll of white fat that she pinched between her thumb and forefinger.

She held the insulin pen a few inches from her belly but didn't inject herself. Somewhere behind all those Pop-Tarts was a tiny baby with tiny hands and feet and a mouth and eyes—breathing every breath she took, peeing every ten minutes when she ran to the bathroom. Sara's words had brought things home for Faith, but holding Balthazar Lindsey had awakened something in Faith that she had never felt in her life. As much as she had loved Jeremy, his birth was hardly a celebration. Fifteen was not an appropriate age for baby showers, and even the nurses at the hospital had looked at her with pity.

This time would be different, though. Faith was old enough so that it was acceptable for her to be a mother. She could walk through the mall with her baby on her hip without worrying people would assume she was her own child's older sister. She could take him to the pediatrician and sign all his forms without getting her mother to cosign. She could tell his teachers to go screw themselves during PTA meetings without worrying about being sent to the principal's office herself. Hell, she could drive now.

She could do it right this time. She could be a good mother from start to finish. Well, maybe not start. Faith catalogued all the things she had done to her baby just this week: ignored him, denied his existence, passed out in a garage, contemplated abortion, exposed him to whatever Sam Lawson was carrying, fallen off a porch step and risked both their lives trying to stop Will from pounding a Yugoslavian doorman's head into the fine looped carpet lining the penthouse hallway at Beeston Place.

And here they were now, mother and child in the Grady ICU, and she was about to poke a needle somewhere near his head.

The door opened.

"What the hell are you doing?" Amanda demanded. She figured it out for herself quickly enough. "Oh, for the love of God. When were you going to tell me about this?"

Faith rolled her shirt back down, thinking it was a little late for modesty. "Right after I told you I'm pregnant."

Amanda tried to slam the door but the hydraulic hinge wouldn't let her. "Goddamn it, Faith. You're never going to get ahead with a baby."

Her hackles rose. "I got this far with one."

"You were a kid in uniform making sixteen thousand dollars a year. You're thirty-three now."

Faith tried, "I guess this means you won't be throwing me a baby shower."

Her look would have cut glass. "Does your mother know?"

"I thought I'd let her enjoy her vacation."

Amanda slapped her palm to her forehead, which would've been comical if not for the fact that she held Faith's life in her hands. "A dyslexic half-wit with a temper problem and a fertile, fat diabetic who lacks a rudimentary understanding of birth control.” She jabbed her finger in Faith’s face. “I hope you like that pairing, young lady, because you’re going to be stuck with Will Trent forever now.”

Faith tried to ignore the “fat” part, which, honestly, hurt the most. “I can think of worse things than being partnered with Will Trent for the rest of my life.”

“You’d just better be damned glad the security cameras didn’t catch his little tantrum.”

“Will’s a good cop, Amanda. He wouldn’t still be working for you if you didn’t believe that.”

“Well—” She cut herself off. “Maybe when he’s not putting his abandonment issues on full display.”

“Is he all right?”

“He’ll live,” Amanda replied, not sounding too convinced. “I sent him to track down that prostitute. Lola.”

“She’s not in jail?”

“There was a pretty big score in the apartment—heroin, meth, coke. Angie Polaski managed to get Lola kicked for being an informant.” Amanda shrugged. She couldn’t always control the Atlanta police department.

“Do you think it’s a good idea to have Will looking for Lola, considering how angry he was about that baby being left alone?”

The old Amanda was back—the one who couldn’t be questioned. “We’ve got two missing women and a serial killer who knows what to do with them. There has to be some movement on this case before it gets away from us. The clock is ticking, Faith. He could be watching his next victim right now.”

“I was supposed to meet with Rick Sigler today—the paramedic who worked on Anna.”

“I sent someone around to Sigler’s house an hour ago. His wife was there with him. He adamantly denied knowing anyone named Jake Berman. He barely admitted he was on the road that night.”

Faith could not think of a worse way to question the man. “He’s gay. The wife doesn’t know.”

“They never do,” Amanda countered. “At any rate, he wasn’t interested in talking, and we don’t have enough right now to drag him down to the station.”

“I’m not sure he’s a suspect.”

“Everyone is a suspect as far as I’m concerned. I read the autopsy report. I’ve seen what was done to Anna. Our bad guy likes to experiment. He’s going to keep doing this until we stop him.”

Faith had been running on adrenaline for the past few hours, and she felt it spark up again at Amanda’s words. “Do you want me to watch Sigler?”

“I’ve got Leo Donnelly parked outside his house right now. Something tells me you don’t want to be trapped in a car with him all night.”

“No, ma’am,” Faith answered, and not just because Leo was a chain smoker. He would probably blame Faith for putting him on Amanda’s shit list. He would be right.

“Someone needs to go to Michigan to find the files on Pauline Seward’s family. The warrant’s being expedited, but apparently nothing past fifteen years is on the computers. We need to find someone from her past and we need to find them fast—the parents, hopefully the brother, if it's not our mysterious Mr. Berman. For obvious reasons, I can't send Will to read through the files."

Faith put the insulin pen down on the counter. "I'll do it."

"Do you have this diabetes thing under control?" Faith's expression must've been answer enough. "I'll send one of my agents who can actually do their job." She waved her hand, dismissing any objections Faith might have. "Let's just move on from that until it bites us in the ass again, shall we?"

"I'm sorry about this." Faith had apologized more in the last fifteen minutes than she had in her entire life.

Amanda shook her head, indicating she wasn't willing to discuss the stupidity of the situation. "The doorman's asked for a lawyer. We're scheduled to talk to them first thing in the morning."

"You arrested him?"

"Detained. He's obviously foreign-born. The Patriot Act gives us twenty-four hours to hold him while we check his immigration status. Hopefully, we can turn his apartment upside down and find something more concrete to hammer him with."

Faith wasn't one to argue with the true course of justice.

Amanda asked, "What about Anna's neighbors?"

"It's a quiet building. The apartment below the penthouse has been vacant for months. They could've set off an atom bomb up there and no one would've known."

"The dead guy?"

"Drug dealer. Heroin overdose."

"Anna's employer didn't miss her?"

Faith told her what little she'd managed to find out. "She works for a law firm—Bandle and Brinks."

"Good Christ, this just keeps getting worse. Do you know about the firm?"

Amanda didn't give Faith time to answer. "They specialize in bringing lawsuits against municipalities—bad policing, bad social services, anything they can catch you on, they pounce and sue your budget to hell and back. They've sued the state and won more times than I can count."

"They weren't open to questioning. They won't turn over any of her files without a warrant."

"In other words, they're being lawyers." Amanda paced the room. "You and I will talk with Anna now, then we'll go back over to her building and turn it upside down before that law firm of hers realizes what we're doing."

"When's the interview with the doorman?"

"Eight sharp tomorrow morning. You think you can fit that into your busy schedule?"

"Yes, ma'am."

Amanda looked like a parent as she shook her head at Faith again; frustrated, mildly disgusted. "I don't suppose the father's in the picture this time, either."

"I'm a little too old to be trying something new."

"Congratulations," she said, opening the door. It would've been nice except for the "idiot" she muttered as she walked into the hall.

Faith hadn't realized she had been holding her breath until Amanda left the room. Her lips parted in a heavy sigh, and for the first time since this whole diabetes thing started, she jabbed the needle into her skin on the first try. It didn't hurt as much, or maybe she was in such shock that she couldn't feel anything.

She stared at the wall in front of her, trying to get her head back into the investigation. Faith closed her eyes, visualizing the autopsy photos of Jacquelyn Zabel, the cave where Jacquelyn and Anna Lindsey had been kept. Faith catalogued the horrible things that must have happened to the women—the torture, the pain. She put her hand to her stomach again. Was the child that was growing inside of her a girl? What sort of world was Faith bringing her into—a place where young girls were molested by their fathers, where magazines told them they would never be perfect enough, where sadists could take you away from your life, your own child, in the blink of an eye and thrust you into a living hell for the rest of your life?

A shudder racked her body. She stood and left the room.

The cops in front of Anna's door stepped aside. Faith crossed her arms over her chest, feeling a sudden coldness as she entered. Anna was lying in bed, Balthazar in the crook of her bony arm. Her shoulder was pronounced, the bone hard against the skin, the same as the girls Faith had seen in the videos on Pauline McGhee's computer.

"Agent Mitchell has just entered the room," Amanda told the woman. "She's been trying to find out who did this to you."

The whites of Anna's eyes were clouded, as if she had cataracts. She stared unseeingly toward the door. Faith knew there was no etiquette for this kind of situation. She had handled rape and abuse cases before, but nothing like this. She had to think the skills translated. You didn't make small talk. You didn't ask them how they were doing, because the answer was obvious.

Faith said, "I know this is a difficult time. We just have a few questions for you."

Amanda told Faith, "Ms. Lindsey was just telling me she finished a big case and took off work for a few weeks to spend time with her child."

Faith asked, "Did anyone else know you were taking time off?"

"I left a note with the doorman. People at work knew—my secretary, my partners. I don't talk to the people in my building."

Faith felt like a large wall had been erected around Anna Lindsey. There was something so cold about the woman that establishing a connection seemed impossible. She stuck to the questions they needed answered. "Can you tell us what happened when you were taken?"

Anna licked her dry lips, closed her eyes. When she spoke, her voice was little more than a whisper. "I was in my apartment getting Balthazar ready for a walk in the park. That's the last thing I remember."

Faith knew there could be some memory loss with Taser attacks. "What did you see when you woke up?"

"Nothing. I never saw anything again after that."

"Any sounds or sensations you can recall?"

"No."

"Did you recognize your attacker?"

Anna shook her head. "No. I can't remember anything."

Faith let a few seconds pass, trying to get hold of her frustration. "I'm going to give you a list of names. I need you to tell me if any of them sound familiar.”

Anna nodded, her hand sliding across the sheets to find her son’s mouth. He suckled her finger, tiny gulping noises coming from his throat.

“Pauline McGhee.”

Anna shook her head.

“Olivia Tanner.”

Again she shook her head.

“Jacquelyn, or Jackie, Zabel.”

She shook her head.

Faith had saved Jackie for last. The two women had been in the cave together. This was the only thing they knew for certain. “We found your fingerprint on Jackie Zabel’s driver’s license.”

Anna’s dry lips parted again. “No,” she said firmly. “I don’t know her.”

Amanda glanced Faith’s way, eyebrows raised. Was this traumatic amnesia? Or something else?

Faith asked, “What about something called thinspo?”

Anna stiffened. “No,” she said, more quickly this time, her voice louder.

Faith gave it another few seconds, letting the woman think. “We found some notebooks where you were kept. They had the same words over and over again—‘I will not deny myself.’ Does that mean anything to you?”

She shook her head again.

Faith worked to keep the pleading out of her voice. “Can you tell us anything about your attacker? Did you smell something, like oil or gas on him? Cologne? Did you feel any facial hair or any physical—”

“No,” Anna whispered, pressing her fingers along her child’s body, finding his hand and taking it in hers. “I can’t tell you anything. I don’t remember any details. Nothing.”

Faith opened her mouth to speak, but Amanda beat her to the punch, saying, “You’re safe here, Ms. Lindsey. We’ve had two armed guards outside your door since you were brought in. No one can hurt you anymore.”

Anna turned her head toward her baby, making shushing sounds to soothe him. “I am not afraid of anything.”

Faith was taken aback at how certain the woman sounded. Maybe if you survived what Anna had been through, you believed you could endure anything.

Amanda said, “We think he has two more women right now. That he’s doing the same thing to them that he’s done to you.” She tried again, “One of the women has a child, Ms. Lindsey. His name is Felix. He’s six years old and he wants to be with his mother. I’m sure wherever she is, she’s thinking of him right now, wanting to hold him again.”

“I hope she’s strong,” Anna mumbled. Then, louder, she told them, “As I have said many times now, I don’t remember anything. I don’t know who did it, or where they took me or why they did it. I just know that it’s over now, and I’m putting it behind me.”

Faith could feel Amanda’s frustration matching her own.

Anna said, “I need to rest now.”

“We can wait,” Faith told her. “Maybe come back in a few hours.”

“No.” The woman’s expression turned hard. “I know my legal obligations. I’ll sign a statement, or make my mark, or whatever it is blind people do, but if you want to talk to me again, you can make an appointment with my secretary when I'm back at work."

Faith tried, "But, Anna—"

She turned her head toward the baby. Anna's blindness had blocked them from her vision, but her actions seemed to block them from her mind.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Sara had finally managed to clean her apartment. She could not think of the last time it had looked this good—maybe when she had first seen it with her real estate agent before she had even moved in. The Milk Lofts had once been a dairy, serviced by the vast farmland that used to cover the eastern part of the city. There were six floors in the building, two apartments on each floor separated by a long hallway with large windows at either end. The main living area of Sara's place was what was called an open plan, the kitchen looking onto the enormous living room. Floor-to-ceiling windows that were a bitch to keep clean lined an entire wall, giving her a nice view of downtown when the shades were open. There were three bedrooms in the back, each with its own bathroom. Sara, of course, slept in the master, but no one had ever slept in the guest room. The third room she used as an office and for storage.

She had never thought of herself as a loft person, but when Sara had moved to Atlanta, she had wanted her new life to be as different from her old as was humanly possible. Instead of choosing a cute bungalow on one of the city's old, tree-lined streets, she had opted for a space that was little more than an empty box. Atlanta's real estate market was just hitting rock bottom, and Sara had a ridiculous amount of money to spend. Everything was new when she'd moved in, but she had renovated the entire place from top to bottom anyway. The price of the kitchen alone would have fed a family of three for a year. Add in the palatial bathrooms and it was downright embarrassing that Sara had been so free with her checkbook.

In her previous life, she had always been careful with her money, never splurging on anything except a new BMW every four years. After Jeffrey's death, there had been his life insurance policy, his pension, his own savings and the proceeds from the sale of his house. Sara had left all of it in the bank, feeling like spending his money would be admitting he was gone. She had even considered refusing the tax exemption she got from the state for being a widow of a slain police officer, but her accountant had balked and it wasn't worth the fight.

Subsequently, the money she sent to Sylacauga, Alabama, every month to help Jeffrey's mother came out of her own pocket while Jeffrey's money compounded meager interest at the local bank. Sara often thought about giving it to his son, but that would have been too complicated. Jeffrey's son had never been told that Jeffrey was his real father. She couldn't ruin the boy's life and then hand over a sum that amounted to a small fortune to a kid who was still in college.

So, Jeffrey's money sat there in the bank, just like the letter sat on Sara's mantel. She stood by the fireplace, fingering the edge of the envelope, wondering why she hadn't put it back into her purse or jammed it into her pocket again. Instead, during her rabid fit of cleaning, she had only picked it up to dust under the envelope as she made her way down the mantel.

Sara saw Jeffrey's wedding ring on the opposite end. She still wore her wedding ring—a matching white-gold band—but his college ring, a hunk of gold with the Auburn University insignia carved into the top, was more important to her. The blue stone was scratched and it was too big for her finger, so she wore it on a long chain around her neck the way a soldier wears his dog tags. She didn't wear it for anyone to see. It was always tucked into her shirt, close to her heart, so she could feel it at all times.

Still, she took Jeffrey's wedding band and kissed it before putting it back on the mantel. Over the last few days, her mind had somehow put Jeffrey in a different place. It was as if she was going through mourning again, but this time, at a remove. Instead of waking up feeling devastated, as she had for the last three and a half years, she felt enormously sad. Sad to turn over in bed and not have him there. Sad that she would never see him smile again. Sad that she would never hold him or feel him inside of her again. But not utterly devastated. Not like every move or thought was an effort. Not like she wanted to die. Not like there was no light at the end of all of this.

There was something else, too. Faith Mitchell had been so horrible today, and Sara had survived. She hadn't broken down or fallen to pieces. She had not come undone. She had kept herself together. The funny thing was, in some ways Sara felt closer to Jeffrey because of it. She felt stronger, more like the woman he had fallen in love with than the woman who had fallen apart without him. She closed her eyes, and she could almost feel his breath on the back of her neck, his lips brushing so softly that a tingle went down her spine. She imagined his hand wrapping around her waist, and was surprised when she put her hand there to feel nothing but her own hot skin.

The buzzer rang and the dogs stirred along with Sara. She shushed them as she walked to the intercom and buzzed in the pizza delivery guy. Betty, Will Trent's dog, had been adopted quickly by Billy and Bob, her two greyhounds. When she was cleaning earlier, all three dogs had settled onto the couch in a pile, glancing up occasionally when Sara walked into the room, sometimes giving her a sharp look if she made too much noise. Even the vacuum cleaner had not dislodged them.

Sara opened the door to wait for Armando, who delivered pizza to her apartment at least twice a week. The fact that they were on a first-name basis was something she pretended was normal, and she routinely overtipped the deliveryman so that he wouldn't make a big deal about seeing her more than he saw his own children.

"Doin' all right?" he asked as pizza and money changed hands.

"Doing great," she told him, but her mind was back in the apartment, on what she was doing before the buzzer had sounded. It had been so long since she'd been able to remember what it felt like to be with Jeffrey. She wanted to dwell on it, to crawl into bed and let her mind wander back to that sweet place.

"Have a good one, Sara." Armando turned to leave, then stopped. "Hey, there's some strange guy hanging around downstairs."

She lived in the middle of a large city, so this was hardly unusual. "Regular strange or call-the-cops strange?"

"I think he is a cop. Doesn't look it, but I saw his badge."

"Thanks," she said. He gave her a nod as he headed toward the elevator. Sara put the pizza box on the kitchen counter and walked to the far side of the living room. She pushed open the window and leaned out. Sure enough, six stories down, she spotted a speck looking suspiciously like Will Trent.

"Hey!" she called. He didn't respond, and she watched him for a moment as he paced back and forth, wondering if he'd heard her. She tried again, raising her voice like a soccer mom at a NASCAR race. "Hey!"

Will finally looked up, and she told him, "Sixth floor."

She watched him go into the building, passing Armando on the way out, who tossed Sara a wave and said something about seeing her soon. Sara shut the window, praying Will had not heard the exchange, or at least had the decency to pretend. She checked the apartment, making sure nothing was too horrendously out of place. There were two couches in the middle of the living room, one packed with dogs, the other with pillows. Sara fluffed these up, tossing them back onto the couch in what she hoped was an artful arrangement.

Thanks to two hours of elbow grease, the kitchen was sparkling clean, even the copper backsplash behind the stove, which was gorgeous until you realized it took two different kinds of cleaners. She passed the flat-screen television on the wall and stopped cold. She'd forgotten to dust the screen. Sara tugged down the sleeve of her shirt over her hand and did the best she could.

By the time she opened her door, Will was getting off the elevator. Sara had only met the man a few times, but he looked awful, like he hadn't slept in weeks. She saw his left hand, noticed the skin on his knuckles was split apart in a way that might suggest his fist had smashed repeatedly into someone's mouth.

Occasionally, Jeffrey had come home with the same kinds of cuts. Sara always asked about them, and he always lied. For her part, she made herself believe the lies because she wasn't comfortable with the idea of his walking outside the law. She wanted to believe that her husband was a good man in every way. Part of her wanted to think that Will Trent was a good man, too, so she was prepared to believe whatever story he came up with when she asked, "Is your hand all right?"

"I hit someone. The doorman at Anna's building."

Sara was caught off guard by his honesty. She took a second to form a response. "Why?"

Again, he seemed to give her the truth. "I just snapped."

"Are you in trouble with your boss?"

"Not really."

She realized she was keeping him in the hall and stepped aside so he could come in. "That baby is lucky you found him. I don't know that he could've gone another day."

"That's a convenient excuse." He looked around the room, absently scratching his arm. "I've never hit a suspect before. I've scared them into thinking I might, but I've never actually done it."

"My mother always told me there's a fine line between never and always." He looked confused, and Sara explained, "Once you do something bad, it's easier to do it again the next time, then the next time, and before you know it, you're doing it all the time and it doesn't bother your conscience."

He stared at her for what felt like a full minute.

She shrugged. "It's up to you. If you don't like crossing that line, then don't do it again. Don't ever make it easy."

There was a mixture of surprise in his face, then something like relief. Instead of acknowledging what had just happened, he told her, "I hope Betty wasn't too much trouble."

"She was fine. She's not yippy at all."

"Yeah," he agreed. "I didn't intend to dump her on you like that."

"It was no problem," Sara assured him, though she had to admit that Faith Mitchell was right about Sara's motivations this morning. Sara had offered to watch the dog because she wanted details about the case. She wanted to contribute something to the investigation. She wanted to be useful again.

Will was just standing there in the middle of the room, his three-piece suit wrinkled, the vest loose around his stomach as if he'd lost weight recently. She had never seen anyone look so lost in her life.

She told him, "Have a seat."

He seemed undecided, but finally took the couch across from the dogs. He didn't sit the way men usually sit—legs apart, arms spread along the back of the couch. He was a big guy, but he appeared to work very hard not to take up a lot of space.

Sara asked, "Have you had supper?"

He shook his head and she put the pizza box on the coffee table. The dogs were very interested in this development, so Sara sat on the couch with them in order to keep them in line. She waited for Will to take a slice, but he just sat there opposite, hands resting on his knees.

He asked, "Is that your husband's ring?"

Startled, she turned to the ring, which was flat on the polished mahogany. The letter was on the other end of the mantel, and Sara had a flash of concern that Will would figure out what was inside.

"Sorry," he apologized. "I shouldn't pry."

"It's his," she told him, realizing that she'd been pressing her thumb into the matching ring on her finger, spinning it around in a nervous habit.

"What about ..." He touched his hand to his chest.

Sara mimicked the movement, feeling exposed as she found Jeffrey's college ring beneath her thin shirt. "Something else," she answered, not going into detail.

He nodded, still looking around the room. "I was found in a kitchen trashcan." His words were abrupt, surprising. He explained, "At least that's what my file says."

Sara didn't know how to respond, especially when he laughed, as if he'd made an off-color joke at a church social.

"Sorry. I don't know why I said that." He pulled a piece of pizza out of the box, catching the dripping cheese in his hand.

"It's all right," she told him, putting her hand on Bob's head as the greyhound's snout slid toward the coffee table. She couldn't even comprehend what Will was saying. He might as well have told her he had been born on the moon.

She asked, "How old were you?"

He waited until he'd swallowed, then told her, "Five months." He took another bite of pizza and she watched his jaw work as he chewed. Sara's mind conjured up an image of Will Trent at five months old. He would've just started trying to sit up on his own and recognizing sounds.

He took another bite and chewed thoughtfully. "My mother put me there."

"In the trashcan?"

He nodded. "Someone broke into the house—a man. She knew he was going to kill her, and probably me, too. She hid me in the trashcan under the sink, and he didn't find me. I guess I must've known to be quiet." He gave a crooked half-grin. "I was in Anna's apartment today, and I looked in every trashcan. All the time, I was thinking about what you said this morning, about how the killer put the trash bags inside of the women to send a message, because he wanted to tell the world that they were trash, meaningless."

"Obviously, your mother was trying to protect you. She wasn't sending a message."

"Yeah," he said. "I know."

"Did they ...?" Her mind wasn't working well enough to ask questions.

"Did they catch the guy who killed her?" Will asked, finishing her sentence. He glanced around the room again. "Did they catch the person who killed your husband?"

He had asked a question, but he wasn't looking for an answer. He was making the point that it didn't matter, something Sara had felt from the moment she'd been told the man who'd orchestrated Jeffrey's death was dead. She said, "Every cop who knows, that's all they care about. Did they catch the guy?"

"Eye for an eye." He pointed to the pizza. "Mind if I—"

He had finished half the pie. "Go ahead."

"It's been a long day."

Sara laughed at the understatement. He laughed, too.

She pointed to his hand. "Do you want me to take care of that?"

He glanced at the wounds as if he'd just realized something was wrong. "What can you do?"

"You've waited too long for stitches." She stood up to get her first aid kit from the kitchen. "I can clean it. You need to start some antibiotics so it doesn't get infected."

"What about rabies?"

"Rabies?" She tied up her hair with a band she found in the kitchen drawer, then hooked her reading glasses on her shirt collar. "The human mouth is pretty dirty, but it's very rare—"

"I mean from rats," Will said. "There were some rats in the cave where Anna and Jackie were kept." He scratched his right arm again, and she realized now why he had been doing it. "You can get rabies from rats, right?"

Sara froze, her hand reaching up to take a stainless steel bowl from the cabinet. "Did they bite you?"

"No, they ran up my arms."

"Rats ran up your arms?"

"Just two. Maybe three."

"Two or three rats ran up your arms?"

"It's really calming the way you keep repeating everything I say, but in a louder voice."

She laughed at the comment, but still asked, "Were they acting erratic? Did they try to attack you?"

"Not really. They just wanted to get out. I think they were as scared of me as I was of them." He shrugged. "Well, one of them stayed down. He was eyeballing me, you know, kind of watching what I was doing. He never came near me, though."

She put on her reading glasses and sat beside him. "Roll up your sleeves."

He took off his jacket and rolled up the shirtsleeve on his left arm, though he had been scratching his right. Sara didn't argue. She looked at the scratches on his forearm. They weren't even deep enough to bleed. He was probably remembering it a lot worse than it actually was. "I think you'll be fine."

"You're sure? Maybe that's why I went a little crazy today."

She could tell he was only half kidding. "Tell Faith to call me if you start foaming at the mouth."

"Don't be surprised if you hear from her tomorrow."

She rested the stainless steel bowl in her lap, then put his left hand in the bowl. "This might sting," she warned, pouring peroxide over the open wounds. Will didn't flinch, and she took his lack of reaction as an opportunity to do a more thorough job.

She tried to take his mind off what she was doing, and, frankly, her own curiosity was raised. "What about your father?"

"There were extenuating circumstances," was all he offered. "Don't worry. Orphanages aren't as bad as Dickens would lead you to believe." He changed the subject, asking, "Do you come from a big family?"

"Just me and my younger sister."

"Pete said your dad's a plumber."

"He is. My sister worked in the business with him for a while, but now she's a missionary."

"That's nice. You both take care of people."

Sara tried to think of another question, something to say that would make him open up, but nothing would come to mind. She had no idea how to talk to someone who didn't have a family. What stories of sibling tyranny or parental angst could you share?

Will seemed equally at a loss for words, or maybe he was just choosing to be silent. Either way, he didn't speak until she was doing her best to cover the broken skin by crisscrossing several Band-Aids over his knuckles.

He said, "You're a good doctor."

"You should see me with splinters."

He looked at his hand. Flexed his fingers.

She said, "You're left-handed."

He asked, "Is that a bad thing?"

"I hope not." She held up her left hand, which she'd been using to clean his wounds. "My mother says it means you're smarter than everybody else." She started cleaning up the mess. "Speaking of my mother, I called her about the question you had—the apostle who replaced Judas? His name was Matthias." She laughed, joking, "I'm pretty sure if you meet anyone by that name, you've probably found your killer."

He laughed, too. "I'll put out an APB."

"Last seen wearing a robe and sandals."

He shook his head, still smiling. "Don't make light of it. That's the best lead I've heard all day."

"Anna's not talking?"

"I haven't talked to Faith since ..." He waved his injured hand. "She would've called if anything came up."

"She's not what I thought," Sara told him. "Anna. I know this is odd to say, but she's very dispassionate. Unemotional."

"She's been through a lot."

"I know what you mean, but it's beyond that." Sara shook her head. "Or maybe it's my ego. Doctors aren't used to being talked to as if they're servants."

"What did she say to you?"

"When I brought her baby to her—Balthazar—I don't know, it was weird. I wasn't expecting a medal by any means, but I thought she would at least thank me. She just told me that I could go away."

Will rolled down his shirtsleeve. "None of these women have been particularly likable."

"Faith said there might be an anorexia connection."

"There might be. I don't know a lot about it. Are anorexics generally horrible people?"

"No, of course not. Everyone is different. Faith asked me about the same thing this afternoon. I told her that it takes a very driven personality to starve yourself like that, but it doesn't follow that they're unkind." Sara thought about it. "Your killer probably didn't choose these women because they're anorexic. He chooses them because they're awful people."

"If they're awful people, then he'd have to know them. He'd have to have contact with them."

"Are you finding any connections other than the anorexia?"

"All of them are unmarried. Two of them have kids. One of them hates kids. One of them wanted a kid, but maybe not." He added, "Banker, lawyer, real estate broker and interior designer."

"What kind of lawyer?"

"Corporate attorney."

"Not real estate closings?"

He shook his head. "The banker didn't work mortgages, either. She was in charge of community relations—doing fundraisers, making sure the president of the bank had his picture in the paper beside kids with cancer. That sort of thing."

"They're not in a support group?"

"There's a chat room, but we can't get into it without a password." He rubbed his eyes with his hands. "It just goes in circles."

"You look tired. Maybe a good night's sleep will help you figure it out."

"Yeah, I should go." But he didn't. He just sat there looking at her.

Sara felt the noise drain from the room, and the air got stuffy, almost hard to breathe. She was acutely aware of the pressure against her skin from the gold band around her fourth finger, and she realized that her thigh was brushing his.

Will was the first to break the spell, turning, reaching for his jacket off the back of the couch. "I really should go," he told her, standing up to put on his jacket. "I need to find a prostitute."

She was certain she had heard wrong. "I'm sorry?"

He chuckled. "A witness named Lola. She was the one who was taking care of the baby and she tipped us off about Anna's apartment. I've been looking for her all afternoon. I think now that it's nighttime, she's probably emerged from her lair."

Sara stayed on the couch, thinking it was probably best to keep some distance between them so Will didn't get the wrong message. "I'll wrap up some pizza for you."

"That's okay." He went to the other couch and extracted Betty from the dog pile. He tucked her close to his chest. "Thanks for the conversation." He paused. "About what I said ..." He paused again. "Maybe best just to forget about it, okay?"

Her mind reeled with something to say that wasn't flip or—worse—an invitation. "Of course. No problem."

He smiled at her again, then let himself out of her apartment.

Sara sat back on the couch, hissing out a breath of air, wondering what the hell had just happened. She traced back through their conversation, wondering if she had given Will a sign, an unintentional signal. Or maybe there wasn't anything there. Maybe she was reading too much into the look he gave her as they both sat on the couch. Surely, it didn't help matters that three minutes before Will had arrived, Sara was thinking lewd thoughts about her husband. Still, she went back through it again, trying to figure out what had brought them to that uncomfortable moment, or if, in fact, there had been an uncomfortable moment at all.

It wasn't until she remembered holding his hand over the bowl, cleaning out the wounds on his knuckles, that she realized that Will Trent was no longer wearing his wedding ring.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Will wondered how many men in the world were trolling for prostitutes in their cars right now. Maybe hundreds of thousands, if not millions. He glanced at Betty, thinking he was probably the only one doing it with a Chihuahua in his passenger seat.

At least he hoped so.

Will looked at his hands on the steering wheel, the Band-Aids that covered the broken skin. He couldn't remember the last time he'd gotten into a serious fight. It must have been when he was back at the children's home. There was a bully there who had made his life miserable. Will had taken it and taken it, and then he had snapped, and Tony Campano had ended up with his front teeth broken out like a Halloween pumpkin.

Will flexed his fingers again. Sara had tried to do her best with the Band-Aids, but there was no way to keep them from falling off. Will tried to catalog the many times he had been to a doctor as a child. There was a scar on his body for just about each visit, and he used the marks to jog his memory, naming the foster parent or group home leader who had been courteous enough to break a bone or burn him or rip open his skin.

He lost count, or maybe he just couldn't keep a thought in his head because all he kept coming back to was the way Sara Linton had looked when he first saw her in the doorway to her apartment. He knew she had long hair, but she'd always kept it up. This time, it was down—soft curls cascading past her shoulders. She was wearing jeans and a long-sleeved cotton shirt that did a very good job of showing everything she had to great advantage. She was in socks, her shoes kicked off by the door. She smelled nice, too—not like perfume, but just clean and warm and beautiful. While she was fixing his hand, it had taken everything in him not to lean down and smell her hair.

Will was reminded of a Peeping Tom he'd caught in Butts County a few years ago. The man had followed women out to the parking lot of the local shopping mall, then offered them money to smell their hair. Will could still remember the news report, the local sheriff's deputy visibly nervous in front of the news camera. The only thing the cop could come up with to tell the reporter was, "He's got a problem. A problem with hair."

Will had a problem with Sara Linton.

He scratched Betty's chin as he waited for a red light to change. The Chihuahua had done a good job of ingratiating herself with Sara's dogs, but Will was not foolish enough to think he had a snowball's chance. No one had to tell him he wasn't the sort of man Sara Linton would go for. For one, she lived in a palace. Will had remodeled his house a few years ago, so he knew the cost of all the nice things he could not afford. Just the appliances in her kitchen had run around fifty thousand dollars, twice the amount he had spent on his whole house.

Two, she was smart. She wasn't obvious about it, but she was a doctor. You didn't go to medical school if you were stupid, or Will would've been a doctor, too. It would take Sara no time at all to figure out he was illiterate, which made him glad that he wasn't going to be spending any more time around her.

Anna was getting better. She would be out of the hospital soon. The baby was fine. There was no reason on earth for Will to ever see Sara Linton again unless he happened to be at Grady Hospital when she was on shift.

He supposed he could hope he got shot. He'd thought Amanda was going to do exactly that when she'd taken him into the stairwell this afternoon. Instead, she had merely said, "I've waited a long time for your short hairs to grow in." Not exactly the words you expect from your superior after you've beaten a man nearly senseless. Everyone was making excuses for him, everyone was covering for him, and Will was the only one who seemed to think that what he had done was wrong.

He pulled away from the light, heading into one of the seedier parts of town. He was running out of places to check for Lola, a revelation which troubled him, and not just because Amanda had told him not to bother coming in to work tomorrow unless he tracked the whore down. Lola had to have known about the baby. She had certainly known about the drugs and what was going on in Anna Lindsey's penthouse apartment. Maybe she had seen something else—something she wasn't willing to trade because it might put her life in danger. Or maybe she was just one of those cold, unfeeling people who didn't care if a child was slowly dying. Word must have gotten around by now that Will was the kind of cop who beat people. Maybe Lola was afraid of him. Hell, there had been a moment in that hallway when Will was afraid of himself.

He had felt numb when he got to Sara's apartment, like his heart wasn't even beating in his chest. He was thinking of all the men who had raised their fists to him when he was a child. All the violence he had seen. All the pain he had endured. And he was just as bad as the rest of them for beating that doorman into the ground.

Part of him had told Sara Linton about the incident because he had wanted to see the disappointment in her eyes, to know with just one look that she would never approve of him. What he got instead was ... understanding. She acknowledged that he had made a mistake, but she hadn't assumed that it defined his character. What kind of person did that? Not the kind of person Will had ever met. Not the kind of woman Will could ever understand.

Sara was right about how it was easier to do something bad the second time. Will saw it all the time at work: repeat offenders who had gotten away with it once and decided they might as well roll the dice and try it again. Maybe it was human nature to push those boundaries. A third of all DUI offenders ended up being arrested for drunk driving a second time. Over half of all the violent felons captured were already released convicts. Rapists had one of the highest recidivist rates in the prison system.

Will had learned a long time ago that the only thing he could control in any given situation was himself. He wasn't a victim. He wasn't prisoner to his temper. He could choose to be a good person. Sara had said as much. She had made it seem so easy.

And then he had forced that weird moment when they were together on the couch, staring at her like he was an ax murderer.

"Idiot." He rubbed his eyes, wishing he could rub away the memory. There was no use thinking about Sara Linton. In the end, it would lead to nothing.

Will saw a group of women loitering on the sidewalk ahead. They were all dressed in various shades of fantasy: schoolgirls, strippers, a transsexual who looked a lot like the mother from Leave It to Beaver. Will rolled down his window and they all did a silent negotiation, deciding who to send over. He drove a Porsche 911 he had rebuilt from the ground up. The car had taken him almost a decade to restore. It seemed to take a decade for the prostitutes to decide who to send.

Finally, one of the schoolgirls sauntered over. She leaned into the car, then backed out just as quickly. "Nuh-uh," she said. "No way. I ain't fuckin' no dog."

Will held out a twenty-dollar bill. "I'm looking for Lola."

Her lip twisted, and she snatched away the cash so quickly Will felt the paper burn his fingertips. "Yeah, that bitch'll fuck your dog. She on Eighteenth. Strolling by the old post office."

"Thank you."

The girl was already sashaying back to her group.

Will rolled up the window and took a U-turn. He saw the girls in his rearview mirror. The schoolgirl had passed the twenty on to her minder, who would in turn pass it on to the pimp. Will knew from Angie that the girls seldom got to keep any cash. The pimps took care of their living quarters, their food, their clothes. All the girls had to do was risk their lives and health every night by tricking whatever john pulled up with the right amount of cash. It was modern slavery, which was ironic, considering most if not all of the pimps were black.

Will turned onto Eighteenth Street and slowed the car to a crawl, coming up on a parked sedan under a streetlight. The driver was behind the wheel, his head back. Will gave it a few minutes and a head popped up from the man's lap. The door opened and the woman tried to get out, but the man reached over and grabbed her by the hair.

"Crap," Will mumbled, jumping out of his car. He locked the door with the remote on his keys as he jogged toward the sedan and yanked open the door.

"What the fuck?" the man yelled, still holding the woman by the hair.

"Hey, baby," Lola said, reaching her hand out to Will. He grabbed it without thinking, and she got out of the car, her wig staying in the man's hand. He cursed and threw it onto the street, pulling away from the curb so fast that the car door slammed shut.

Will told Lola, "We need to talk."

She bent over to get her wig, and courtesy of the streetlight, he saw straight up to her tonsils. "I'm running a business here."

Will tried, "Next time you need help—"

"Angie helped me, not you." She tugged at her skirt. "You watch the news? Cops found enough coke in that penthouse to teach the world to sing. I'm a fucking hero."

"Balthazar's going to be okay. The baby."

"Baltha-what?" She wrinkled her face. "Christ, kid barely had a chance."

"You took care of him. He meant something to you."

"Yeah, well." She put the wig on her head, trying to get it straight. "I got two kids, you know? Had them while I was locked up. Got to spend some time with them before the state took them away.” Her arms were bone-thin, and Will was again reminded of the thinspo videos they had found on Pauline’s computer. Those girls were starving themselves because they wanted to be thin. Lola was starving because she couldn’t afford food.

“Here,” he said, tugging the wig straight for her.

“Thanks.” She started walking down the street back toward her group. There was the usual mixture of schoolgirls and tramps, but they were older, harder women. The streets usually got tougher the higher the numbers. Pretty soon, Lola and her gang would be on Twenty-first, a street so hopeless that dispatch at the local police station routinely sent out ambulances to pick up women who had died during the night.

He tried, “I could arrest you for obstructing a crime.”

She kept walking. “Might be nice in jail. Getting kind of cold out here tonight.”

“Did Angie know about the baby?”

She stopped.

“Just tell me, Lola.”

Slowly, she turned around. Her eyes searched his, not looking for the right answer, but looking for the answer that he wanted to hear. “No.”

“You’re lying.”

Her face remained emotionless. “He really okay? The baby, I mean.”

“He’s with his mom now. I think he’ll be okay.”

She dug around in her purse, finding a pack of cigarettes and some matches. He waited for her to light up, take a drag. “I was at a party. This guy I know, he said there was this pad in some fancy apartment building. The doorman’s easy. Lets people in and out. Mostly, it was high-class stuff. You know, people who needed a nice place for a couple of hours, no questions asked. They come in and party, the maid comes the next day. The rich people who own the different apartments get back from Palm Beach or wherever and have no idea.” She picked a stray piece of tobacco off her tongue. “Something happened this time, though. Simkov, the doorman, pissed off somebody in the building. They gave him a two-week notice. He started letting in the lower clientele.”

“Like you?”

She lifted her chin.

“What’d he charge?”

“Have to talk to the boys about that. I just show up and fuck.”

“What boys?”

She exhaled a long plume of smoke.

Will let it go, knowing not to push her too hard. “Did you know the woman whose apartment you were in?”

“Never met her, never seen her, never heard of her.”

“So, you get there, Simkov lets you up, and then what?”

“At first it’s nice. Usually, we’ve been in one of the lower apartments. This was the penthouse. Lots of your better consumers. Good stash. Coke, some H. The crack showed up a couple of days later. Then the meth. Went downhill from there.”

Will remembered the trashed state of the apartment. “That happened fast.”

"Yeah, well. Drug addicts aren't exactly known for their restraint." She chuckled at a memory. "Couple of fights broke out. Some bitches got into it. Then the trannies went to town and—" She shrugged, like What do you expect?

"What about the baby?"

"Kid was in the nursery first time I got there. You got kids?"

He shook his head.

"Smart choice. Angie's not exactly the mothering type."

Will didn't bother to agree with her, because they both knew that was the God's honest truth. He asked, "What did you do when you found the baby?"

"The apartment wasn't a good place for him. I could see what was coming. The wrong kind of people were showing up. Simkov was letting anybody in. I moved the kid down the hall."

"To the trash room."

She grinned. "Ain't nobody worried about throwing away the trash at that party."

"Did you feed him?"

"Yeah," she said. "I fed him what was in the cabinets, changed his diaper. I did that with my own kids, you know? Like I said, they let you keep them for a while before they're turned over. I learned all about feeding and that kind of shit. I took pretty good care of him."

"Why did you leave him?" Will asked. "You were arrested on the street."

"My pimp didn't know about this—I was off the books, just having a good time. He tracked me down and told me to get back to work, so I did."

"How did you get back upstairs to take care of the baby?"

She jerked her hand up and down. "I tossed off Simkov. He's all right."

"Why didn't you tell me when you called that first night that there was a baby involved?"

"I figured I'd take care of him when I got out," she admitted. "I was doing a good job, right? I mean, I was doing good by him, keeping him fed and changing his little diapers. He's a sweet little boy. You seen him, right? You know he's sweet."

That sweet little boy was dehydrated and hours from dying when Will had seen him. "How did you know Simkov?"

She shrugged. "Otik's a longtime customer, you know?" She gestured toward the street. "Met him here on Millionaire's Row."

"I wouldn't exactly call him a stand-up guy."

"He did me a favor letting me go up there. I made some good cash. I kept the kid safe. What else you want from me?"

"Did Angie know about the baby?"

She coughed, the sound coming from deep in her chest. When she spit onto the sidewalk, Will felt his stomach roll. "You're gonna have to ask her about that."

Lola swung her purse over her shoulder and headed back toward her group.

Will took out his cell phone as he walked toward his car. The thing was on its last legs, but it still managed to make the call.

"Hello?" Faith said.

Will didn't want to talk about what had happened this afternoon, so he didn't give her an opening. "I talked to Lola." He ran down what the prostitute had told him. "Simkov called her in to help her make some extra cash. I'm sure he took his share off the top."

"Maybe that's something we can use," Faith answered. "Amanda wants me to talk to Simkov tomorrow. We'll see if his story matches up."

"What did you find on him?"

"Not much. He lives in the apartment building on the bottom floor. He's supposed to be on the desk from eight until six, but there's been problems with that lately."

"I guess that's why they gave him his two-week notice."

"His criminal report came up clean. His bank account's all right, considering he gets free rent." Faith paused, and he could hear her turning the pages in her notebook. "We found some porn in his apartment, but nothing young or kinky. His phone's clean."

"Sounded to me like he'd let anybody into the building for the right amount of cash. Did Anna Lindsey give you anything?"

She told him about her fruitless conversation with the woman. "I don't know why she won't talk. Maybe she's scared."

"Maybe she thinks if she puts it out of her mind, doesn't talk about it, then it'll go away."

"I suppose that works if you've got the emotional maturity of a six-year-old."

Will tried not to take her words personally.

Faith told him, "We looked at the front-door logs from the apartment building. There was a cable guy and a couple of delivery people. I talked to all of them as well as the building maintenance guy. They're checking out. Clean records, solid alibis."

Will got into his car. "What about neighbors?"

"No one seems to know anything, and these people are too rich to talk to the police."

Will had met the type before. They didn't want to get involved and they didn't want their names in the papers. "Did any of them know Anna?"

"Same as with the others—anyone who knew her didn't like her."

"What about forensics?"

"Should be back in the morning."

"What about the computers?"

"Nothing, and the warrants aren't in for the bank yet, so we don't have access to Olivia Tanner's cell phone, BlackBerry, or her computer at work."

"Our bad guy is smarter at this than we are."

"I know," she admitted. "Everything is starting to feel like a dead end."

There was a lull in the conversation. Will searched for something to fill it, but Faith beat him to the punch.

"So, Amanda and I are going to interview the doorman at eight in the morning, then I've got an appointment I need to go to. It's out in Snellville."

Will couldn't think what anyone would be doing in Snellville.

"I figure it'll take an hour or so. Hopefully, we'll have an ID on Jake Berman by then. We need to talk to Rick Sigler, too. I keep letting him slip through the cracks."

"He's white, early forties."

"Amanda made the same point. She sent someone around to talk to Sigler earlier today. He was at home with his wife.”

Will groaned. “Did he deny even being at the scene?”

“Apparently, he tried to. He wouldn’t even acknowledge he was with Jake Berman, which makes it seem more and more like a hookup.” Faith sighed. “Amanda’s got a tail on Sigler, but his background is clean. No aliases, no multiple addresses, born and raised in Georgia. He’s got K-through-twelve school records in Conyers. There’s no indication that he’s ever been to Michigan, let alone lived there.”

“We’re only stuck on this brother thing because Pauline McGhee told her son to watch out for his uncle.”

“True, but what else do we have to follow? If we hit any more brick walls, we’re both going to start getting concussions.”

Will waited a few seconds. “What kind of appointment?”

“It’s a personal thing.”

“All right.”

Neither of them seemed to have anything to say after that. Why was it so easy for Will to spill his guts to Sara Linton, but he could barely manage to have a normal conversation with any other women in his life—especially his partner?

Faith offered, “I’ll talk about my thing if you’ll talk about yours.”

He laughed. “I think we need to start from the beginning. With the case, I mean.”

She agreed. “The best way to see if you’ve missed something is to retrace your steps.”

“When you get back from your appointment. We’ll go to the Coldfields’, talk to Rick Sigler at his work so he’s not freaking out in front of his wife, then go over all the witnesses—anybody who’s even remotely connected to this thing. Fellow employees, maintenance men who’ve been to the house, tech support, anybody they’ve had contact with.”

“Couldn’t hurt,” she agreed. There was another lull. Again she filled it. “Are you all right?”

Will had pulled up in front of his house. He put the car in park, wishing that a bolt of lightning would just come down from the sky and kill him dead.

Angie’s car was blocking the driveway.

“Will?”

“Yeah,” he managed. “I’ll see you in the morning.”

He ended the call and tucked the phone into his pocket. The lights were on in the front room, but Angie hadn’t bothered to turn on the porch light. He had cash in his pocket, credit cards. He could stay in a hotel tonight. There had to be a place that wouldn’t mind dogs, or maybe he could sneak Betty in under his jacket.

Betty stood and stretched on the seat. The front porch light came on.

Will mumbled under his breath as he scooped up the dog. He got out of his car and locked it, then headed up the driveway. He opened the gate to the backyard and set Betty on the grass, then he stood outside his own house a few minutes, debating, then decided he was being stupid and made himself go in.

Angie was on the couch with her feet curled up under her. Her long dark hair was down the way he liked it, and she was wearing a tight black dress that hugged every curve. Sara had looked beautiful, but Angie looked sexy. Her makeup was dark, her lips a blood red. He wondered if she had made an effort. Probably. She always sensed when Will was pulling away. She was like a shark smelling blood in the water.

She greeted him the same way the prostitute did. "Hey, baby."
"Hey."

Angie stood up from the couch, stretching like a cat as she walked over to him. "Good day?" she asked, putting her arms around his neck. Will turned his head, and she turned it back, kissing him on the lips.

He said, "Don't do that."

She kissed him again because she had never liked being told what to do.

Will kept himself as impassive as he could, and she finally dropped her arms.

"What happened to your hand?"

"I beat someone."

She laughed, like he was joking. "Really?"

"Yeah." He leaned his hand on the back of the couch. One of the Band-Aids was peeling up.

"You beat someone." She was taking him seriously now. "Any witnesses?"

"None that are talking."

"Good for you, baby." She was close to him, right behind him. "I bet Faith wet her pants." Her hand traced down his arm, rested on the back of his wrist. Her tone changed. "Where's your ring?"

"In my pocket." Will had taken it off before he'd gone up to Sara's apartment. At the time, he'd fooled himself into thinking he'd done it because his fingers were swelling and the ring was getting tight.

Angie's hand went to his pants pocket. Will closed his eyes, feeling the day catch up with him. Not just the day, but the last eight months. Angie was the only woman he had ever been with, and his body had been lonely, almost aching for the feel of her.

Her fingers touched him through the thin material of his pocket. His reaction was immediate, and when she breathed into his ear, he gripped the couch so that he could still stand.

She took his ear between her teeth. "You miss me?"

He swallowed, unable to speak as she pressed her breasts, her body, into his back. He leaned his head back and she kissed his neck, but it wasn't Angie he was thinking about when her fingers wrapped around him. It was Sara, her long, thin fingers working on his hand as they both sat on the couch. The way her hair had smelled, because he had let himself bend down just for a moment and inhaled as quietly as he could. She smelled of goodness and mercy and kindness. She smelled of everything that he had ever wanted—everything that he could never have.

"Hey." Angie had stopped. "Where'd you go?"

With effort, Will managed to zip up his pants. He shouldered Angie out of the way as he walked across the room.

She asked, "Is it your time of the month again?"

"Did you know about the baby?"

She cocked her hand on her hip. "What baby?"

"I don't care what the answer is, but I want the truth. I need to know the truth."

"You gonna beat me if I don't tell you?"

"I'm gonna hate you," he answered, and they both knew what he was saying was true. "That baby could've been you or me. Hell, that baby was me."

Her tone was sharp, defensive. "Mommy leave him in the trash-can?"

"It was that or whore him out for speed."

She pressed her lips together, but would not look away. "Touché," she finally said, because Diedre Polaski had done just that very thing to her baby girl.

Will repeated his question, the only question that mattered anymore. "Did you know that there was a baby in that penthouse?"

"Lola was taking care of it."

"What?"

"She's not bad. She was making sure it was okay. If she hadn't got popped—"

"Wait a minute." He put out his hands to stop her. "You think that whore was taking care of that baby?"

"He's fine, right? I made some calls to Grady. Mother and son are united again."

"You made some calls?" He couldn't believe what he was hearing. "Jesus Christ, Angie. He's a tiny baby. He would've been dead if we'd waited any longer."

"But you didn't and he's not."

"Angie—"

"People always take care of babies, Will. Who looks out for people like Lola?"

"You're worried about some crack whore when there's a baby in a trash heap starving to death?" He didn't let her answer. "That's it. That's it for me."

"What the hell does that mean?"

"It means I'm finished. It means the string on our yo-yo has broken."

"Fuck you."

"No more back and forth. No more screwing around on me, running out on me in the middle of the night, then running back in a month or a year later pretending like you can lick my wounds all better."

"You make it sound so romantic."

He opened the front door. "I want you out of my house and out of my life." She didn't move, so he walked over to her, started pushing her toward the door.

"What are you doing?" She pushed back, and when he wouldn't budge, she slapped him. "Get the fuck away from me."

He lifted her from behind, and she used her foot to kick the door closed.

"Get out," he said, trying to reach the doorknob even as he held on to her.

Angie had been a beat cop before she'd been a detective, and she knew how to take him down. Her foot kicked out, popping him in the back of the knee, dropping him to the floor. Will held on, pulling her down with him so they were struggling on the floor like a couple of angry dogs.

"Stop it," she screamed, kicking him, punching him, using every part of her body to cause pain.

Will rolled her onto her stomach, pushing her flat against the wood floor. He grabbed both her hands in one of his, squeezing them together so she couldn't fight him. Without even thinking, he reached down and ripped away her underwear. Her nails dug into the back of his hand as he slid his fingers inside her.

"Asshole," she hissed, but she was so wet Will could barely feel his fingers moving in and out. He found the right spot, and she cursed again, pressing her face into the floor. She never came with him. It was part of her power play. She always squeezed every last bit of soul out of Will, but she would never let him do the same to her.

"Stop it," she demanded, but she was moving against his hand, tensing with each stroke. He unzipped his pants and pushed himself inside her. She tried to tighten against him, but he pushed harder, forcing her to open up. She groaned and there was a sweet release as she took him in deeper, then even more. He pulled her up to her knees, fucking her as fast as he could while his fingers worked to bring her to the edge. She started to moan, a deep, guttural sound he had never heard before. Will rammed himself into her, not caring if he left marks up and down her body, not caring if he broke her. When she finally came, she gripped him so hard that it almost hurt to be inside of her. His own release was so savage that he ended up collapsed on top of her, panting, every part of him sore.

Will rolled onto his back. Angie's hair was tangled around her face. Her makeup was smeared. She was breathing as hard as he was.

"Jesus Christ," she mumbled. "Jesus Christ." She tried to reach out and touch his face, but he slapped her hand away.

They lay there like that, both panting on the floor, for what seemed like hours. Will tried to feel remorse, or anger, but all he felt was exhaustion. He was so sick of this, so sick of the way Angie drove him to extremes. He thought again about what Sara had said: Learn from your mistakes.

Angie Polaski was looking like the biggest mistake Will had ever made in his miserable life.

"Christ." She was still breathing hard. She rolled over on her side, slid her hand up under his shirt. Her hands were hot, sweaty against his skin. Angie said, "Whoever she is, tell her I said thanks."

He stared up at the ceiling, not trusting himself to look at her.

"I've been screwing you for twenty-three years, baby, and you've never fucked me like that before." Her fingers found the ridge at the bottom of his rib, the place where the skin puckered from a cigarette burn. "What's her name?"

Will still didn't answer.

Angie whispered, "Tell me her name."

Will's throat hurt when he tried to swallow. "Nobody."

She gave a deep, knowing laugh. "Is she a nurse or a cop?" She laughed again. "Hooker?"

Will didn't say anything. He tried to block Sara out of his mind, didn't want her in his thoughts right now because he knew what was coming. Will had scored one point, so Angie had to score ten.

He flinched as Angie found a sensitive nerve on his damaged skin.

She asked, "Is she normal?"

Normal. They had used that word in the children's home to describe people not like them—people with families, people with lives, people whose parents didn't beat them or pimp them out or treat them like trash.

Angie kept tracing the tip of her finger around the burn. "She know about your problem?"

Will tried to swallow again. His throat scratched. He felt sick.

"She know you're stupid?"

He felt trapped under her finger, the way it was pressing into the round scar where the burning cigarette had melted his flesh. Just when he thought he couldn't take it anymore, she stopped, putting her mouth close to his ear, sliding her fingers up the sleeve of his shirt. She found the long scar running up his arm where the razor had opened his flesh.

"I remember the blood," she said. "The way your hand shook, the way the razor blade opened up your skin. Do you remember that?"

He closed his eyes, tears leaking out. Of course he remembered. If he thought about it hard enough, he could still feel the tip of the sharp metal scraping across his bone because he had known that he should send the razor deep—deep enough to open the vein, deep enough to make sure it was done right.

"Remember how I held you?" she asked, and he could feel her arms around him even though she wasn't holding him now. The way she had wrapped her whole body around him like a blanket. "There was so much blood."

It had dripped down her own arms, onto her legs, her feet.

She had held on to him so tight that he couldn't breathe, and he had loved her so much, because he knew she understood why he was doing it, why he had to stop the madness that was going on around him. Every scar on his body, every burn, every break—Angie knew about it the same way she knew everything about herself. Every secret Will had, Angie held somewhere deep inside her. She held on to it with her life.

She was his life.

He gulped, his mouth still spitless. "How long?"

She rested her hand on his stomach. She knew she had him back, knew it was just a matter of snapping her fingers. "How long what, baby?"

"How long do you want me to love you?"

She didn't answer him immediately, and he was about to ask the question again when she said, "Isn't that a country music song?"

He turned to look at her, searching her eyes for some sign of kindness that he had never seen before. "Just tell me how long so I can count the days, so I know when this is finally going to be over."

Angie traced her hand down the side of his face.

"Five years? Ten years?" His throat was closing, like someone had fed him glass. "Just tell me, Angie. How long until I can stop loving you?"

She leaned in, put her mouth to his ear again. "Never."

She pushed herself up from the floor, smoothing down her skirt, finding her shoes and underwear. Will lay there as she opened the door, then left without bothering to look back. He didn't blame her. Angie never looked back. She knew what was behind her, just like she always knew what was ahead.

Will didn't get up when he heard her shoes on the porch stairs or her car starting up in the driveway. He didn't get up when he heard Betty scratching at the dog door, which he'd forgotten to open for her. Will did not move for anything. He lay on the floor all night, until the sun coming in through the windows told him it was time to go back to work.

DAY FOUR

CHAPTER TWENTY

Pauline was hungry, but she could handle that. She understood the pains in her stomach and lower intestines, the way the spasms reverberated through her gut as they grasped for any type of nourishment. She knew it well, and she could handle it. The thirst was different, though. There was no way around the thirst. She had never gone without water for this long before. She was desperate, willing to do anything. She'd even peed on the floor and tried to drink it, but it just made her thirst even wilder so that she'd ended up sitting on her knees, baying like a wolf.

No more. She couldn't be in that dark place for long. She couldn't let it get to her again, envelop her so that all she wanted to do was curl into a ball and pine for Felix.

Felix. He was the only reason to get out of here, to fight, to stop the fuckers from taking Pauline away from her baby boy.

She lay on her side, arms pinned to her waist, feet sticking straight out, and lifted her upper body, straining her neck so that she could line herself up right. She held herself like that, muscles tight, sweating, the blindfold rubbing her skin, as she took aim. The chains around her wrists rattled from exertion, and before she could stop herself, she reared back her head and pounded it into the wall.

Pain streaked through her neck. She saw stars—literal stars—swimming through her vision. She fell onto her back, panting, trying not to hyperventilate, willing herself not to pass out.

"What are you doing?" the other woman asked.

The bitch had been lying on her back like a corpse for the last twelve hours, unresponsive, uncaring, and now she was asking questions?

"Shut up," Pauline snarled. She didn't have time for this shit. She rolled over onto her side again, lining up her body with the wall, moving down a few more inches. She held her breath, squeezed her eyes shut and pounded her head into the wall again.

"Fuck!" she screamed, her head exploding with pain. She fell onto her back again. There was blood on her forehead, sliding underneath the blindfold, getting into her eyes. She couldn't blink it away, couldn't wipe it. She felt like a spider was crawling across her eyelids, seeping into her eyeballs.

"No," Pauline said, and she found herself wrapped in a full-on hallucination, spiders crawling across her face, digging into her skin, laying eggs in her eyes. "No!"

She jerked up to sitting, head spinning from the sudden motion. She was panting again, and she bent her head to her knees, touched her chest to her thighs. She had to get hold of herself. She couldn't give in to the thirst. She couldn't let the dementia settle into her brain again so that she lost where she was.

"What are you doing?" the stranger whispered, terrified.

"Leave me alone."

"He'll hear you. He'll come down."

"He's not coming down," Pauline snapped. Then, to prove it, she screamed, "Come down here, you motherfucker!" Her throat was so raw that she started coughing from the exertion, but she still screamed, "I'm trying to escape! Come stop me, you limp-dicked motherfucker!"

They waited and waited. Pauline ticked off the seconds. There were no footsteps on the stairs. No lights turned on. No doors opened.

"How do you know?" the stranger said. "How do you know what he's doing?"

"He's waiting for one of us to break," Pauline told her. "And it's not going to be me."

The woman asked another question, but Pauline ignored her, lining herself up with the wall again. She braced herself to pound her head into the wall again, but she couldn't do it. She couldn't hurt herself again. Not right now. Later. She would rest a few minutes and then do it later.

She rolled onto her back, tears streaming down her face. She didn't open her mouth, because she didn't want the woman to know she was crying. The stranger had heard the sobbing, heard Pauline sliding around in her own piss. That show was over. No more tickets would be sold.

"What's your name?" the stranger asked.

"None of your goddamn business!" Pauline barked. She didn't want to make friends. She wanted to get out of here any way she could, and if that meant walking over the stranger's dead body to freedom, Pauline would do it. "Just shut up."

"Tell me what you're doing and maybe I can help you."

"You can't help me. You got that?" Pauline twisted to face the stranger, even though they were in total darkness. "Listen up, bitch. Only one person is going to make it out of here alive and it's not going to be you. You understand me? Shit rolls downhill, and I'm not going to be the one smelling like a sewer when this is over with. All right?"

The stranger was silent. Pauline fell onto her back, looking up at darkness, trying to brace herself for the wall again.

The woman's voice was barely a whisper. "You're Atlanta Thin, aren't you?"

Pauline's throat tightened like a noose had been put around it. "What?"

" 'Shit rolls downhill, and I'm not going to be the one smelling like a sewer,' " she repeated. "You say that a lot."

Pauline chewed her lip.

"I'm Mia-Three."

Mia—slang for "bulimia." Pauline recognized the screen name, but still insisted, "I don't know what you're talking about."

Mia asked, "Did you show them that email at work?"

Pauline opened her mouth, just tried to breathe a while. She tried to think of the other things she had told the Pro-Anna Internet group, the desperate thoughts that raced through her mind and somehow ended up being typed onto the keyboard. It was almost like purging, but instead of emptying your stomach, you were emptying your brain. Telling somebody those awful thoughts you had, knowing they had them, too, somehow made it easier to get up every morning.

And now the stranger wasn't a stranger anymore.

Mia repeated, "Did you show them the email?"

Pauline swallowed, even though there was only dust in her throat. She couldn't believe she was tied up like a fucking hog and this woman wanted to talk about work. Work didn't matter anymore. Nothing mattered anymore. The email was from another life, a life where Pauline had a job she wanted to keep, a mortgage, a car payment. They were waiting down here to be raped, tortured, murdered, and this woman was worried about a fucking email?

Mia said, "I didn't get to call Michael, my brother. Maybe he's looking for me."

"He won't find you," Pauline told her. "Not out here."

"Where are we?"

"I don't know," she answered—the truth. "I woke up in the trunk of a car. I was chained. I'm not sure how long I was in there. The trunk opened. I started to scream, then he Tased me again." She closed her eyes. "Then I woke up here."

"I was in my backyard," Mia told her. "I heard something. I thought maybe a cat ..." She let her words trail off. "I was in a trunk when I came to. I'm not sure how long he kept me in there. It felt like days. I tried to count away the hours, but ..." She went into a long silence that Pauline didn't know how to interpret. Finally she said, "Do you think that's how he found us—on the chat board?"

"Probably," she lied. Pauline knew how he had found them, and it wasn't that damn chat room. It was Pauline who had led them here—Pauline's big mouth that had gotten them into trouble. She wasn't going to tell Mia what she knew. There would be more questions, and with the questions would come accusations that Pauline knew she wouldn't be able to handle.

Not now. Not when her brain felt like it was stuffed with cotton and the blood dripping down her eyes felt like the tiny, hairy legs of a million spiders.

Pauline gasped for breath, trying to keep herself from freaking out again. She thought about Felix and the way he smelled when she bathed him with the new soap she picked up at Colony Square during her lunch break.

Mia asked, "It's still in the safe, right? They'll find the email in the safe and they'll know you told the upholsterer to measure the elevator."

"Bitch, what does it matter? Do you not understand where we are, what's going to happen to us? So what if they find the email? Some fucking consolation. 'She's dead, but she was right all along.' "

"More than you got in life."

They shared a moment of commiseration. Pauline tried to remember what little she knew about Mia. The woman didn't post much on the board, but when she did, she was pretty on point. Like Pauline and a few other posters, Mia didn't like whiners and she didn't take much bullshit.

"They can't starve us," Mia said. "I can go nineteen days before I start to shut down."

Pauline was impressed. "I can go about the same," she lied. Her max had been twelve, and then they'd put her in the hospital and plumped her up like a Thanksgiving turkey.

Mia said, "Water is the issue."

"Yeah," Pauline agreed. "How long can you—"

"I've never tried to go without water," Mia interrupted, finishing the sentence.

"It doesn't have any calories."

"Four days," Pauline told her. "I read somewhere that you can only last about four days."

"We can last longer." It wasn't wishful thinking. If Mia could last nineteen days without eating, she sure as hell could last longer than Pauline without water.

That was the problem. She could outlast Pauline. No one had outlasted Pauline before.

Mia asked the obvious question. "Why hasn't he fucked us?"

Pauline pressed her head to the cool concrete floor, tried to keep the panic from building up inside of her. The fucking wasn't the problem. It was the other stuff—the games, the taunting, the tricks ... the trash bags.

"He wants us weak," Mia guessed. "He wants to make sure we can't fight back." Mia's chains rattled as she moved. Her voice sounded closer, and Pauline guessed she'd turned onto her side. "What were you doing? Before, I mean. Why were you hitting the wall with your head?"

"If I can punch through the sheetrock, maybe I can get out. It's standard building code that the two-by-fours have to be sixteen inches apart."

Mia's tone filled with awe. "You have a sixteen-inch waist?"

"No, you dumbass. I can turn sideways and slide out."

Mia laughed at her own stupidity, but then she pointed out something that made Pauline feel equally as idiotic. "Why aren't you using your feet?"

They were both quiet, but Pauline felt something welling up inside her. Her stomach twinged, and she heard laughter in her ears, honest-to-God, all-out laughter, as she thought about how fucking stupid she was.

"Oh, God," Mia sighed. She was laughing, too. "You are such an idiot."

Pauline twisted her body around, trying to spin on her shoulder. She lined up her feet, bracing them together so that the chains wouldn't throw her off, and kicked. The sheetrock caved on the first try.

"Dumbass," she muttered, this time at herself. She slid back around to face the opening, using her teeth to bite off the broken chunks of sheetrock. There was poison in the dust, but she didn't care. She would rather die with her head poking six inches out of this room than be trapped here while she waited for that fucker to come for her.

"Did you get it?" Mia asked. "Did you break—"

"Shut up," Pauline told her, biting into foam padding. He had soundproofed the walls. That was to be expected. No big deal. She just grabbed it with her teeth, taking chunk after chunk out, aching for the feel of fresh air on her face.

"Fuck!" Pauline screamed. She inched around so that her waist was lined up with the hole. She reached out with her fingers, which barely went past the broken sheetrock. She tore out the foam, then her fingers brushed something that felt like a screen. She arched her back, reaching her hands out as far as they would go. Her fingers traced along crisscrossed wire. "Goddamn it!"

"What is it?"

"Chicken wire." He had lined the walls with chicken wire so they couldn't break out.

Pauline angled herself around again and jammed her feet against the wire. The soles of her shoes met solid resistance. Instead of the screen giving, the counterforce moved her several inches across the floor. She inched back to try again, rolling over onto her stomach and placing her sweaty palms to the cement. Pauline reared her feet back and kicked with all her strength. Again she met solid resistance, her body sliding away from the wall.

"Oh, Jesus," she gasped, falling onto her back. The tears came, the tiny spider legs encroaching on her vision. "What am I going to do?"

"Can your hands reach?"

"No," Pauline cried. Hope drained out of her with every breath. Her hands were too tight to the belt. The chicken wire was attached to the back of the two-by-four. There was no way she could reach it.

Pauline's body shook with sobs. She had not seen him in years, but she still knew how his mind worked. The basement was his staging ground, a carefully prepared prison where he would starve them into submission. But this was not the worst of it. There would be a cave somewhere, a dark place in the earth that he had lovingly dug out by hand. The basement would break them. The cave would destroy them. The bastard had thought of everything.

Again.

Mia had managed to inch her way over. Her voice was close, almost on top of Pauline. "Shut up," Mia ordered, pushing Pauline out of the way. "We'll use our mouths."

"What?"

"It's thin metal, right? Chicken wire?"

"Yeah, but—"

"You bend it back and forth and it breaks."

Pauline shook her head. This was crazy.

"All we need is for one piece to give," Mia said, as if the logic was clear. "Just grab it in your mouth and pull back and forth, back and forth. It'll break eventually, then we can kick it. Or we can just break every single piece off with our mouths."

"We can't—"

"Don't tell me can't, you fucking bitch." Mia's foot was chained, but she managed to kick Pauline in the shin.

"Ouch! Jesus—"

"Start counting," Mia ordered, inching toward the hole in the wall. "When you get to two hundred, it'll be your turn."

Pauline wasn't going to do it because she would be damned if she let this bitch tell her what to do. She heard something then—teeth on metal. Grinding, twisting. Two hundred seconds. Their skin would rip open. Their gums would be in shreds. There was no telling if it would even work.

Pauline rolled over, sat up on her knees.

She started counting.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Faith had never thought of herself as a morning person, but she had gotten into the habit of going in to work early when Jeremy was a child. You couldn't not be a morning person when there was a hungry boy to feed, dress, scrutinize and send off to the bus stop by 7:13 at the latest. If not for Jeremy, she might have been one of those late-night people, the sort who rolls into bed well after midnight, but Faith's usual bedtime ran closer to ten, even after Jeremy was a teenager and his waking hours were few and far between.

For his own reasons, Will was always at work early, too. Faith saw his Porsche parked in its usual space as she pulled the Mini into the lot under City Hall East. She put the car in park, then sat there trying to get the driver's seat back where she could reach the pedals and the steering wheel at the same time without being impaled by one while having to stretch to reach the other. After several minutes, she finally found the right combination and briefly thought about having the seat bolted into place. If Will wanted to drive her car again, he'd have to do it with his knees around his ears.

There was a tap at her window, and Faith looked up, startled. Sam Lawson stood there, a cup of coffee in his hand.

Faith opened the car door and wedged herself out, feeling like she'd put on twenty pounds overnight. Finding something to wear this morning had been a nearly impossible task. She was carrying enough water weight to fill a tank at SeaWorld. Thankfully, her giddiness over Sam Lawson had been a twenty-four-hour virus. She did not relish having a conversation with him now, especially since her mind needed to be focused on the day ahead of her.

"Hey, babe," Sam said, looking her up and down in his usual predatory way.

Faith got her purse out of the back seat. "Long time no see."

He gave a half-shrug that implied he was merely the victim of circumstance. "Here," he said, offering her the coffee. "Decaf."

Faith had tried to drink some coffee this morning. The smell had sent her rushing to the bathroom. "Sorry." She ignored the cup, walking away from him, trying not to get sick again.

Sam tossed the cup into the trashcan as he caught up with her. "Morning sickness?"

Faith glanced around, afraid they'd be heard. "I haven't told anyone but my boss." She tried to remember when you were supposed to tell people. There had to be a certain number of weeks before you were sure it took. Faith must be coming up on that mark. She should start telling people soon. Should she get them all together, invite her mother and Jeremy to dinner, get her brother on speakerphone, or was there a way to send a bulk anonymous email and perhaps jump on a flight to the Caribbean for a few weeks to avoid the fallout?

Sam's fingers snapped in front of her face. "You in there?"

"Barely." Faith reached for the door to the building just as he did. She let him open it for her. "I've got a lot on my mind."

"About last night—"

"It was two nights ago, actually."

He grinned. "Yeah, but I wasn't really thinking about it until last night."

Faith sighed as she pressed the elevator button.

"Come here." He pulled her toward the alcove on the other side of the elevator. There was a vending machine with three rows of sticky buns, which Faith knew without having to look.

Sam stroked her hair behind her ear. Faith pulled back. She wasn't ready for intimacy this early in the morning. She wasn't sure she was ever ready for it. Without thinking, she glanced up to make sure there wasn't a security camera watching them.

He said, "I was an ass the other night. I'm sorry."

She heard the elevator doors open, then close. "It's all right."

"No, it's not." He leaned in to kiss her, but she pulled back again.

"Sam, I'm at work." She didn't add the rest of what she was thinking, which was that she was in the middle of a case where one woman had died, another woman had been tortured and two more were missing. "This isn't the time."

"It's never the time," he said, something he'd often told her years ago when they were seeing each other. "I want to try this again with you."

"What about Gretchen?"

He shrugged. "Hedging my bets."

Faith groaned, pushing him away. She went back to the elevator and pressed the button. Sam didn't leave, so she told him, "I'm pregnant."

"I remember."

"I don't want to break your heart, but the baby's not yours."

"Doesn't matter."

She turned to face him. "Are you trying to work out some ghosts because your wife had an abortion?"

"I'm trying to get back into your life, Faith. I know it has to be on your terms."

Faith balked at the backhanded compliment. "I seem to recall one of the problems between us, other than you being a drunk, me being a cop and my mother thinking you were the Antichrist, was you didn't like the fact that I had a son."

"I was jealous of the attention you gave him."

At the time, she had accused him of this very thing. To hear him admit to it now left her nearly breathless.

"I've grown up," he said.

The elevator opened. Faith made sure the car was empty, then held the door open with her hand. "I can't have this conversation now. I've got work to do." She got into the elevator and let the doors go.

"Jake Berman lives in Coweta County."

Faith nearly lost her hand stopping the doors. "What?"

He took his notebook out of his pocket and wrote as he talked. "I tracked him down through his church. He's a deacon and a Sunday School teacher. They've got a great website with his picture on it. Lambs and rainbows. Evangelical."

Faith's brain couldn't process the information. "Why did you find him?"

"I wanted to see if I could beat you to the punch."

Faith didn't like where this was going. She tried to neutralize the situation. "Listen, Sam, we don't know that he's a bad guy."

"I guess you've never been in the men's room at the Mall of Georgia."

"Sam—"

"I haven't talked to him," he interrupted. "I just wanted to see if I could track him down when no one else could. I'm tired of Rockdale squeezing my balls. I much prefer it when you do."

Faith let that comment go, too. "Give me the morning to talk to him."

"I told you, I'm not looking for a story." He grinned, showing all his teeth. "It was an exercise in faith."

She narrowed her eyes at him.

"I wanted to see if I could do your job." He tore off the piece of paper, giving her a wink. "Pretty easy stuff."

Faith grabbed the address before he changed his mind. He held her gaze as the doors closed, then Faith found herself staring at her reflection on the backs of the doors. She was sweating already, though she supposed in a pinch that could pass for a pregnant glow. Her hair was starting to frizz because, even though it was only April, the temperature was inching up the thermometer.

She looked at the address Sam had given her. There was a heart around the entire thing, which she found annoying and endearing in equal parts. She didn't quite trust that he wasn't looking for a story in Jake Berman. Maybe the Atlanta Beacon was doing a down-low exclusive, outing married churchgoers who were trolling glory holes and finding raped and tortured women in the middle of the road.

Could Berman be Pauline's brother? Now that she had an address, Faith wasn't so sure. What were the odds that Jake Berman had hooked up with Rick Sigler, and both men just happened to be on the road at the same time the Coldfields' car hit Anna Lindsey?

The doors opened and Faith walked out onto her floor. None of the hall lights were on, and she flipped the switches as she walked toward Will's office. No light seeped from under his door, but she knocked anyway, knowing from his car that he was in the building.

"Yes?"

She opened the door. He was sitting at his desk with his hands clasped in front of his stomach. The lights were off.

She asked, "Everything okay?"

He didn't answer her question. "What's up?"

Faith shut the door and opened the folding chair. She saw the back of Will's hand, and that some new scratches had been added to the cuts he'd received while beating Simkov's face. She didn't mention this, instead going to the case. "I got Jake Berman's address. He's in Coweta. That's about forty-five minutes from here, right?"

"If the traffic's good." He held out his hand for the address.

She read it off to him. "Nineteen-thirty-five Lester Street."

He still had his hand out. For some reason, all Faith could do was stare at his fingers.

Will snapped, "I'm not a fucking idiot, Faith. I can read an address."

His tone was sharp enough to make the hair on the back of her neck rise. Will seldom cursed, and she had never heard him say “fuck” before. She asked, “What’s wrong?”

“Nothing’s wrong. I just need the address. I can’t do the interview with Simkov. I’ll go find Berman and we’ll meet back here after your appointment.” He shook his hand. “Now give me the address.”

She crossed her arms. She would die before she gave him the piece of paper. “I don’t know what the hell is wrong with you, but you need to get your head out of your ass and talk to me about this before we’ve got a real problem.”

“Faith, I’ve only got two testicles. If you want one, you’re going to have to talk to Amanda or Angie.”

Angie. With that one word, all the fight seemed to go out of him.

Faith sat back in the chair, her arms still crossed, studying him. Will looked out the window, and she could see the faint line of the scar going down the side of his face. She wanted to know how it had happened, how his skin had been gouged from his jaw, but as with everything else, the scar was just another thing they did not talk about.

Faith put the paper on his desk and slid the address across to him.

Will gave it a cursory glance. “There’s a heart around it.”

“Sam drew it.”

Will folded the paper and put it in his vest pocket. “Are you seeing him?”

Faith was loath to use the words “booty call,” so she just shrugged. “It’s complicated.”

He nodded—the same nod they always used when there was something personal that wasn’t going to be discussed.

She was sick of this. What was going to happen in a month when she started showing more? What was going to happen in a year when she collapsed on the job because she had miscalculated her insulin? She could easily see Will making excuses for her weight gain or simply helping her up and telling her she should be careful where she stepped. He was so damn good at pretending the house wasn’t on fire even as he ran around looking for water to put it out.

She threw up her hands in surrender. “I’m pregnant.”

His eyebrows shot up.

“Victor’s the father. I’m also diabetic. That’s why I passed out in the garage.”

He seemed too shocked to speak.

“I should’ve told you before. That’s what my secret appointment is in Snellville. I’m going to the doctor so she can help me with this diabetes thing.”

“Sara can’t be your doctor?”

“She referred me to a specialist.”

“A specialist means it’s serious.”

“It’s a challenge. The diabetes makes it more difficult. It’s manageable, though.” She had to add, “At least that’s what Sara said.”

“Do you need me to go to your appointment with you?”

Faith had a glimpse of Will sitting in the waiting room of Delia Wallace’s office with her purse in his lap. “No. Thank you. I need to do this on my own.”

“Does Victor—”

“Victor doesn’t know. No one knows except you and Amanda, and I only told her because she caught me shooting up with insulin.”

"You have to give yourself shots?"

"Yeah."

She could almost see his mind working, the questions he wanted to ask her but didn't know how to frame.

Faith said, "If you want another partner—"

"Why would I want another partner?"

"Because it's a problem, Will. I don't know how much of a problem, but my blood sugar drops or goes up, and I get emotional, and I either bite your head off or feel like I'm going to burst into tears, and I don't know how I'm going to do my job with this thing."

"You'll work it out," he said, always reasonable. "I worked it out. My problem, I mean."

He was so adaptive. Anything bad that happened, no matter how horrible, he just nodded and moved on. She supposed that was something he'd learned at the orphanage. Or maybe Angie Polaski had drilled it into him. As a survival skill, it was commendable. As the basis of a relationship, it was irritating as hell.

And there was absolutely nothing Faith could do about it.

Will sat up in his chair. He did his usual trick, making a joke to ease the tension. "If I get a vote, I would rather you bite my head off than start crying."

"Back at you."

"I need to apologize." Suddenly, he was serious again. "For what I did to Simkov. I've never laid hands on anyone like that before. Not ever." He looked her directly in the eye. "I promise it won't happen again."

All Faith could say was, "Thank you." Of course she didn't agree with what Will had done, but it was hard to shout out recriminations when he was so obviously already doing a good job of hating himself.

It was Faith's turn to lighten things up. "Let's stay away from good cop/bad cop for a while."

"Yeah, stupid cop/bitchy cop works a lot better for us." He reached into his vest pocket and handed her back Jake Berman's details. "We should call Coweta and have them put eyes on Berman to make sure he's the right guy."

The wheels in Faith's brain took their time moving in a new direction. She looked at Sam's block handwriting, the stupid heart around the address. "I don't know why Sam thinks he can track down the guy in five minutes when our entire data processing division can't find him in two days."

Faith took out her cell phone. She didn't want to bother with the proper channels, so she called Caroline, Amanda's assistant. The woman practically lived in the building, and she picked up the phone on the first ring. Faith relayed Berman's address and asked her to have the Coweta County field agent verify that this was the Jake Berman they had been looking for.

"Do you want him to bring the guy in?" Caroline asked.

Faith thought about it, then decided she didn't want to make the decision on her own. She asked Will, "Do you want them to bring in Berman?"

He shrugged, but answered, "Do we want to tip him off?"

"A cop knocking on his door is a tip-off no matter what."

Will shrugged again. "Tell him to try to verify Berman's identity from a distance. If it's the right guy, then we'll go down there and snatch him up. Give the agent my cell number. We'll go after you finish talking to Simkov."

Faith passed this on to Caroline. She ended the call, and Will turned his computer monitor toward her, saying, "I got this email from Amanda."

Faith slid over the mouse and keyboard. She changed the color settings so her retinas didn't spontaneously combust, then double-clicked on the file. She summarized for Will as she read. "Tech hasn't been able to break into any of the computers. They say the anorexia chat room is impossible to open without a password—it's got some kind of fancy encryption. The warrants for Olivia Tanner's bank should be in this afternoon so we can get into her phone and files." She scrolled down. "Hmm." She read silently, then told Will, "Okay, well, this might be something to take to the doorman. The fire exit door on the penthouse floor had a partial on the handle—right thumb."

Will knew Faith had spent most of yesterday afternoon combing through Anna Lindsey's building. "How are the stairs accessed?"

"Either the lobby or the roof," she said, reading the next passage. "The fire escape ladder that runs down the back of the building had another print that matched the one from the door. They're sending it to the Michigan State Police to run comparables. If Pauline's brother has a record, it should come up. If we can get a name, then we're halfway there."

"We should check for parking tickets in the area. You can't just park anywhere in Buckhead. They're pretty good about catching you."

"Good idea," Faith said, opening up her email account to send out the request. "I'll open it up to parking tickets in or around the area of all the last known locations of our victims."

"Son of Sam was caught by a parking ticket."

Faith tapped the keys. "You've got to stop watching so much television."

"Not much else to do at night."

She glanced at his hands, the new scratches.

He asked, "How did he get Anna Lindsey out of the building? He couldn't have thrown her over his shoulder and taken her down the fire escape ladder."

Faith sent off the email before answering. "The exit door for the stairs was wired. An alarm would have gone off if anyone had opened the door." She asked, "Did he take her down the elevator and into the lobby?"

"That's something to ask Simkov."

"The doorman isn't there twenty-four hours," Faith reminded him. "The killer could've waited for Simkov to clock out, then used the elevator to bring her body down. Simkov was supposed to keep an eye on things after hours, but he was hardly dedicated to his job."

"There wasn't another doorman to relieve him?"

"They've been trying to find someone to fill the position for six months," she told him. "Apparently, it's hard to find someone who wants to sit on their ass behind a desk for eight hours a day—which is why they put up with so much bullshit from Simkov. He was willing to double up his shifts, such as they were."

"What about security tapes?"

"They tape over them every forty-eight hours." She had to add, "Except for the ones from yesterday, which seem to be missing." Amanda had made sure the tape of Will slamming Simkov's face into the counter had been destroyed.

Will's face flooded with guilt, but still he asked, "Anything in Simkov's apartment?"

"We tossed it upside down. He drives an old Monte Carlo that leaks like a sieve and there aren't any receipts for storage units."

"There's no way he could be Pauline's brother."

"We've been so focused on that that we haven't seen anything else."

"All right, so let's take the brother out of the equation. What about Simkov?"

"He's not smart. I mean, he's not stupid, but our killer is choosing women he wants to conquer. I'm not saying our bad guy is a genius, but he's a hunter. Simkov is a pathetic schmuck who keeps porn under his mattress and takes blowjobs to let whores into empty apartments."

"You've never believed in profiles before."

"You're right, but we're spinning our wheels everywhere else. Let's talk about our guy," Faith said, something Will usually suggested. "Who's our killer?"

"Smart," Will admitted. "He probably works for an overbearing woman, or has overbearing women in his life."

"That's pretty much every man on the planet these days."

"Tell me about it."

Faith smiled, taking his words as a joke. "What kind of job does he have?"

"Something that lets him exist under the radar. He has flexible hours. Watching these women, learning about their habits, takes a lot of time. He's got to have a job that lets him come and go as he pleases."

"Let's ask the same boring, stupid question one more time: What about the women? What do they have in common?"

"The anorexia/bulimia thing."

"The chat room." She shot that one down on her own: "Of course, even the FBI can't find out who the site is registered to. No one has been able to break Pauline's password. How could our guy find it?"

"Maybe he started the site himself in order to troll for victims?"

"How would he find out their true identities? Everyone's tall, thin and blonde on the Internet. And usually twelve and horny."

He was twisting his wedding ring again, staring out the window. Faith couldn't stop looking at the scratches on the back of his hand. In forensic parlance, they would have called the marks defensive wounds. Will had been behind someone who had gouged her fingernails deep into his skin.

She asked, "How did it go with Sara last night?"

Will shrugged. "I just picked up Betty. I think she likes Sara's dogs. She's got two greyhounds."

"I saw them yesterday morning."

"Oh, that's right."

"Sara's nice," Faith told him. "I really like her."

Will nodded.

"You should ask her out."

He laughed, shaking his head at the same time. "I don't think so."

"Because of Angie?"

He stopped twisting the ring. "Women like Sara Linton ..." She saw a flash of something in his eyes that she couldn't quite read. Faith expected him to shrug it off, but he kept talking. "Faith, there's no part of me that's not damaged." His voice sounded thick in his throat. "I don't mean just the things you can see. There's other stuff. Bad stuff." He shook his head again, a tight gesture, more for his own benefit than Faith's. He finally told her, "Angie knows who I am. Somebody like Sara ..." Again his voice trailed off. "If you really like Sara Linton, then you don't want her to know me."

All Faith could think to say was his name. "Will."

He gave a forced laugh. "We gotta stop talking about this stuff before one of us starts lactating." He took out his cell phone. "It's almost eight. Amanda will be waiting for you in the interrogation room."

"Are you going to watch?"

"I'm going to make some calls up to Michigan and annoy the crap out of them until they run those fingerprints we found on Anna's fire escape. Why don't you call me when you're out of your doctor's appointment? If Sam found the right Jake Berman, we can go talk to him together."

Faith had forgotten about her doctor's appointment. "If he's the right Jake Berman, then we should scoop him up immediately."

"I'll call you if that's the case. Otherwise, go to your doctor's appointment, then we'll start from scratch like we'd planned."

She listed it off. "The Coldfields, Rick Sigler, Olivia Tanner's brother."

"That should keep us busy."

"You know what's bugging me?" Will shook his head, and she told him, "We haven't gotten the reports from Rockdale County yet." She held up her hands, knowing Rockdale was a sore point. "If we're going to start from the beginning, we need to do just that—get the initial crime-scene report from the first responding cop and go over every detail point by point. I know Galloway said the guy's fishing in Montana, but if his notes are good, then we don't need to talk to him."

"What are you looking for?"

"I don't know. But it bothers me that Galloway hasn't faxed it over."

"He's not exactly on top of things."

"No, but everything he's held back until now has been for a reason. You said it yourself. People don't do stupid things without a logical explanation."

"I'll put a call in to his office and see if the secretary can handle it without getting Galloway involved."

"You should get those scratches on the back of your hand looked at, too."

He glanced down at his hand. "I think you've looked at them plenty."

Except for talking to Anna Lindsey in the hospital the day before, Faith had never worked directly with Amanda on a case. The extent of their interaction tended to be with a desk between them, Amanda on one side with her hands steeped in front of her like a disapproving schoolmarm and Faith fidgeting in her chair as she gave her report. Because of this, Faith tended to forget that Amanda had clawed her way up the ranks back during a time when women in uniform were relegated to fetching coffee and typing reports. They weren't even allowed to carry guns, because the brass thought that, given the choice between shooting a bad guy and breaking a nail, the latter would win out.

Amanda had been the first female officer to disabuse them of this theory. She had been at the bank cashing her paycheck when a robber decided to take an early withdrawal. One of the tellers had panicked, and the robber had started to pistol-whip her. Amanda shot him once in the heart, what was called a K-5 for the circle it corresponded to on the shooting range target. She'd told Faith once that she had gotten her nails done afterward.

Otik Simkov, the doorman from Anna Lindsey's building, would have benefited from knowing this story. Or maybe not. The little troll had an air of arrogance about him, despite being stuffed into a too-small Day-Glo orange prison uniform and open-toed sandals that had been worn by a thousand prisoners before him. His face was bruised and battered, but he still held himself upright, shoulders squared. As Faith entered the interrogation room, he gave her the same look of appraisal a farmer might give a cow.

Cal Finney, Simkov's lawyer, made a show of looking at his watch. Faith had seen him on television many times; Finney's commercials had their own annoying jingle. He was as handsome in person as he was on the set. The watch on his arm could've put Jeremy through college.

"Sorry I'm late." Faith directed the apology toward Amanda, knowing she was the only one who mattered. She sat in the chair opposite Finney, catching the look of distaste on Simkov's face as he openly stared at her. This was not a man who had learned to respect women. Maybe Amanda would change that.

"Thank you for speaking with us, Mr. Simkov," Amanda began. She was still using her pleasant voice, but Faith had been in enough meetings with her boss to know that Simkov was in trouble. She had her hands resting lightly on a file folder. If experience was anything to go by, she would open the folder at some point, unleashing the gates of hell.

She said, "We just have a few questions to ask you regarding—"

"Screw you, lady," Simkov barked. "Talk to my lawyer."

"Dr. Wagner," Finney said. "I'm sure you're aware that we filed a lawsuit against the city this morning for police brutality." He snapped open his briefcase and pulled out a stack of papers, which he dropped with a thunk on the table.

Faith felt her face flush, but Amanda didn't seem fazed. "I understand that, Mr. Finney, but your client is looking at a charge of obstructing justice in a particularly heinous case. Under his watch, one of the tenants in his building was abducted. She was raped and tortured. She barely managed to escape with her life. I'm sure you saw it on the news. Her child was left to die, again under Mr. Simkov's watch. The victim will never regain her vision. You can see why we are somewhat frustrated that your client has been less than forthcoming about what, exactly, was going on in his building."

"I know nothing," Simkov insisted, his accent so thick Faith expected him at any moment to start talking about capturing Moose and Squirrel. He told the lawyer, "Get me out of here. Why am I a prisoner? I am soon a wealthy man."

Finney ignored his client, asking Amanda, "How long will this take?"

"Not long." Her smile indicated otherwise.

Finney wasn't fooled. "You've got ten minutes. Keep all your questions to the Anna Lindsey case." He advised Simkov, "Your cooperation now will reflect well during your civil suit."

Unsurprisingly, he was swayed by the prospect of money. "Yeah. Okay. What are your questions?"

"Tell me, Mr. Simkov," Amanda continued. "How long have you been in our country?"

Simkov glanced at his lawyer, who nodded that he should answer.

"Twenty-seven years."

"You speak English very well. Would you describe yourself as fluent, or should I get a translator here to make you more comfortable?"

"I am perfect with my English." His chest puffed out. "I read American books and newspapers all the time."

"You are from Czechoslovakia," Amanda said. "Is that correct?"

"I am Czech," he told her, probably because his country no longer existed.

"Why do you ask me questions? I am suing you. You should be answering my questions."

"You have to be a United States citizen in order to sue the government."

Finney piped up, "Mr. Simkov is a legal resident."

"You took my green card," Simkov added. "It was in my wallet. I saw you see it."

"You certainly did." Amanda opened the folder, and Faith felt her heart leap.

"Thank you for that. It saved me some time." She slipped on her glasses and read from a page in the folder. "'Green Cards issued between 1979 and 1989, containing no expiration date, must be replaced within 120 days of this notice. Affected lawful permanent residents must file an Application to Replace Lawful Permanent Residence Card, form I-90, in order to replace their current green card or their permanent lawful resident status will be terminated.'" She put the page down. "Does that sound familiar to you, Mr. Simkov?"

Finney held out his hand. "Let me see that."

Amanda passed him the notice. "Mr. Simkov, I'm afraid Immigration and Naturalization Services has no record of you filing form I-90 to renew your legal status as a resident in this country."

"Bullshit," Simkov countered, but his eyes went nervously to his lawyer.

Amanda passed Finney another sheet of paper. "This is a photocopy of Mr. Simkov's green card. You'll note there's no expiration date. He's in violation of his terms of status. I'm afraid we'll have to turn him over to the INS." She smiled sweetly. "I also got a call from Homeland Security this morning. I had no idea Czech-made weapons were falling into the hands of terrorists. Mr. Simkov, I believe you were a metalworker before you came to America?"

"I was a farrier," he shot back. "I put shoes on horses."

"Still, you have a specialized knowledge of metal tooling."

Finney muttered a curse. "You people are unbelievable. You know that?"

Amanda was leaning back in her chair. "I don't recall from your commercials, Mr. Finney—do you have a subspecialty in immigration law?" She gave a cheery whistle, a pitch-perfect imitation of the jingle on Finney's television commercials.

"You think you're going to get away with a beat-down on a technicality? Look at this man." Finney pointed to his client, and Faith had to concede the lawyer's point. Simkov's nose was twisted to the side where the cartilage had been shattered. His right eye was so swollen the lid wouldn't open more than a slit. Even his ear was damaged; an angry row of stitches bisected the lobe where Will's fist had split the skin in two.

Finney said, "Your officer beat the shit out of him, and you think that's okay?" He didn't expect an answer. "Otik Simkov fled a communist regime and came to this country to start his life all over again from scratch. You think what you're doing to him now is what the Constitution is all about?"

Amanda had an answer for everything. "The Constitution is for innocent people."

Finney snapped his briefcase closed. "I'm calling a press conference."

"I'd be more than happy to tell them how Mr. Simkov made a whore suck him off before he'd let her go up to feed a dying six-month-old baby." She leaned over the table. "Tell me, Mr. Simkov:

Did you give her a few extra minutes with the child if she swallowed?"

Finney took a second to regroup. "I'm not denying this man is an asshole, but even assholes have rights."

Amanda gave Simkov an icy smile. "Only if they're United States citizens."

"Unbelievable, Amanda." Finney seemed genuinely disgusted. "This is going to catch up with you one day. You know that, don't you?"

Amanda was having some kind of staring contest with Simkov, blocking out everything else in the room.

Finney turned his attention to Faith. "Are you all right with this, Officer? Are you okay with your partner beating up a witness?"

Faith wasn't at all okay with it, but now was not the time to equivocate. "It's Special Agent, actually. 'Officer' is generally what you call patrolmen."

"This is great. Atlanta's the new Guantánamo Bay." He turned back to Simkov. "Otik, don't let them push you around. You have rights."

Simkov was still staring at Amanda, as if he thought he could break her somehow. His eyes moved back and forth, reading her resistance. Finally, he gave a tight nod. "Okay. I drop my lawsuit. You make this other stuff go away."

Finney didn't want to hear it. "As your lawyer, I am advising you to—"

"You're not his lawyer anymore," Amanda interrupted. "Isn't that right, Mr. Simkov?"

"Correct," he agreed. He crossed his arms, staring straight ahead.

Finney muttered another curse. "This isn't over."

"I think it is," Amanda told him. She picked up the stack of pages detailing the suit against the city.

Finney cursed her again, adding Faith for good measure, then left the room.

Amanda tossed the lawsuit into the trashcan. Faith listened to the noise the pages made as they fluttered through the air. She was glad that Will was not here, because as much as Faith's conscience was bothering her over this, Will's was nearly killing him. Finney was right. Will was getting away with a beat-down thanks to a technicality. If Faith hadn't been in that hallway yesterday, she might be feeling differently right now.

She summoned the image of Balthazar Lindsey lying in the recycling bin a few feet from his mother's penthouse apartment and all that came to mind were excuses for Will's behavior.

"So," Amanda said. "Shall we assume there's honor among criminals, Mr. Simkov?"

Simkov nodded appreciatively. "You are a very hard woman."

Amanda seemed pleased with the assessment, and Faith could see how thrilled she was to be back in an interrogation room again. It probably bored her to death sitting through organizational meetings and looking at budgets and flowcharts all day. No wonder terrorizing Will was her only hobby.

She said, "Tell me about the scam you had going on in the apartments."

He gave an open-handed shrug. "These rich people are always traveling. Sometimes I rent out the space to someone. They go in. They do a little—" He made a screwing gesture with his hands. "Otik gets a little money. The maid's in the next day. Everyone is happy."

Amanda nodded, as if this was a perfectly understandable arrangement. "What happened with Anna Lindsey's place?"

"I figure, why not cash out? That asshole Mr. Regus in 9A, he knew something was up. He don't smoke. He come back from one of his business trips and there was a cigarette burn on his carpet. I saw it—barely there. No big deal. But Regus caused some problems."

"And they fired you."

"Two-week notice, good referral." He shrugged again. "I already got another job lined up. Bunch of town houses over near the Phipps Plaza. Twenty-four-hour watch. Very classy place. Me and this other guy, we switch out. He takes days. I take the nights."

"When did you first notice Anna Lindsey was missing?"

"Always at seven o'clock, she comes down with the baby. Then one day she's not there. I check my message box where the tenants leave me things, mostly complaints—can't get a window open, can't figure out the television, stuff that's not my job, right? Anyway, there's a note from Ms. Lindsey saying she's on vacation for two weeks. I figure she must have left. Usually, they tell me where they go, but maybe she thinks since I won't be here when she's back, it don't matter."

That jibed with what Anna Lindsey said. Amanda asked, "Is that how she usually communicated with you, through notes?"

He nodded. "She don't like me. Says I'm sloppy." His lip curled in disgust. "Made the building buy me a uniform so I look like a monkey. Made me say 'yes, ma'am' and 'no, ma'am' to her like I'm a child."

That sounded like the kind of thing their victim profile trended toward.

Faith asked, "How did you know she was gone?"

"I don't see her come downstairs. Usually, she go to the gym, she go to the store, she take the baby for walks. Wants help getting the stroller in and out of the elevator." He shrugged. "I think, 'She must be gone.'"

Amanda said, "So you assumed Ms. Lindsey would be gone for two weeks, which coincided nicely with the date your employment would terminate."

"Easy peasy," he agreed.

"Who did you call?"

"This pimp. The dead guy." For the first time, Simkov seemed to lose a bit of his arrogance. "He's not so bad. They call him Freddy. I don't know his real name, but he was always honest with me. Not like some of the others. I tell him two hours, he stay two hours. He pay for the maid. That's it. Some of the other guys, they get a little pushy—try to negotiate, don't leave when they're supposed to. I push back. I don't call them when an apartment's available. Freddy, he film a music video up there once. I watch for it on the TV, but I don't see. Maybe he couldn't find an agent. Music is a hard business."

"The party at Anna Lindsey's got out of hand." Amanda stated the obvious.

"Yeah, out of hand," he agreed. "Freddy's a good guy. I don't go up there to check on them. Every time I'm in the elevator, someone say, 'Oh, Mr. Simkov, could you look at this in my apartment.' 'Could you water my plants?' 'Could you walk my dog?' Not my job, but they trap you like that, what can you say? 'Fuck off? No, you can't. So I stay at my desk, tell them I can't do anything because my job is to watch the desk, not walk their puppy dogs. Right?'"

Amanda said, "That apartment was a mess. It's hard to believe it got that bad in just a week."

He shrugged. "These people. They got no respect for nothing. They shit in the corner like dogs. Me, I'm not surprised. They're all fucking animals, do anything to get the drug in their arm."

"What about the baby?" Amanda asked.

"The whore—Lola. I thought she was going up there to do some business. Freddy was there. Lola got a soft spot for him. I didn't know he was dead. Or that they had trashed Ms. Lindsey's place. Obviously."

"How often was Lola going up there?"

"I don't keep up with it. Couple times a day. I figure she get a bump every now and then." He rubbed his hand under his nose, sniffing—the universal sign for snorting coke. "She not so bad. A good woman brought down by bad circumstance."

Simkov didn't seem to realize he was one of the bad circumstances. Faith asked, "Did you see anything unusual in the building over the last two weeks?"

He barely gave her a glance, asking Amanda, "Why is this girl asking me questions?"

Faith had been snubbed before, but she knew this guy needed to be on a short leash. "You want me to get my partner back in here to talk to you?"

He snorted, as if the thought of another beat-down was inconsequential, but he answered Faith's question. "What do you mean, unusual? It's Buckhead. Unusual is everywhere."

Anna Lindsey's penthouse had probably set her back three million dollars. The woman hardly lived in the ghetto. "Did you see any strangers loitering around?" Faith persisted.

He waved her off. "Strangers everywhere. This is a big city."

Faith thought about their killer. He had to have access to the building in order to Taser Anna and take her away from the apartment. Simkov obviously wasn't going to make this easy, so she tried to bluff him. "You know what I'm talking about, Otik. Don't bullshit me or I'll have my partner go back to work on your ugly face."

He shrugged again, but there was something different about the gesture. Faith waited him out, and he finally said, "I go for a smoke sometimes behind the building."

The fire escape that led to the roof was behind the building. "What did you see?"

"A car," he said. "Silver, four-door."

Faith tried to keep her reaction calm. Both the Coldfields and the family from Tennessee had seen a white sedan speeding away from the accident. It had been dusk. Maybe they had mistaken the silver car for white. "Did you get a license plate number?"

He shook his head. "I saw the ladder to the fire escape was unlatched. I went up to the roof."

"On the ladder?"

"Elevator. I can't climb that ladder. It's twenty-three floors. I got a bad knee."

"What did you see on the roof?"

"There was a soda can there. Someone used it for an ashtray. Lots of butts inside."

"Where was it?"

"On the ledge of the roof, right by the ladder."

"What did you do with it?"

"I kicked it off," he said, giving another one of his shrugs. "Watched it hit the ground. It exploded like—" He put his hands together, then flung them apart.

"Pretty spectacular."

Faith had been behind that building, had searched it top to bottom. "We didn't find any cigarette butts or a soda can behind the building."

"That's what I'm saying. Next day, it was all gone. Someone cleaned it up."

"And the silver car?"

"Gone, too."

"You're sure you didn't see any suspicious men hanging around the building?"

He blew out a puff of air. "No, lady. I told you. Just the root beer."

"What root beer?"

"The soda can. It was Doc Peterson's Root Beer."

The same as they'd found in the basement of the house behind Olivia Tanner's.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

As Will drove to Jake Berman's house in Coweta County, he debated with himself the level of fury Faith would feel when she found out that he had tricked her. He wasn't sure which would make her angrier: the outright lie he had told her on the phone about Sam finding the wrong Jake Berman or the fact that Will was going down south to talk to the man on his own. There was no way she would've kept her doctor's appointment if Will had told her that the real Jake Berman was alive and well and living on Lester Drive. She would have insisted on coming along, and Will wouldn't have been able to come up with a good excuse for her not to, other than that she was pregnant and diabetic and had enough on her plate without having to put herself at risk by interviewing a witness who could very well be a suspect.

That would have gone over really well with Faith. Like a lead football over the Mississippi.

Will had gotten Caroline, Amanda's assistant, to cross-reference Jake Berman with the address on Lester Drive. With that key piece of information, they had opened up Berman's background fairly easily. The mortgage was in his wife's name, as were all of the credit cards, the cable bill and the utilities. Lydia Berman was a schoolteacher. Jake Berman had drawn his full lot of unemployment and still not found a job. He had declared bankruptcy eighteen months ago. He'd walked away from around half a million dollars in debt. The reason behind his being hard to find might have been as simple as a desire to elude creditors. Considering he'd been arrested a few months ago for public indecency, it made sense that Berman would want to keep a low profile.

Then again, it would also all make sense if Berman was their suspect.

The Porsche wasn't comfortable for long distances, and Will's back was aching by the time he reached Lester Drive. Traffic had been worse than usual, an overturned tractor-trailer jackknifed across the interstate bringing everything to a standstill for almost a full hour. Will hadn't wanted to be alone with his thoughts. He had listened to every station on the dial by the time he crossed into Coweta County.

Will pulled up beside an unmarked Chevy Caprice at the mouth of Lester Drive. A lawnmower was sticking out of the back of the trunk. The man behind the wheel was dressed in overalls, a thick gold chain hanging around his neck. Will recognized Nick Shelton, the regional field agent for District 23.

"How they hangin'?" Nick asked, turning down the bluegrass blaring from the radio. Will had met the agent a few times before. He was so country his neck glowed red, but he was a solid investigator, and he knew how to do his job.

Will asked, "Is Berman still in the house?"

"Unless he sneaked out the back," Nick answered. "Don't worry. He struck me as the lazy type."

"Did you talk to him?"

"Posed as a landscaper looking for work." Nick handed him a business card. "I told him it'd be a hundred bucks a month, and he said he could take care of his own damn lawn, thank you very much." He snorted a laugh. "This from a guy who's still in his pajamas at ten o'clock in the morning."

Will looked at the card, seeing a drawing of a lawnmower and some flowers. He said, "Nice."

"The fake phone number comes in handy with the ladies." Nick chuckled again. "I got a good look at ol' Jakey while he was lecturing me on competitive pricing. He's definitely your guy."

"Did you get into the house?"

"He wasn't that stupid." Nick asked, "You want me to stick around?"

Will thought about the situation, the fact that if he had given her the chance, Faith would have been right: Don't go into an unknown situation without backup. "If you don't mind. Just hang back here and make sure I don't get my head blown off."

They both laughed a little louder than the words called for, probably because Will wasn't really joking.

He rolled up his window and drove down the road. Just to make things easier, Caroline had called Berman before Will had left the office. She had posed as an operator for the local cable television company. Berman had assured her he would be home to let in the technician who was doing a general upgrade so that their service wouldn't be interrupted. There were a lot of tricks you could use to make sure people were home. The cable ruse was the best. People would go without a lot of things, but they would put their lives on hold for days at a time in order to wait for the cable company to show up.

Will checked the numbers on the mailbox, making sure they matched the note Sam Lawson had given Faith. Courtesy of MapQuest, which printed large arrows on their directions, and a couple of stops at some convenience stores, Will had managed to navigate his way through the rural town with only a few wrong turns.

Still, he checked the number with the mailbox a third time before getting out of the car. He saw the heart Sam had drawn around the address, and wondered again why a man who was not the father of Faith's child would do such a thing. Will had only met the reporter once, but he didn't like him. Victor was all right. Will had talked to him on the phone a couple of times and sat by him during an incredibly tedious awards ceremony that Amanda had insisted her team attend, mostly because she wanted to make sure someone clapped when her name was called. Victor had wanted to talk about sports, but not football and baseball, which were the only two sports Will paid attention to. Hockey was for Yankees and soccer was for Europeans. He wasn't quite sure how Victor had gotten interested in both, but it made for pretty dull conversation. Whatever Faith had seen in the guy, Will had been glad a few months ago when he started to notice that Victor's car wasn't in Faith's driveway when he went to pick her up for court days.

Of course, Will was not one to judge about relationships. His whole body was still sore from being with Angie last night. It was not a good sore—it was the kind of sore that made you want to crawl up into bed and sleep for a week. Will knew from experience it wouldn't matter, because as soon as he started putting one foot in front of the other, rebuilding some semblance of a life, Angie would return and he'd be back in that same place again. It was the pattern of his life. Nothing was ever going to change it.

The Berman home was a one-story ranch spread out over a large lot. The house looked lived-in, but not in a good way. The grass was overgrown and weeds tangled the flowerbeds. The green Camry in the driveway was filthy. Mud caked the tires and there was a sheen of filth on the car that looked like it had been there for quite a while. There were two baby seats in back and the requisite Cheerios stuck to the windshield. Two yellow, diamond-shaped signs were hanging from the side window, probably reading Baby on Board. Will pressed his hand to the hood of the car. The engine was cold. He looked at the time on his phone. It was coming up on ten o'clock. Faith would probably be at her doctor's by now.

Will knocked on the door and waited. He thought about Faith again, how furious she would be, especially if Will was about to come face-to-face with the killer. Though it looked as if he wasn't going to come face-to-face with anyone. No one answered the door. He knocked on the door again. When that didn't work, he stepped back from the house and looked up at the windows. All the shades were open. Some lights were on. Maybe Berman was in the shower. Or maybe he was fully aware that the police were trying to talk to him. Nick's hayseed landscaper act was pretty impressive, but he'd been sitting at the end of the road for about an hour. In a neighborhood this small, phones had probably been ringing off the hook.

Will tried the front door, but it was locked. He walked around the house, peering in the windows. There was a light at the end of the hallway. He was going to the next window when he heard a noise inside like a door slamming shut. Will put his hand to the gun on his belt, feeling all the hair on the back of his neck stand up. Something wasn't right, and Will was keenly aware that Nick Shelton was sitting in his car listening to the radio right now.

There was the unmistakable sound of a window banging shut. Will jogged around to the back of the house in time to see a man darting through the backyard. Jake Berman was wearing pajama pants with no shirt, but he'd managed to put on his sneakers. He glanced over his shoulder as he ran past an elaborate swing set, toward the chain-link fence that separated the property from the neighbor on the opposite side.

"Crap," Will mumbled, bolting after him. Will was a good runner, but Berman was fast—his arms pumping, legs moving in a blur.

"Police!" Will yelled, misjudging the height of the fence so badly that his foot caught. He fell to the ground and scrambled up as quickly as he could. He saw Berman go down a side yard, past another house and toward the street. Will did the same, taking advantage of the angle, shortening the distance as he chased Berman across the road.

There was a screech of wheels as Nick Shelton's Caprice pulled up. Berman dodged the car, slamming his hand on the hood as he made his way toward another backyard.

"Dammit," Will cursed. "Police! Stop!"

Berman kept going, but he was a sprinter, not a marathoner. If Will was good at anything, it was endurance. He caught his second wind as Jake Berman slowed, trying to open the wooden gate to a neighbor's backyard. He glanced over his shoulder, saw Will, then took off again. Berman was too winded, though, and Will could tell from the slow way his legs were moving that the man was about to give up. Still, Will wasn't going to take any chances. When he got close enough, he lunged, bringing Berman down in a heavy tackle that knocked the wind out of both of them.

"Dumbass!" Nick Shelton yelled, kicking Berman in the side.

Considering his run-in with the doorman at Anna's building yesterday, Will would've thought he'd be more gentle in his approach, but his heart was beating so hard in his chest that he felt nauseated. Worse, adrenaline was pumping all kinds of bad thoughts into his head.

Nick kicked Berman again. "Never run from the law, motherfucker."

"I didn't know you were cops—"

"Shut up." Will started to put the cuffs on him, but Berman squirmed, trying to get away. Nick raised his foot again, but Will drove his knee into Berman's back so hard that he could feel the ribs bend. "Stop it."

"I didn't do anything!"

"Is that why you ran?"

"I was going for a run," he screamed. "I always run this time of day."

Nick asked, "In your pj's?"

"Fuck off."

"It's a felony to lie to the police." Will stood, yanking up Berman with him. "Five years in prison. Plenty of men's bathrooms in jail."

Berman's face turned white. Some of his neighbors had congregated. They didn't look happy—or, Will noticed, particularly supportive.

"It's all right," Berman told them. "Just a misunderstanding."

Nick said, "A misunderstanding by this dumbass who thinks he can run away from the police."

Will wasn't worried about appearances. He jerked Berman's hands high, making him bend over as he walked him back across the street.

"My lawyer is going to hear about this."

Nick said, "Be sure to tell him how you ran away like a scared little schoolgirl."

Will pushed Berman into the road. He asked Nick, "Mind calling this in?"

"You want the cavalry?"

"I want a police car screeching up to his house with lights and sirens blaring so everyone in the neighborhood knows it's there."

Nick gave him a salute as he trotted off toward his car.

Berman said, "You're making a mistake."

"Your mistake was fleeing the scene of a crime."

"What?" He turned around, a look of genuine surprise on his face. "What crime?"

"Route 316."

He still looked confused. "That's what this is about?"

Either the man was delivering an Oscar-worthy performance or he was completely clueless. "You witnessed a car accident four days ago on 316. A woman was hit by a car. You talked to my partner."

"I didn't leave that girl alone. The ambulance was there. I told that cop at the hospital everything I saw.”

“You gave a false phone number and address.”

“I was just—” He glanced around, and Will wondered if he was going to bolt again. “Get me out of here,” Berman pleaded. “Just take me to the police station, okay? Take me to the station, give me my phone call, and we’ll work all of this out.”

Will turned him around, keeping a hand on his shoulder in case the man decided to try his luck again. Every step, Will could feel his temper getting more and more riled up. Berman was looking more and more like a pathetic, weaselly excuse for a human being. They had wasted the last two days looking for the asshole, and then the idiot had made Will chase him across half the neighborhood.

Berman turned around. “Why don’t you take off these cuffs so I can—”

Will spun him back around so hard that he had to catch Berman before he fell flat on his face. The nearest neighbor was standing in her open front doorway, watching them. Like the other women, she didn’t look exactly displeased to see the man being led away in handcuffs.

Will asked, “Do they hate you because you’re gay? Or because you’re sponging off your wife?”

Berman spun around again. “Where the fuck do you get off—”

Will pushed him back around so hard that this time he lost his balance. “It’s ten o’clock and you’re still in your pajamas.” He marched Berman through the tall grass in his yard. “You don’t have a lawn-mower?”

“We can’t afford a gardener.”

“Where are your kids?”

“Day care.” He tried to turn around again. “What business is this of yours?”

Will shoved him again, forcing him go up the driveway. He hated the guy for so many reasons, not least of which because he had a wife and kids who probably cared about him a great deal and he couldn’t even cut the grass or wash the car for them.

Berman demanded, “Where are you taking me? I said take me to the police station.”

Will kept quiet, shoving him up the driveway, yanking up his arms whenever he slowed or tried to turn around.

“If I’m under arrest, then you have to take me to jail.”

They walked to the back of the house, Berman protesting the entire way. He was a man who was used to being listened to, and it seemed to irk him more to be ignored than to be pushed around, so Will kept silent as he shoved him toward the patio.

Will tried the back door, but it was locked. He looked at Berman, whose smug look seemed to indicate he thought he was getting the upper hand. The window the man had sneaked out had guillotined closed. He slid it back open, the cheap springs clanging.

Berman said, “Don’t worry. I’ll wait for you.”

Will wondered where Nick Shelton was. He was probably in front of the house, thinking he was doing Will a favor by giving him time alone with the suspect.

“Right,” Will muttered, loosening one side of the cuffs and clamping Berman to the barbecue grill. He lifted himself up and angled his body through the open window. Will found himself in the kitchen, which was decorated in a goose theme: geese on the wallpaper border, geese on the towels, geese on the carpet under the kitchen table.

He looked back out the window. Berman was there, smoothing down his pajamas like he was trying them on at Macy's.

Will did a quick check of the house, finding only what he expected: a children's room with bunk beds, a large master and attached bath, a kitchen, a family room and a study with one book on the shelves. Will couldn't read the title, but he recognized Donald Trump's picture on the jacket and assumed it was a get-rich-quick scheme. Obviously, Jake Berman hadn't taken the man's advice. Though, considering Berman had lost his job and declared bankruptcy, maybe he had.

There was no basement, and the garage was empty but for three boxes that seemed to contain the contents of Jake Berman's old office: a stapler, a nice desk set, lots of papers with charts and graphs on them. Will opened the sliding glass door to the patio and found Berman sitting under the grill, his arm dangling over his head.

"You have no right to search my house."

"You were fleeing your residence. That's all the cause I needed."

Berman seemed to buy the explanation, which sounded reasonable even to Will's ears, though he knew it was highly illegal.

Will dragged around a chair from the table set and sat down. The air was still chilly, and the sweat he'd generated from chasing after Berman was drying in the cold.

"This isn't fair," Berman said. "I want your badge number and your name and —"

"You want the real one or you want me to make up something, like you did?"

Berman had the sense not to answer.

"Why did you run, Jake? Where were you going to go in your pajamas?"

"I didn't think that far," he grumbled. "I just don't want to deal with this right now. I've got a lot on my plate."

"You've got two choices here: Either you tell me what happened that night or I take you to jail in your pajamas." To make the threat clear, Will added, "And I don't mean the Coweta Country Club. I'll stroll you straight into the Atlanta Pen, and I won't let you change." He pointed to Berman's chest, which was heaving up and down from panic and anger. The man obviously spent time on his body. He was cut, his abs well defined, his shoulders broad and muscled. "You'll find all those pull-ups at the gym didn't go to waste."

"Is that what this is about? You're some kind of homophobic jerk?"

"I don't care who you're blowing in the toilet." This much was true, though Will kept an edge to his voice to imply the opposite. Everybody had a button, and Berman's was his sexual orientation. At the moment, Will's seemed to be that the cheating prick chained to the Grillmaster 2000 was screwing around on his wife and expecting her to just suck it up and be a good spouse. The Oprah-esque irony was not lost on Will.

He said, "The guys down at the pen love it when new meat comes along."

"Fuck you."

"Oh, they will. They'll fuck you in places you didn't know could be fucked."

"Go to hell."

Will let him sulk for a few seconds, trying to get his own emotions under control. He concentrated on how much time they had pissed away looking for this pathetic idiot when they could've been following real clues. Will listed it out for him. "Resisting arrest, lying to the police, wasting police time, obstructing an investigation. You could get ten years for this, Jake, and that's if the judge likes you, which is doubtful considering you've got a record and you present like an arrogant asshole."

Berman seemed to finally realize that he was in trouble. "I've got kids." There was a pleading sound to his voice. "My sons."

"Yeah, I read about them in your arrest report when they picked you up at the Mall of Georgia."

Berman looked down at the concrete patio. "What do you want?"

"I want the truth."

"I don't know what the truth is anymore."

He was obviously feeling sorry for himself again. Will wanted to kick him in the face, but he knew that would accomplish nothing. "You need to understand I'm not your therapist, Jake. I don't care about your crisis of conscience, or that you have kids or that you're cheating on your wife—"

"I love her!" he said, for the first time showing an emotion other than self-pity. "I love my wife."

Will pulled back on the pressure, trying to get his temper under control. He could be mad or he could get information. Only one of them was the reason he was here.

Berman said, "I used to be somebody. I used to have a job. I used to go to work every day." He looked up at the house. "I used to live somewhere nice. I drove a Mercedes."

"You were a builder?" Will asked, though he'd been told as much when Caroline had found Berman's tax returns.

"High-rises," he said. "The bottom dropped out of the market. I was lucky to walk away with the clothes on my back."

"Is that why you put everything in your wife's name?"

He gave a slow nod. "I was ruined. We moved here from Montgomery a year ago. It was supposed to be a fresh start, but ..." He shrugged, as if it was pointless to continue.

Will had thought his accent was a little deeper than most. "Is that where you're originally from—Alabama?"

"Met my wife there. Both of us went to Alabama." He meant the state university. "Lydia was an English major. It was more like a hobby until I lost my job. Now she's teaching at school and I'm with the kids all day." He stared out at the play set, the swings stirring in the wind. "I used to travel a lot," he said. "That's how I got it out of my system. I'd travel around, and I'd do what I needed to do, and then I'd come home and be with my wife and go to church, and that's how it worked for almost ten years."

"You were arrested six months ago."

"I told Lydia it was a mistake. All those queers from Atlanta trolling the mall, trying to pick up straight men. The cops were clamping down. They thought I was one because ... I don't know what I told her. Because I had a nice haircut. She wanted to believe me, so she did."

Will guessed he'd be forgiven for his sympathies leaning more toward the spouse who was being lied to and cheated on. "Tell me what happened on 316."

"We saw the accident, people in the road. I should've been more helpful. The other man—I don't even know his name. He had medical training. He was trying to help the woman who'd been hit by the car. I was just standing there in the street trying to think of a lie to tell my wife. I don't think she'd believe me if it happened again, no matter what I came up with."

"How did you meet him?"

"I was supposed to be at the bar watching a game. I saw him go into the theater. He was a nice-looking guy, alone. I knew why he was there." He gave a heavy sigh. "I followed him into the bathroom. We decided to go somewhere else for more privacy."

Jake Berman was no neophyte, and Will didn't ask him why he had driven forty minutes away from his home in order to watch a game at a bar. Coweta might have been rural, but Will had passed at least three sports bars as he headed off the interstate, and there were even more downtown.

Will warned him, "You have to know that it was dangerous getting into a car with a stranger like that."

"I guess I've been lonely," the man admitted. "I wanted to be with somebody. You know, be myself with somebody. He said we could go in his car, maybe find a place out in the woods to be together for more than a few minutes in the toilet." He gave a harsh laugh. "The smell of urine is not a big aphrodisiac for me, believe it or not." He looked Will in the eye. "Does it make you sick to hear about this?"

"No," Will answered truthfully. He had listened to countless witnesses tell stories of meaningless hookups and mindless sex. It really didn't matter if it was a man or a woman or both. The emotions were similar, and Will's goal was always the same: get the information he needed to break the case.

Jake obviously knew Will wasn't going to give him much more rope. He said, "We were driving down the road, and the guy I was with—"

"Rick."

"Rick. Right." He looked as if he wished he didn't know the man's name. "Rick was driving. He had his pants unbuttoned." Jake colored again. "He pushed me away. He said there was something on the road ahead. He started to slow down, and I saw what looked like a bad accident." He paused, measuring his words, his culpability. "I told him to keep driving, but he said he was a paramedic, that he couldn't leave the scene of an accident. I guess that's some kind of code or something." He paused again, and Will guessed he was forcing himself to remember what had happened.

Will told him, "Take your time."

Jake nodded, giving it a few seconds. "Rick got out of the car, and I stayed inside. There was this old couple standing in the street. The man was clutching his chest. I kept sitting there in the car, just staring like it was all a movie being played out. The older woman got on the phone—I guess to call an ambulance. It was weird, because she kept her hand to her mouth, like this." He cupped his hand over his mouth the way Judith Coldfield did when she smiled. "It was like she was telling a secret, but there was no one around to hear, so ..." He shrugged.

"Did you get out of the car?"

"Yeah," he answered. "I finally moved. I could hear the ambulance coming. I went to the old guy. I think his name was Henry?" Will nodded. "Yeah, Henry. He was in bad shape. I think both of them were in shock. Judith's hands were shaking like crazy. The other guy, Rick, he was working on the naked woman. I didn't see much of her. It was hard to see, you know? Hard to look at her, I mean. I remember when their son got there, he just stared at her, like, 'Oh, Jesus.' "

"Wait a minute," Will said. "Judith Coldfield's son was at the scene?"

"Yeah."

Will went back through his interview with the Coldfields, wondering why Tom would leave out such an important detail. There had been plenty of opportunity for the man to speak up, even with his domineering mother in the room. "What time did the son get there?"

"About five minutes before the ambulance."

Will felt ridiculous for repeating everything Berman said, but he had to be clear. "Tom Coldfield got to the scene before the ambulance arrived?"

"He was there before the cops. They didn't even show up until after the ambulances had left. No one was there. It was brutal. We had, like, twenty minutes with that girl just dying in the road, and no one came to help her."

Will felt a piece of the puzzle click into place—not the one they needed for the case, but the one that explained why Max Galloway had been so openly hostile about sharing information. The detective must have known that the ambulance had taken the victim away before the police arrived. Faith had been right all along. There was a reason Rockdale wasn't faxing over the initial responder's report, and that reason was because they were covering their asses. Slow police response times were the sort of thing local news stations built their feature stories on. This was the last straw as far as Will was concerned. He would have Galloway's detective shield by the end of the day. There was no telling what other evidence had been hidden or, worse, compromised.

"Hey," Berman said. "You wanna hear this or not?"

Will realized he had been too caught up in his own thoughts. He picked up the narrative. "So, Tom Coldfield showed up," he said. "Then the ambulances came?"

"Just one at first. They put the woman in first, the one who'd been hit by the car. Henry said he would wait because he wanted to go with his wife, and there wasn't room for all of them in one ambulance. There was kind of an argument about it, but Rick said, 'Go, just go,' because he knew the woman was in a bad way. He gave me the keys to his car and got into the ambulance so he could keep working on her."

"How long before the next ambulance arrived?"

"About ten, maybe fifteen minutes later."

Will did the math in his head. Almost forty-five minutes had elapsed in the story, and the police still hadn't shown up. "Then what?"

"They loaded up Henry and Judith. The son followed them, and I was left in the road."

"And the police still weren't there?"

"I heard the sirens right after the last ambulance left. The car was there—the one the Coldfields had been driving. The scene of the crime, right?" He looked back at the play set in the yard, as if he could visualize his children playing in the sun. "I thought about taking Rick's car back to the theater. They wouldn't know me, right? I mean, you wouldn't have any way of identifying me if I hadn't gone to the hospital and given my name."

Will shrugged, but it was true. If not for the fact that Jake Berman had given them his real name, Will wouldn't be sitting here right now.

Jake continued, "So, I got in the car and headed back toward the theater."

"Toward the police cars?"

"They were coming in the opposite direction."

"What changed your mind?"

He shrugged, and tears came into his eyes. "I was tired of running, I guess. Running away from ... everything." He put his free hand to his eyes. "Rick told me they were taking her to Grady, so I got on the interstate and went to Grady."

His courage had apparently run out shortly afterward, but Will did not point this out to the man.

Berman asked, "Is the old man okay?"

"He's fine."

"I heard on the news that the woman's all right."

"She's healing," Will told him. "What happened to her will always be with her, though. She won't be able to run away from it."

He wiped his eyes with the back of his hand. "Some kind of lesson for me, right?" His self-pity had returned. "Not that you care, right?"

"You know what I don't like about you?"

"Please enlighten me."

"You're cheating on your wife. I don't care who with—it's cheating. If you want to be with someone else, then be with them, but let your wife go. Let her have a life. Let her have someone who really loves her and understands her and wants to be with her."

The man shook his head sadly. "You don't understand."

Will guessed that Jake Berman was beyond lessons. He stood from the table and uncuffed him from the grill. "Be careful about getting into cars with strangers."

"I'm finished with that. I mean it. Never again."

He sounded so certain of himself that Will almost believed him.

WILL HAD TO WAIT until he was out of Jake Berman's neighborhood before his phone registered enough bars to make a call. Even then, service was spotty, and he had to pull over onto the side of the road just to get a call to go through. He dialed Faith's cell phone and listened to it ring. Her voicemail picked up, and he ended the call. Will checked the clock. 10:15. She was probably still with her doctor in Snellville.

Tom Coldfield hadn't mentioned that he had been at the crime scene—yet another person who had lied to them. Will was getting pretty sick and tired of people lying. He flipped open his phone and dialed information. They connected him to the tower at Charlie Brown Airport, where yet another operator told Will that Tom was taking a cigarette break. Will was in the process of leaving a message when the operator offered to give him Coldfield's cell phone number. A few minutes later, he was listening to Tom Coldfield yell over the sound of a jet engine.

"I'm glad you called, Agent Trent." His voice was just shy of a shout. "I left a message for your partner earlier, but I haven't heard back."

Will put his finger in his ear, as if that might help drown out the noise of a plane taking off on the other side of town. "Did you remember something?"

"Oh, nothing like that," Tom said. The roar subsided, and his voice went back to normal. "My folks and I were talking last night, wondering how your investigation was going."

There was a deafening rush of jet engine. Will waited it out, thinking this was crazy. "What time do you get off work?"

"About ten minutes, then I've got to pick up the kids from my mom's."

Will figured he would kill two birds with one stone. "Can you meet me at your parents' house?"

Tom waited for more engine noise to pass. "Sure. Shouldn't take me more than forty-five minutes to get there. Is something wrong?"

Will looked at the clock on the dash. "I'll see you in forty-five minutes."

He ended the call before Tom could ask any more questions. Unfortunately, he also ended it before he could get the Coldfields' address. Their retirement community shouldn't be too hard to find. Clairmont Road stretched from one side of DeKalb County to the other, but there was only one area where senior citizens flocked, and that was in the vicinity of the Atlanta Veterans Administration hospital. Will put the car in gear, got back onto the road, and headed toward the interstate.

As Will drove, he debated about whether to call Amanda and tell her that Max Galloway had screwed them over again, but she would ask where Faith was, and Will did not want to remind their boss that Faith was having medical issues. Amanda hated weakness of any kind, and she was relentless where Will's disability was concerned. There was no telling what abuse she would visit on Faith for being diabetic. Will wasn't going to give her more ammunition.

He could, of course, call Caroline, who would in turn feed the information to Amanda. He cradled the phone in his hand, praying it would not come apart as he dialed in the number for Amanda's assistant.

Caroline made much use of her caller ID. "Hi, Will."

"Mind doing me another favor?"

"Sure."

"Judith Coldfield called 9-1-1 and two ambulances got to the scene before the Rockdale police did."

"That ain't right."

"No," Will agreed. It wasn't. The fact that Max Galloway had lied meant that instead of talking to a trained first responder about what he had recorded at the scene, Will was going to have to rely on the Coldfields to reconstruct what they had seen. "I need you to track down the timeline. I'm pretty sure Amanda's going to want to know what took them so long."

Caroline said, "You know Rockdale's where I'll call for the response times."

“Try Judith Coldfield’s cell phone records.” If Will could catch them in a lie, that would be yet another weapon Amanda could use against them. “Do you have her number?”

“Four-oh-four—”

“Hold on,” Will said, thinking it would be useful to have Judith’s number. He drove with his fingertips as he took out the digital recorder he kept in his pocket and turned it on. “Go ahead.”

Caroline gave him Judith Coldfield’s cell number. Will clicked off the recorder and put the phone back to his ear to thank her. He used to have a system for keeping up with witnesses’ and suspects’ personal information, but Faith had gradually taken over everything to do with paperwork, so that Will was lost without her. With the next case, he would have to correct that. He didn’t like the idea of being so dependent on her—especially since she was pregnant. She’d probably be out at least a week when the baby came.

He tried Judith’s cell, which only got him as far as her voicemail. He left a message for her, then called Faith again and told her that he was on his way to the Coldfields’. Hopefully, she would call him back and give him their address on Clairmont Road. He didn’t want to call Caroline again because she would wonder why an agent didn’t have all this written down somewhere. Besides, his cell phone had started making a clicking noise in his ear. He would have to do something to fix it soon. Will gently placed it on the passenger’s seat. There was only one string and a quickly degrading piece of duct tape holding it together now.

Will kept the radio low as he headed into the city. Instead of going through the downtown connector, he jumped on I-85. Traffic on the Clairmont exit was backed up more than usual, so he took the long way, skirting around DeKalb Peachtree Airport, driving through neighborhoods that were so culturally diverse even Faith wouldn’t be able to read some of the signs out in front of the businesses.

After fighting more traffic, he finally found himself in the right area. He turned into the first gated community across from the VA hospital, knowing the best way to go about this would be the methodical one. The guard at the gate was polite, but the Coldfields weren’t on his residents’ list. The next place yielded the same negative result, but when Will got to the third compound, the nicest one of them all, he hit pay dirt.

“Henry and Judith.” The man at the gate smiled, as if they were old friends. “I think Hank’s out on the links, but Judith should be home.”

Will waited while the guard made a phone call to get him buzzed in. He looked around the well-kept grounds, feeling a pang of envy. Will didn’t have children and he had no family to speak of. His retirement was something that worried him, and he had been saving a nest egg since his first paycheck. He wasn’t a risk taker, so he hadn’t lost much in the stock market. T-bills and municipal bonds were where most of his hard-earned cash went. He was terrified of ending up some lonely old guy in a sad, state-run nursing home. The Coldfields were living the sort of retirement Will was hoping for—a friendly security guard at the gate, nicely kept gardens, a senior center where you could play cards or shuffleboard.

Of course, knowing how things worked, Angie would get some terrible, wasting disease that lasted just long enough to suck away all his retirement money before she died.

"You're in, young man!" The guard was smiling, his straight white teeth showing beneath a bushy gray mustache. "Go left right out of the gate, then take another left, then right, and you'll be on Taylor Drive. They're 1693."

"Thanks," Will said, understanding only the street name and the numbers. The man had made a hand gesture indicating which way Will should go first, so he went through the gate and turned the car in that direction. After that, it was anyone's guess.

"Crap," Will mumbled, obeying the ten-mile-per-hour speed limit as he circled the large lake in the middle of the property. The houses were one-story cottages that all looked the same: weathered shingles, single-car garages and various assortments of concrete ducks and bunnies spotting the trimmed lawns.

There were old people out walking, and when they waved at him, he waved back, he supposed to convey the impression that he knew where he was going. Which was not the case. He stopped the car in front of an elderly woman who was dressed in a lilac wind suit. She had ski poles in her hands as if she were Nordic skiing.

"Good morning," Will said. "I'm looking for sixteen-ninety-three Taylor Drive."

"Oh, Henry and Judith!" the skier exclaimed. "Are you their son?"

He shook his head. "No, ma'am." He didn't want to alarm anyone, so he said, "I'm just a friend of theirs."

"This is a very nice car, isn't it?"

"Thank you, ma'am."

"I bet I couldn't get myself into there," she said. "Maybe even if I got in, I couldn't get out!"

He laughed with her to be polite, scratching this particular community off the list of places to which he'd want to retire.

She said, "Do you work with Judith at the homeless shelter?"

Will hadn't been questioned so much since he had trained for interrogations at the GBI academy. "Yes, ma'am," he lied.

"Got this at their little thrift store," she said, indicating the wind suit. "Looks brand-new, doesn't it?"

"It's lovely," Will assured her, though the color was nothing like what you would find in nature.

"Tell Judith I've got some more knickknacks I can give her if she wants to send the truck by." She gave a knowing look. "At my age, I find I don't need so many things."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Well." The woman nodded, pleased. "Just go up here to the right." He watched the way her hand curved. "Then Taylor Drive is on the left."

"Thank you." He put the car in gear, but she stopped him.

"You know, it would've been easier next time if, right when you left the gate, you took a left, then an immediate left, then—"

"Thank you," Will repeated, rolling the car along. His brain was going to explode if he talked to another person in this place. He kept the Porsche inching along, hoping he was going in the right direction. His phone rang, and he nearly wept with relief when he saw it was Faith.

Carefully, he opened the broken phone and held it to his ear. "How was your doctor's appointment?"

"Fine," she said. "Listen, I just talked to Tom Coldfield—"

"About meeting him? So did I."

"Jake Berman's going to have to wait."

Will felt his chest tighten. "I already talked to Jake Berman."

She was quiet—too quiet.

"Faith, I'm sorry. I just thought it would be better if I ..." Will didn't know how to finish the sentence. His grip on his cell phone slipped, bringing a crackling static onto the line. He waited for it to die down, then repeated, "I'm sorry."

She took a painfully long time letting the ax fall. When she finally spoke, her tone was clipped, like her words were getting strangled in her throat. "I don't treat you differently because of your disability."

She was wrong, actually, but he knew this was not the time to point that out. "Berman told me that Tom Coldfield was at the crime scene." She wasn't yelling at him, so he continued, "I guess Judith called him because Henry was having a heart attack. Tom followed them to the hospital in his car. The cops didn't show up until everyone was already gone."

She seemed to be debating between screaming at him and being a cop. As usual, her cop side won out. "That's why Galloway was jerking us around. He was covering Rockdale County's ass." She moved on to the next problem. "And Tom Coldfield didn't tell us he was at the scene."

Will paused for some more static. "I know."

"He's early thirties, closer to my age. Pauline's brother was older, right?"

Will wanted to talk to her about this in person rather than through his cracked phone. "Where are you?"

"I'm right outside the Coldfields'."

"Good," he told her, surprised she had gotten there so fast. "I'm right around the corner. I'll be there in two minutes."

Will ended the call and dropped the phone on the seat beside him. Another wire had slipped out between the clamshells. This one was red, which was not a good sign. He glanced at his rearview mirror. The skier was making her way toward him. She was coming up fast, and Will pushed the car up to fifteen miles per hour so he could get away from her.

The street signs were larger than normal, the letters a crisp white on black, which was a horrible combination for Will. He turned as soon as he could, not bothering to try to read the first letter on the sign. Faith's Mini would stand out like a beacon among the Cadillacs and Buicks the retired folks seemed to favor.

Will got to the end of the street, but there was no Mini. He turned down the next street, and nearly smacked into the skier. She made a motion with her hand, indicating he should roll down the window.

He put on a pleasant smile. "Yes, ma'am?"

"Right there," she said, pointing to the cottage on the corner. This particular model had a lawn jockey outside, its white face freshly painted. Two large cardboard boxes were by the mailbox, each labeled in black marker. "I guess you're not taking those back in this tiny car of yours."

"No, ma'am."

"Judith said her son was going to bring the truck later on today." She glanced up at the sky. "Better not be too late."

"I'm sure it won't be long," Will told the skier. She didn't seem as keen to continue the conversation this time. She tossed him a wave as she continued her walk down the street.

Will looked at the boxes in front of Judith and Henry Coldfield's house, reminded of the trash Jacquelyn Zabel had set outside her mother's place. Though the cardboard boxes and black trash bags Jackie had put on the curb weren't meant to be trash. Charlie Reed had said he'd shooed off a Goodwill truck just before Will and Faith had arrived. Had he meant Goodwill specifically, or was he using the word as a catchall, the way people always called plastic bandages Band-Aids and tissues Kleenexes?

All along, they had been looking for a physical link between the women, one thing that tied them all together. Had Will just stumbled onto it?

The front door to the house opened and Judith came out, walking cautiously as she tried to navigate her way down the two porch stairs with a large box in her hands. Will got out of the car and rushed over, catching the box before she dropped it.

"Thank you," she told him. She was out of breath, her cheeks flushed. "I've been trying to get this stuff out all morning and Henry's been no help whatsoever." She walked toward the curb. "Just put it here by the others. Tom's supposed to be by later to pick them up."

Will set the box down on the ground. "How long have you volunteered at the shelter?"

"Oh ..." She seemed to think about it as she walked back toward the house. "I don't know. Since we moved here. I guess that's a couple of years now. Goodness, how time flies."

"Faith and I saw a brochure the other day when we were at the shelter. It had a list of corporate sponsors on it."

"They want to get their money's worth. They're not being charitable because it's the right thing to do. It's public relations for them."

"There was a logo for a bank on the one we saw." Even now, he recalled the image of the four-point deer at the bottom of the pamphlet.

"Oh, yes. Buckhead Holdings. They donate the most money, which, between you and me, isn't nearly enough."

Will felt a bead of sweat roll down his back. Olivia Tanner was the community relations director for Buckhead Holdings. "What about a law firm?" he asked. "Does anyone do pro bono work for the shelter?"

Judith opened the front door. "There are a couple of firms who help out. We're a women's only shelter, you know. Lots of the women need help filing divorce papers, getting restraining orders. Some of them are in trouble with the law. It's all very sad."

"Bandle and Brinks?" Will asked, giving her the name of Anna Lindsey's law firm.

"Yes," Judith said, smiling. "They help out quite a lot."

"Do you know a woman named Anna Lindsey?"

She shook her head as she went into the house. "Was she staying in the shelter? I'm ashamed to say there are so many that I often don't have the time to speak to them individually."

Will followed her inside, glancing around. The layout was exactly as he would have guessed from the street. There was a large living room that looked onto a screen porch and the lake. The kitchen was on the side of the house that had the garage, and the other side held the bedrooms. All the doors leading off the hallway were closed. The startling thing was that it looked as if an Easter egg had exploded inside the house. Decorations were everywhere. There were bunnies in pastel suits sitting on every available surface. Baskets with plastic eggs lying in silky green grass were scattered along the floor.

Will said, "Easter."

Judith beamed. "It's my second favorite time of the year."

Will loosened his tie, feeling a sweat come all over him. "Why is that?"

"The Resurrection. The rebirth of our Lord. The cleansing of all our sins. Forgiveness is a powerful, transformative gift. I see that at the shelter every day. Those poor, broken women. They want redemption. They don't realize it's not something that can just be given. Forgiveness has to be earned."

"Do they all earn it?"

"Considering your job, I think you know the answer to that better than I do."

"Some women aren't worthy?"

She stopped smiling. "People like to think that we've moved on from biblical times, but we still live in a society where women are cast out, don't we?"

"Like trash?"

"That's a bit harsh, but we all make our choices."

Will felt more beads of sweat roll down his back. "Have you always loved Easter?"

She straightened a bow tie on one of the rabbits. "I suppose part of it's because Henry's work only gave him off Easter and Christmas. It was always such a special time for us. Don't you love being with family?"

He asked, "Is Henry home?"

"Not at the moment." She turned her watch around on her wrist. "He's always late. He loses track of time so easily. We were supposed to go to the community center after Tom picked up the kids."

"Does Henry work at the shelter?"

"Oh, no." She gave a small laugh as she walked into her kitchen. "Henry's much too busy enjoying his retirement. Tom's good about helping out, though. He complains, but he's a good boy."

Will remembered Tom had been trying to fix a lawnmower when they'd found him at the charity shop. "Does he mostly work in the store?"

"Lord, no, he hates working in the store."

"So, what does he do?"

She picked up a sponge and wiped the counter. "A little bit of everything."

"Like what?"

She stopped wiping. "If a woman needs legal help, he tracks down one of the lawyers, or if one of the kids makes a spill, he grabs a mop." She smiled proudly. "I told you, he's a good boy."

"Sounds like it," Will agreed. "What else does he do?"

"Oh, this and that." She paused, thinking it through. "He coordinates the donations. He's very good on the phone. If it sounds like he's talking to someone who might give a bit more, he'll drive the truck over to pick up their stuff, and nine times out of ten, he comes back with a nice check in addition. I think he likes getting out and talking to people. All he does at the airport is stare at blips on a screen all day. Would you like some iced water? Lemonade?"

"No, thank you," he answered. "What about Jacquelyn Zabel? Have you heard her name before?"

"That strikes a bell, but I'm not sure why. It's a very unusual name."

"How about Pauline McGhee? Or maybe Pauline Seward?"

She smiled, putting her hand over her mouth. "No."

Will forced himself to slow things down. The first rule of interviewing was to be calm, because it was hard to spot whether or not someone else was tense when you were tense yourself. Judith had gone still when he'd asked the last question, so he repeated it. "Pauline McGhee or Pauline Seward?"

She shook her head. "No."

"How often does Tom pick up donations?"

Judith's voice took on a falsely cheerful tone. "You know, I'm not sure. I've got my calendar in here somewhere. I usually mark the dates." She opened one of the kitchen drawers and started to rummage around. She was visibly nervous, and he knew she had opened the drawer to give herself something to do other than look him in the eye. She chattered on, telling Will, "Tom is so good about giving his time. He's very involved in the youth group at his church. The whole family volunteers at the soup kitchen once a month."

Will didn't let her get sidetracked. "Does he go out alone to pick up donations?"

"Unless there's a couch or something large." She closed the drawer and opened another. "I have no idea where my calendar is. All those years I wanted my husband home with me, and now he drives me crazy putting things up where they don't belong."

Will glanced out the front window, wondering what was keeping Faith. "The children are here?"

She opened another drawer. "Napping in the back."

"Tom said he would meet me here. Why didn't he tell us he was at the crime scene where your car hit Anna Lindsey?"

"What?" She looked momentarily confused, but told him, "Well, I called Tom to come see Henry. I thought he was having a heart attack, that Tom would want to be there, that—"

"But Tom didn't tell us he was there," Will repeated. "And neither did you."

"It didn't ..." She waved her hand, dismissing it. "He wanted to be with his father."

"These women who were abducted were cautious women. They wouldn't open the door to just anybody. It would have to have been someone they trusted. Somebody they knew was coming."

She stopped looking for the calendar. Her face showed her thoughts as clear as a picture: She knew something was horribly wrong.

Will asked, "Where is your son, Mrs. Coldfield?"

Tears welled into her eyes. "Why are you asking all these questions about Tom?"

“He was supposed to meet me here.”

Her voice was almost a whisper. “He said he had to go home. I don’t understand ...”

Will realized something then—something Faith had said on the phone. She’d already talked to Tom Coldfield. The reason she wasn’t here yet was because Tom had sent her to the wrong house.

Will made his voice deadly serious. “Mrs. Coldfield, I need to know where Tom is right now.”

She put her hand to her mouth, tears spilling from her eyes.

There was a phone on the wall. Will snatched the receiver off the hook. He dialed in Faith’s cell phone number, but his finger didn’t make it to the last digit. There was a searing pain in his back, the worst muscle spasm he’d ever had in his life. Will put his hand to his shoulder, his fingers feeling for a knot, but all he felt was cold, sharp metal. He looked down to find the bloody tip of what had to be a very large knife sticking out of his chest.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Faith sat outside Thomas Coldfield's house, her cell phone to her ear as she listened to Will's cell ring. He'd said he was two minutes away, but it was looking more like ten. The call went to voicemail. Will was probably lost, driving around in circles, looking for her car because he was too pigheaded to ask for help. If she was in a better mood, she'd go out and look for him, but she was scared of what she'd say to her partner if she had him alone.

Every time she thought about Will lying to her, going to talk to Jake Berman behind her back, she had to squeeze the steering wheel to keep from punching a hole into the dashboard of the car. They couldn't go on like this—not with Faith being a liability. If he thought she couldn't handle herself in the field, then there was no reason for them to be together anymore. She could put up with a lot of Will's crazy shit, but she had to have his trust or this would never work out. It wasn't as if Will didn't have his own liabilities. For instance, not knowing the difference between something as freaking simple as left and right.

Faith checked the time again. She would give Will another five minutes before going into the house.

The doctor hadn't given her good news, though Faith had foolishly been expecting it. From the minute she'd made the appointment with Delia Wallace, her health had improved dramatically. She hadn't woken up in a cold sweat this morning. Her blood sugar was high, but not off the chart. Her mind felt sharp, focused. And then Delia Wallace had sent it all crashing down.

Sara had ordered some kind of test at the hospital that showed Faith's blood sugar pattern over the last few weeks. The results had not been good. Faith was going to have to meet with a dietitian. Dr. Wallace had told her she was going to have to plan out every meal, every snack and every single moment of her life until she died—which she might do prematurely anyway, because her blood sugar was fluctuating so wildly that Dr. Wallace had told Faith the best thing she could do was take a couple of weeks off from work and focus on educating herself about the care and maintenance of a diabetic.

She loved when doctors said things like that, as if taking two weeks off from work was something that could be achieved with the snap of a finger. Maybe Faith could go to Hawaii or Fiji. She could call up Oprah Winfrey and ask for the name of her personal chef.

Fortunately, there was some good news with the bad. Faith had seen her baby. Well, not really seen it—the child was little more than a speck right now—but she had listened to his heartbeat, watched the ultrasound and seen the gentle up and down of the tiny blob inside her, and even though Delia Wallace had insisted that it wasn't quite time for such things, Faith would have sworn that she saw a tiny little hand.

Faith dialed in Will's cell phone number again. It rang over into voicemail almost immediately. She wondered if his phone had finally given up the ghost.

Why he would not get a new one was beyond her. Maybe there was some sort of emotional attachment he had to the thing.

Either way, he was holding her up. She opened the door and got out of the car. Tom Coldfield lived only ten minutes from where his parents had met with their unfortunate accident. His house was in the middle of nowhere, the closest neighbor barely within walking distance. The home itself had that boxlike feel of modern suburban architecture. Faith preferred her own ranch house, with its sloping floorboards and hideous fake paneling in the family room.

Every year when she got her tax rebate, she told herself she was going to have something done to the paneling, and every year Jeremy magically managed to need something around the same time as the check came in. Once, she thought she was going to get away clean, but the little scamp had broken his arm while trying to prove to his friends that he could jump his skateboard off the roof of the house and onto a mattress they had found in the woods.

She put her hand to her stomach. That paneling was going to be up until she died.

Faith fished in her purse for her ID as she walked to the front door. She was wearing heels and one of her nicest dresses, because for some reason this morning it had seemed important to look respectable in front of Delia Wallace—a silly affectation, since Faith had spent their entire time together in a thin paper gown.

She turned around, looking out into the empty street. Still no sign of her partner. She didn't understand what was taking him so long. Tom had told Faith on the phone that he'd already given Will directions to his house. Even taking into account the left/right thing, Will was good at finding his way. He should be here by now. Regardless, he should definitely be answering his phone. Maybe Angie had called again. The way Faith was feeling toward Will right now, she hoped his wife was being every bit her pleasant self.

Faith rang the doorbell and waited much too long for the door to be answered, considering she had been parked in the driveway for nearly a quarter of an hour.

"Hi." The woman who came to the door was thin and angular, but not pretty by any stretch. She gave Faith an awkward, forced smile. Her blonde hair was lank across her forehead, the dark roots growing in. She had that run-down look you get when you have small children.

"I'm Special Agent Faith Mitchell," Faith said, holding up her badge.

"Darla Coldfield." The woman's voice was one of those breathy whispers that implied delicacy. She picked at the collar of the purple blouse she was wearing. Faith could see the edge was worn, threads sticking up where she had picked open the seam.

"Tom said he'd meet me here."

"He should be home any second." The woman seemed to realize she was blocking the doorway. She stepped aside. "Won't you come in?"

Faith walked into the foyer, which was lined with black and white tile. She saw that the tile went all the way through to the back of the house, into the kitchen and family room. Even the dining room and study on either side of the front door were tiled.

Still, she made the perfunctory noise about the woman having a lovely home, her own footsteps echoing in her ears as they made their way to the family room. The furnishings were more masculine than Faith would have guessed. There was a brown leather couch and matching recliner. The rug on the floor was black with not a speck of dirt or fuzz showing. There were no toys, which was odd considering the Coldfields had two children. Maybe they weren't allowed in the room. She wondered where they spent their time. The part of the house she had seen was hot and uncomfortable even though it was cool outside. Faith felt her skin on the edge of breaking into a sweat. Sun was streaming through the windows, yet every light in the place was on.

Darla asked, "Would you like some tea?"

Faith was looking at her watch again, wondering about Will. "Sure."

"Sweet? Unsweet?"

Faith's answer was not as automatic as it should have been. "Unsweet. Have you lived here long?"

"Eight years."

The place looked about as lived-in as a vacant warehouse. "You have two kids?"

"A boy and a girl." She smiled uncertainly. "Do you have a partner?"

The question seemed strange, given the conversation. "I have a son."

She smiled, putting her hand to her mouth. She had probably picked up the gesture from her mother-in-law. "No, I meant someone you work with."

"Yes." Faith looked at the family photos on the mantel. They were taken from the same series as the one Judith Coldfield had shown them at the shelter. "Maybe you could call Tom and see what's keeping him?"

Her smile faltered. "Oh, no. I wouldn't want to bother him."

"It's police business, so I really do need you to bother him."

Darla pressed her lips together. Faith couldn't read her expression. She was almost completely blank. "My husband doesn't like to be rushed."

"And I don't like to be kept waiting."

Darla gave her that same weak smile from before. "I'll go get that tea for you."

She started to leave, but Faith asked, "Do you mind if I use your bathroom?"

Darla turned again, her hands clasped in front of her chest. Her face was still blank. "Down the hall, on the right."

"Thank you." Faith followed her directions, her heels clicking like a drum major's on the tile as she walked past a pantry and what must have been the door to the basement. She was getting a creepy feeling off of Darla Coldfield, but she couldn't quite figure out why. Maybe it was Faith's instinctive hatred of women who constantly deferred to their husbands.

Inside the bathroom, she went straight to the sink, where she splashed cold water on her face. The lights were just as intense in the powder room, and Faith flipped down the switches, but nothing happened. She flipped them back up and then back down again. Still the lights stayed on. She looked up. The bulbs were probably a hundred watts each.

Faith blinked her eyes several times, thinking that looking directly into a burning lightbulb was probably not the smartest thing she had ever done. She grabbed the doorknob to the linen closet to keep herself steady as she waited for the feeling to pass. Maybe she would wait in here for Will instead of sitting on the sofa drinking tea with Darla Coldfield, straining to make small talk. The bathroom was nice if sparsely furnished. The room was L-shaped, with a linen closet filling in the void between the top and bottom of the L. Faith guessed the laundry room was on the other side of the wall. She could hear the gentle rumble of a clothes dryer through the partition.

Because Faith was a nosy person, she opened the closet door. There was a slow squeak from the hinges, and she stood there waiting for Darla Coldfield to come in and chastise her for being rude. When this did not happen, Faith looked inside. The space was deeper than she would've guessed, but the shelves were narrow—stacked with towels that were neatly folded and a set of sheets with race cars on them that probably belonged to the children.

Where were the children? Maybe they were outside playing. Faith closed the closet door and looked out the small window. The backyard was empty—not even a swing set or tree house. Maybe the kids were taking naps in preparation for Grandma and Grandpa's visit. Faith had never let Jeremy sleep before her parents came to visit. She'd wanted her mother and father to run him ragged so that he was tired enough to sleep in the next morning.

She groaned out a long sigh as she sat on the toilet beside the sink. She was still feeling light-headed, probably from the heat. Or maybe from her blood sugar. She had been on the high side at the doctor's office.

She put her purse on her lap and dug around for her monitor. There had been a huge display for different blood glucose monitors on the wall in the doctor's office. Most of them were either cheap or free, because the real money came from the specialized strips they all used. Each manufacturer had a different one, so once you chose a monitor, you were locked in forever. Unless you dropped it on the bathroom floor and broke it.

"Shit," Faith mumbled, leaning down to pick up the monitor, which had slipped out of her hand and skittered over by the wall. She heard a faint, sonorous noise coming from the machine.

Faith picked up the monitor, wondering what damage she had done. The readout on the machine was still at zero, waiting for a strip. She shook the device, holding it to her ear and listening for the sound again. She leaned down, trying to duplicate the motion that had caused the monitor to make the noise. The sound repeated, more like the kind of thing you would hear on a playground this time—loud and frenzied.

And not coming from the monitor.

Could it be a cat? Some animal caught in the heating ducts? One Christmas, Jeremy's gerbil had been killed in the dryer, and Faith had sold the machine to a neighbor rather than deal with the carnage. But whatever this thing was, it was alive, and obviously intended to stay that way. She leaned down a third time, hovering near the heating grate at the base of the toilet.

The noise was clearer this time, but still muffled. Faith got down on her knees, pressing her ear to the grate. She thought of all the animals that could make that sort of noise. It sounded almost like words.

Help.

It wasn't an animal. It was a woman calling for help.

Faith's hand went into her purse, pulling out the velvet bag where she kept her Glock when she wasn't wearing it on her hip. Her hands were sweating.

There was a sudden, loud knock on the door: Darla. "Are you okay in there, Agent Mitchell?"

"I'm fine," Faith lied, trying to keep her voice normal. She found her cell phone, tried to ignore that her hands had started shaking. "Is Tom here yet?"

"Yes." The woman went silent. Just that one word hanging in the air.

"Darla?" There was no answer. "Darla, my partner is on the way. He's going to be here any minute." Faith's heart was pounding so hard that her chest hurt. "Darla?"

There was another bang on the door, but this one was sharper. Faith dropped the phone and held the gun with both hands, ready to fire at whoever came into the bathroom. The Glock did not have a conventional safety. The only way it could be fired was if you pulled the trigger all the way back. Faith aimed at the center of the doorway, bracing herself to yank back the trigger as hard as she could.

Nothing. No one came through the door. The knob was not turning. Quickly, she glanced down, looking for her cell phone. It was behind the toilet. She kept her gun trained on the door while she reached down for the phone, snatching it up.

The door stayed closed.

Faith's hands were sweating so badly that her fingers couldn't stay on the buttons. She hissed a curse as she dialed in the number wrong. She was trying again when she heard the closet door squeak open behind her.

She spun around, her gun pointing straight at Darla's chest. Faith took in everything at once—the false door in the closet wall, the washing machine on the other side, the Taser in Darla's hands.

Faith lurched to the side, not bothering to aim as she pulled back on the trigger. The Taser hooks sailed past her, the thin metal wires shimmering in the bright light as the hooks bounced off the wall.

Darla stood there, the spent Taser in her hands. A chunk of sheetrock had been taken out over her left shoulder.

"Don't move," Faith warned, keeping the gun trained on Darla's chest as she fumbled for the doorknob. "I mean it. Don't move."

"I'm sorry," the woman whispered.

"Where's Tom?" When she didn't answer, Faith screamed, "Where the fuck is Tom?"

Darla would only shake her head.

Faith threw open the door, still pointing the gun at Darla as she backed out of the room.

"I'm so sorry," the woman repeated.

Two strong arms wrapped around Faith from behind—a man, his body hard, his strength palpable. It had to be Tom. He lifted her off the floor and, without thinking, Faith pulled the trigger again, firing the Glock into the ceiling. Darla was still standing in the closet, and Faith pulled the trigger with purpose this time, wanting to put a bullet in the woman that could be traced back to her gun. The Glock missed, and Darla ducked away, shutting the false door behind her.

Faith fired again and again as Tom backed her out into the hallway. His hand clamped around Faith's wrist like a vise, the pain so sharp that she was sure her bones had snapped. She held on to the gun as long as she could, but she was no match for his strength. Dropping the weapon, she started kicking with all her might, reaching out to grab anything she could find—the edge of the door, the wall, the knob on the basement door. Every muscle in her body screamed from pain.

“Fight,” Tom grunted, his lips so close to Faith’s ear that she felt like he was inside of her head. She could feel his body responding to the struggle, the pleasure he was deriving from her fear.

Faith felt a surge of fury tighten her resolve. Anna Lindsey. Jacquelyn Zabel. Pauline McGhee. Olivia Tanner. She would not be another one of his victims. She would not end up at the morgue. She would not abandon her son. She would not lose her baby.

She twisted around and scratched Tom’s face, digging her fingernails into his eyes. She used every part of her body—her hands, her feet, her teeth—to fight him. She would not give in. She would kill him with her bare hands if she had to.

“Let me out of here!” someone screamed from the basement. The noise was a surprise. For a split second, Faith stopped struggling. Tom stopped, too. The door shook. “Let me the fuck out!”

Faith came to her senses. She started kicking again, flailing, doing everything she could to free herself. Tom held on, his powerful arms like a clamp around her body. Whoever was behind the basement door was beating it, trying to break it down. Faith opened up her mouth and screamed as loud as she could. “Help! Help me!”

“Do it!” Tom yelled.

Darla stood at the end of the hallway, the reloaded Taser in her hands. Faith saw her Glock at the woman’s feet.

“Do it!” Tom demanded, his voice barely audible over the banging behind the door. “Shoot her!”

All Faith could think about was the child inside her, those tiny fingers, that delicate heartbeat pressing up and down against her baby’s tissue-thin chest. She went completely limp, relaxing every muscle in her body. Tom hadn’t been expecting her to give in, and he stumbled as he took on her full weight. They both dropped to the floor. Faith scrambled across the tile, reaching for the gun, but he yanked her back like a fish on a line.

The door splintered open, shards of wood flying. A woman ran out, half-fell into the hallway, screaming obscenities. Her hands were at her waist, her feet chained, but she moved with almost laser precision as she slammed her body into Tom’s.

Faith took advantage of the distraction and grabbed the Glock, twisting around, aiming at the bodies thrashing on the floor.

“Fucker!” Pauline McGhee screeched. She was kneeling on Tom’s chest, leaning over him. Her hands were cuffed tight to a belt around her waist, but she had managed to wrap her fingers around his neck. “Die!” she screamed, blood spraying from her torn mouth. Her lips were shredded, her eyes wild. She was forcing all of her weight into Tom’s neck.

“Stop,” Faith managed, her breath rasping between her lips. She felt a deep, searing pain in her belly, like something had torn. Still, she kept her gun trained at Pauline’s chest. There was at least half a magazine left in the Glock; she would use it if she had to. “Get off him,” Faith ordered.

Tom bucked, hands clawing at Pauline. Pauline pressed harder, pivoting on her knees, putting her full weight into his neck.

"Kill him," Darla begged. She was curled into a ball by the bathroom door, the Taser on the floor beside her. "Please ... kill him."

"Stop," Faith warned Pauline, willing her hand not to shake as she gripped the gun.

"Let her do it," Darla pleaded. "Please, let her do it."

Faith groaned as she staggered to her feet. She put the gun to Pauline's head, made her voice as steady and strong as possible. "Stop right now or I will pull this fucking trigger, so help me God."

Pauline looked up. Their eyes locked, and Faith willed every ounce of resolve into her face, even though all she wanted to do was fall to her knees and pray that the life inside of her was going to continue.

"Let him go right now," Faith demanded.

Pauline took her time obeying the order, as if she hoped that one more second of pressure would do the trick. She sat back on the floor, her hands still clenched. Tom rolled over, coughing so hard that his entire body spasmed from the effort.

"Call an ambulance," Faith said, though no one seemed to be moving. Her mind raced. Her vision kept blurring. She had to call Amanda. She had to find Will. Where was he? Why wasn't he here?

"What's wrong with you?" Pauline asked, giving Faith a nasty look.

Faith's head was spinning. She sagged against the wall, trying not to pass out. She felt something wet between her legs. There was another twinge in her belly, almost like a contraction. "Call an ambulance," she repeated.

"Trash ..." Tom Coldfield muttered. "You're all nothing but trash."

"Shut up," Pauline hissed.

Tom rasped, " 'Put now this woman out from me ... and bolt the door after her.' "

"Shut up," Pauline repeated through clenched teeth.

A guttural sound came from Tom's throat. He was laughing. " 'O, Absalom, I am risen.' "

Pauline struggled to get to her knees. "You're going straight to hell, you sick bastard."

"Don't," Faith warned, raising the gun again. "Get a phone." She glanced over her shoulder at Darla. "Get my phone out of the bathroom."

Faith snapped her head around as Pauline leaned over Tom.

"Don't," Faith repeated.

Pauline smiled a grotesque jack-o'-lantern sneer down at Tom Coldfield. Instead of wrapping her hands around his throat again, she spit in his face. "Georgia's a death penalty state, motherfucker. Why else do you think I moved here?"

"Wait," Faith said, bewildered. "You know him?"

Raw hatred flashed in the woman's eyes. "Of course I know him, you stupid bitch. He's my brother."

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Will lay on his side on Judith Coldfield's kitchen floor, watching Judith sob into her hands. His nose was itching, which was a funny thing to bother him, considering the fact that he had a kitchen knife sticking out of his back. At least he thought it was a kitchen knife. Every time he tried to turn his head to look, the pain got so bad that he felt himself start to pass out.

He wasn't bleeding badly. The real threat came from the knife moving, shifting away from whatever vessel or artery it was damming and causing the blood to start flowing in earnest. Just thinking about the mechanics of the thing, the metal blade pressing between muscle and sinew, made his head swim. Sweat drenched his body, and he was starting to get chills. Oddly, holding up his neck was the hardest part. The muscles were so tense that his head throbbed with every heartbeat. If he let go for even a second, the pain in his shoulder brought the taste of vomit into his mouth. Will had never realized how many parts of his body were connected to his shoulder.

"He's a good boy," Judith told Will, her voice muffled by her hands. "You don't know how good he is."

"Tell me. Tell me why you think he's good."

The request startled her. She finally looked up at him, seemed to realize he was in danger of eventually dying. "Are you in pain?"

"I'm hurting pretty badly," he admitted. "I need to call my partner. I need to know if she's okay."

"Tom would never hurt her."

The fact that she felt compelled to make that statement sent an icy dread through Will. Faith was a good cop. She could take care of herself, except the times when she couldn't. She had passed out a few days ago—just dropped to the pavement in the parking garage at the courthouse. What if she passed out again? What if she passed out and when she finally came to, she opened her eyes to see another cave, another torture chamber excavated by Tom Coldfield?

Judith wiped her eyes with the back of her hand. "I don't know what to do ..."

Will didn't think she was looking for suggestions. "Pauline Seward left Ann Arbor, Michigan, twenty years ago. She was seventeen years old."

Judith looked away.

He took a calculated guess. "The missing persons report filed on her said that she left home because her brother was abusing her."

"That's not true. Pauline was just ... she made that up."

"I've read the report," he lied. "I saw what he did to her."

"He didn't do anything," Judith insisted. "Pauline did those things to herself."

"She hurt herself?"

"She hurt herself. She made up stories. From the moment she was born, she was always making trouble."

Will should have guessed. "Pauline's your daughter."

Judith nodded, obviously disgusted by the fact.

"What kind of trouble did she get into?"

"She wouldn't eat," Judith told him. "She starved herself. We took her to doctor after doctor. We spent every dime we had trying to get help for her, and she repaid us by going to the police and telling them awful stories about Tom. Just awful, awful things."

"That he hurt her?"

She hesitated, then gave the slightest of nods. "Tom has always had a sweet nature. Pauline was just too—" She shook her head, unable to find words. "She made things up about him. Awful things. I knew they couldn't be true." Judith kept coming back to the same point. "Even when she was a small child, she told lies. She was always looking for ways to hurt people. To hurt Tom."

"His name isn't really Tom, is it?"

She was looking somewhere over his shoulder, probably at the handle of the knife. "Tom is his middle name. His first is—"

"Matthias?" he guessed. She nodded again, and for just a moment Will let himself think about Sara Linton. She had been joking at the time, but she had also been right. Find the guy named Matthias and you find your killer.

"After Judas's betrayal, the apostles had to decide who would help them tell the story of the resurrection of Jesus." She finally met his gaze. "They chose Matthias. He was a holy man. A true disciple to our Lord."

Will blinked to get the sweat out of his eyes. He told Judith, "Every woman who is missing or dead has a connection to your shelter. Jackie donated her mother's things. Olivia Tanner's bank sponsored your community outreach. Anna Lindsey's law firm did pro bono work. Tom must've met them all there."

"You don't know that."

"Then tell me another connection."

Judith's eyes scanned his back and forth, and he could read the desperation in her face. "Pauline," she suggested. "She might be—"

"Pauline is missing, Mrs. Coldfield. She was abducted from a parking lot two days ago. Her six-year-old son was left in the car."

"She has a child?" Judith's mouth opened in shock. "Pauline has a baby?"

"Felix. Your grandson."

She put her hand to her chest. "The doctors said she wouldn't—I don't understand. How could she have a baby? They said she'd never be able to carry —" She kept shaking her head in disbelief.

"Did your daughter have an eating disorder?"

"We tried to get help for her, but in the end ..." Judith shook her head, as if it was all useless. "Tom teased her about her weight, but all little brothers tease their older sisters. He never meant her any harm. He never meant ..." She stopped, holding back a strangled sob. There was a crack in her façade as she let herself consider the possibility that her son might be the monster Will had described. Just as quickly, she recovered, shaking her head. "No. I don't believe you. Tom would never hurt anyone."

Will's body started to shiver. He still wasn't losing much blood, but his mind wasn't capable of ignoring the pain for longer than a minute at a time. His head would drop, or he would flick sweat out of his eye, and it would flare up like hellfire. The darkness kept calling to him, the sweet relief of letting go. He let his eyes close for a few seconds, then a few more. Will jerked himself awake, groaning at the searing pain.

Judith said, "You need help. I should get you help." She made no move to do this. The phone started to ring again, and she simply stared at the receiver on the wall.

"Tell me about the cave."

"I don't know anything about that."

"Did your son like to dig holes?"

"My son likes to go to church. He loves his family. He loves helping people."

"Tell me about the number eleven."

"What about it?"

"Tom seems drawn to it. Is it because of his name?"

"He just likes it."

"Judas betrayed Jesus. There were eleven apostles until Matthias came along."

"I know my Bible stories."

"Did Pauline betray you? Were you incomplete until your son came along?"

"This means nothing to me."

"Tom's obsessed with the number eleven," Will told her. "He took Anna Lindsey's eleventh rib. He shoved eleven trash bags up inside her womb."

"Stop!" she shouted. "I don't want to hear any more."

"He electrocuted them. He tortured and raped them."

She screeched, "He was trying to save them!"

The words echoed around the tiny room like a pinball striking metal.

Judith covered her mouth with her hand, horrified.

Will said, "You knew."

"I didn't know anything."

"You must have seen it on the news. Some of the women's names were released. You had to recognize them from your work at the shelter. You saw Anna Lindsey in the road after Henry hit her with the car. You called Tom to take care of her, but there were too many people around."

"No."

"Judith, you know—"

"I know my son," she insisted. "If he was with those women, it was only because he was trying to help them."

"Judith—"

She stood up, and Will could tell she was angry. "I'm not going to listen to you lie about him. I nursed him when he was a baby. I held him—" She cradled her arms. "I held him to my chest and promised him that I would protect him."

"You didn't do that with Pauline, too?"

Her face became emotionless. "If Tom doesn't come, I'm going to have to take care of you myself." She took a knife out of the butcher block. "I don't care if I go to prison for the rest of my life. I will not let you destroy my son."

"You sure you can do that? Stabbing someone in the back isn't the same as stabbing them to their face."

"I'm not going to let you hurt him." She held the knife awkwardly, gripped in both hands. "I won't let you."

"Put the knife down."

“What makes you think you can tell me what to do?”

“My boss is behind you with a gun pointed at your head.”

She gasped, the sound catching in her throat when she whirled around and saw Amanda standing on the other side of the window. Without warning, Judith raised the knife and lunged toward Will. The window exploded. Judith fell to the floor in front of him, the knife still gripped in her hand. A perfect circle of blood seeped into the back of her shirt.

He heard a door break open. People ran in, heavy shoes on the floor, orders being barked. Will couldn't take it anymore. He dropped his head and the pain shot through to his core. Amanda's high heels swam into his vision. She knelt down in front of him. Her mouth was moving, but Will couldn't hear what she was saying. He wanted to ask about Faith, about her baby, but it was too easy to surrender to the darkness.

THREE DAYS LATER

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

Pauline McGhee was hard to look at, even as she held her child in her lap. Her mouth had been ripped to shreds by the metal wire she'd chewed through, so she mumbled as she tried to speak, her lips tightly held together. Tiny sutures held the skin in place like something out of Frankenstein. And yet, she was hard to feel any sympathy for, perhaps because she kept referring to Faith as "bitch" more than any man ever had.

"Bitch," she said now, "I don't know what I can tell you. I haven't seen my family in twenty years."

Will shifted in his chair beside Faith. His arm was in a sling tight to his chest and he was in visible pain, but he had insisted on coming in for the interview. Faith couldn't blame him for wanting answers. Unfortunately, it was fast becoming obvious that they weren't going to get them from Pauline.

"Tom has lived in sixteen different cities over the last thirty years," Will told her. "We've found cases in twelve of them—women who were abducted and never returned. They were always in pairs. Two women at a time."

"I know what a fucking pair is."

Will opened his mouth to speak, but Faith reached under the table, pressing his knee. Their usual tactics weren't working. Pauline McGhee was a survivor, willing to step over anything or anyone to save her own skin. She had kicked Olivia Tanner into unconsciousness in order to make sure she was the first one to escape the basement. She would have strangled her own brother to death if Faith hadn't stopped her. She wasn't someone who could be reached through empathy.

Faith took a gamble. "Pauline, stop the bullshit. You know you can leave this room at any time. You're staying for a reason."

The injured woman looked down at Felix, stroking his hair. For just an instant, Pauline McGhee seemed almost human. Something about the child transformed her so that Faith suddenly understood the hard outer shell was a defense against the world that only Felix could penetrate. The boy had fallen asleep in her arms as soon as his mother sat down at the conference table. His thumb kept going to his mouth, and Pauline moved it away a few times before giving in. Faith could understand why she wouldn't want to let her son out of sight, but this was hardly the kind of thing you'd want to bring a kid to.

Pauline asked, "Were you really going to shoot me?"

"What?" Faith asked, even though she knew exactly what the woman meant.

"In the hall," she said. "I would've killed him. I wanted to kill him."

"I'm a police officer," Faith answered. "It's my job to protect life."

"That life?" Pauline asked, incredulous. "You know what that bastard did." She lifted her chin toward Will. "Listen to your partner. My brother killed at least two dozen women. Do you really think he deserves a trial?" She pressed her lips to the top of Felix's head. "You should've let me kill him. Put him down like a fucking dog.”

Faith didn't answer, mostly because there was nothing to say. Tom Coldfield was not talking. He wasn't bragging about his crimes or offering to tell where the bodies were buried in exchange for his life. He was resolved to go to prison, probably death row. All he had asked for was bread and water and his Bible, a book that had so many scribbled notations in the margins that the words were barely legible.

Still, Faith had tossed and turned in bed over the last few nights, reliving those few seconds in the hallway. Sometimes she let Pauline kill her brother. Sometimes she ended up having to shoot the woman. None of the scenarios sat well with her, and she had resigned herself to knowing that these emotions were the type that only time could heal. The process of moving on was helped by the fact that the case was no longer Faith and Will's responsibility. Because Matthias Thomas Coldfield's crimes had crossed state lines, he was the FBI's problem now. Faith was only allowed to interview Pauline because they thought the women shared a bond. They were dead wrong.

Or maybe not.

Pauline asked, “How far along are you?”

“Ten weeks,” Faith answered. She had been at the edge of insanity when the paramedics arrived at Tom Coldfield's house. All she could think about was her baby, whether or not it was still safe. Even when the heartbeat had bleated through the fetal monitor, Faith had kept sobbing, begging the EMTs to take her to the hospital. She'd been sure they were all wrong, that something horrible had happened. Oddly, the only person who could convince her otherwise had been Sara Linton.

On the plus side, her whole family knew she was pregnant now, thanks to the Grady nurses referring to Faith as “that hysterical pregnant cop” her entire stay in the ER.

Pauline stroked back Felix's hair. “I got so fat with him. It was disgusting.”

“It's hard,” Faith admitted. “It's worth it, though.”

“I guess.” She brushed her torn lips across her son's head. “He's the only thing good about me.”

Faith had often said the same thing about Jeremy, but now, facing Pauline McGhee, she saw how lucky she was. Faith had her mother, who loved her despite all Faith's faults. She had Zeke, even though he had moved to Germany to get away from her. She had Will, and for better or worse, she had Amanda. Pauline had no one—just a small boy who desperately needed her.

Pauline said, “When I had Felix, it just made me think about her. Judith. How could she hate me so much?” She looked up at Faith, expecting an answer.

Faith said, “I don't know. I can't imagine how anyone could hate their own child. Any child, for that matter.”

“Well, some kids just suck, but your own kid ...”

Pauline went quiet again for such a long time that Faith wondered if they were back to square one again.

Will spoke. “We need to know why all of this happened, Pauline. I need to know.”

She was staring back out the window, her son held close to her heart. She spoke so quietly that Faith had to strain to hear her. “My uncle raped me.”

Faith and Will were both silent, giving the woman space.

Pauline confided, "I was three years old, then four, then coming up on five. I finally told my grandmother what was happening. I thought the bitch would save me, but she turned it around like I was some devil child." Her lips twisted into a bitter sneer. "My mother believed them, not me. She chose their side. Like always."

"What happened?"

"We moved away. We always moved when things got bad. Dad put in for a transfer at work, we sold the house and then we started all over again. Different town, different school, same fucking situation."

Will asked, "When did it get bad with Tom?"

"I was fifteen." Pauline shrugged again. "I had this friend, Alexandra McGhee—that's where I got my name when I changed it. We lived in Oregon a couple of years before we moved to Ann Arbor. That's when it really started with Tom—when everything got bad." Her tone had turned to a dull narrative, as if she was giving a secondhand account of something mundane instead of revealing the most horrible moments of her life. "He was obsessed with me. Like, in love with me. He followed me around, and he would smell my clothes and try to touch my hair and ..."

Faith tried to hide her revulsion, but her stomach clenched at the image the other woman's words conjured.

Pauline said, "Suddenly, Alex stopped coming over. We were best friends. I wanted to know if I'd said something, or done something ..." Her voice trailed off. "Tom was hurting her. I don't know how. At least, I didn't know how in the beginning. I found out soon enough."

"What happened?"

"She was writing this sentence everywhere, over and over again. On her books, on the soles of her shoes, the back of her hand."

"I will not deny myself," Will guessed.

Pauline nodded. "It was this exercise one of the doctors at the hospital gave me. I was supposed to write the sentence, convince myself not to binge and purge, like writing a fucking sentence a zillion times would make it all go away."

"Did you know Tom was making Alex write the sentence?"

"She looked like me," Pauline admitted. "That's why he liked her so much. She was like a substitution for me—same color hair, same height, about the same weight but she looked fatter than me."

The same qualities that had drawn Tom to all the recent victims: Each woman resembled his sister.

Pauline told them, "I asked him about it—why he was making her write the sentence. I mean, I was pissed, right? And I yelled at him, and he just hit me. Not like a slap, but with his fist. And when I fell down, he started beating me."

Faith asked, "What happened next?"

Pauline stared blankly out the window, as if she was alone in the room. "Alex and I were in the woods. We'd go out there to smoke after school. The day that Tom beat me, I met her out there. At first, she wouldn't say anything, but then she just broke down. She finally told me that Tom had been taking her into the basement of our house and doing things to her. Bad things." She closed her eyes.

"Alex took it because Tom said if she didn't, then he would start doing it to me. She was protecting me."

She opened her eyes, staring at Faith with startling intensity. "Alex and I were talking about what to do. I told her it was useless telling my parents, that nothing would happen. So we decided to go to the police. There was this cop I knew. Only, I guess Tom followed us out to the woods. He was always watching us. He had this baby monitor he hid in my room. He'd listen to us and ..." She shrugged, and Faith could very easily guess what Tom had been doing while he listened to his sister and her friend.

Pauline continued, "Anyway, Tom found us in the woods. He hit me in the back of the head with a rock. I don't know what he did to Alex. I didn't see her for a while. I think he was working on her, trying to break her. That was the hardest part. Was she dead? Was he beating her? Torturing her? Or maybe he'd let her go and she was keeping quiet because she was scared of him." She swallowed. "But it wasn't that."

"What was it?"

"He was keeping her in the basement again. Priming her for the really bad stuff."

"No one heard her down there?"

Pauline shook her head. "Dad was gone, and Mom ..." She shook her head again. Faith was convinced they would never really know what Judith Coldfield knew about her son's sadistic ways.

Pauline said, "I don't know how long it lasted, but eventually, Alex ended up in the same place as me."

"Where was that?"

"In the ground," she said. "It was dark. We were blindfolded. He put cotton in our ears, but we could still hear each other. We were tied up. Still ... we knew we were underground. There's a taste, right? Kind of like a wet, dirty taste you get in your mouth. He had dug a cave. It must've taken him weeks. He always liked to plan everything, to control every last detail."

"Was Tom with you all the time after that?"

"Not at first. I guess he was still working on his alibi. He just left us there for a few days—tied up so we couldn't move, couldn't see, could barely hear anything. We screamed at first, but ..." She shook her head as if she could shake away the memory. "He brought us water, but not food. I guess a week went by. I was okay—I'd gone longer than that without eating. But Alex ... She broke. She kept crying all the time, begging me to do something to help her. Then Tom would come, and I'd beg him to shut her up, to make it so I didn't have to hear it." She went silent again, lost in her memories. "And then one day, something changed. He started in on us."

"What did he do?"

"At first, he just talked. He was all into biblical stuff—stuff my mom put into his head about him being a replacement for Judas, who betrayed Jesus. She was always saying how I had betrayed her, how she had carried me to be a good kid, but I had turned out rotten, made her family hate her with my lies."

Faith quoted the last sentence she had heard Tom Coldfield utter. "'O Absalom, I am risen.'"

Pauline shivered, as if the words cut through her. "It's from the Bible. Ammon raped his own sister, and once he was finished with her, he cast her out for being a whore.” Her torn lips twisted into an approximation of a smile. “Absalom was Ammon’s brother. He killed him for raping their sister.” She gave a harsh laugh. “Too bad I didn’t have another brother.”

“Was Tom always obsessed with religion?”

“Not a regular religion. Not normal. He twisted the Bible to suit whatever he wanted to do. That’s why he was keeping me and Alex underground—so that we would have a chance to be reborn like Jesus.” She looked up at Faith. “Crazy shit, right? He’d go on and on for hours, telling us how bad we were, talking about how he was going to redeem us. He’d touch me sometimes, but I couldn’t see ...” She shuddered again, her whole body shaking from the movement. Felix stirred, and she soothed him back to sleep.

Faith felt her heart thumping in her chest. She could remember her own struggle with Tom, the feel of his hot breath in her ear when he told her, “Fight.”

Will asked, “What did Tom do when he stopped talking to you and Alex?”

“What do you think he did?” she asked sarcastically. “He didn’t know what he was doing, but he knew he liked it when he hurt us.” She swallowed, her eyes tearing up. “It was our first time—both of us. We were only fifteen. Girls didn’t sleep around a lot back then. We weren’t angels or anything, but we weren’t sluts, either.”

“Did he do anything else?”

“He starved us. Not like what he did to the other women, but bad enough.”

“The trash bags?”

She gave a single, tight nod. “We were trash to him. Nothing but trash.”

Tom had said as much in the hallway. “No one missed you or Alex when Tom had you in the cave?”

“They thought we’d run away. Girls do that, right? They just run away from home, and if the parents are there to say that the girls are bad, that they lie all the time and can’t be trusted, then it’s no big deal, right?” She didn’t let them answer. “I bet Tom got a hard-on lying to the cops, telling them he had no idea where we’d gone.”

“How old was Tom when this happened?”

“Three years younger than me.”

“Twelve,” Will said.

“No,” Pauline corrected. “He hadn’t had his birthday yet. He was only eleven when it happened. He turned twelve a month later. Mom had a party. The little freak was out on bail and she threw him a birthday party.”

“How did you get out of the cave?”

“He let us go. He said he was going to kill us if we told anybody, but Alex told her parents anyway, and they believed her.” She snorted a laugh. “Fuck me if they didn’t believe her.”

“What happened to Tom?”

“He was arrested. The cops called, and Mom took him down to the station. They didn’t come get him. They didn’t arrest him. They just called us on the phone and said to bring him in.” She paused, collecting herself. “Tom had a psychiatric evaluation. There was all this talk about sending him to adult prison, but he was only a kid, and the shrinks were screaming about how he needed help. Tom could look younger when he wanted—much younger than he actually was. Bewildered, like he didn't understand why people were saying all these bad things about him."

"What did the courts decide to do?"

"He was diagnosed with something. I don't know. Psychopath, probably."

"We have his Air Force records. Did you know he served?" Pauline shook her head, and Faith told her, "Six years. He was discharged in lieu of court-martial."

"What does that mean?"

"Reading between the lines, I'd guess that the Air Force didn't want—or know how—to treat his disorder, so they offered him an honorable discharge and he took it." Tom Coldfield's military records were written in the sort of departmental code only a seasoned vet could decipher. As a doctor, Faith's brother, Zeke, had recognized all the clues. The nail in the coffin was the fact that Tom had never been called back up to serve in Iraq, even at the height of the war when enlistment standards had dropped to almost nonexistent.

Will asked, "What happened to Tom in Oregon?"

Pauline answered in a measured tone. "He was supposed to go to the state hospital, but Mom talked to the judge, said we had family back east and could we take him back and put him in a hospital there so he could be close to the people who cared about him. The judge said okay. I guess they were glad to get rid of us. Sort of like with the Air Force, huh? Out of sight, out of mind."

"Did your mother get him treatment?"

"Hell no," she laughed. "My mother did the same fucking thing all over again. She said Alex and I were lying, that we had run away and gotten hurt by a stranger, and we were trying to pin it on Tom because we hated him and we wanted people to feel sorry for us."

Faith felt a sickness in the pit of her stomach, wondering how a mother could be so blind to her child's suffering.

Will asked, "Is that when you changed your names to Coldfield?"

"We changed them to Seward after what happened to Tom. It wasn't easy. There were bank accounts, all sorts of documents to file to make it legal. My dad started asking questions. He wasn't happy, because he actually had to do something, you know? Go down to the courthouse, get copies of birth certificates, fill out forms. They were in the middle of changing everything over to Seward when I ran away. I guess when they left Michigan, they changed it back to Coldfield. It's not like Oregon was following up on Tom. As far as they were concerned, his case was closed."

"Did you ever hear from Alex McGhee?"

"She killed herself." Pauline's voice was so cold it sent a chill down Faith's spine. "I guess she couldn't take it. Some women are like that."

Will asked, "You're sure your father didn't know what was going on?"

"He didn't want to know," Pauline answered. But there was no way of confirming this. Henry Coldfield had suffered a massive coronary upon hearing what had happened to his wife and son. He'd died en route to the hospital.

Will kept pressing. "Your father never noticed—"

"He traveled all the time. He was gone for weeks, sometimes as much as a whole month. And even when he was home, he was never really home. He was flying his plane or off hunting or playing golf or just doing whatever the hell he wanted to do.” Pauline’s tone got angrier with every word. “They had this kind of bargain, you know? She kept the house running, didn’t ask him to help with anything, and he got to do whatever he wanted so long as he handed over his paycheck and didn’t ask any questions. Nice life, huh?”

“Did your father ever hurt you?”

“No. He was never there to hurt me. We saw him at Christmas and Easter. That was about it.”

“Why Easter?”

“I don’t know. It was always special to my mother. She would dye eggs and hang up streamers and stuff. She would tell Tom the story of his birth, how he was special, how she had wanted a son so badly, how he’d made her life complete.”

“Is that why you chose to run away on Easter?”

“I ran away because Tom was digging another hole in the backyard.”

Faith gave her a moment to collect her thoughts. “This was in Ann Arbor?”

Pauline nodded, a faraway look in her eyes. “I didn’t recognize him, you know?”

“When he abducted you?”

“It happened so fast. I was so damn happy to see Felix. I thought I’d lost him. And then my brain started to make the connection that it was Tom standing there, but it was too late by then.”

“You recognized him?”

“I felt him. I can’t describe it. I just knew with every part of my body that it was him.” She closed her eyes for a few seconds. “When I came to in the basement, I could still feel him. I don’t know what he did to me while I was passed out. I don’t know what he did.”

Faith suppressed a shudder at the thought. “How did he find you?”

“I think he always knew where I was. He’s good at tracking people down, watching them, figuring out their habits. I guess I didn’t make it too hard, using Alex’s name like I did.” She gave a humorless laugh. “He called me at work about a year and a half ago. Can you believe that? What are the odds that I’d take a call like that and it would be Tom on the other end?”

“Did you know it was him on the phone?”

“Fuck no. I would’ve grabbed Felix and run.”

“What did he want when he called?”

“I told you. It was a cold call.” She shook her head, disbelieving. “He told me about the shelter, that they would take donations and give blank receipts. We’ve got all these rich clients, and they give away their furniture to charity for the tax write-off. It makes them feel better about ditching a fifty-thousand-dollar living room set and buying an eighty-thousand-dollar one.”

Faith couldn’t even comprehend the numbers. “So, you decided to refer your clients to the shelter?”

“I was pissed at Goodwill. They give you a time frame, like between ten and noon. Who can wait for that? My clients are millionaires. They can’t sit around all morning waiting for some homeless dude to show up. Tom said the shelter would make an exact appointment and be there on time. And they always were. They were friendly and clean, which, trust me, is saying a lot. I told everybody to use them.” She realized what she had said. “I told everybody.”

"Including the women on your Internet board?"

She kept silent.

Faith told her what they had found out over the last few days. "Anna Lindsey's firm started giving the shelter legal advice six months ago. Olivia Tanner's bank became a major donor last year. Jackie Zabel called the shelter to pick up things from her mother's house. They all heard about the shelter somewhere."

"I didn't ... I didn't know."

They still hadn't managed to break into the chat room. The site was too sophisticated, and cracking the passwords no longer had a priority for the FBI, since their guy was already sitting in jail. Faith needed the confirmation, though. She had to hear it from Pauline. "You posted about the shelter, didn't you?"

Pauline still did not answer.

"Tell me," Faith said, and for some reason, the request worked.

"Yeah. I posted it."

Faith hadn't realized that she had been holding her breath. She let it out in a slow stream. "How did Tom know they all had eating disorders?"

Pauline looked up. Some of her color seeped back into her cheeks. "How did you know?"

Faith thought about the question. They knew because they had investigated the women's lives, just as methodically as Tom Coldfield had. He'd followed them around, spied on their most intimate moments. And none of them had known he was doing it.

Pauline asked, "Is the other woman all right? The one I was with."

"Yes." Olivia Tanner was well enough to refuse to talk to the police.

"She's a tough bitch."

"So are you." Faith told her, "It might help to talk to her."

"I don't need help."

Faith didn't bother to argue.

Pauline said, "I knew Tom would find me eventually. I kept training myself. Making sure I could go without food. Making sure I could last." She explained, "When it was me and Alex, he would hurt whoever screamed the loudest, whoever broke first. I made sure it wasn't me. That's how I helped myself."

Will asked, "Your father never asked why your mother wanted to change your names and move?"

"She told him it was to give Tom a fresh start—give us all a fresh start." She gave a humorless laugh, directing her words toward Faith. "It's always about the boys, isn't it? Mothers and their sons. Fuck the daughters. It's the sons they really love."

Faith put her hand to her stomach. The gesture had become second nature over the last few days. All along, she had been thinking that the child inside of her was a boy; another Jeremy who would draw pictures and sing to her. Another toddler who would puff out his chest when he told his friends that his mom was a cop. Another young man who was respectful of women. Another adult who knew from his single mother how hard it was to be the fairer sex.

Now Faith prayed that she would have a daughter. Every woman they had met on this case had found a way to hate herself long before Tom Coldfield had gotten hold of her. They all were used to depriving their bodies of everything from nourishment to warmth to something as vital as love. Faith wanted to show her own child a different path. She wanted a girl she could raise who might have a chance of loving herself. She wanted to see that girl grow into a strong woman who knew her value in the world. And she never wanted either of her children to meet someone as bitter and damaged as Pauline McGhee.

Will told Pauline, "Judith's in the hospital. The bullet just missed her heart."

The woman's nostrils flared. Tears came into her eyes, and Faith wondered if there was still a part of her, no matter how small, that wanted some kind of bond with her mother.

Faith offered, "I can take you to see Judith if you want."

She snorted a laugh, angrily wiping away her tears. "Bitch, don't even. She was never there for me. I'm sure as shit not going to be there for her." She shifted her son on her shoulder. "I need to get him home."

Will tried. "If you could just—"

"Just what?"

He didn't have an answer for her. Pauline stood up and walked to the door, trying to hold Felix as she reached for the knob.

Faith told her, "The FBI will probably be getting in touch with you."

"The FBI can kiss my ass." She managed to get the door open. "And so can you."

Faith watched her walk down the hallway, shifting Felix as she turned toward the elevators. "God," she said softly. "It's hard to feel sorry for her."

"You did the right thing," Will told her.

Faith saw herself in Tom Coldfield's hallway again, her gun pointed at Pauline's head, Tom bucking on the floor. They weren't trained to wing suspects. They were trained to fire a rapid bullet spread straight over the center of the chest.

Unless you were Amanda Wagner. Then you squeezed off a single shot that did enough damage to take them down but not take their life.

Will asked, "If you had to do it again, would you let Pauline kill Tom?"

"I don't know," Faith confessed. "I was operating on autopilot. I just did what I was trained to do."

"Considering what Pauline's been through ..." Will began, then stopped himself. "She's not very nice."

"She's a cold-blooded bitch."

"I'm surprised I haven't fallen in love with her."

Faith laughed. She had seen Angie at the hospital when they brought Will out of surgery. "How is Mrs. Trent doing?"

"She's making sure my life insurance policies are paid up." He took out his phone. "I told her I'd be back by three."

Faith didn't make a comment about the new phone, or the wary look on his face. She supposed Angie Polaski was back in Will's life now. Faith would just have to get used to her, the same way you tolerated an annoying sister-in-law or the boss's whorishly obnoxious daughter.

He pushed back his chair. "I guess I should go."

"You want me to drive you home?"

"I'll walk."

He only lived a few blocks over, but he'd been in surgery less than seventy-two hours ago. Faith opened her mouth to protest, but Will stopped her.

“You’re a good cop, Faith, and I’m glad you’re my partner.”

There were few things he could have said that would have stunned her more. “Really?”

He leaned down and kissed the top of her head. Before she could respond, he told her, “If you ever see Angie on top of me like that, don’t give her a warning, all right? Just pull the trigger.”

EPILOGUE

Sara stood back as they rolled her patient out of the trauma room. The man had been in a head-on collision with a motorcyclist who thought red lights were only for cars. The cyclist was dead, but the man had a good chance thanks to the fact that he was wearing his seatbelt. Sara was constantly amazed at the number of people she saw in the Grady ER who believed seatbelts were unnecessary. She had seen almost as many in the morgue during her years as coroner for Grant County.

Mary came into the room to clean up the mess for the next patient. "Good save," she said.

Sara felt herself smiling. Grady saw only the worst of the worst. She didn't hear that often enough.

"How's that hysterical pregnant cop doing? Mitchell?"

"Faith," Sara supplied. "Good, I guess." She hadn't talked to Faith since the woman had been airlifted to the emergency room two weeks ago. Every time Sara thought to pick up the phone to check on her, something stopped her from making the call. For her part, Faith hadn't called, either. She was probably embarrassed that Sara had seen her at such a low moment. For a woman who hadn't been sure whether or not she was going to keep her baby, Faith Mitchell had sobbed like a child when she thought she'd lost it.

Mary asked, "Isn't your shift over?"

Sara glanced at the clock. Her shift had ended twenty minutes ago. "You need help?" She indicated various detritus she'd thrown on the floor minutes earlier as she'd worked to save her patient's life.

"Go on," Mary told her. "You've been here all night."

"So have you," Sara reminded her, but she didn't have to be told twice to leave.

Sara walked down the hall toward the doctors' lounge, stepping aside as gurneys whizzed by. Patients were stacked up like sardines again, and she ducked under the counter at the nurses' station to take a shortcut away from them. CNN was on the television over the desk; she saw that the Tom Coldfield case was still in the news.

As big as the story was, Sara found it remarkable that more people had not come forward to tell their version of events. She hadn't expected Anna Lindsey to exploit herself for money, but the fact that the other two surviving women were equally as tight-lipped was surprising in this age of instant movie deals and television exclusives. Sara had gleaned from the news reports that there was more to the story than GBI was letting on, but she was hard-pressed to find anyone who was willing to share the truth.

She certainly could not be faulted for trying. Faith had been incapable of communicating anything when she'd been brought into the ER, but Will Trent had been kept overnight for observation. The kitchen knife had missed all the major arteries, but his tendons were another story. He was looking at months of physical therapy before he got back his full range of motion. Despite this, Sara had gone into his room the next morning with the blatant intent of pumping him for information. He'd been different with her, and kept pulling up the bedsheet, finally tucking it under his chin in an oddly chaste manner, as if Sara had never seen a man's chest before.

Will's wife had shown up a few minutes later, and Sara had realized instantly that the awkward moment she'd had with Will Trent on her couch was purely a figment of her imagination. Angie Trent was striking and sexy in that dangerous-looking way that drives men to extremes. Standing beside her, Sara had felt slightly less interesting than the hospital wallpaper. She had made her excuses and left as quickly as politeness would allow. Men who liked women like Angie Trent did not like women like Sara.

She was relieved by the revelation, if only slightly disappointed. It had been nice thinking that a man had found her attractive. Not that she would do anything about it. Sara would never be able to give her heart away to another human being the way she had with Jeffrey. It wasn't that she was incapable of love; she was simply incapable of repeating that kind of abandon.

"Hey there." Krakauer was walking out of the lounge as she went in. "You off?"

"Yes," Sara told him, but the doctor was already down the hall, staring straight ahead, trying to ignore the patients who were calling to him.

She went to her locker and spun the dial. She took out her purse and dropped it on the bench behind her. The zipper gaped open. She saw the edge of the letter tucked in between her wallet and her keys.

The Letter. The explanation. The excuse. The plea for absolution. The shifting of blame.

What could the woman who had single-handedly brought about Jeffrey's death possibly have to say?

Sara took out the envelope. She rubbed it between her fingers. There was no one else in the lounge. She was alone with her thoughts. Alone with the diatribe. The ramblings. The juvenile justifications.

What could be said? Lena Adams had worked for Jeffrey. She was one of his detectives on the Grant County police force. He had covered for Lena, bailed her out of trouble and fixed her mistakes for over ten years. In return, she had put his life in jeopardy, gotten him mixed up with the kind of men who killed for sport. Lena had not planted that bomb or even known about it. There was no court of law that would condemn her for her actions, but Sara knew—knew to the core of her being—that Lena was responsible for Jeffrey's death. It was Lena who had gotten him involved with those bloodless mercenaries. It was Lena who had put Jeffrey in the way of the men who murdered him. As usual, Jeffrey had been protecting Lena, and it had gotten him killed.

And for that, Lena was as guilty as the man who had planted the bomb. Even guiltier, as far as Sara was concerned, because Sara knew that Lena's conscience was eased by now. She knew that there were no charges that could be brought, no punishment to bring down on her head. Lena would not be fingerprinted or humiliated as they photographed and strip-searched her. She would not be put into solitary confinement because the inmates wanted to kill the cop who'd just been sentenced to prison. She would not feel the needle in her arm. She would not look out into the viewing area of the death chamber at the state penitentiary and see Sara sitting there, waiting for Lena Adams to finally die for her crimes.

She had gotten away with cold-blooded murder, and she would never be punished for it.

Sara tore off the corner of the envelope and slipped her thumb along the edge, breaking the seal. The letter was on yellow legal paper, one-sided, each of the three pages numbered. The ink was blue, probably from a ballpoint pen.

Jeffrey had favored yellow legal pads. Most cops do. They keep stacks of them on hand, and they always produce a fresh one when a suspect is ready to write a confession. They slide the tablet across the table, uncap a fresh new pen and watch the words flow from pen to paper, the confessor turning from suspect to criminal.

Juries like confessions written on yellow legal paper. It's something familiar to them, less formal than a typed statement, though there was always a typed statement to back it up. Sara wondered if somewhere there was a transcription of the printed capital letters that crossed the pages she now held in her hands. Because, as sure as Sara was standing in the doctors' lounge at Grady Hospital, this was a confession.

Would it make a difference, though? Would Lena's words change anything? Would they bring back Jeffrey? Would they give Sara back her old life—the life where she belonged?

After the last three and a half years, Sara knew better. Nothing would bring that back, not pleading or pills or punishments. No list would ever capture a moment. No memory would ever re-create that state of bliss. There would only be the emptiness, the gaping hole in Sara's life that had once been filled by the only man in the world she could ever possibly love.

In short, no matter what Lena had to say, it would never bring Sara any peace. Maybe knowing this made it easier.

Sara sat down on the bench behind her and read the letter anyway.

To my readers ...

thank you for trusting me.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

First off, I want to thank my readers from the bottom of my heart for their continued support. I felt such a sense of purpose while I was writing Sara's story, and I hope y'all think it was worth it.

On the publishing side, the usual suspects are to be thanked: the Kates (M and E, respectively), Victoria Sanders, and everyone at Random House U.S., U.K. and Germany. Special appreciation goes to my friends at the Busy Bee. I wanted to thank you in Dutch, but the only Dutch words I know are the bad ones. Schijten!

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation was kind enough to let me go behind the scenes with some of their special agents and technicians. Holy crap at the job y'all do. Director Vernon Keenan, John Bankhead, Jerrie Gass, Assistant Special Agent in Charge Jesse Maddox, Special Agent Wes Horner, Special Agent David Norman and others unnamed here—thank you all for your time and patience, especially when I was asking the crazier questions.

Sara continues to benefit from Dr. David Harper's many years in medicine. Trish Hawkins and Debbie Teague were again instrumental in giving Will obstacles—and helping me figure ways around them. Don Taylor, you are a peach and a true friend.

My daddy made me vegetable soup when I was too loopy from cold medicine to string two sentences together. D.A. ordered pizza when my fingers were too tired from typing.

Oh—and, yet again, I have taken liberties with roads and landmarks. For instance, Georgia Route 316 in Conyers is not meant to be Highway 316, which runs through Dacula. It's fiction, y'all.

The background of the book cover is a black and white photograph of a dense forest of bare trees, viewed from a low angle looking up towards the sky. The branches are intricate and dark against a lighter sky.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLER FROM THE AUTHOR OF UNDONE

KARIN SLAUGHTER

BROKEN

A Novel
of Suspense

"Addictive . . . Slaughter is a terrific writer, and she keeps the emotional tension high throughout."

—The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

KARIN SLAUGHTER

BROKEN

A Novel of Suspense

DELL • NEW YORK

Broken is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Copyright © 2010 by Karin Slaughter

All rights reserved.

Published in the United States by Delacorte Press, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., New York.

DELACORTE PRESS is a registered trademark of Random House, Inc., and the colophon is a trademark of Random House, Inc.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Slaughter, Karin,
Broken : a novel / Karin Slaughter.
p. cm.

eISBN: 978-0-440-33959-5

1. Linton, Sara (Fictitious character)—Fiction.
2. Policewomen—Fiction.
3. Georgia—Fiction. I. Title.

PS3569.L275B76 2010

813'.54—dc22 2010004424

www.bantamdell.com

Cover design: Carlos Beltran

v3.0_r1

Contents

Master - Table of Contents

Broken

Title Page

Copyright

Prologue

Monday

Chapter 1

Chapter 2

Chapter 3

Chapter 4

Chapter 5

Chapter 6

Chapter 7

Chapter 8

Tuesday

Chapter 9

Chapter 10

Chapter 11

Chapter 12

Chapter 13

Chapter 14

Chapter 15

Wednesday

Chapter 16

Chapter 17

Chapter 18

Chapter 19

Three Weeks Later

Epilogue

Dedication

Acknowledgments

PROLOGUE

Allison Spooner wanted to leave town for the holiday, but there was nowhere to go. There was no reason to stay here, either, but at least it was cheaper. At least she had a roof over her head. At least the heat in her crappy apartment occasionally worked. At least she could eat a hot meal at work. At least, at least, at least ... Why was her life always about the least of things? When was there going to come a time when it started being about the most?

The wind picked up and she clenched her fists in the pockets of her light jacket. It wasn't so much raining as misting down a cold wetness, like walking around inside a dog's nose. The icy chill coming off Lake Grant made it worse. Every time the breeze picked up, she felt as if tiny, dull razors were slicing through her skin. This was supposed to be south Georgia, not the freaking South Pole.

As she struggled for her footing along the tree-lined shores, it seemed like every wave that lapped the mud brought the temperature down another degree. She wondered if her flimsy shoes would be enough to keep her toes from getting frostbite. She had seen a guy on TV who'd lost all his fingers and toes to the cold. He'd said he was grateful to be alive, but people will say anything to get on TV. The way Allison's life was going right now, the only program she'd end up on was the nightly news. There'd be a picture—probably that awful one from her high school yearbook—beside the words “Tragic Death.”

The irony was not lost on Allison that she would be more important to the world if she were dead. No one gave a crap about her now—the meager living she was scraping out, the constant struggle of keeping up with her classes while juggling all the other responsibilities in her life. None of it would matter to anybody unless she turned up frozen on the lakeshore.

The wind picked up again. Allison turned her back to the cold, feeling its freezing fingers probe her rib cage, squeeze her lungs. A shiver racked her body. Her breath was a cloud in front of her. She closed her eyes. She chanted her problems through chattering teeth.

Jason. School. Money. Car. Jason. School. Money. Car.

The mantra continued well past the penetrating gust. Allison opened her eyes. She turned around. The sun was going down faster than she'd thought. She turned around, facing the college. Should she go back? Or should she go forward?

She chose to go forward, tucking her head down against the howling wind.

Jason. School. Money. Car.

Jason: Her boyfriend had turned into an asshole, seemingly overnight.

School: She was going to flunk out of college if she didn't find more time to study.

Money: She wasn't going to be able to live, let alone go to school, if she cut back any more hours at work.

Car: Her back had started smoking this morning when she cranked it up, which was no big deal since it had been smoking for months, but this time the smoke was on the inside, coming through the heating vents. She'd nearly suffocated driving to school.

Allison trudged along, adding “frostbite” to her list as she rounded the bend in the lake. Every time she blinked, it felt like her eyelids were cutting through thin sheets of ice.

Jason. School. Money. Car. Frostbite.

The frostbite fear seemed more immediate, though she was reluctant to admit that the more she worried about it, the warmer she felt. Maybe her heart was beating faster or her walking pace was picking up as the sun began to set and she realized that all of her whining about dying in the cold might come true if she didn't hurry the hell up.

Allison reached out, bracing herself against a tree so that she could pick her way past a tangle of roots that dipped into the water. The bark was wet and spongy under her fingertips. A customer had sent back a hamburger at lunch today because he said the bun was too spongy. He was a big, gruff man in full hunting gear, not the sort of guy you'd expect to use a delicate word like "spongy." He had flirted with her and she had flirted back, and then when he left there was a fifty-cent tip on his ten-dollar meal. He'd actually winked at her as he walked out the door, like he was doing her a favor.

She wasn't sure how much more of this she could take. Maybe her grandmother had been right. Girls like Allison didn't go to college. They found work at the tire factory, met a guy, got pregnant, got married, had a couple of more kids, then got divorced, sometimes in that order, sometimes not. If she was lucky, the guy didn't beat her much.

Was that the kind of life Allison wanted for herself? It was the kind of life that was written in her blood. Her mother had lived it. Her grandmother had lived it. Her aunt Sheila had lived it until she pulled a shotgun on her uncle Boyd and nearly took his head off. All three of the Spooner women had at some point or another thrown away everything for a worthless man.

Allison had watched it happen to her mother so often that by the time Judy Spooner was in the hospital for the last time, every bit of her insides eaten away from the cancer, all Allison could reflect on was the waste of her mother's life. She'd even looked wasted. At thirty-eight years old, her hair was thinning and nearly all gray. Her skin was faded. Her hands were clawed from working at the tire factory—picking tires off the belt, pressure-testing them, putting them back on the belt, then picking up the next tire, then again and again, over two hundred times a day, so that every joint in her body ached by the time she crawled into bed at night. Thirty-eight years old and she welcomed the cancer. Welcomed the relief.

One of the last things Judy had told Allison was that she was glad to be dying, glad that she didn't have to be alone anymore. Judy Spooner believed in heaven and redemption. She believed that one day streets of gold and many mansions would replace her gravel drive and trailer-park existence. All Allison believed was that she had never been enough for her mother. Judy's glass was perpetually half empty, and all the love Allison poured into her over the years would never fill her mother up.

Judy was too far drawn into the muck. The muck of her dead-end job. The muck of one worthless man after another. The muck of a baby holding her down.

College was going to be Allison's salvation. She was good at science. Looking at her family, it made no sense, but somehow she understood how chemicals worked. She understood at a basic level the synthesis of macromolecules. Her grasp of synthetic polymers came hand in glove. Most important, she knew how to study. She knew that somewhere on earth, there was always a book with an answer in it, and the best way to find that answer was to read every book you could get your hands on.

By her senior year in high school, she had managed to stay away from the boys and the drinking and the meth that had ruined just about every girl her age in her small hometown of Elba, Alabama. She wasn't going to end up being one of those soulless, washed-out girls who worked the night shift and smoked Kools because they were elegant. She wasn't going to end up with three kids by three different men before she hit thirty. She wasn't going to ever wake up one morning unable to open her eyes because some man's fist had beaten them shut the night before. She wasn't going to end up dead and alone in a hospital bed like her mother.

At least that's what she'd been thinking when she left Elba three years ago. Mr. Mayweather, her science teacher, had pulled every string he could grab to get her enrolled in a good college. He wanted her to get as far away from Elba as possible. He wanted her to have a future.

Grant Tech was in Georgia, and it wasn't far away in miles so much as far away in feeling. The college was enormous compared to her high school, which had a graduating class of twenty-nine people. Allison had spent her first week on campus wondering how it was possible to be in love with a place. Her classes were filled with kids who had grown up with opportunities, who'd never considered not going to college straight out of high school. None of her fellow students snickered when she raised her hand to answer a question. They didn't think you were selling out if you actually listened to the teacher, tried to learn something other than how to give yourself French tips or weave extensions into your hair.

And the area around the college was so pretty. Elba was a blight, even for south Alabama. Heartsdale, the city where Grant Tech was located, felt like a town you'd see on television. Everyone tended their yards. Flowers lined Main Street in the spring. Total strangers waved at you with a smile on their face. At the diner where she worked, the locals were so kind, even if they were bad tippers. The town wasn't so big that she got lost. Unfortunately, it wasn't so big that she didn't meet Jason.

Jason.

She'd met him her sophomore year. He was two years older, more experienced, more sophisticated. His idea of a romantic date wasn't sneaking into a movie and doing it quick in the back row before the manager kicked you out. He took her to real restaurants with cloth napkins on the tables. He held her hand. He listened to her. When they had sex, she finally understood why people called it making love. Jason didn't just want better things for himself. He wanted better things for Allison. She'd thought what they had was a serious thing—the last two years of her life had been spent building something with him. And then suddenly, he had turned into a different person. Suddenly, everything that had been so great about their relationship was the reason it was falling apart.

And, as with her mother, Jason had somehow managed to make it all Allison's fault. She was cold. She was distant. She was too demanding. She never had time for him. As if Jason was an affectionate saint who spent his days wondering what would make Allison happy. She wasn't the one who went on all-night benders with her friends. She wasn't the one getting mixed up with weird people at school. She sure as hell wasn't the one who got them involved with that jerk from town. How could that be Allison's fault if she had never even seen the guy's face?

Allison shivered again. Every step she took around this damn lake, it seemed like the shoreline squeezed out another hundred yards just to spite her. She looked down at the wet ground beneath her feet. It had been storming for weeks. Flash floods had taken out roads, cut down trees. Allison had never been good with bad weather. The darkness got to her, tried to pull her down. It made her moody and tearful. All she wanted to do was sleep away the time until the sun came back out.

"Shit!" Allison hissed, catching herself before she slipped. The cuffs of her pants were caked in mud, her shoes nearly soaked through. She looked out into the churning lake. The rain was sticking to her eyelashes. She brushed back her hair with her fingers as she stared at the dark waters. Maybe she should let herself slip. Maybe she should let herself fall all the way into the lake. What would it be like to let herself go? What would it feel like to let the undertow take her farther to the center of the lake where her feet no longer touched the ground and her lungs could no longer find air?

This wasn't the first time she'd thought about it. It was probably the weather, the relentless rain and dreary sky. Everything seemed more depressing in the rain. And some things were more depressing than others. There had been a story in the paper last Thursday about a mother and child who'd drowned in their Volkswagen Beetle two miles outside of town. They were within spitting distance of the Third Baptist Church when a flash flood cut through the street and whisked them away. There was something about the design of the old Beetles that made them able to float, and this newer model had floated, too. At least at first.

The church crowd who'd just left their usual potluck were helpless to do anything for fear of getting caught up in the flood. They watched in horror as the Beetle spun around on the surface of the water, then tipped over. Water flooded into the cab. Mother and child were tossed into the current. The woman they interviewed in the paper said she would go to sleep every night and wake up every morning for the rest of her life seeing that little three-year-old's hand reaching out from the water before the final time the poor thing was pulled down.

Allison could not stop thinking of the child, either. Even though she had been at the library when it happened. Even though she'd never met the woman or the child or even the lady who spoke to the paper, she could see that little hand reaching up every time she closed her eyes. Sometimes, the hand grew larger. Sometimes, it was her mother reaching out for her help. Sometimes, she woke up screaming because the hand was pulling her down.

If she was telling the truth, Allison's mind had turned toward dark thinking long before the newspaper story. She couldn't blame the weather completely, but certainly the constant rain, the unrelenting overcast, had churned up inside of her mind its own kind of despair. How much easier would it be if she just gave in? Why go back to Elba and turn into some toothless, haggard old woman with eighteen kids to feed when she could just walk into the lake and for once take control of her destiny?

She was turning into her mother so fast that she could almost feel her hair going gray. She was just as bad as Judy—thinking she was in love when all the guy was interested in was what was between her legs. Her aunt Sheila had said as much on the phone last week. Allison had been whining about Jason, wondering why he wouldn't return her calls.

A long drag on her cigarette, then, during the exhale, "You sound just like your mother."

A knife in her chest would have been faster, cleaner. The worst part was that Sheila was right. Allison loved Jason. She loved him way too much. She loved him enough to call him ten times a day even though he never picked up. She loved him enough to hit reload on her stupid computer every two minutes to see if he had answered one of her nine billion emails.

She loved him enough to be out here in the middle of the night doing the dirty work that he didn't have the balls to do.

Allison took another step closer to the lake. She could feel her heel start to slip, but her body's automatic need for self-preservation took over before she fell. Still, the water lapped against her shoes. Her socks were already soaked. Her toes were beyond numb, to that point where a sharp pain seemed to pierce through the bone. Was that what it would be like—a slow numbing falling into a painless passage?

She was terrified of suffocating. That was the problem. She'd loved the ocean for maybe ten minutes as a kid, but that had changed by the time she turned thirteen. Her idiot cousin Dillard had held her under the water once at the municipal pool, and now she didn't even like to take baths because she was afraid she'd get water up her nose and panic.

If Dillard were here, he'd probably push her into the lake without her even having to ask. That first time he'd held her head down under the water, he hadn't shown a bit of remorse. Allison had thrown up her lunch. She was racked with sobs. Her lungs were burning, and he'd just said, "Heh-heh," like an old man who pinches the fire out of the back of your arm just to hear you squeal.

Dillard was Sheila's boy, her only child, more disappointing to her than his father, if that was even possible. He huffed so much spray paint that his nose was a different color every time you saw him. He smoked crystal. He stole from his mama. The last Allison heard, he was in prison for trying to rob a liquor store with a water pistol. The clerk had cracked open his skull with a baseball bat by the time the cops got there. The result was that Dillard was even dumber than before, but that wouldn't have stopped him from passing up a good opportunity. He would've given Allison a good shove with both hands, sending her headfirst into the water as he let out his little cackle. "Heh-heh." All the while she'd be flailing, working her way up to drowning.

How long would it take before she passed out? How long would Allison have to live in terror before she died? She closed her eyes again, trying to think about the water surrounding her, swallowing her. It would be so cold that it would feel warm at first. You couldn't live long without air. You'd pass out. Maybe the panic would take hold, sending you into some kind of hysterical unconsciousness. Or maybe you would feel alive—shot through with adrenaline, fighting like a squirrel trapped in a paper bag.

She heard a branch snap behind her. Allison turned, surprised.

“Jesus!” She slipped again, this time for real. Her arms flailed out. Her knee collapsed. Pain took away her breath. She slammed face-first into the mud. A hand grabbed the back of her neck, forcing her to stay down. Allison inhaled the bitter coldness of the earth, the wet, oozing muck.

Instinctively, she struggled, fighting the water, fighting the panic that flooded into her brain. She felt a knee jam into the base of her spine, pinning her firmly to the ground. Burning pain seared into her neck. Allison tasted blood. She didn’t want this. She wanted to live. She had to live. She opened her mouth to scream it at the top of her lungs.

But then—darkness.

MONDAY

CHAPTER ONE

Fortunately, the winter weather meant the body at the bottom of the lake would be well preserved, though the chill on the shore was bone-aching, the sort of thing that made you strain to remember what August had been like. The sun on your face. The sweat running down your back. The way the air conditioner in your car blew out a fog because it could not keep up with the heat. As much as Lena Adams strained to remember, all thoughts of warmth were lost on this rainy November morning.

“Found her,” the dive captain called. He was directing his men from the shore, his voice muffled by the constant shush of the pouring rain. Lena held up her hand in a wave, water sliding down the sleeve of the bulky parka she had thrown on when the call had come in at three this morning. The rain wasn’t hard, but it was relentless, tapping her back insistently, slapping against the umbrella that rested on her shoulder. Visibility was about thirty feet. Everything beyond that was coated in a hazy fog. She closed her eyes, thinking back to her warm bed, the warmer body that had been wrapped around her.

The shrill ring of a phone at three in the morning was never a good sound, especially when you were a cop. Lena had woken out of a dead sleep, her heart pounding, her hand automatically snatching up the receiver, pressing it to her ear. She was the senior detective on call, so she in turn had to start other phones ringing across south Georgia. Her chief. The coroner. Fire and rescue. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation to let them know that a body had been found on state land. The Georgia Emergency Management Authority, who kept a list of eager civilian volunteers ready to look for dead bodies on a moment’s notice.

They were all gathered here at the lake, but the smart people were waiting in their vehicles, heat blasting while a chill wind rocked the chassis like a baby in a cradle. Dan Brock, the proprietor of the local funeral home who did double duty as the town coroner, was asleep in his van, head back against the seat, mouth gaping open. Even the EMTs were safely tucked inside the ambulance. Lena could see their faces peering through the windows in the back doors. Occasionally, a hand would reach out, the ember of a cigarette glowing in the dawn light.

She held an evidence bag in her hand. It contained a letter found near the shore. The paper had been torn from a larger piece—college ruled, approximately eight and a half inches by six. The words were all caps. Ballpoint pen. One line. No signature. Not the usual spiteful or pitiful farewell, but clear enough: I WANT IT OVER.

In many ways, suicides were more difficult investigations than homicides. With a murdered person, there was always someone you could blame. There were clues you could follow to the bad guy, a clear pattern you could lay out to explain to the family of the victim exactly why their loved one had been stolen away from them. Or, if not why, then who the bastard was who’d ruined their lives.

With suicides, the victim is the murderer. The person upon whom the blame rests is also the person whose loss is felt most deeply. They are not around to take the recriminations for their death, the natural anger anyone feels when there is a loss. What the dead leave instead is a void that all the pain and sorrow in the world can never fill. Mother and father, sisters, brothers, friends and other relatives—all find themselves with no one to punish for their loss.

And people always want to punish someone when a life is unexpectedly taken.

This was why it was the investigator's job to make sure every single inch of the death scene was measured and recorded. Every cigarette butt, every discarded piece of trash or paper, had to be catalogued, checked for fingerprints, and sent to the lab for analysis. The weather was noted in the initial report. The various officers and emergency personnel on scene were recorded in a log. If a crowd was present, photographs were taken. License plates were checked. The suicide victim's life was investigated just as thoroughly as with a homicide: Who were her friends? Who were her lovers? Was there a husband? Boyfriend? Girlfriend? Were there angry neighbors or envious co-workers?

Lena knew only what they had found so far: a pair of women's sneakers, size eight, placed a few feet away from the suicide note. Inside the left shoe was a cheap ring—twelve-karat gold with a lifeless ruby at the center. The right shoe contained a white Swiss Army watch with fake diamonds for numbers. Underneath this was the folded note.

I want it over.

Not much of a comfort for those left behind.

Suddenly, there was a splash of water as one of the divers surfaced from the lake. His partner came up beside him. They each struggled against the silt on the lake bottom as they dragged the body out of the cold water and into the cold rain. The dead girl was small, making the effort seem exaggerated, but quickly Lena saw the reason for their struggle. A thick, industrial-looking chain was wrapped around her waist with a bright yellow padlock that hung low, like a belt buckle. Attached to the chain were two cinder blocks.

Sometimes in policing, there were small miracles. The victim had obviously been trying to make sure she couldn't back out. If not for the cinder blocks weighing her down, the current would have probably taken the body into the middle of the lake, making it almost impossible to find her.

Lake Grant was a thirty-two-hundred-acre man-made body of water that was three hundred feet deep in places. Underneath the surface were abandoned houses, small cottages and shacks where people had once lived before the area was turned into a reservoir. There were stores and churches and a cotton mill that had survived the Civil War only to be shut down during the Depression. All of this had been wiped out by the rushing waters of the Ochawahee River so that Grant County could have a reliable source of electricity.

The National Forestry Service owned the best part of the lake, over a thousand acres that wrapped around the water like a cowl. One side touched the residential area where the more fortunate lived, and the other bordered the Grant Institute of Technology, a small but thriving state university with almost five thousand students enrolled.

Sixty percent of the lake's eighty-mile shoreline was owned by the State

Forestry Division. The most popular spot by far was this one, what the locals called Lover's Point. Campers were allowed to stake tents. Teenagers came here to party, often leaving behind empty beer bottles and used condoms. Occasionally, there would be a call about a fire someone had let get out of control, and once, a rabid bear had been reported, only to turn out to be an elderly chocolate Labrador who had wandered away from his owners' campsite.

And bodies were occasionally found here, too. Once, a girl had been buried alive. Several men, predictably teenagers, had drowned performing various acts of stupidity. Last summer, a child had broken her neck diving into the shallow waters of the cove.

The two divers paused, letting the water drip off the body before resuming their task. Finally, nods went around and they dragged the young woman onto the shore. The cinder blocks left a deep furrow in the sandy ground. It was six-thirty in the morning, and the moon seemed to wink at the sun as it began its slow climb over the horizon. The ambulance doors swung open. The EMTs cursed at the bitter cold as they rolled out the gurney. One of them had a pair of bolt cutters hefted over his shoulder. He slammed his hand on the hood of the coroner's van, and Dan Brock startled, comically flailing his arms in the air. He gave the EMT a stern look, but stayed where he was. Lena couldn't blame him for not wanting to rush into the rain. The victim wasn't going anywhere except the morgue. There was no need for lights and sirens.

Lena walked closer to the body, carefully folding the evidence bag containing the suicide note into her jacket pocket and taking out a pen and her spiral-bound notebook. Crooking her umbrella between her neck and shoulder, she wrote the time, date, weather, number of EMTs, number of divers, number of cars and cops, what the terrain was like, noted the solemnity of the scene, the absence of spectators—all the details that would need to be typed exactly into the report.

The victim was around Lena's height, five-four, but she was built much smaller. Her wrists were delicate, like a bird's. The fingernails were uneven, bitten down to the quick. She had black hair and extremely white skin. She was probably in her early twenties. Her open eyes were clouded like cotton. Her mouth was closed. The lips looked ragged, as if she chewed them out of nervous habit. Or maybe a fish had gotten hungry.

Her body was lighter without the drag of the water, and it only took three of the divers to heft her onto the waiting gurney. Muck from the bottom of the lake covered her head to toe. Water dripped from her clothes—blue jeans, a black fleece shirt, white socks, no sneakers, an unzipped, dark blue warm-up jacket with a Nike logo on the front. The gurney shifted, and her head turned away from Lena.

Lena stopped writing. "Wait a minute," she called, knowing something was wrong. She put her notebook in her pocket as she took a step closer to the body. She had seen a flash of light at the back of the girl's neck—something silver, maybe a necklace. Pondweed draped across the victim's throat and shoulders like a shroud. Lena used the tip of her pen to push away the slippery green tendrils. Something was moving beneath the skin, rippling the flesh the same way the rain rippled the tide.

The divers noticed the undulations, too. They all bent down for a better look. The skin fluttered like something out of a horror movie.

One of them asked, “What the—”

“Jesus!” Lena jumped back quickly as a small minnow slithered out from a slit in the girl’s neck.

The divers laughed the way men do when they don’t want to admit they’ve just soiled themselves. For her part, Lena put her hand to her chest, hoping no one noticed that her heart had practically exploded. She took a gulp of air. The minnow was floundering in the mud. One of the men picked it up and tossed it back into the lake. The dive captain made the inevitable joke about something being fishy.

Lena shot him a hard look before leaning down toward the body. The slit where the fish had come out was at the back of the neck, just to the right of the spine. She guessed the wound was an inch wide, tops. The open flesh was puckered from the water, but at one point the injury had been clean, precise—the kind of incision that was made by a very sharp knife.

“Somebody go wake up Brock,” she said.

This wasn’t a suicide investigation anymore.

CHAPTER TWO

Frank Wallace never smoked in his county-issued Lincoln Town Car, but the cloth seats had absorbed the fug of nicotine that seeped from every pore in his body. He reminded Lena of Pig Pen from the Peanuts comic strip. No matter how clean he was or how often he changed his clothes, the stench followed him like a dust cloud.

"What's wrong?" he demanded, not even giving her time to shut the car door.

Lena shucked her wet parka onto the floorboard. Earlier, she had thrown on a jacket with two shirts underneath to help fight the cold. Still, even with the heat blasting, her teeth were chattering. It was as if her body had stored up all the chill while she was standing outside in the rain and only let it out now that she was safely sheltered.

She held her hands up to the vent. "God, it's freezing."

"What's wrong?" Frank repeated. He made a show of pulling back his black leather glove so he could see his watch.

Lena shivered involuntarily. She couldn't keep the excitement out of her voice. No cop would ever admit it to a civilian, but murders were the most exciting cases to work. Lena was so pumped through with adrenaline that she was surprised the cold was getting to her. Through chattering teeth, she told him, "It's not a suicide."

Frank looked even more annoyed. "Brock agree with you?"

Brock had gone back to sleep in his van while he waited for the chains to be cut, which they both knew because they could see his back molars from where they were sitting. "Brock wouldn't know his ass from a hole in the ground," Lena shot back. She rubbed her arms to coax some warmth back into her body.

Frank took out his flask and handed it to her. She took a quick sip, the whisky burning its way down her throat and into her stomach. Frank took a hefty drink of his own before returning the flask to his coat pocket.

She told him, "There's a knife wound in the neck."

"Brock's?"

Lena gave him a withering glance. "The dead girl." She leaned down and searched her parka for the wallet she had found in the pocket of the woman's jacket.

Frank said, "Could be self-inflicted."

"Not possible." She put her hand to the back of her neck. "Blade went in about here. The killer was standing behind her. Probably took her by surprise."

Frank grumbled, "You get that from one of your textbooks?"

Lena held her tongue, something she wasn't used to doing. Frank had been interim police chief for the last four years. Everything that happened in the three cities that comprised Grant County fell under his purview. Madison and Avondale carried the usual drug problems and domestic violence, but Heartsdale was supposed to be easy. The college was here, and the affluent residents were vocal about crime.

Even without that, complicated cases had the tendency to turn Frank into an asshole. Actually, life in general could turn him into an asshole. His coffee going cold. The engine in his car not catching on the first try. The ink running dry in his pen. Frank hadn't always been like this. He'd certainly leaned toward grumpy for as long as Lena had known him, but his attitude lately was tinged with an underlying fury that seemed ready to boil to the surface. Anything could set him off. In the blink of an eye he'd turn from being manageably irritated to downright mean.

At least in this particular matter Frank's reluctance made sense. After thirty-five years of policing, a murder case was the last thing he wanted on his plate. Lena knew that he was sick of the job, sick of the people it brought him into contact with. He had lost two of his closest friends in the last six years. The only lake he wanted to be sitting in front of right now was in sunny Florida. He should've had a fishing pole and a beer in his hands, not a dead kid's wallet.

"Looks fake," Frank said, opening the wallet. Lena agreed. The leather was too shiny. The Prada logo was plastic.

"Allison Judith Spooner," Lena told him, watching Frank try to peel apart the soaked plastic picture sleeves. "Twenty-one. Driver's license is from Elba, Alabama. Her student ID's in the back."

"College." Frank breathed out the word with something like despair. It was bad enough Allison Spooner had been found on or near state property. Add to that the fact that she was an out-of-state kid attending Grant Tech, and the case just got twenty times more political.

He asked, "Where'd you find the wallet?"

"In her jacket pocket. I guess she didn't have a purse. Or maybe whoever killed her wanted us to know her identity."

He was looking at the girl's driver's license photo.

"What is it?"

"Looks like that little waitress who works at the diner."

The Grant Diner was on the opposite end of Main Street from the police station. Most of the force ate there for lunch. Lena stayed away from the place. She usually brown-bagged it, or, more often than not, didn't eat.

She asked, "Did you know her?"

He shook his head and shrugged at the same time. "She was good-looking."

Frank was right. Not many people had a flattering driver's license photo, but Allison Spooner had been luckier than most. Her white teeth showed in a big smile. Her hair was pulled back off her face, revealing high cheekbones. There was merriment in her eyes, as if someone had just made a joke. This was all in sharp contrast to the body they had pulled out of the lake. Death had erased her vibrancy.

Frank said, "I didn't know she was a student."

"They usually don't work in town," Lena allowed. Grant Tech's students tended to work on campus or not at all. They didn't mix with the town and the town did its best not to mix with them.

Frank pointed out, "The school's closed this week for Thanksgiving break. Why isn't she home with her family?"

Lena didn't have the answer. "There's forty bucks in the wallet, so this wasn't a robbery.”

Frank checked the money compartment anyway, his thick, gloved fingers finding the twenty and two tens glued together with lake water. “She could’ve been lonely. Decided to take the knife and end it herself.”

“She’d have to be a contortionist,” Lena insisted. “You’ll see when Brock gets her on the table. She was stabbed from behind.”

He gave a bone-weary sigh. “What about the chain and cinder blocks?”

“We can try Mann’s Hardware in town. Maybe the killer bought them there.”

He tried again. “You’re sure about the knife wound?”

She nodded.

Frank kept staring at the license photo. “Does she have a car?”

“If she does, it’s not in the vicinity.” Lena pressed the point. “Unless she carried forty pounds’ worth of cinder blocks and some chains through the woods ...”

Frank finally closed the wallet and handed it back to her. “Why is it every Monday just gets shittier and shittier?”

Lena couldn’t answer him. Last week wasn’t that much better. A young mother and her daughter had been taken by a flash flood. The whole town was still reeling from the loss. There was no telling what they’d make of a pretty, young college girl being murdered.

She told Frank, “Brad’s trying to track down somebody from the college who can get into the registrar’s office and give us Spooner’s local address.” Brad Stephens had finally worked his way up from patrol to the rank of detective, but his new job didn’t have him doing much more than his old one did. He was still running errands.

Lena offered, “Once the scene is cleared, I’ll work on the death notification.”

“Alabama’s on central time.” Frank looked at his watch. “It’ll probably be better to call the parents direct instead of waking up the Elba P.D. this early in the morning.”

Lena checked her own watch. They were coming up on seven o’clock, which meant it was almost six in Alabama. If Elba was anything like Grant County, the detectives were on call during the night, but not expected to be at their desks until eight in the morning. Normally at this time of the day, Lena would be just getting out of bed and fumbling with the coffeemaker. “I’ll put in a courtesy call when we get back to the station.”

The car went quiet except for the brushing sound of rain against steel. A bolt of lightning, thin and mean, sparked in the sky. Lena instinctively flinched, but Frank just stared ahead at the lake. The divers weren’t worried about the lightning. They were taking turns with the bolt cutters, trying to disentangle the dead girl from the two cinder blocks.

Frank’s phone rang, a high-pitched warble that sounded like a bird sitting somewhere in the rain forest. He answered it with a gruff “Yeah.” He listened for a few seconds, then asked, “What about the parents?” Frank grumbled a string of curses under his breath. “Then go back inside and find out.” He snapped his phone shut. “Jackass.”

Lena gathered Brad had forgotten to get the parents’ information. “Where does Spooner live?”

“Taylor Drive. Number sixteen and a half. Brad’s gonna meet us there if he manages to get his head out of his ass.” He put the engine in gear and slung his arm over the seat behind Lena as he backed up the car. The forest was dense and wet. Lena braced her palm against the dashboard as Frank slowly made his way back to the road.

“Sixteen and a half must mean she’s in a garage apartment,” Lena noted. Many of the local residents had converted their garages or empty toolsheds into the semblance of a living space so that they could charge exorbitant rent to the college students. Most students were so desperate to live off campus that they didn’t ask too many questions.

Frank said, “Gordon Braham’s the landlord.”

“Brad found that out?”

They hit a bump that made Frank’s teeth clamp together. “His mother told him.”

“Well.” Lena searched her mind for something positive to say about Brad. “Shows initiative that he found out who owns the house and the garage.”

“Initiative,” Frank mocked. “That kid’s gonna get his head shot off one day.”

Lena had known Brad for over ten years. Frank had known him even longer. They both still saw him as a goofy young boy, a teenager who looked out of place with his gun belt tightened high on his waist. Brad had put in his years in uniform and passed the right tests to garner his gold detective shield, but Lena had done this job long enough to know that there was a difference between a paperwork promotion and a street promotion. She could only hope that in a small town like Heartsdale, Brad’s lack of street smarts wouldn’t matter. He was good at filling out reports and talking to witnesses, but even after ten years behind the wheel of a squad car, he still tended to see the good in people instead of the bad.

Lena had been on the job less than a week when she’d realized that there was no such thing as a truly good person.

Herself included.

She didn’t want to waste time worrying about Brad right now. She flipped through the photographs in Allison Spooner’s wallet as Frank made his way through the forest. There was a picture of an orange tabby cat lying in a ray of sunshine, and a candid snapshot that showed Allison with a woman Lena assumed was her mother. The third photo showed Allison sitting on a park bench. On her right was a man who looked a few years younger than she was. He was wearing a baseball cap pulled down low and had his hands tucked deep into the pockets of his baggy pants. On Allison’s left was an older woman with stringy blond hair and heavy makeup. Her jeans were skintight. There was a hardness to her eyes. She could have been thirty or three hundred. All three of them sat close together. The boy had his arm around Allison Spooner’s shoulders.

Lena showed Frank the picture. He asked, “Family?”

She studied the photo, concentrating on the background. “Looks like this was taken on campus.” She showed Frank. “See the white building in the back? I think that’s the student center.”

“That girl don’t look like a college student to me.”

He meant the older blonde. “She looks local.” She had the unmistakably trashy, bleach-blond air of a town-bred girl. Fake wallet aside, Allison Spooner appeared to be several rungs up on the social ladder. It didn't jibe that the two would be friends. "Maybe Spooner had a drug problem?" Lena guessed. Nothing crossed class lines like methamphetamine.

They'd finally made it to the main road. The back wheels of the car gave one final spin in the mud as Frank pulled onto asphalt. "Who called it in?"

Lena shook her head. "The 911 call was made from a cell phone. The number was blocked. Female voice, but she wouldn't leave her name."

"What'd she say?"

Lena carefully thumbed back through her notebook so the damp pages would not tear. She found the transcription and read aloud, " 'Female voice: My friend has been missing since this afternoon. I think she killed herself. 911 Operator: What makes you think she killed herself? Female voice: She got into a fight last night with her boyfriend. She said she was going to drown herself up by Lover's Point.' The operator tried to keep her on the line, but she hung up after that."

Frank was quiet. She saw his throat work. His shoulders were slumped so low that he looked like a gangbanger holding on to the steering wheel. He'd been fighting the possibility that this was a murder since Lena got into the car.

She asked, "What do you think?"

"Lover's Point," Frank repeated. "Only a townie would call it that."

Lena held the notebook in front of the heating vents, trying to dry the pages. "The boyfriend is probably the kid in the picture."

Frank didn't pick up on her train of thought. "So, the 911 call came in, and Brad drove out to the lake and found what?"

"The note was under one of the shoes. Allison's ring and watch were inside." Lena bent down again to the plastic evidence bags buried in the deep pockets of her parka. She shifted through the victim's belongings and found the note, which she showed to Frank. " 'I want it over.' "

He stared at the writing so long she was worried he wasn't minding the road.

"Frank?"

One of the wheels grazed the edge of the asphalt. Frank jerked the steering wheel. Lena held on to the dash. She knew better than to say anything about his driving. Frank wasn't the type of man who liked to be corrected, especially by a woman. Especially by Lena.

She said, "Strange note for a suicide. Even a fake suicide."

"Short and to the point." Frank kept one hand on the wheel as he searched his coat pocket. He slid on his reading glasses and stared at the smeared ink. "She didn't sign it."

Lena checked the road. He was riding the white line again. "No."

Frank glanced up and steered back toward the center line. "Does this look like a woman's handwriting to you?"

Lena hadn't considered the possibility. She studied the single sentence, which was written in a wide, round print. "It looks neat, but I couldn't say if a man or woman wrote it. We could get a handwriting expert. Allison's a student, so there are probably notes she took from classes or essays and tests. I'm sure we could find something to compare it with."

Frank didn't address any of her suggestions. Instead, he said, "I remember when my daughter was her age." He cleared his throat a few times. "She used to draw circles over her i's instead of dots. I wonder if she still does that."

Lena kept quiet. She had worked with Frank her entire career, but she didn't know much about his personal life beyond what most everyone else in town knew. He had two children by his first wife, but that was many wives ago. They'd moved out of town. He didn't seem to have contact with any of them. The subject of his family was one he never broached, and right now Lena was too cold and too wired to start sharing.

She put the focus back on the case. "So, someone stabbed Allison in the neck, chained her to some cinder blocks, threw her in the lake, then decided to make it look like a suicide." Lena shook her head at the stupidity. "Another criminal mastermind."

Frank gave a snort of agreement. She could tell his mind was on other things. He took off his glasses and stared at the road ahead.

She didn't want to, but she asked, "What's going on?"

"Nothing."

"How many years have I been riding with you, Frank?"

He made another grunting noise, but he relented easily enough. "Mayor's been trying to track me down."

Lena felt a lump rise in her throat. Clem Waters, the mayor of Heartsdale, had been trying for some time to make Frank's job as interim chief a more permanent position.

Frank said, "I don't really want the job, but there's nobody else lining up to take it."

"No," she agreed. No one wanted the job, not least of all because they would never in a million years match the man who'd held it before.

"Benefits are good," Frank said. "Nice retirement package. Better health care, pension."

She managed to swallow. "That's good, Frank. Jeffrey would want you to take it."

"He'd want me to retire before I have a heart attack chasing some junkie across the campus quad." Frank took out his flask and offered it to Lena. She shook her head and watched him take a long pull, one eye on the road as he tilted back his head. Lena's focus stayed on his hand. There was a slight tremor to it. His hands had been shaking a lot lately, especially in the morning.

Without warning, the rain's steady beat turned into a harsh staccato. The noise echoed in the car, filling up the space. Lena pressed her tongue to the roof of her mouth. She should tell Frank now that she wanted to resign, that there was a job in Macon waiting for her if she could bring herself to make the leap. She had moved to Grant County to be near her sister, but her sister had died almost a decade ago. Her uncle, her only living relative, had retired to the Florida Panhandle. Her best friend had taken a job at a library up North. Her boyfriend lived two hours away. There was nothing keeping Lena here except inertia and loyalty to a man who had been dead for four years and probably hadn't thought she was a good cop anyway.

Frank used his knees to hold the steering wheel steady as he screwed the cap back on the flask. "I won't take it unless you say it's okay."

She turned her head in surprise. "Frank—"

"I mean it," he interrupted. "If it's not okay with you, then I'll tell the mayor to shove it up his ass." He gave a harsh chuckle that rattled the phlegm in his chest. "Might let you come along to see the look on the little prick's face."

She made herself say, "You should take the job."

"I don't know, Lee. I'm gettin' so damn old. Children are all grown up. Wives have moved on. Most days, I wonder why I even get out of bed." He gave another raspy chuckle. "Might find me in the lake one day with my watch in my shoes. But for real."

She didn't want to hear the tiredness in his voice. Frank had been on the job twenty years longer than Lena, but she could feel the weariness in his tone like it was her own. This was why she had been spending every free minute of her time taking classes at the college, trying to get a bachelor's degree in forensic science so she could work on the crime scene investigation end instead of enforcement.

Lena could handle the early morning calls that yanked her from sleep. She could handle the carnage and the dead bodies and the misery that death brought to each and every moment of your life. What she could not take anymore was being on the front lines. There was too much responsibility. There was too much risk. You could make one mistake and it could cost a life—not your own, but another person's. You could end up getting someone's son killed. Someone's husband. Someone's friend. You found out fairly quickly that another person dying on your watch was far worse than the specter of your own death.

Frank said, "Listen, I need to tell you something."

Lena glanced at him, wondering at his sudden openness. His shoulders had slumped even more and his knuckles were white from gripping the steering wheel. She ran through the catalogue of things she might be in trouble for at work, but what came out of his mouth took her breath away. "Sara Linton's back in town."

Lena tasted whisky and bile in the back of her throat. For a brief, panicked moment, she thought she was going to throw up. Lena could not face Sara. The accusations. The guilt. Even the thought of driving down her street was too much. Lena always took the long way to work, bypassing Sara's house, bypassing the misery that churned up every time she thought of the place.

Frank kept his voice low. "I heard it in town, so I gave her dad a call. He said she was driving down for Thanksgiving today." He cleared his throat. "I wouldn't'a told you, but I've stepped up patrols outside their house. You'd see it on the call sheet and wonder—so, now you know."

Lena tried to swallow the sour taste in her mouth. It felt like glass going down her throat. "Okay," she managed. "Thanks."

Frank took a sharp turn onto Taylor Road, blowing through a stop sign. Lena grabbed the side of the door to brace herself, but the movement was automatic. Her mind was caught up in how to ask Frank for time off during the middle of a case. She would take the week and drive over to Macon, maybe scope out some apartments until the holiday was past and Sara was back in Atlanta where she belonged.

"Look at this dumbass," Frank mumbled as he slowed the car.

Brad Stephens was standing outside his parked patrol car. He was wearing a tan suit pressed to within an inch of its life. His white shirt almost glowed against the blue striped tie that his mama had probably laid out for him with the rest of his clothes this morning. What was obviously bothering Frank was the umbrella in Brad's hand. It was bright pink except for the Mary Kay logo stitched in yellow.

"Go easy on him," Lena tried, but Frank was already getting out of the car. He wrestled with his own umbrella—a large black canopy that he'd gotten from Brock at the funeral home—and stomped over to Brad. Lena waited in the car, watching Frank berate the young detective. She knew what it felt like to be on the other end of Frank's tirades. He had been her trainer when she first entered patrol, then her partner when she made detective. If not for Frank, Lena would've washed out of the job the first week. The fact that he didn't think women belonged on the force made her damned determined to prove him otherwise.

And Jeffrey had been her buffer. Lena had come to the realization some time ago that she had a tendency to be mirror to whoever was in front of her. When Jeffrey was in charge, they did everything the right way—or at least as right as they could. He was a solid cop, the kind of man who had the trust of the community because his character came through in everything he did. That was why the mayor had hired him in the first place. Clem wanted to break the old ways, to pull Grant County into the twenty-first century. Ben Carver, the outgoing chief of police, was as crooked as a stick in water. Frank had been his right-hand man and just as jagged. Under Jeffrey, Frank had changed his ways. They all had. Or at least they had as long as Jeffrey was alive.

Within the first week of Frank being put in charge, things had started to slip. It was slow at first, and hard to spot. A Breathalyzer result had gone missing, freeing one of Frank's hunting buddies from a DUI. An unusually careful pot dealer at the college was suddenly caught with a huge stash in the trunk of his car. Tickets disappeared. Cash was missing from the evidence locker. Requisitions turned iffy. The service contract for the county cars went to a garage Frank had part ownership in.

Like a dam breaking, these small cracks had led to larger issues until the whole thing burst open and every cop on the force was doing something they shouldn't do. Which was one of the biggest reasons Lena had to get out. Macon didn't do things the easy way. The city was bigger than the three cities of Grant County combined, topping out at a population of around a hundred thousand. People sued if they were wronged by the police, and they tended to win. Macon's murder rate was one of the highest in the state. Burglaries, sex crimes, violent crimes—there was plenty of opportunity for a detective, but even more work for a crime scene tech. Lena was two courses away from getting her criminal science degree. There were no shortcuts in evidence collection. You dusted for prints. You vacuumed the carpets for fibers. You photographed the blood and other fluids. You catalogued the evidence. Then you handed it all off to someone else. The lab techs were responsible for doing the science. The detectives were responsible for catching the bad guys. All Lena would be was a glorified cleaner with a badge and state benefits. She could spend the rest of her life processing crime scenes, then retire young enough to supplement her pension with private investigation work.

She would end up being one of those asshole private detectives who were always putting their noses where they didn't belong.

"Adams!" Frank slammed his hand on the hood of the car. Water splashed up like a dog shaking itself. He was finished yelling at Brad and was spoiling for someone else to rip into.

Lena took the dripping wet parka off the floor and put it on, tightening the strings on the hood so her hair wouldn't get soaked. She caught a look at herself in the rearview mirror. Her hair had started to twist into curls. The rain had brought out her Irish Catholic father's roots and managed to suppress her Mexican grandmother's.

"Adams!" Frank yelled again.

By the time she got out of the car, he was concentrating another tirade on Brad, yelling at him about how he was wearing his gun holster too low on his belt.

Lena forced her lips into a tight smile, trying to give Brad some silent support. She had been a dumb cop herself many years ago. Maybe Jeffrey had thought she was worthless, too. The fact that he had tried to turn her into something worthwhile was a testament to his determination. One of the few reasons Lena could give herself for not taking the job in Macon was thinking that she could do something to help Brad be a better cop. She could keep him away from the corruption, train him to do things the right way.

Do as I say, not as I do.

"Are you sure this is it?" Frank demanded. He meant the house.

Brad's throat worked. "Yes, sir. That's what the college had on file. Sixteen and a half Taylor Drive."

"Did you knock on the door?"

Brad seemed unsure of which answer was the right one. "No, sir. You said to wait for you."

"You got a phone number for the owner?"

"No, sir. His name is Mr. Braham, but—"

"Christ," Frank muttered, stalking up the driveway.

Lena couldn't help but feel sorry for Brad. She thought about reaching up and patting him on the shoulder, but he tilted his bright pink umbrella the wrong way and ended up sending a sheet of rain down on her head.

"Oh," Brad breathed. "Gosh, I'm sorry, Lena."

She pressed down some expletives that wanted to come and walked ahead of him, joining Frank.

Sixteen and a half Taylor Drive was a one-story garage that was slightly deeper than a minivan and twice as wide. "Converted" was a loose term, because the structure had not been altered well on the outside. The roll-up metal door was still in place, black construction paper covering the windows. Because of the overcast day, the lights inside the apartment showed through the cracks in the aluminum siding. Tufts of pink fiberglass insulation were matted down by rain. The tin roof was rusted red, a blue tarp covering the back corner.

Lena stared at the structure, wondering why any woman in her right mind would live here.

"Scooter," Frank noted. There was a purple Vespa parked by the garage. A bike chain attached the back wheel to an eyebolt screwed into the concrete drive. He asked, "Same chain as what was on the girl?"

She saw a flash of bright yellow under the wheel. "Looks like the same padlock."

Lena glanced toward the main house, a split ranch with a sloping gable on the front. The windows were dark. There was no car by the house or on the street. They would have to find the landlord for permission to go into the garage. She flipped open her cell phone to call Marla Simms, the station's elderly secretary. Between Marla and her best friend, Myrna, they represented a combined Rolodex of every person in town.

Brad pressed his face up to one of the windows in the garage door. He squinted, trying to see past a rip in the construction paper. "Jeesh," he whispered, backing up so quickly that he almost tripped over his feet. He drew his gun and went into a crouch.

Lena's Glock was in her hand before she thought about putting it there. Her heart had jumped into her throat. Adrenaline made her senses sharpen. A quick look over her shoulder showed Frank had drawn his weapon, too. They all stood there, guns pointed toward the closed garage door.

Lena motioned for Brad to move back. She kept a low crouch as she walked up to the garage window. The tear in the construction paper seemed larger now, more like a target she was about to put her face in front of. Quickly, she glanced inside. There was a man standing at a folding table. He was wearing a black mask. He looked up as if he heard a noise, and Lena ducked down again, her heart racing. She stood still, counting off the seconds as her ears strained to hear footsteps, a gun loading. There was nothing, and she slowly let out the breath she'd been holding.

She held up one finger to Frank: one person. She mouthed the word "mask," and saw his eyes widen in surprise. Frank indicated his gun and she shrugged as she shook her head. She hadn't been able to see whether or not the man was holding a weapon.

Without being told, Brad walked toward the side of the building. He went around the back, obviously checking for exits. Lena counted the seconds, reaching twenty-six by the time he showed up on the other side of the building. Brad shook his head. No back door. No windows. Lena indicated that he should go down the driveway and serve as backup. Let her and Frank handle this. Brad started to protest, but she cut him with a look. Finally, he hung his head in surrender. She waited until he was at least fifteen feet away before nodding to Frank that she was ready to go.

Frank walked toward the garage and leaned down, wrapping his hand around the steel handle at the base of the roll-up door. He checked with Lena, then yanked up on the handle hard and fast.

The man inside was startled, his eyes going wide behind the black ski mask covering his face. He had a knife in his gloved hand, raised as if to charge. The blade was long and thin, at least eight inches. What looked very much like dried blood was caked around the handle. The concrete beneath his feet was stained a dark brown. More blood.

"Drop it," Frank said.

The intruder didn't comply. Lena took a few steps to her right, closing any escape routes. He was standing behind a large cafeteria table with paperwork strewn across it. A twin bed was angled out from the wall so that between the bed frame and the table, the entire room was cut down the middle.

"Put down the knife," Lena told him. She had to turn sideways to get past the bed. There was another dark stain on the concrete under the bed. A bucket with brown water and a filthy-looking sponge was beside it. She kept her gun trained at the man's chest, stepping carefully around boxes and scattered pieces of paper. He glanced nervously between Lena and Frank, the knife still raised in his fist.

"Drop it," Frank repeated.

The man's hands started to lower. Lena let herself exhale, thinking this was going to go easy. She was wrong. Without warning, the man shoved the table violently to the side, slamming it into Lena's legs, sending her back onto the bed. Her head grazed the frame as she rolled onto the concrete floor. A shot rang out. Lena didn't think it was from her gun, but her left hand felt hot, almost on fire. Someone shouted. There was a muffled groan. She scrambled to stand. Her vision blurred.

Frank was lying on his side in the middle of the garage. His gun lay on the ground beside him. His fist was clamped around his arm. She thought at first that he was having a heart attack. The blood seeping between his fingers showed that he had been cut.

"Go!" he yelled. "Now!"

"Shit," Lena hissed, pushing away the table. She felt nauseated. Her vision was still blurred, but it sharpened on the black-clad suspect bolting down the driveway. Brad was standing stock-still, mouth open in surprise. The intruder ran right past him.

"Stop him!" she screamed. "He stabbed Frank!"

Brad jerked around, giving chase. Lena ran after them, sneakers slapping against the wet ground, water flying up into her face. She rounded the end of the driveway and flew down the street. Ahead, she saw Brad gaining on the suspect. He was taller, fitter, every stride closing the gap between him and the intruder.

Brad yelled, "Police! Stop!"

Everything slowed. The rain seemed to freeze in midair, tiny droplets trapped in time and space.

The suspect stopped. He reared around, slicing the knife through the air. Lena reached for her gun, felt the empty holster. There was a popping sound of metal breaking through flesh, then a loud groan. Brad crumpled to the ground.

"No," Lena gasped, running to Brad, falling to her knees. The knife was still in his belly. Blood seeped into his shirt, turning the white to crimson. "Brad—"

"It hurts," he told her. "It hurts so bad."

Lena dialed her cell phone, praying the ambulance team was still at the lake and not making the half-hour trip back to the station. Behind her, she heard loud footsteps, shoes pounding pavement. With startling speed, Frank sprinted past her, yelling with uncontrolled rage. The suspect turned around to see what hell was about to be unleashed upon him just as Frank tackled him to the asphalt. Teeth shattered. Bones snapped. Frank's fists were flying, a windmill of pain raining down on the suspect.

Lena pressed the phone to her ear. She listened to the rings that were going unanswered at the station.

"Lena ..." Brad whispered. "Don't tell my mom I messed up."

"You didn't mess up." She used her hand to shield the rain from his face. His eyelids fluttered, trying to close. “No,” she begged. “Please don’t do this to me.”

“I’m sorry, Lena.”

“No!” she yelled.

Not again.

CHAPTER THREE

Sara Linton no longer thought of Grant County as her home. It was of another place, another time, as tangible to her as Rebecca's Manderley or Heathcliff's moors. As she drove through the outskirts of town, she couldn't help but notice that everything looked the same, yet nothing was quite real. The closed military base that was slowly reverting to nature. The trailer parks on the bad side of the railroad tracks. The abandoned box store that had been converted into a storage center.

Three and a half years had passed since Sara had been home, and she wanted to think that her life was okay now, getting closer to a new normal. Actually, her current life in Atlanta looked a lot like it would have if she had stayed there after medical school instead of moving back to Grant County. She was the chief pediatric attending in Grady Hospital's emergency room, where students followed her around like puppy dogs and the security guards carried multiple clips on their belts in case the gangbangers tried to finish the job they started on the streets. An epidemiologist who worked for the Centers for Disease Control on Emory's campus had started asking her out. She went to dinner parties and grabbed coffee with friends. Occasionally, on the weekends, she would take the dogs to Stone Mountain Park to give the greyhounds space to run. She read a lot. She watched more television than she should. She was living a perfectly normal, perfectly boring life.

And yet, the minute she saw the sign announcing that she had officially entered Grant County, her carefully constructed façade started to crack. She pulled over to the side of the road, feeling a constriction in her chest. The dogs stirred in the back seat. Sara forced herself not to give in. She was stronger than this. She had fought tooth and nail to climb out of the depression she'd spiraled into after her husband's death, and she was not going to allow herself to fall back in just because of a stupid road sign.

"Hydrogen," she said. "Helium, lithium, beryllium." It was an old trick from her childhood, listing out the elements from the periodic table to take her mind off the monsters that might be lurking under her bed. "Neon, sodium, magnesium ..." She recited from memory until her heart stopped racing and her breathing returned to normal.

Finally, the moment passed, and she found herself laughing at the thought of Jeffrey finding out she was chanting the periodic table on the side of the road. He'd been a jock in high school—handsome, charming, and effortlessly cool. It had tickled him no end to see Sara's geeky side.

She reached around and gave the dogs some attention so they would settle back down. Instead of starting the car again, she sat for a while, staring out the window at the empty road leading into town. Her fingers went to the collar of her shirt, then lower to the ring she wore on a necklace. Jeffrey's Auburn class ring. He'd been on the football team until he got tired of warming the bench.

The ring was bulky, too big for her finger, but touching it was the closest she could come to touching him. It was a talisman. Sometimes, she found herself touching it without remembering putting her hand there.

Her only consolation was that there was nothing left unsaid between them. Jeffrey knew that Sara loved him. He knew there was no part of her that did not belong wholly and completely to him, just as she knew that he felt the same. When he died, his last words were to her. His last thoughts, his last memories, all were of Sara. Just as she knew that her last thoughts would always be of him.

She kissed the ring before tucking it back into her shirt. Carefully, Sara pulled the car off the shoulder and back onto the road. The overwhelming feeling threatened to come back as she drove farther into town. It was so much easier to push away the things that she had lost when they weren't staring her right in the face. The high school football stadium where she had first met Jeffrey. The park where they had walked the dogs together. The restaurants where they ate. The church that Sara's mother had occasionally guilted them into attending.

There had to be one place, one memory, that was untouched by this man. Long before Jeffrey Tolliver even knew there was such a thing as Grant County, she'd had a life here. Sara had grown up in Heartsdale, gone to the high school, joined the science club, helped out at the women's shelter where her mother volunteered, done the occasional odd job with her father. Sara had lived in a house Jeffrey had never stepped foot in. She'd driven a car he'd never seen. She had shared her first kiss with a local boy whose father owned the hardware store. She had gone to dances at the church and attended potlucks and football games.

All without Jeffrey.

Three years before he entered her life, Sara had taken the part-time job of county medical examiner in order to buy out her partner at the children's clinic. She had kept the job long after her loan had been paid off. She was surprised to find out that helping the dead was sometimes more rewarding than saving the living. Every case was a puzzle, every body riddled with clues to a mystery that only Sara could solve. A different part of her brain that she hadn't even known existed was engaged by the coroner's job. She had loved both her jobs with equal passion. She had worked countless cases, given testimony in court on countless suspects and circumstances.

Now, Sara could not remember one detail from any of them.

What she could vividly recall was the day that Jeffrey Tolliver had strolled into town. The mayor had wooed him away from the Birmingham police force to take over for the retiring chief of police. Every woman Sara knew practically tittered with joy whenever Jeffrey's name was mentioned. He was witty and charming. He was tall, dark, and handsome. He'd played college football. He drove a cherry red Mustang, and when he walked, he had the athletic grace of a panther.

That Jeffrey set his sights on Sara had shocked the entire town, Sara included. She wasn't the type of girl who got the good-looking guy. She was the type of girl who watched her sister or her best friend get the good-looking guy. And yet, their casual dates turned into something deeper, so that a few years later, no one was surprised when Jeffrey asked her to marry him. Their relationship had been hard work, and God knew there had been ups and downs, but in the end, she had known with every fiber of her being that she belonged to Jeffrey and, more important, that he belonged completely to her.

Sara wiped her tears with the back of her hand as she drove. The longing was the hardest part, the physical ache her body felt at the memory of him. There was no part of town that didn't slap her in the face with what she had lost. These roads had been kept safe by him. These people had called him friend. And Jeffrey had died here. The town he'd loved so much had become his crime scene. There was the church where they mourned his death. There was the street where a long line of cars had pulled over as his casket was driven out of town.

She would only be here for four days. She could do anything for four days.

Almost anything.

Sara took the long way to her parents' house, bypassing Main Street and the children's clinic. The bad storms that had followed her all the way from Atlanta had finally subsided, but she could tell from the dark clouds in the sky that this was only a temporary reprieve. The weather seemed to fit her mood lately—sudden, violent storms with fleeting rays of sunshine.

Because of the coming Thanksgiving holiday, lunchtime traffic was nonexistent. No cars were snaking a long line toward the college. No noontime shoppers were heading into downtown. Still, she took a left instead of a right at Lakeshore Drive, going two miles out of her way around Lake Grant so that she would not drive past her old house. Her old life.

The Linton family home, at least, was welcoming in its familiarity. The house had been tinkered with over the years—additions tacked on, bathrooms added and updated. Sara's father had built out the apartment space over the garage when she went away to college so that she would have a place to stay during summer break. Tessa, Sara's younger sister, had lived there for almost ten years while she waited for her life to start. Eddie Linton was a plumber by trade. He had taught both his girls the business, but only Tessa had stuck around long enough to do anything with it. That Sara had chosen medical school instead of a life navigating dank crawl spaces with her sister and father was a disappointment Eddie still tried his best to cover. He was the kind of father who was most happy when his daughters were close by.

Sara didn't know how Eddie felt about Tessa leaving the family business. Around the time Sara had lost Jeffrey, Tessa had gotten married and moved her life eight thousand miles away to work with children in South Africa. She was as impulsive as Sara was steady, though no one would have guessed when the girls were teenagers that either of them would be where they were today. The idea of Tessa as a missionary was still hard for Sara to believe.

"Sissy!" Tessa bounded out of the house, her pregnant belly swaying as she angled herself down the front stairs. "What took you so long? I'm starving!"

Sara was barely out of the car when her sister threw her arms around her. The hug turned from a greeting into something deeper, and Sara felt the darkness coming back. She was no longer certain that she could do this for four minutes, let alone four days.

Tessa mumbled, "Oh, Sissy, everything's changed."

Sara blinked back tears. "I know."

Tessa pulled away. "They got a pool."

Sara laughed in surprise. "A what?"

"Mama and Daddy put in a pool. With a hot tub."

Sara wiped her eyes, still laughing, loving her sister more than words could ever convey. "You're kidding me?" Sara and Tessa had spent most of their childhood begging their parents to put in a pool.

"And Mama took the plastic off the couch."

Sara gave her sister a stern look, as if to ask when the punch line was coming.

"They redecorated the den, changed all the light fixtures, redid the kitchen, painted over the pencil marks Daddy made on the door ... It's like we never even lived there."

Sara couldn't say she mourned the loss of the pencil marks, which had recorded their height until the eighth grade, when she had officially become the tallest person in her family. She grabbed the dog leashes from the passenger seat. "What about the den?"

"All the paneling's down. They even put up crown molding." Tessa tucked her hands into her expansive hips. "They got new lawn furniture. The nice wicker—not the kind that pinches your ass every time you sit down." Thunder made a distant clapping sound. Tessa waited for it to pass. "It looks like something out of Southern Living."

Sara blocked the back door of the SUV as she wrangled with her two greyhounds, trying to snap on their leashes before they bolted off into the street. "Did you ask Mama what made her change everything?"

Tessa clicked her tongue as she took the leashes from Sara. Billy and Bob jumped down, heeling beside her. "She said that she could finally have nice things now that we were gone."

Sara pursed her lips. "I'm not going to pretend that doesn't sting." She walked around the car and opened the trunk. "When's Lemuel coming?"

"He's trying to get a flight out, but those bush pilots won't take off unless every chicken and goat in the village buys a ticket." Tessa had come home a few weeks ago to have the baby in the States. Her last pregnancy had ended badly, the child lost. Understandably, Lemuel didn't want Tessa to take any chances, but Sara found it odd that he hadn't yet joined his wife. Her due date was less than a month away.

Sara said, "I hope I get to see him before I leave."

"Oh, Sissy, that's so sweet. Thank you for lying."

Sara was about to respond with what she hoped was a more artful lie when she noticed a patrol car driving down the street at a slow crawl. The man behind the wheel tipped his hat at Sara. Their eyes met, and she felt herself tearing up again.

Tessa stroked the dogs. "They've been driving by like that all morning."

"How did they know I was coming?"

"I might've let it slip at the Shop 'n Save the other day."

"Tess," Sara groaned. "You know Jill June got on the phone as soon as you left. I wanted to keep this quiet. Now everybody and their dog'll be dropping by."

Tessa kissed Bob with a loud smack. "Then you'll get to see your friends, too, won't you, boy?" She gave Bill a kiss to even things out. "You've gotten two calls already."

Sara pulled out her suitcase and closed the lift gate. "Let me guess. Marla at the station and Myrna from down the street, both trying to milk every ounce of gossip."

"No, actually." Tessa walked alongside Sara back to the house. "A girl named Julie something. She sounded young."

Sara's patients had often called her at home, but she didn't remember anyone named Julie. "Did she leave a number?"

"Mama took it down."

Sara lugged her suitcase up the porch stairs, wondering where her father was. Probably rolling around on the plastic-free couch. "Who else called?"

"It was the same girl both times. She said she needed your help."

"Julie," Sara repeated, the name still not ringing any bells.

Tessa stopped her on the porch. "I need to tell you something."

Sara felt a creeping dread, instinctively knowing bad news was coming. Tessa was about to speak when the front door opened.

"You're nothing but skin and bones," Cathy chided. "I knew you weren't eating enough up there."

"It's good to see you, too, Mother." Sara kissed her cheek. Eddie came up behind her, and she kissed his cheek, too. Her parents petted the dogs, cooing at them, and Sara tried not to notice that the greyhounds were getting a warmer welcome.

Eddie grabbed Sara's suitcase. "I got this." Before she could say anything else, he headed up the stairs.

Sara took off her sneakers as she watched her father leave. "Is something—"

Cathy shook her head in lieu of an explanation.

Tessa kicked off her sandals. The freshly painted wall was scuffed where she had obviously done this many times before. She said, "Mama, you need to tell her."

Cathy exchanged a look with Tessa that raised the hair on the back of Sara's neck.

"Tell me what?"

Her mother started off with an assurance. "Everybody's fine."

"Except?"

"Brad Stephens got hurt this morning."

Brad had been one of her patients, then one of Jeffrey's cops. "What happened?"

"He got stabbed trying to arrest somebody. He's at Macon General."

Sara leaned against the wall. "Stabbed where? Is he all right?"

"I don't know the details. His mama's at the hospital with him now. I guess we'll get a phone call one way or another tonight." She rubbed Sara's arm. "Now, let's not worry until it's time to worry. It's in the Lord's hands now."

Sara felt blindsided. "Why would anyone hurt Brad?"

Tessa supplied, "They think it had something to do with the girl they pulled out of the lake this morning."

"What girl?"

Cathy cut off any further conversation on the matter. "They don't know anything, and we are not going to add to these rampant rumors."

Sara pressed, "Mama—"

"No more." Cathy squeezed her arm before letting go. "Let's remember the things we have to be thankful for, like both of my girls being home at the same time.”

Cathy and Tessa walked down the hall toward the kitchen, the dogs following them. Sara stayed in the foyer. The news about Brad had been brushed over so quickly that she hadn’t had time to process it. Brad Stephens had been one of Sara’s first patients at the children’s clinic. She had watched him grow from a gawky teenager into a clean-cut young man. Jeffrey had kept him on a tight leash. He was more like a puppy than a cop—a sort of mascot at the station. Of course, Sara knew better than anyone else that being a cop, even in a small town, was a dangerous job.

She fought the urge to call the hospital in Macon and find out about Brad. An injured cop always brought a crowd. Blood was donated. Vigils were started. At least two fellow police officers stayed with the family at all times.

But Sara wasn’t part of that community anymore. She wasn’t the police chief’s wife. She had resigned as the town’s medical examiner four years ago. Brad’s condition was none of her business. Besides, she was supposed to be on vacation right now. She had worked back-to-back shifts in order to get the time off, trading weekends and full moons in exchange for the Thanksgiving holiday. This week was going to be hard enough without Sara sticking her nose into other people’s problems. She had enough problems of her own.

Sara looked at the framed photographs that lined the hallway, familiar scenes from her childhood. Cathy had put a fresh coat of paint on everything, but if the paint had not been recent, there would have been a large rectangle near the door that was lighter in color than the rest of the wall: Jeffrey and Sara’s wedding picture. Sara could still see it in her head—not the picture, but the actual day. The way the breeze stirred her hair, which miraculously had not frizzed in the humidity. Her pale blue dress and matching sandals. Jeffrey in dark pants and a white dress shirt, ironed so crisp that he hadn’t bothered to button the cuffs. They had been in the backyard of her parents’ house, the lake offering a spectacular sunset. Jeffrey’s hair was still damp from the shower, and when she put her head on his shoulder, she could smell the familiar scent of his skin.

“Hey, baby.” Eddie was standing on the bottom stair behind her. Sara turned around. She smiled, because she wasn’t used to having to look up to see her father.

He asked, “You get bad weather coming down?”

“Not too bad.”

“I guess you took the bypass?”

“Yep.”

He stared at her, a sad smile on his face. Eddie had loved Jeffrey like a son. Every time he spoke to Sara, she felt his loss in double measure.

“You know,” he began, “you’re getting to be just as beautiful as your mother.”

She could feel her cheeks redden from the compliment. “I’ve missed you, Daddy.”

He took her hand in his, kissed her palm, then pressed it over his heart. “You hear about the two hats hanging on a peg by the door?”

She laughed. “No. What about them?”

“One says to the other, ‘You stay here. I’ll go on a head.’ ”

Sara shook her head at the bad pun. "Daddy, that's awful."

The phone rang, the old-fashioned sound of an actual ringing bell filling the house. There were two telephones in the Linton home: one in the kitchen and one upstairs in the master bedroom. The girls were only allowed to use the one in the kitchen, and the cord was so long from being stretched into the pantry or outside, or anywhere else there might be an infinitesimal bit of privacy, that it had lost all of its curl.

"Sara!" Cathy called. "Julie is on the phone for you."

Eddie patted her arm. "Go."

She walked down the hall and into the kitchen, which was so beautiful that she froze mid-stride. "Holy crap."

Tessa said, "Wait till you see the pool."

Sara ran her hand along the new center island. "This is marble." Previously, the Linton décor had favored Brady Bunch orange tiles and knotty pine cabinetry. She turned around and saw the new refrigerator. "Is that Sub-Zero?"

"Sara." Cathy held out the phone, the only thing in the kitchen that had not been updated.

She exchanged an outraged look with Tessa as she put the phone to her ear. "Hello?"

"Dr. Linton?"

"Speaking." She opened the door on the cherry wall cabinet, marveling at the antique glass panels. There was no answer on the phone. She said, "Hello? This is Dr. Linton."

"Ma'am? I'm sorry. This is Julie Smith. Can you hear me okay?"

The connection was bad, obviously a cell phone. It didn't help matters that the girl was speaking barely above a whisper. Sara didn't recognize the name, though she guessed from the twangy accent that Julie had grown up in one of the poorer areas of town. "What can I do for you?"

"I'm sorry. I'm calling from work and I gotta be quiet."

Sara felt her brow furrow. "I can hear you fine. What do you need?"

"I know you don't know me, and I'm sorry to be calling you like this, but you have a patient named Tommy Braham. You know Tommy, don't you?"

Sara ran through all the Tommys she could think of, then came up not with a face, but with a disposition. He was just another young boy who'd had myriad office visits for the sorts of things you would expect: a bead shoved up his nose. A watermelon seed in his ear. Unspecified belly aches on important school days. He stuck out mostly because his father, not his mother, had always brought him to the clinic, an unusual occurrence in Sara's experience.

Sara told the girl, "I remember Tommy. How's he doing?"

"That's the thing." She went quiet, and Sara could hear water running in the background. She waited it out until the girl continued, "Sorry. Like I was saying, he's in trouble. I wouldn't have called, but he told me to. He texted me from prison."

"Prison?" Sara felt her heart sink. She hated to hear when one of her kids turned out bad, even if she couldn't quite recall what he looked like. "What did he do?"

"He didn't do anything, ma'am. That's the point."

"Okay." Sara rephrased the question. "What was he convicted of?"

"Nothing as far as I know. He doesn't even know if he's arrested or what."

Sara assumed the girl had confused prison with jail. "He's at the police station on Main Street?" Tessa shot her a look and Sara shrugged, helpless to explain.

Julie told her, "Yes, ma'am. They got him downtown."

"Okay, what do they think he did?"

"I guess they think he killed Allison, but there ain't no way he—"

"Murder." Sara did not let her finish the sentence. "I'm not sure what he wants me to do." She felt compelled to add, "For this sort of situation, he needs a lawyer, not a doctor."

"Yes, ma'am, I know the difference between a doctor and a lawyer." Julie didn't sound insulted by Sara's clarification. "It's just that he said he really needed someone who would listen to him, because they don't believe that he was with Pippy all night, and he said that you were the only one who ever listened to him, and that one cop, she's been really hard on him. She keeps staring at him like—"

Sara put her hand to her throat. "What cop?"

"I'm not sure. Some lady."

That narrowed things down enough. Sara tried not to sound cold. "I really can't get involved in this, Julie. If Tommy has been arrested, then by law, they have to provide him with a lawyer. Tell him to ask for Buddy Conford. He's very good at helping people in these sorts of situations. All right?"

"Yes, ma'am." She sounded disappointed, but not surprised. "Okay, then. I told him I'd try."

"Well ..." Sara did not know what else to say. "Good luck. To both of you."

"Thank you, ma'am, and like I said, I'm sorry to bother you'uns over the holiday."

"It's all right." Sara waited for the girl to respond, but there was only the sound of a flushing toilet, then a dead line.

Tessa asked, "What was that about?"

Sara hung up the phone and sat down at the table. "One of my old patients is in jail. They think he killed somebody. Not Brad—someone named Allison."

Tessa asked, "Which patient was she calling about? I bet it's the boy who stabbed Brad."

Cathy slammed the refrigerator door to express her disapproval.

Still, Tessa pressed, "What's his name?"

Sara studiously avoided her mother's disapproving gaze. "Tommy Braham."

"That's the one. Mama, didn't he used to cut our grass?"

Cathy gave a clipped "Yes," not adding anything else to the conversation.

Sara said, "For the life of me, I can't remember what he looks like. Not too bright. I think his father is an electrician. Why can't I remember his face?"

Cathy tsked her tongue as she spread Duke's mayonnaise onto slices of white bread. "Age will do that to you."

Tessa smiled smugly. "You should know."

Cathy made a biting retort, but Sara tuned out the exchange. She strained to remember more details about Tommy Braham, trying to place him. His father stuck out more than the son; a gruff, muscled man who was uncomfortable being at the clinic, as if he found the public act of caring for his son to be emasculating. The wife had run off—Sara remembered that at least. There had been quite a scandal around her departure, mostly because she had left in the middle of the night with the youth minister of the Primitive Baptist church.

Tommy must have been around eight or nine when Sara first saw him as a patient. All boys looked the same at that age: bowl hair cuts, T-shirts, blue jeans that looked impossibly small and bunched up over bright white tennis shoes. Had he had a crush on her? She couldn't remember. What stuck out the most was that he had been silly and a bit slow. She imagined if he'd committed murder, it was because someone else had put him up to it.

She asked, "Who is Tommy supposed to have killed?"

Tessa answered, "A student from the college. They pulled her out of the lake at the crack of dawn. At first they thought it was a suicide, then they didn't, so they went to her house, which happens to be that crappy garage Gordon Braham rents out to students. You know the one?"

Sara nodded. She had once helped her father pump the septic tank outside the Braham house while she was on a holiday break from college, an event that had spurred her to work doubly hard to get into medical school.

Tessa supplied, "So, Tommy was there in the garage with a knife. He attacked Frank and ran out into the street. Brad chased after him and he stabbed Brad, too."

Sara shook her head. She had been thinking something small—a convenience store holdup, an accidental discharge of a gun. "That doesn't sound like Tommy."

"Half the neighborhood saw it," Tessa told her. "Brad was chasing him down the street and Tommy turned around and stabbed him in the gut."

Sara thought it through to the next step. Tommy hadn't stabbed a civilian. He had stabbed a cop. There were different rules when a police officer was involved. Assault turned into attempted murder. Manslaughter turned into murder in the first.

Tessa mumbled, "I hear Frank got a little rough with him."

Cathy voiced her disapproval as she took plates down from the cabinets. "It's very disappointing when people you respect behave badly."

Sara tried to imagine the scene: Brad running after Tommy, Frank bringing up the rear. But it wouldn't have just been Frank. He wouldn't waste his time pounding on a suspect while Brad was bleeding out. Someone else would have been there. Someone who had probably caused the whole takedown to go bad in the first place.

Sara felt anger spread like fire inside her chest. "Where was Lena during all of this?"

Cathy dropped a plate on the floor. It shattered at her feet, but she did not bend to pick up the pieces. Her lips went into a thin line and her nostrils flared. Sara could tell she was struggling to speak. "Don't you dare say that hateful woman's name in my house ever again. Do you hear me?"

"Yes, ma'am." Sara looked down at her hands. Lena Adams. Jeffrey's star detective. The woman who was supposed to have Jeffrey's back at all times. The woman whose cowardice and fear had gotten Jeffrey murdered.

Tessa struggled to kneel down and help her mother clean up the broken dish. Sara stayed where she was, frozen in place.

The darkness was back, a suffocating cloud of misery that made her want to curl into a ball. This kitchen had been filled with laughter all of Sara's life—the good-natured bickering between her mother and sister, the bad puns and practical jokes from her father. Sara did not belong here anymore. She should find an excuse to leave. She should go back to Atlanta and let her family enjoy their holiday in peace rather than dredging up the collective sorrow of the last four years.

No one spoke until the phone rang again. Tessa was closest. She picked up the receiver. "Linton residence." She didn't make small talk. She handed the phone to Sara.

"Hello?"

"I'm sorry to be bothering you, Sara."

Frank Wallace always seemed to be making an effort when he said Sara's name. He had played poker with Eddie Linton since Sara was in diapers, and had called her "Sweetpea" until he realized that it was inappropriate to address his boss's wife with such familiarity.

Sara managed a "Hi" as she opened the French door leading onto the back deck. She hadn't realized how hot her face was until the cold hit her. "Is Brad all right?"

"You heard about that?"

"Of course I heard." Half the town probably knew about Brad before the ambulance had arrived on the scene. "Is he still in surgery?"

"Got out an hour ago. Surgeons say he's got a shot if he makes it through the next twenty-four hours." Frank said more, but Sara couldn't concentrate on his words, which were meaningless anyway. The twenty-four-hour mark was the gold standard for surgeons, the difference between explaining a death at the weekly morbidity and mortality meeting or passing off an iffy patient to another doctor to manage their care.

She leaned against the house, cold brick pressing into her back, as she waited for Frank to get to the point. "Do you remember a patient named Tommy Braham?"

"Vaguely."

"I hate to pull you into this, but he's been asking for you."

Sara listened with half an ear, her mind whirring with possible excuses to answer the question she knew that he was going to ask. She was so caught up in the task that she hadn't realized Frank had stopped talking until he said her name. "Sara? You still there?"

"I'm here."

"It's just that he won't stop crying."

"Crying?" Again, she had the sensation of missing an important part of the conversation.

"Yeah, crying," Frank confirmed. "I mean, a lot of them cry. Hell, it's jail. But he's seriously not right. I think he needs a sedative or something to calm him down. We got three drunks and a wife beater in here gonna break through the walls and strangle him if he don't shut up."

She repeated his words in her head, still not sure she'd heard right. Sara had been married to a cop for many years, and she could count on one hand the number of times Jeffrey had worried about a criminal in his cells—and never a murderer, especially a murderer who had harmed a fellow officer. "Isn't there a doctor on call?"

"Honey, there's barely a cop on call. The mayor's cut half our budget. I'm surprised every time I flip a switch that the lights still come on."

She asked, "What about Elliot Felteau?" Elliot had bought Sara's practice when she left town. The children's clinic was right across the street from the station.

"He's on vacation. The nearest doc is sixty miles away."

She gave a heavy sigh, annoyed with Elliot for taking a week off, as if children would wait until after the holiday to get sick. She was also annoyed with Frank for trying to drag her into this mess. But mostly, she was annoyed with herself that she had even taken the call. "Can't you just tell him that Brad's going to be okay?"

"It's not that. There was this girl we pulled out of the lake this morning."

"I heard."

"Tommy confessed to killing her. Took him a while, but we broke him. He was in love with the girl. She didn't want to give him the time of day. You know the kind of thing."

"Then it's just remorse," she said, though she found the behavior strange. In Sara's experience, the first thing most criminals did after they confessed was fall into a deep sleep. Their bodies had been so shot through with adrenaline for so long that they collapsed in exhaustion when they finally got the weight off their chests. "Give him some time."

"It's more than that," Frank insisted. He sounded exasperated and slightly desperate. "I swear to God, Sara, I really hate asking you this, but something's gotta help him get through. It's like his heart's gonna break if he doesn't see you."

"I barely remember him."

"He remembers you."

Sara chewed her lip. "Where's his daddy?"

"In Florida. We can't get hold of him. Tommy's all alone, and he knows it."

"Why is he asking for me?" There were certainly patients she had bonded with over the years, but, to her recollection, Tommy Braham had not been one of them. Why couldn't she remember his face?

Frank said, "He says you'll listen to him."

"You didn't tell him I'd come, did you?"

"Course not. I didn't even want to ask, but he's just bad off, Sara. I think he needs to see a doctor. Not just you, but a doctor."

"It's not because—" She stopped, not knowing how to finish the question. She decided to be blunt. "I heard you took him down hard."

Frank coughed his language. "He fell down a lot while I was trying to arrest him."

Sara was familiar with the euphemism, code for the nastier side of law enforcement. Abuse of prisoners in custody was a subject she never broached with Jeffrey, mostly because she did not want to know the answer. "Is anything broken?"

"A couple of teeth. Nothing bad." Frank sounded exasperated. "He's not crying over a split lip, Sara. He needs a doctor."

Sara looked through the window into the kitchen. Her mother was sitting at the table beside Tessa. Both of them stared back at her. One of the reasons Sara had moved back to Grant County after medical school was because of the paucity of doctors serving rural areas. With the hospital downtown closed, the sick were forced to travel almost an hour away to get help. The children's clinic was a blessing for the local kids, but, apparently, not during holidays.

"Sara?"

She rubbed her eyes with her fingers. "Is she there?"

He hesitated a moment. "No. She's at the hospital with Brad."

Probably concocting a story in her head where she was the hero and Brad was just a careless victim. Sara's voice shook. "I can't see her, Frank."

"You won't have to."

She felt grief tighten her throat. To be at the station house, to be where Jeffrey was most at home.

Lightning crackled high up in the clouds. She could hear rain, but not see it yet. Out on the lake, waves crashed and churned. The sky was dark and ominous with the promise of another storm. She wanted to take it as a sign, but Sara was a scientist at heart. She had never been good at relying on faith.

"All right," she relented. "I think I have some diazepam in my kit. I'll come through the back." She paused. "Frank—"

"You have my word, Sara. She won't be here."

Sara did not want to admit to herself that she was glad to leave her family, even if it meant going to the station house. She felt awkward around them, a piece of a puzzle that didn't quite fit. Everything was the same, yet everything was different.

She took the back way around the lake again, avoiding her old house that she had shared with Jeffrey. There was no way to get to the station without driving down Main Street. Thankfully, the weather had turned, rain dripping down in a thick, hazy curtain. This made it impossible for people to sit on the benches that lined the road or stroll up the cobblestone sidewalks. All the shop doors were tightly closed against the cold. Even Mann's Hardware had taken down their porch swing display.

She turned down a back alley that ran behind the old pharmacy. The paved road gave way to gravel, and Sara was glad that she was in an SUV. She had always driven sedans while she lived in Heartsdale, but Atlanta's streets were far more treacherous than any country road. The potholes were deep enough to get lost in and the constant flooding during the rainy season made the BMW a necessity. Or at least that's what she told herself every time she paid sixty dollars to fill up her gas tank.

Frank must have been waiting for her, because the back door to the station opened before Sara put the car in park. He unfolded a large black umbrella and came out to the car to walk her back to the station. The rain was so loud that Sara did not speak until they were inside.

She asked, "Is he still upset?"

Frank nodded, fiddling with the umbrella, trying to get it closed. Sutures crisscrossed the knuckles of his right hand. There were three deep scratches on the back of his wrist. Defensive wounds.

"Christ." Frank winced from pain as he tried to get his stiff fingers to move.

Sara took the umbrella from him and closed it. "Do they have you on antibiotics?"

"Got a prescription for something. Not sure what it is." He took the umbrella from her and tossed it into the broom closet. "Tell your mama I'm sorry for taking you away your first day back."

Frank had always seemed old to Sara, mostly because he was a contemporary of her father's. Looking at him now, she thought Frank Wallace had aged a hundred years since the last time she had seen him. His skin was sallow, his face etched with deep lines. She looked at his eyes, noticing the yellow. Obviously, he was not well.

"Frank?"

He forced a smile. "Good to see you, Sweetpea."

The name was meant to put up a barrier, and it worked. She let him kiss her cheek. His dominant odor had always been cigarette smoke, but today she smelled whiskey and chewing gum on his breath. Instinctively, she looked at her watch. Eleven-thirty in the morning, the time of day when a drink meant that you were biding time until your shift ended. On the other hand, this wasn't like a usual day for Frank. One of his men had been stabbed. Sara probably would have had her share of alcohol in the same situation.

He asked, "How you been holding up?"

She tried to look past the pity in his eyes. "I'm doing great, Frank. Tell me what's going on."

He quickly shifted gears. "Kid thought the girl was into him. He finds out she's not and sticks her with a knife." He shrugged. "Did a real bad job covering it up. Led us right to his doorstep."

Sara was even more confused. She must be mixing up Tommy with one of her other kids.

Frank picked up on this. "You really don't remember him?"

"I thought I did, but now I'm not so sure."

"He seems to think y'all have some kind of bond." He saw Sara's expression and amended, "Not in a weird way or anything. He's kind of young." Frank touched the side of his head. "Not a lot going on up there."

Sara felt a flash of guilt that this boy she barely remembered had felt such a connection to her. She had seen thousands of patients over the years. There were certainly names that stuck out, kids whose graduations and wedding days she had witnessed, a couple whose funerals she had attended. Other than a few stray details, Tommy Braham was a blank.

"It's this way," Frank said, as if she had not been in the station a thousand times. He used his plastic badge to open the large steel door that led to the cells. A blast of hot air met them.

Frank noticed her discomfort. "Furnace is acting up."

Sara took off her jacket as she followed him through the door. When she was a child, the local school had sent kids on field trips to the jail as a way of scaring them away from a life of crime. The Mayberry motif of open cells with steel bars had changed over long ago. There were six steel doors on either side of a long hallway. Each had a wire-mesh glass window and a slot at the bottom through which food trays could be passed. Sara kept her focus straight ahead as she followed Frank, though out of the corner of her eye, she could see men standing at their cell doors, watching her progress.

Frank took out his keys. "I guess he stopped crying."

She wiped away a bead of sweat that had rolled down her temple. "Did you tell him I was coming?"

He shook his head, not stating the obvious: he hadn't been sure that Sara would show up.

He found the right key and glanced through the window to make sure Tommy wasn't going to be any trouble. "Oh, shit," he muttered, dropping the keys. "Oh, Christ."

"Frank?"

He snatched up the keys off the floor, uttering more curses. "Christ," he murmured, sliding the key into the lock, turning back the bolt. He opened the door and Sara saw the reason for his panic. She dropped her coat, the bottle of pills she'd shoved in the pocket before she left the house making a rattling sound as they hit the concrete.

Tommy Braham lay on the floor of his cell. He was on his side, both arms reaching out to the bed in front of him. His head was turned at an awkward angle as he stared blankly up at the ceiling. His lips were parted. Sara recognized him now, the man he had become not much different from the little boy he'd once been. He'd brought her a dandelion once, and turned the color of a turnip when she'd kissed his forehead.

She went to him, pressing her fingers to his neck, doing a cursory check for a pulse. He had obviously been beaten—his nose broken, his eye blackened—but that was not the reason for his death. Both his wrists were cut open, the wounds gaping, flesh and sinew exposed to the stale air. There seemed to be more blood on the floor than there was inside of his body. The smell was sickly sweet, like a butcher's shop.

"Tommy," she whispered, stroking his cheek. "I remember you."

Sara closed his eyelids with her fingers. His skin was still warm, almost hot. She had driven too slowly getting here. She shouldn't have used the restroom before leaving the house. She should have listened to Julie Smith. She should have agreed to come without a fight. She should have remembered this sweet little boy who'd brought her a weed he'd picked from the tall grass growing outside the clinic.

Frank bent down and used a pencil to drag a thin, cylindrical object out of the blood.

Sara said, "It's an ink cartridge from a ballpoint pen."

"He must have used it to ..."

Sara looked at Tommy's wrists again. Blue lines of ink crossed the pale skin. She had been the coroner for Grant County before she'd left for Atlanta, and she knew what a repetitive injury looked like. Tommy had scraped and scraped with the metal ink cartridge, digging into his flesh until he found a way to open a vein. And then he had done the same thing to his other wrist.

"Shit." Frank was staring over her shoulder.

She turned around. On the wall, written in his own blood, Tommy had scrawled the words Not me.

Sara closed her eyes, not wanting to see any of this, not wanting to be here.

“Did he try to recant?”

Frank said, “They all do.” He hesitated, then added, “He wrote out a confession. He had guilty knowledge of the crime.”

Sara recognized the term “guilty knowledge.” It was used to describe details that only the police and the criminal knew. She opened her eyes. “Is that why he was crying? He wanted to take back his confession?”

Frank gave a tight nod. “Yeah, he wanted to take it back. But they all—”

“Did he ask for a lawyer?”

“No.”

“How did he get the pen?”

Frank shrugged, but he wasn’t stupid. He could guess what had happened.

“He was Lena’s prisoner. Did she give him the pen?”

“Of course not.” Frank stood up, walked to the cell door. “Not on purpose.”

Sara touched Tommy’s shoulder before standing. “Lena was supposed to frisk him before she put him in the cell.”

“He could’ve hidden it in—”

“I’m assuming she gave him the pen to write his confession.” Sara felt a deep, dark hate burning in the pit of her stomach. She had been back in town for less than an hour and already she was in the middle of yet another one of Lena’s epic screwups. “How long did she interrogate him?”

Frank shook his head again, like she had it all wrong. “Couple’a three hours. Not that long.”

Sara pointed to the words Tommy had written in his own blood. “‘Not me,’ ” she read. “He says he didn’t do it.”

“They all say they didn’t do it.” Frank’s tone told her his patience was running thin. “Look, honey, just go home. I’m sorry about all this, but ...” He paused, his mind working. “I gotta call the state, start the paperwork, get Lena back in ...” He rubbed his face with his hands. “Christ, what a nightmare.”

Sara picked her coat up off the floor. “Where is his confession? I want to see it.”

Frank dropped his hands. He seemed stuck in place. Finally, he relented, leading her toward the door at the opposite end of the hall. The fluorescent lights of the squad room were harsh, almost blinding, compared to the dark cells. Sara blinked to help her eyes adjust. There was a group of uniformed patrolmen standing by the coffeemaker. Marla was at her desk. They all stared at her with the same macabre curiosity they had shown four years ago: How awful, how tragic, how long before I can get on the phone and tell somebody I saw her?

Sara ignored them because she did not know what else to do. Her skin felt hot, and she found herself looking down at her hands so that she would not see Jeffrey’s office. She wondered if they had left everything as it was: his Auburn memorabilia, his shooting trophies and family photographs. Sweat rolled down her back. The room was so stifling that she thought she might be sick.

Frank stopped at his desk. “Allison Spooner is the girl he killed. Tommy tried to make it look like a suicide—wrote a note, stuck Spooner’s watch and ring in her shoes. He would’ve gotten away with it but Le—” He stopped. “Allison was stabbed in the neck.”

“Has an autopsy been performed?”

“Not yet.”

“How do you know the stab wasn’t self-inflicted?”

“It looked—”

“How deep did it penetrate? What was the trajectory of the blade? Was there water in her lungs?”

Frank talked over her, an air of desperation to his voice. “She had ligature marks around her wrists.”

Sara stared at him. She had always known Frank to be an honorable man, yet she would have sworn on a stack of Bibles that he was lying through his teeth. “Brock confirmed this?”

He hesitated before shaking his head and shrugging at the same time.

Sara could feel herself getting angrier. She knew somewhere in the back of her mind that her anger was unreasonable, that it was coming from that dark place she had ignored for so many years, but there was no stopping it now—even if she wanted to. “Was the body weighted down in the water?”

“She had two cinder blocks chained to her waist.”

“If she floated with both hands hanging down, livor mortis could have settled into her wrists, or her hands could have rested at an angle on the bottom of the lake, making it look to the untrained eye as if she’d been tied up.”

Frank looked away. “I saw them, Sara. She was tied up.” He opened a file on his desk and handed her a piece of yellow legal paper. The top was torn where it had been ripped away from the pad. Both sides were filled. “He copped to everything.”

Sara’s hands shook as she read Tommy Braham’s confession. He wrote in the exaggerated cursive of an elementary school student. His sentence construction was just as immature: Pippy is my dog. She was sick. She ate a sock. She needed a picture took of her insides. I called my dad. He is in Florida. Sara turned the page over and found the meat of the narrative. Allison had spurned a sexual advance. Tommy had snapped. He’d stabbed her and taken her to the lake to help cover his crime.

She looked at both sides of the paper. Two pages. Tommy had ended his life in less than two pages. Sara doubted he’d understood half of it. The only time he’d used a comma was right before a big word. These, he printed in block letters, and she could see small dots where he had pressed the pen under each letter to make sure he’d spelled it correctly.

Sara could barely speak. “She coached him.”

“It’s a confession, Sara. Most cons have to be told what to write.”

“He doesn’t even understand what he’s saying.” She skimmed the letter, reading, “‘I punched Allison to subdude.’” She stared at Frank, disbelieving. “Tommy’s IQ is barely above eighty. You think he masterminded this fake suicide? He’s less than one standard deviation from being classified as mentally disabled.”

“You got that from reading two paragraphs?”

“I got that from treating him,” Sara snapped. It had all come flooding back to her as she read the confession: Gordon Braham’s face when Sara suggested his son might be developing too slowly for his age, the tests Tommy had endured, Gordon’s devastation when Sara told him his son would never mature past a certain level. “Tommy was slow, Frank. He didn’t know how to count change. It took him two months to learn how to tie his shoes.”

Frank stared back at her, exhaustion seeping from every pore. “He stabbed Brad, Sara. He cut me in the arm. He ran from the scene.”

Her hands started shaking. Her body surged with anger. “Did you think to ask Tommy why?” she demanded. “Or were you too busy beating his face to a pulp?”

Frank glanced back at the officers by the coffee machine. “Keep your voice down.”

Sara was not going to be silenced. “Where was Lena when all this happened?”

“She was there.”

“I bet she was. I bet she was right there pulling everybody’s strings. ‘The victim was tied up. She must have been murdered. Let’s go to her apartment. Let’s get everybody around me hurt while I walk away without so much as a scratch.’” Sara could feel her heart shaking in her chest. “How many people does Lena have to get injured—killed—before somebody stops her?”

“Sara—” Frank rubbed his hands over his face. “We found Tommy in the garage with—”

“His father owns the property. He had every right to be in that garage. Did you? Did you have a warrant?”

“We didn’t need a warrant.”

“Have the laws changed since Jeffrey was alive?” Frank winced at the name. “Did Lena identify herself as a cop or just start waving her gun around?”

Frank didn’t answer her question, which was answer enough. “It was a tense situation. We did everything by the book.”

“Does Tommy’s handwriting match the suicide note?”

Frank blanched, and she realized he hadn’t asked the question himself. “He probably forged it, made it look like the girl’s.”

“He didn’t have the intelligence to forge anything. He was slow. Is that not getting through to you? There’s no way in hell Tommy could’ve done any of this. He wasn’t mentally capable of plotting out a trip to the store, let alone a fake suicide. Are you being willfully blind? Or just covering for Lena like you always do?”

“Mind your tone,” Frank warned.

“This is going to catch her.” Sara held up the confession like a trophy. The shaking in her hands had gotten worse. She felt hot and cold at the same time. “Lena tricked him into writing this. All Tommy wanted to do was please people. She pushed him into a confession and then she pushed him into taking his own life.”

“Now, hold on—”

“She’s going to lose her badge for this. She should go to prison.”

“Sounds to me like you care a hell of a lot more about some punk kid than a cop who’s fighting for his life.”

He could have slapped her face and the shock would have been less. “You think I don’t care about a cop?”

Frank sighed heavily. “Listen, Sweetpea. Just calm down, okay?”

“Don’t you dare tell me to calm down. I’ve been calm for the last four years.” She took her cell phone out of her back pocket and scrolled through the contacts, looking for the right number.

Frank sounded scared. “What are you going to do?”

Sara listened to the phone ring at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation's headquarters in Atlanta. A secretary answered. She told the woman, "This is Sara Linton calling for Amanda Wagner."

CHAPTER FOUR

Sara sat in her car in the hospital parking lot, staring out at Main Street. The facility had stopped accepting patients a year ago, but the building had looked abandoned long before that. Weeds sprouted in the ambulance bay. Windows on the upper floors were broken. The metal door that used to be propped open for smokers was bolted shut with a steel bar.

Guilt about Tommy Braham still weighed heavily on her—not just because she hadn’t remembered him, but because in the space of a few seconds, she had taken his death and used it as a launching pad for her own revenge fantasy against Lena Adams. Sara realized now that she should have just let it play out on its own instead of inserting herself into the middle. A suicide in police custody automatically triggered an investigation by the state. Frank would have followed the chain of command, calling in Nick Shelton, Grant County’s local field agent for the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. Nick would have talked to all the officers and witnesses involved. He was a good cop. In the end, he would have come to the same conclusion as Sara: that Lena had been negligent.

Unfortunately, Sara hadn’t been patient enough to trust the process. She had unilaterally decided to be town coroner again, elbowing poor Dan Brock out of the way, taking her own photographs of the scene, doing sketches of Tommy’s cell, before she allowed the body to be removed. She’d made copies of every sheet of paper she could find in the station house that referred to Tommy Braham. Even with all of this, calling Amanda Wagner, a deputy director with the GBI, was the worst of her transgressions. It was like swinging a sledgehammer at a thumbtack.

“Stupid,” she whispered, leaning her head into the steering wheel. She should be home right now looking at the marble tile her father had installed in the master bathroom, not waiting for someone straight from GBI headquarters to show up so she could unduly influence an investigation.

She leaned back against the seat, checking the clock on the dashboard. Special Agent Will Trent was almost an hour late, but she had no way of calling him. The trip from Atlanta was four hours—less if you knew you could flash your badge and talk your way out of a speeding ticket. She looked at the clock again, waiting out the flicker of 5:42 changing to 5:43.

Sara had no idea what she was going to say to him. She had talked to Will Trent probably a half dozen times while he worked a case involving one of Sara’s patients at Grady’s ER. She had shamelessly inserted herself into the investigation then, much as she was doing now. Will would probably start to wonder if she was some kind of crime scene voyeur. At the very least, he would question her obsession with Lena Adams. He would probably think that she was crazy.

“Oh, Jeffrey,” Sara whispered. What would he think of the mess she was getting herself into? What would he say about how awful being back in his adoptive town, the town he loved, made her feel? Everyone was so careful around her, so respectful. She should be grateful, but on some level, her skin crawled when she saw the pity in their eyes.

She was so damn tired of being tragic.

The roar of an engine announced Will Trent's arrival. He was in a beautiful old Porsche, black on black. Even in the rain, the machine looked like an animal ready to pounce.

He took his time getting out of the car, snapping the faceplate off the radio, removing the GPS receiver from the dash, and locking them both in the glove compartment. He lived in Atlanta, where you bolted your front door even if you were just going out to get your mail. Sara knew he could leave the Porsche sitting in the parking lot with the doors wide open and the worst thing that might happen is someone would come along and close them for him.

Will smiled at her as he locked the door. Sara had only ever seen him in three-piece suits, so she was surprised to find him dressed in a black sweater and jeans. He was tall, at least six-three, with a lean runner's body and an easy gait. His sandy blond hair had grown out, no longer the military cut he'd sported when they first met. Initially, Sara had taken Will Trent for an accountant or lawyer. Even now, she had a hard time reconciling the man with the job. He didn't walk with a cop's swagger. He didn't have that world-weary stare that let you know he carried a gun on his hip. Still, he was an excellent investigator, and suspects underestimated him at their own peril.

This was one of the reasons that Sara was glad that Amanda Wagner had sent Will Trent. Lena would hate him on sight. He was too soft-spoken, too accommodating—at least on first blush. She wouldn't know what she was getting herself into until it was too late.

Will opened the car door and got in.

Sara said, "I thought you'd gotten lost."

He gave her a half-grin as he adjusted the seat so his head wasn't hitting the roof. "I apologize. I actually did get lost." He looked at her face, obviously trying to get a read off her. "How are you doing, Dr. Linton?"

"I'm ..." Sara let out a long sigh. She didn't know him very well, which, oddly, made it easier for her to be honest. "Not so great, Agent Trent."

"Agent Mitchell said to tell you she's sorry she couldn't make it."

Faith Mitchell was his partner, a onetime patient of Sara's. She was currently on maternity leave, fairly close to her due date. "How is she holding up?"

"With her usual forbearance." His smile indicated the opposite. "Excuse me for changing the subject so quickly, but how can I help you?"

"Did Amanda tell you anything?"

"She told me there was a suicide in custody and to get down here as fast as possible."

"Did she tell you about ..." Sara waited for him to fill in the blank. When he didn't, she prompted, "My husband?"

"Is that relevant? I mean, to what's going on today?"

Sara felt her throat tighten.

Will asked, "Dr. Linton?"

"I don't know that it's relevant," she finally answered. "It's just history. Everyone you meet in this town is going to know about it. They're going to assume that you do, too.” She felt tears sting her eyes for the millionth time that day. “I’m sorry. I’ve been so angry for the last six hours that I haven’t really thought about what I’m dropping you in the middle of.”

He leaned up and pulled a handkerchief out of his back pocket. “There’s no need to apologize. I get dropped in the middle of stuff all the time.”

Aside from Jeffrey and her father, Will Trent was the only man Sara knew who still carried a handkerchief. She took the neatly folded white cloth he handed her.

Will repeated, “Dr. Linton?”

She wiped her eyes, apologizing again. “I’m sorry. I’ve been tearing up like this all day.”

“It’s always hard to go back.” He said this with such certainty that Sara found herself really looking at him for the first time since he’d gotten into the car. Will Trent was an attractive man, but not in a way that you would quickly notice. If anything, he seemed eager to blend in with his surroundings, to keep his head down and do his job. Months ago, he’d told Sara that he’d grown up in the Atlanta Children’s Home. His mother had been killed when he was an infant. These were big revelations, yet Sara felt like she knew nothing about him at all.

His head turned toward her and she looked away.

Will said, “Let’s try it this way: You tell me what you think I should know. If I have more questions, I’ll try to ask them as respectfully as I can.”

Sara cleared her throat several times, trying to find her voice. She was thinking about her own recovery after Jeffrey’s death, the year of her life she had lost to sleep and pills and misery. None of that mattered right now. What she needed to convey to Will was that Lena Adams had a long-standing pattern of risking other people’s lives, of sometimes getting people killed.

She said, “Lena Adams was responsible for my husband’s death.”

Will’s expression did not change. “How so?”

“She got mixed up with someone ...” Sara cleared her throat again. “The man who killed my husband was Lena’s lover. Boyfriend. Whatever. They were together for several years.”

“They were together when your husband died?”

“No.” Sara shrugged. “I don’t know. He had this hold on her. He beat her. It’s possible that he raped her, but—” Sara stopped, not knowing how to tell Will not to feel sorry for Lena. “She goaded him. I know this sounds horrible, but it was like Lena wanted to be abused.”

He nodded, but she wondered if he really understood.

“They had this sick relationship where they brought out the worst in each other. She put up with it until it stopped being fun, then she called in my husband to clean up her mess and ...” Sara stopped, not wanting to sound as desperate as she felt. “Lena painted a target on his back. It was never proven, but her ex-lover is the man who killed my husband.”

Will said, “Police officers have a responsibility to report abuse.”

Sara felt a spark of anger, thinking he was blaming Jeffrey for not stepping in. “She denied it was happening. You know how hard domestic violence is to prove when—”

“I know,” he interrupted. “I’m sorry my words were unclear. I meant to say that the onus was on Detective Adams. Even when the officer is herself the victim of abuse, by law, it's her duty to report it."

Sara tried to even out her breathing. She was getting so worked up about this that she must have seemed slightly crazy. "Lena's a bad cop. She's sloppy. She's negligent. She's the reason my husband is dead. She's the reason Tommy is dead. She's probably the reason Brad got stabbed in the street. She gets people into situations, puts them in the line of fire, then backs away and watches the carnage."

"On purpose?"

Sara's throat was so dry she could barely swallow. "Does it matter?"

"I suppose not," he admitted. "I'm guessing Detective Adams was never charged with anything in your husband's murder?"

"She's never held accountable for anything. She always manages to slither back under her rock."

He nodded, staring ahead at the rain-soaked windshield. Sara had turned off the engine. She had been cold before Will came, but now their combined body heat was warm enough to cloud the windows.

Sara chanced another look at Will, trying to guess what he was thinking. His face remained impassive. He was probably the hardest person to read that Sara had ever met in her life.

She finally said, "This all sounds like a witch hunt on my part, doesn't it?"

He took his time answering. "A suspect killed himself while in police custody. The GBI is charged with investigating that."

He was being too generous. "Nick Shelton is the Grant County field agent. I leapfrogged over about ten heads."

"Agent Shelton wouldn't have been allowed to conduct the investigation. He's got a relationship with the local force. They would've sent me or somebody like me to look into this. I've worked in small towns before. Nobody feels bad about hating the pencil pusher from Atlanta." He smiled, adding, "Of course, if you hadn't called Dr. Wagner directly, it might've taken another day to get somebody down here."

"I'm so sorry that I dragged you away this close to a holiday. Your wife must be furious."

"My ...?" He seemed puzzled for a second, as if he'd forgotten about the ring on his finger. He covered for it badly, saying, "She doesn't mind."

"Still, I'm sorry."

"I'll live." He turned her back to the matter at hand. "Tell me what happened today."

This time the words came much more easily—Julie's phone call, the rumors about Brad's stabbing, Frank's plea for her help. She finished with finding Tommy in the cell, seeing the words he had scrawled on the wall. "They arrested him for Allison Spooner's murder."

Will's eyebrows furrowed. "They charged Braham with murder?"

"Here's the worst part." She handed him the photocopy she'd made of Tommy's confession.

Will seemed surprised. "They gave this to you?"

"I have a relationship—a past relationship." She didn't really know how to explain why Frank had let her bulldoze her way through. "I was the town coroner. I was married to the boss. They're used to showing me evidence."

Will patted his pockets. "I think my reading glasses are in my suitcase."

She dug around in her purse and pulled out her own pair.

Will frowned at the glasses, but slid them on. He blinked several times as he scanned the page, asking, "Tommy is local?"

"Born and raised."

"How old is he?"

Sara couldn't keep the outrage out of her tone. "Nineteen."

He looked up. "Nineteen?"

"Exactly," she said. "I don't know how they think he masterminded this. He can barely spell his own name."

Will nodded as he turned back to the confession, his eyes going back and forth across the page. Finally, he looked at Sara. "Did he have some kind of reading problem, like dyslexia?"

"Dyslexia is a language disorder. But, no, Tommy wasn't dyslexic. His IQ was around eighty. Intellectually disabled people test out at seventy or below—what used to be called retarded. Dyslexia has nothing to do with IQ. Actually, I had a couple of kids with it who ran circles around me."

He gave his half-grin. "I find that very hard to believe."

She smiled back, thinking he didn't know the first thing about her. "Don't get hung up on a couple of spelling mistakes."

"It's more than a couple."

"Think about it this way: I could sit across from a dyslexic all day and never know it. With Tommy, he could talk about baseball or football until the cows came home, but get him into more complex areas of thinking and he'd be completely lost. Concepts that required logic, or processing cause and effect, were incredibly difficult for him to grasp. You couldn't talk a dyslexic into a false confession any more easily than you could talk someone who had green eyes or red hair into saying they did something they didn't do. Tommy was incredibly gullible. He could be talked into anything."

Will stared at her, not speaking for a moment. "You think Detective Adams elicited a false confession?"

"Yes, I do."

"Do you think she's criminally negligent?"

"I don't know the legal threshold. I just know that her actions led to his death."

He spoke carefully, and she finally realized that he was interviewing her. "Can you tell me how you reached that conclusion?"

"Other than the fact that he scrawled 'Not me' in his own blood before he died?"

"Other than that."

"Tommy is—was—very suggestible. It goes hand in hand with his low IQ. He didn't test low enough to be classified as severely disabled, but he had some of the same attributes: the desire to please, the innocence, the gullibility. What happened today—the note, the shoes, the botched cover-up. On the surface, it seems like the kind of thing a person who is slow or stupid might do, but it's all too complicated for Tommy." She tried to listen to herself from Will's perspective. "I know this sounds like I'm hell-bent on going after Lena, and obviously I am, but that doesn't mean that what I'm saying isn't scientific fact. I had a hard time treating Tommy because he would always say he had whatever symptom I asked him about, whether it was a headache or a cough. If I put it into his head the right way, he would've told me he had the bubonic plague."

"So you're saying Lena should have recognized that Tommy was slow and ...?"

"Not badgered him into killing himself, for one."

"And two?"

"Sought proper medical care for him. He was obviously stricken. He wouldn't stop crying. He wouldn't talk to anybody ..." Her voice trailed off as she saw the hole in her argument. Frank had called Sara for help.

Instead of pointing out the obvious, Will asked, "Isn't the prisoner the responsibility of the booking officer?"

"Lena is the one who put him there. She didn't frisk him—or at least didn't frisk him well enough to find the ink cartridge he used to kill himself with. She didn't alert the guards to keep a close eye on him. She just got the confession and walked away." Sara could feel herself getting angrier by the second. "Who knows how she left him emotionally. She probably talked him into thinking his life wasn't worth living. This is what she does over and over again. She creates these shitstorms and someone else always pays the price."

Will stared out at the parking lot, his hands resting lightly on his knees. Though the hospital had closed, the electricity was still working. The parking lot lights flickered on. In their yellow glow, Sara could see the scar that ran down the side of Will's face and into his collar. It was old, probably from his childhood. The first time she'd seen it, she'd thought maybe he'd ripped the skin sliding into first base or failing at some daring feat on a bicycle. That was before she'd found out that he'd grown up in an orphanage. Now, she wondered if there was more to the story.

Certainly, it wasn't Will Trent's only scar. Even in profile, she could see the spot between his nose and lip where someone or something had repeatedly busted the skin apart. Whoever had stitched the flesh back together hadn't done a very good job. The scar was slightly jagged, giving his mouth an almost raffish quality.

Will exhaled a breath of air. When he finally spoke, he was all business. "They charged Tommy Braham with murder? Nothing else?"

"No, just murder."

"Not attempted murder for Detective Stephens?" Will asked. Sara shook her head. "Wasn't Chief Wallace also injured?"

Sara felt a blush work its way up her chest. She imagined Frank was calling it that even after the beating he gave Tommy in the middle of the street. "The arrest report said murder. Nothing else."

"The way I see it is that I have two issues here. One is that a suspect killed himself while he was in Detective Adams's custody, and two is that I'm not sure why she arrested Tommy Braham for murder based on his confession. And not just his confession, but any confession."

"Meaning?"

"You don't just arrest someone for murder based solely on their confession. There has to be corroborative evidence. The sixth amendment gives a defendant the right to confront his accuser. If you're your own accuser and you recant your confession ...” He shrugged. “It’s like a dog chasing its tail.”

Sara felt stupid for not making this connection hours ago. She had been the county medical examiner for almost fifteen years. The police didn’t necessarily need a cause of death to hold someone for suspicion of murder, but they needed the official finding that a murder had been committed before an arrest warrant was issued.

Will said, “They had plenty of reason to hold Braham without the murder charge: assault with a deadly weapon, attempted murder, assault on a police officer during the course of duty, assault during the course of arrest, evading arrest, trespassing. These are serious felonies. They could hold him on any combination for the next year and no one would complain.” He shook his head, as if he couldn’t grasp the logic. “I’ll need to get their reports.”

Sara turned around to the back seat and retrieved the copies she’d made. “I’ll have to wait for the drugstore to open in the morning so I can print the photographs.”

Will marveled at her access as he flipped through the pages. “Wow. All right.” He skimmed the pages as he talked. “I know you’re convinced Tommy didn’t kill this girl, but it’s my job to prove it one way or another.”

“Of course. I didn’t mean to ...” Sara let her voice trail off. She had meant to influence him. That was the point of them being here. “You’re right. I know you have to be impartial.”

“I just need you to be prepared, Dr. Linton. If I find out Tommy did it, or can’t find solid proof that he didn’t, no one is going to care how he was treated in jail. They’re going to think your Detective Adams saved them a lot of their tax dollars by avoiding a trial.”

Sara felt her heart sink. He was right. She had seen people in this town make assumptions before that weren’t necessarily rooted in fact. They didn’t embrace nuance.

He gave her an alternate scenario. “On the other hand, if Tommy didn’t kill this girl, then there’s a murderer out there who’s either very lucky or very clever.”

Again, Sara hadn’t let herself think this far. She had been so concerned with Lena’s involvement that it hadn’t occurred to her that Tommy’s innocence would point to another killer.

Will asked, “What else did you find out?”

“According to Frank, both he and Lena saw marks on Spooner’s wrists that indicated she was tied up.”

Will made a skeptical noise. “That’s really hard to tell when a body’s been in the water that long.”

Sara did not revel in her feelings of vindication. “There’s a stab wound, or what they think is a stab wound, in her neck.”

“Is it possible that it was self-inflicted?”

“I haven’t seen it, but I can’t imagine anyone would kill themselves with a stab to the back of the neck. And there would’ve been a lot of blood, especially if her carotid was hit. We’re talking high velocity, up and back, like a hose turned on full blast. I would guess you’d find anywhere from four to five pints of blood at the scene.”

“What about Spooner’s suicide note?”

“ ‘I want it over,’ ” Sara recalled.

“That’s strange.” He closed the folder. “Is the local coroner any good?”

“Dan Brock. He’s a funeral director, not a doctor.”

“I’ll take that as a no.” Will stared at her. “If I transfer Spooner and Braham up to Atlanta, we lose another day.”

She was already a step ahead of him. “I talked to Brock. He’s happy to let me do the autopsies, but we’ll have to start after eleven so we don’t disturb anyone. He’s got a funeral tomorrow morning. He’s supposed to call me later with the exact time so we can coordinate the procedures.”

“Autopsies are done at the funeral home?”

She indicated the hospital. “We used to do them here, but the state cut funding and they couldn’t stay open.”

“Same story, different town.” He looked at his cell phone. “I guess I should go introduce myself to Chief Wallace.”

“Interim Chief,” she corrected, then, “Sorry, it doesn’t matter. Frank’s not at the station right now.”

“I’ve already left two messages for him about meeting up with me. Did he get called out?”

“He’s at the hospital with Brad. And Lena, I imagine.”

“I’m sure they’re taking some time to get their stories straight.”

“Will you go to the hospital?”

“They’re going to hate me enough without me trampling into the hospital room of an injured cop.”

Sara silently conceded the point. “So, what are you going to do now?”

“I want to go to the station and see where they were keeping Tommy. I’m sure they’ll have an extremely hostile patrolman there who’s going to tell me he just got on shift, doesn’t know anything, and Tommy killed himself because he was guilty.” He tapped the file. “I’ll talk to the other prisoners if they haven’t already let them go. I imagine Interim Chief Wallace won’t show up until the morning, which will give me some time to go over these files.” He leaned up to get his wallet out of his back pocket. “Here’s my business card. It’s got my cell number on the back.”

Sara read Will’s name next to the GBI logo. “You have a doctorate?”

He took the card back from her and stared at the printing. Instead of answering her question, he said, “The numbers are good. Can you tell me where I can find the closest hotel?”

“There’s one over by the college. It’s not very nice, but it’s fairly clean. It’ll be quiet since the kids are on break.”

“I’ll get supper there and—”

“They don’t have a restaurant.” Sara felt a flash of shame for her small town. “Everything’s closed this time of night except the pizza place, and they’ve been shut down by the health department so many times that only the students will eat there.”

“I’m sure there are some snack machines at the hotel.” He put his hand on the door handle, but Sara stopped him.

“My mother made a huge dinner and there’s plenty left over.” She took the file from him and wrote her address on the front. “Crap,” she muttered, scratching through the street number. She had given her old address, not her parents’.

"Lakeshore," she said, pointing at the street directly across from the hospital. "Go right. Or left if you want the scenic route. It's just a big circle around the lake." She wrote down her cell number. "Call if you get lost."

"I couldn't impose on your family."

"I've dragged you all the way down here. You could at least let me feed you. Or let my mother feed you, which would be far better for your health." Then, because she knew he was not a stupid man, she added, "And you know I want to know what's happening on the case."

"I don't know how late I'll be."

"I'll wait up."

CHAPTER FIVE

Will Trent pressed his face to the closed glass door of the station house. The lights were out. There was no one at the front desk. He rapped his keys on the door for a third time, thinking if he used any more pressure, the glass would break. The building overhang wasn't doing much to keep the rain off his head. His stomach was grumbling from hunger. He was cold and wet, and extremely irritated that he had been ordered to this small-town hellhole during his vacation.

The worst part about this particular assignment was that this was the first time in his working life that Will had ever asked for a whole week off from work. Back home, his front yard was torn up where he had been digging a trench around the sewer line from his house to the street. Tree roots had taken over the ninety-year-old clay pipe, and a plumber wanted eight thousand dollars to change it out to plastic. Will was digging the trench by hand, trying not to destroy the thousands of dollars worth of landscaping he'd planted in the yard over the last five years, when the phone rang. Not answering didn't seem like an option. He'd been expecting news from Faith—that her baby was finally coming or, even better, that it was already here.

But, no, it was Amanda Wagner, telling him, "We don't say no to a cop's widow."

Will had put a tarp over the trench, but something told him his two days of digging would be erased by a mudslide by the time he got back home. If he ever made it back home. It seemed like he was destined to spend the rest of his life standing in the pouring-down rain outside this Podunk police station.

He was about to tap on the glass again when a light finally came on inside the building. An elderly woman headed toward the door, taking her time as she waddled across the carpeted lobby. She was large, a bright red prairie-style dress draping over her like a tent. Her gray hair was wrapped up in a bun on the top of her head, held there by a butterfly clip. A gold necklace with a cross dangled into her ample cleavage.

She put her hand on the lock, but didn't open it. Her voice was muffled through the glass. "Help you?"

Will took out his ID and showed it to her. She leaned in, scrutinizing the photograph, comparing it with the man in front of her. "You look better with your hair longer."

"Thank you." He tried to blink away the rain pouring into his eyes.

She waited for him to say something else, but Will held his tongue. Finally, she relented, unlocking the door.

The temperature inside was negligibly warm, but at least he was out from the rain. Will ran his fingers through his hair, trying to get the wet out. He stamped his feet to knock off the damp.

"You're making a mess," the woman said.

"I apologize," Will told her, wondering if he could ask for a towel. He took out his handkerchief and wiped his face. He smelled perfume. Sara's perfume.

The woman gave him a steely look, as if she could read what was going through Will's mind and didn't like it. "You gonna just stand there all night sniffing your handkerchief? I got supper to make."

He folded the cloth and put it back in his pocket. "I'm Agent Trent from the GBI."

"I already read that on your ID." She looked him up and down in open appraisal, obviously not liking what she saw. "I'm Marla Simms, the station secretary."

"Nice to meet you, Ms. Simms. Can you tell me where Chief Wallace is?"

"Mrs." Her tone was cutting. "Not sure if you heard, but one of our boys was almost killed today. Struck down in the street while trying to do his job. We've been a little busy with that."

Will nodded. "Yes, ma'am, I did hear that. I hope Detective Stephens is going to be okay."

"That boy has worked here since he was eighteen years old."

"My prayers are with his family," Will offered, knowing religion paid currency in small towns. "If Chief Wallace isn't available, may I speak with the booking officer?"

She seemed annoyed that he knew such a position existed. Frank Wallace had obviously given her the task of stalling the asshole from the GBI. Will could almost see the wheels in her head turning as she tried to figure out a way around his question.

Will politely pressed, "I know that the prisoners aren't left unattended. Are you in charge of the cells?"

"Larry Knox is back there," she finally answered. "I was about to leave. I already locked up all the files, so if you want—"

Will had tucked the file Sara had given him down the front of his pants so that it wouldn't get wet. He lifted his sweater and handed Marla the file. "Can you fax these twelve pages for me?"

She seemed hesitant to take the papers. He couldn't blame her. The file was warm from being pressed against his body. "The phone number is—"

"Hold on." She extracted a pen from somewhere deep inside her hair. It was plastic, a retractable Bic that you'd find in any office setting. "Go ahead."

He gave her his partner's fax number. The woman took her time writing it down, pretending to get the numbers mixed up. Will glanced around the lobby, which looked like every other small-town police station lobby he had ever walked into. Wood paneling lined the walls. Group photographs showed patrolmen in their uniforms, shoulders squared, jaws tilted up, smiles on their faces. There was a tall counter opposite the photographs, a gate filling in the space between the front part of the building and the back, where all the desks were lined up in a row. The lights were all off.

"All right," she said. "I'll fax them before I go."

"Do you have an extra pen I can borrow?"

She offered him the Bic.

"I wouldn't want to take your last one."

"Go ahead."

"No, really," he insisted, holding up his palms. "I couldn't take—"

"There's twenty boxfuls in the closet," she snapped. "Just take it."

"Well, all right. Thanks." He tucked the pen into his back pocket. "About the fax—I've numbered the pages, so if you can make sure all twelve go in the same order?"

She grumbled as she walked toward the gate. He waited as she bent over to find the release. There was a loud buzz and the click of a lock. Will found it strange that there was such a high level of security in the station, but small towns had found lots of inventive ways to spend Homeland Security money after 9/11. He had visited a jail once that had Kohler toilets in all the cells and nickel-plated fixtures on the sinks.

Marla busied herself in front of the row of office machines by the coffeemaker. Will took in the space. Three rows of three desks were in the center of the room. Tables with folding chairs lined the back wall. On the side of the building facing the street was a closed office door. There was a window looking out onto the squad room, but the blinds were tightly shut.

"Jail's in the back," Marla advised. She stacked the pages on the table, giving him a careful eye. Will looked back at the office and something like panic seemed to take hold of Marla, as if she was afraid he would open the door.

"Through here?" he said, indicating a metal door in the back of the room.

"That's the back, isn't it?"

"Thank you," he told her. "I appreciate your help."

Will let the door close before taking out Marla's pen and unscrewing the barrel. As he suspected, the ink cartridge inside was plastic. Sara had said the cartridge Tommy Braham used to cut open his wrists was metal. Will was guessing it came from a nicer pen than the Bic.

He reassembled the pen as he walked down the hall. Exit signs illuminated a tiled floor that was around sixty feet long and four feet wide. Will opened the first door he came to, a storage room. He checked over his shoulder before turning on the light. Boxes of paper clips and various office supplies lined the shelves, as did the twenty boxes of retractable Bic pens Marla had mentioned. Two tall stacks of yellow legal pads were beside the pens, and Will imagined the detectives coming into this closet, grabbing a pen and a legal pad so they could give suspects something to write their confessions with.

There were three more doors off the hallway. Two led to empty interrogation rooms. The setup was as you would expect: a long table with a metal eyebolt sticking out of the top, chairs scattered around. Two-way mirrors looked into each room. Will guessed you had to stand in the supply closet to see the first room. The other viewing room was behind the third door. He tried the knob and found it locked.

The door at the end of the hall opened and a cop in full uniform, including hat, came out. Will glanced over his shoulder, finding a camera in the corner that had tracked his progress down the hallway.

The cop asked, "What do you want?"

"Officer Knox?"

The man's eyes narrowed. "That's right."

"You're the booker?" Will asked, surprised. The position of booking officer was a necessary but tedious job. They were responsible for processing all the newly arrested prisoners and in charge of their well-being while they were housed in the cells. Generally, this was the sort of job an old-timer was given, a light desk position that eased the transition into retirement. Sometimes it was given to a cop who was being punished. Will doubted that was the case with Knox. Frank Wallace wouldn't have left an aggrieved officer here to handle Will.

Knox was staring at him with open anger. "You just gonna stand there?"

Will took out his badge. "I'm Special Agent Trent. I'm with the GBI."

The man took off his hat, showing a shock of carrot red hair. "I know who you are."

"I'm sure your chief has briefed you. We were called in as a matter of routine to investigate the suicide of Tommy Braham."

"You were called in by Sara Linton," he countered. "I was standing right there when she did it."

Will smiled at the man, because he had found that smiling at people when they thought you should be mad was a good way of bringing down some of the tension. "I appreciate your cooperation in this investigation, Officer. I know how difficult things must be for you right now."

"Do you now?" So much for the smiling. Knox looked like he wanted to punch Will in the throat. "A good man is fighting for his life in that hospital over in Macon and you're worried about the piece of shit who stabbed him. That's what I see."

"Did you know Tommy Braham?"

He was taken aback by the question. "What does that matter?"

"I was just curious."

"Yeah, I knew him. Had a screw loose in his head from the day he was born."

Will nodded as if he understood. "Can you take me to the cell where Tommy was found?"

Knox seemed to be really trying to think of a reason to say no. Will waited him out. Any cop would tell you that the best way to get someone to talk was to be quiet. There was a natural, human inclination to fill silence with noise. What most cops didn't realize was that they were just as susceptible to the same technique.

Knox said, "All right, but I don't like you, and you don't like me, so let's not pretend anything otherwise."

"Fair enough," Will agreed, following him through the door, finding himself in a smaller hallway with yet another door. A bench was on one side with a row of gun lockers. Every jail Will had ever visited had the same setup. Rather wisely, weapons were not allowed back with the prisoners.

Knox indicated the lockers. "Be sure to take out your clip and eject the round."

"I don't have my gun on me."

From the look Knox gave him, Will might as well have said he'd left his penis at home.

The man's lip curled in disgust. He turned around, walking toward the next door.

Will asked, "You said you were here when Dr. Linton made her phone call. Were you just coming on shift?"

Knox turned. "I wasn't here when the boy killed himself, if that's what you mean.”

“Were you on shift?” Will repeated.

He hesitated again, as if it wasn’t already clear that he didn’t want to cooperate.

Will said, “I’m assuming you’re not the regular booking officer. You’re patrol, right?”

Knox didn’t answer.

“Who was the booking officer this afternoon?”

He took his time answering. “Carl Phillips.”

“I’ll need to talk to him.”

He smiled. “Carl’s on vacation. Left this afternoon. Camping with his wife and kids. No phones.”

“When will he be back?”

“You’ll have to ask Frank about that.”

Knox took out his keys and opened the door. To Will’s relief, they were finally at the jail. Beside another large door was a viewing window showing another hallway, but this one had the familiar metal doors of jail cells. Just outside the cells was a sort of office for the officer in charge. To one side was a large filing cabinet. To the other was a built-in desk with six flat-screen monitors showing the inside of five of the cells. The sixth monitor had a game of solitaire going. Knox’s supper, a homemade sandwich with chips, was laid out in front of a computer keyboard.

Knox said, “Only got three people in here tonight,” by way of explanation.

Will checked the screens. One man was pacing his cell, the other two were curled up on their bunks. “Where’s the tape for the cameras?”

The cop rested his hand on the computer. “Stopped recording yesterday. We’ve got a call in to get it fixed.”

“That’s really strange that it stopped working right when you needed it.”

Knox shrugged. “Like I said, I wasn’t here.”

“Were any of the prisoners released after Braham was found?”

He shrugged. “I wasn’t in on that.”

Will took the answer as a tacit yes. “Do you have the visitors’ log?”

He opened up one of the filing cabinets and pulled out a sheet of paper, which he handed to Will. The form was lined with columns for names and times, the usual sort of paperwork you found in any jail in America. At the top of the page, someone had written in the date. The rest of the form was blank.

Knox said, “Guess Sara didn’t sign in.”

“Have you known her long?”

“She looked after my kids until she left town. How long have you known her?”

Will noticed a subtle change in the man’s anger. “Not long.”

“Looked like you knew her plenty well, sitting in the car with her for an hour like that in front of the hospital.”

Will hoped he didn’t look as surprised as he felt. He had forgotten how insular and incestuous small towns could be. He pressed his luck. “She’s a lovely woman.”

Knox puffed out his chest. He was at least six inches shorter than Will, obviously trying to make up for it with bravado. “Jeffrey Tolliver was the finest man I ever worked with.”

"His reputation is well known in Atlanta. It was out of respect for him that my boss sent me down here to look after his people."

Knox narrowed his eyes, and Will realized the patrolman could take his words in many different ways, not least of all as a sign that Will planned to go light on the investigation out of respect for Jeffrey Tolliver. This seemed to relax Knox, so Will did not correct him.

Knox said, "Sara just gets a little hot under the collar sometimes. Real emotional."

Will would hardly describe Sara as someone ruled by her emotions. He didn't trust his ability to pull off a cliché like "Women!" He simply nodded and shrugged at the same time, as if to say, "What are you gonna do?"

Knox kept staring at him, trying to make up his mind. "All right, then," he finally said. He used a plastic card to open the last door. His keys were still in his hand, and he jangled them as he walked. "This'n's a drunk sleeping it off. Came in about an hour ago." He indicated the next cell. "Meth head. He's coming down hard. Last time we tried to wake him, he near about knocked somebody's teeth out."

"What about door number three?" Will asked.

"Wife beater."

"I am not!" came a muffled shout from behind the door.

Knox silently nodded to Will. "Third time he's been locked up for it. She won't testify—"

"Goddamn right!" the man screamed.

"He's covered in his own puke, so I'm gonna have to hose him down if you wanna talk to him."

"I hate to ask ..." Will shrugged. "It might help expedite this so we can all get back to our lives. My wife's gonna kill me if I'm not home for the holiday."

"Know whatcha mean." Knox motioned Will to the next cell. The door was open. "This is it."

Tommy Braham's blood had been cleaned up, but the red stain on the concrete floor told the story. His feet would have been toward the door, head back. Maybe he was lying on his side, arm out in front of him. Will guessed from the circumference of the stain that Tommy had not just stopped at one wrist. He had cut open both to make sure the job was done right.

Will stepped into the cell, feeling a slight sense of claustrophobia. He took in the cinder-block-lined walls, the metal bed frame with its thin mattress. The toilet and sink were built as one stainless steel unit. The bowl looked clean, but the smell of sewage was pungent. Beside the sink was a toothbrush, a metal cup, and a small tube of toothpaste like the kind you'd get at a hotel. Will wasn't superstitious, but he was keenly aware that Tommy Braham had, in his misery, taken his life here less than eight hours ago. The feel of his death still lingered.

"'Not me,'" Knox said.

Will turned around, wondering what he meant.

Knox nodded toward the faded wall. "That's what he wrote. 'Not me.'" He took on a knowing tone. "If it wasn't you, buddy, then why'd you kill yourself?"

Will had never found it useful to ask dead men to explain their motivations, so he threw the question back to Knox. "Why do you think he kept insisting he didn't kill Allison Spooner?"

"Told you." Knox touched the side of his head. "Not right up here."

"Crazy?"

"Nah, just stupider than shit."

"Too stupid to know how to kill somebody?"

"Hell, I wish there was such a thing. Wouldn't have to keep such a close eye on the wife during that time of month." He gave a loud laugh, and Will forced himself to join in, pushing away thoughts of Tommy lying on the floor of this cell, slicing and slicing the ink cartridge across his wrist, trying to draw blood. How long would it take before the flesh opened? Would the skin get hot from the friction? Would the metal ink cartridge start to get warm? How long would it take for enough blood to leave his body so that his heart stopped?

Will turned back to the faded letters on the wall. He didn't want to break this new, if false, camaraderie with Knox. "Did you know Allison Spooner?"

"She worked at the diner. All of us knew her."

"What was she like?"

"Good girl. Got the plates out fast. Didn't stand around yapping too much." He looked down at the floor, shaking his head. "She was good-lookin', too. I guess that's what caught Tommy's eye. Poor thing. She probably thought he was harmless."

"Did she have any friends? A boyfriend?"

"I guess it was just Tommy. Never saw anybody else around her." He shrugged. "Not like I was paying attention. Wife don't like it when my eye wanders."

"Did you see Tommy at the diner a lot?"

Knox shook his head. Will could see his compliance was waning.

"Can I talk to the wife beater?"

"I didn't touch her!" the prisoner screamed back, slamming his hand against the cell door.

"Thin walls," Will noted. Knox was leaning against the door, arms crossed. His shirt pocket was bunched up, a silver pen clipped to the material. "Hey, can I borrow your pen?"

Knox touched the clip. "Sorry, this'n's the only one I got."

Will recognized the Cross logo. "Nice."

"Chief Tolliver gave 'em to us the Christmas before he passed."

"All of you?" Knox nodded. Will gave a low whistle. "That must've been expensive."

"They sure ain't cheap."

"It takes a special cartridge, right? A metal one?"

Knox opened his mouth to respond, then caught himself.

Will asked, "Who else got one?"

Knox's lip curled up in a sneer. "Fuck you."

"That's all right. I can ask Sara about it when I see her later."

Knox stood up straight, blocking the door. "You better be careful, Agent Trent. Last guy who was in this cell didn't end up too well."

Will smiled. "I think I can take care of myself."

"That a fact?"

Will forced a grin. "I hope so, because you seem to be threatening me."

"You think?" Knox banged on the open cell door. "You hear that, Ronny? Mr."

GBI here says I'm threatening him."

"What's that, Larry?" the wife beater shouted back. "I can't hear nothing through these thick walls. Not a goddamn thing."

Will sat in the interrogation room, trying to breathe through his mouth as he stared at the photocopied pages Sara had given him. Officer Knox had rescinded his offer to hose down the wife beater. Will had endured the man's stench for twenty minutes before giving up on interrogating him. In Atlanta, Ronny Porter would have sung his way to freedom, giving Will any information he had in order to get out of jail. Small towns were different. Instead of trying to cop a plea, Porter had defended every officer in the building. He'd even waxed poetic on Marla Simms, who apparently used to be his Sunday school teacher.

Will spread out the files, trying to put them into some sort of order. Tommy Braham's confession was handwritten, the copy dark from the yellow paper. He set that aside. The police report was like every form Will had ever handled at the GBI. Boxes provided space for dates, times, weather, and other details of the crime, to be written in by hand. The suicide note had caught the light from the copier, the letters blurring.

There were two other pages that were photocopies of notepaper from a small pad, the sort of thing most cops carried in their back pocket. Four sheets of the smaller paper had been lined up to fit on one copied page. In all, there were eight pages that had been torn from the notepad. Will studied the positioning. He could see faint marks where the lined paper had been taped to a bigger sheet for copying. Instead of jagged edges at the top where the paper had been ripped from the spiral, there was a clean line as if someone had used scissors to cut them out. This he found strangest of all—not just because cops didn't tend to be neat, but because he had never in his career known a police officer to tear pages out of their notebook.

The arrest warrant was the last page in the pile, but this part of the process, at least, was computerized. All the spaces were printed in a typewriter font. The suspect's name was at the top, his address and home phone. Will found the lined box for Tommy's employer. He leaned over the form, squinting his eyes as he held his finger under the tiny letters. His mouth moved as he tried to sound out the word. Will was tired from the monotonous drive. The letters mixed around. He blinked, wishing there was more light in the room.

Sara Linton had been right about one thing. She had sat across from Will for a solid hour and not realized that he was dyslexic.

His phone rang, the noise startling him in the small space. He recognized Faith Mitchell's number. "Hey, partner."

"You were going to call me when you got there."

"Things have been busy," he said, which was sort of the truth. Will had always been bad with directions, and there were parts of Heartsdale between Main Street and the interstate that weren't on his GPS.

She asked, "How's it going?"

"I'm being treated with the utmost respect and care."

"I wouldn't drink anything unless it's in a sealed bottle."

"Good advice." He sat back in the chair. "How're you holding up?"

"I'm about to kill somebody or myself," she admitted. "They're going to do the C-section tomorrow afternoon." Faith was diabetic. Her doctors wanted to control the delivery so her health wasn't jeopardized. She started to give Will the details of the procedure, but he dazed out after she used the word "uterus" the second time. He studied his reflection in the two-way mirror, wondering if Mrs. Simms was right about his hair looking better now that he'd let it grow out.

Finally, Faith wound down her story. She asked, "What's this fax you sent me?"

"Did you get all twelve pages?"

He could hear her counting the sheets. "I've got seventeen total. All from the same number."

"Seventeen?" He scratched his jaw. "Are some of them duplicates?"

"Nope. Got a police report, xeroxed field notes—pages are cut out of the notebook, that's weird. You don't take pages out of your field book—and ..." He assumed she was reading Tommy Braham's confession. "Did you write this?"

"Very funny," Will said. He hadn't been able to make out the words when Sara had shown him the confession in the car, but even to Will, the looped, cartoonish shape of Tommy Braham's handwriting seemed off. "What do you think?"

"I think this reads like one of Jeremy's book reports when he was in first grade."

Jeremy was her teenage son. "Tommy Braham is nineteen."

"What is he, retarded?"

"You're supposed to call it 'intellectually disabled' now."

She made a snorting sound.

"Sara says his IQ was around eighty."

Faith sounded suspicious, but she had been prickly the last time about Sara inserting herself into their case. "How does Sara happen to know his IQ?"

"She used to treat him at her clinic."

"Did she apologize for dragging you below the gnat line on your vacation?"

"She doesn't know it's my vacation, but, yes, she apologized."

Faith was quiet for a moment. "How's she doing?"

He thought not of Sara, but of the scent she had left on his handkerchief. She didn't strike him as the type of woman who would wear perfume. Maybe it was one of those fancy soaps that women used to wash their faces.

"Will?"

He cleared his throat to cover for his silence. "She's okay. She was very upset, but mostly I think she has a good reason." He lowered his voice. "Something doesn't feel right about any of this."

"You think Tommy didn't kill the girl?"

"I don't know what I think yet."

Faith went quiet; never a good sign. He had been partnered with her for over a year, and just when Will thought he was learning to read her moods, she had gotten pregnant and the whole thing went out of whack. "All right," she said. "What else did Sara tell you?"

"Some stuff about the man who killed her husband." Will knew that Faith had already gone behind Sara's back to find out the details. She didn't know about Lena Adams's involvement, or the fact that Sara believed Lena was responsible for Tolliver's death. Will stood up and walked into the hall, making sure Knox wasn't there. Still, he kept his voice low as he relayed the story Sara had told him about her husband's murder. When he finished, Faith let out a long breath of air.

"Sounds like Sara has a hard-on for this Adams woman."

Will sat back down at the table. "That's one way to put it." He did not share the part of Sara's story that had stuck out the most. The entire time she spoke, she had not once uttered Jeffrey Tolliver's name. She had only referred to him as "my husband."

Faith offered, "I think priority number one is tracking down this Julie Smith. She either saw the murder or heard about it. Do you have her cell phone number?"

"I'll get it from Sara later."

"Later?"

Will ignored the question. Faith would want an explanation for why he was having dinner at Sara's house, and then she'd want a report on how it went. "Where does—did—Tommy Braham work?"

She shuffled through the pages. "Says here he was employed at the bowling alley. Maybe that's why he killed himself—to keep from having to spray Lysol in shoes all day."

Will didn't laugh at the joke. "They charged him with murder right off the bat. Not assault, not attempted murder, not resisting."

"Where did they get murder? Am I missing the autopsy report? Lab reports? Forensic filings?"

Will laid it out for her. "Brad Stephens is stabbed. He's airlifted to the hospital. The first thing Adams does is take Tommy Braham back to the station and get his confession for the Spooner girl's murder."

"She didn't go to the hospital with her partner?"

"I'm assuming the chief did. He's been a no-show."

"Did Braham have a lawyer present?" Faith answered her own question. "No lawyer would let him make this confession."

"A murder charge resonates more than assault. It could be political—get the town behind them so no one cares that a killer has killed himself." Will had told Sara the same thing. If Tommy Braham was Allison Spooner's murderer, then people would assume justice had already been served.

Faith said, "This confession is strange. He's got details out the wazoo until the murder. Then, it's taken care of in three lines. 'I got mad. I had a knife on me. I stabbed her once in the neck.' Not much of an explanation." She added, "And there would be a boatload of blood from something like this. Remember that case where the woman's throat was slit?"

Will cringed at the memory. Blood had sprayed everywhere—the walls, ceiling, floor. It was like walking into a paint booth. "Allison Spooner was stabbed in the back of the neck. Maybe that's different?"

"That brings up another good point. One stab wound doesn't sound mad. That sounds very controlled to me."

"Detective Adams was probably in a hurry to get back to the hospital. Maybe she was planning a follow-up interview. Maybe Chief Wallace was going to have a go at Tommy later."

"That's not how you do it. If a suspect is talking, especially confessing, you get every detail."

"They haven't shown much of an aptitude for policing so far. Sara thinks Adams is sloppy, that she plays it too loose. From what I'm seeing with the Spooner investigation, she's right about that."

"Is she pretty?"

For a moment, Will thought she was asking about Sara. "I haven't seen a picture yet, but the cop I spoke with said she was good-looking."

"Young girl, college aged. The press is going to be all over this, especially if she's pretty."

"Probably," he acknowledged. Yet another motive for putting Allison Spooner's murderer behind bars as quickly as possible. "The girl worked at the local diner. I gather a lot of the cops in the station knew her."

"That could explain why they made such a quick arrest."

"It could," he agreed. "But, if Sara is right and Tommy didn't kill the girl, then we've still got a murderer out there."

"When is the autopsy?"

"Tomorrow." Will didn't tell her that Sara had volunteered to do the procedure.

"It all seems very convenient," Faith pointed out. "Dead girl found in the morning, murderer arrested before noon, found dead in his cell before supertime."

"If Brad Stephens doesn't make it, they're probably not going to let Tommy Braham be buried in the city limits."

"When are you going to the hospital?"

"I hadn't planned on it."

"Will, a cop is in the hospital. If you're within a hundred miles, you go see him. You hang around and comfort his wife or his mother. You give blood. It's what cops do."

Will chewed his lip. He hated hospitals. He had never understood why it was necessary to hang around them unless you had to.

"Isn't Brad Stephens a potential witness, too?"

Will laughed. Unless Stephens was a Boy Scout, he doubted the man would help shed any light on what happened yesterday. "I'm sure he'll be as courteous as he is forthcoming."

"You still have to go through the motions." She paused before continuing. "And since I'm being a cop, let me state the obvious: Tommy killed himself for the same reason he ran when they confronted him in the garage. He was guilty."

"Or he wasn't, and he knew no one would believe him."

"You sound like a defense lawyer," Faith noted. "What about the rest of this stuff? It looks like the first few pages of a novel."

"What do you mean?"

"The handwritten notes from Spooner's crime scene. 'Found on the shore approximately thirty yards from the tide line and twelve feet from a large oak is a pair of white Nike Sport tennis shoes, sized women's eight. Inside the left, resting on the sole, which is blue with the word "Sport" emblazoned where the heel rests, is a yellow-gold ring....' I mean, come on. This isn't War and Peace. It's a field report."

"Did you get the suicide note?"

"I want it over." She had the same reaction as Will. "Not exactly the 'goodbye cruel world' you'd expect. And the paper is torn from a larger sheet. That's strange, right? You're going to write a suicide note and you tear it from another sheet of paper?"

"What else did you get? You said there were seventeen pages."

"Incident reports." She read aloud, "Police were called to Skatey's roller rink on Old Highway 5 at approximately twenty-one hundred hours ..." Her voice trailed off as she skimmed the words. "All right. Last week, Tommy got into a fight with a girl whose name they didn't bother to get. He wouldn't stop shouting. He was asked to leave. He refused. The police came and told him to leave. He left. No one arrested." Faith was quiet again. "The second report involves a barking dog at the residence from five days ago. The last one is about loud music. This was two days ago. There's a note on the last page where the cop who took the report makes a reminder to follow up with Tommy's father when he gets back in town."

"Who took the reports?"

"Same cop. Carl Phillips."

That name was more than familiar. "I was told Phillips was the booking officer on duty when all of this went down."

"That doesn't make sense. You don't put a street cop on booking."

"Either he's a really bad liar or they're afraid he's going to tell me the truth."

"So, find him and figure it out for yourself."

"I was told he's out camping with his wife and kids right now. No cell phone. No way to get in touch with him."

"What an amazing coincidence. His name's Carl Phillips?"

"Right." Will knew Faith was writing down the name. She hated when people tried to hide. He told her, "Their security cameras in the cells aren't recording, either."

"Did they tape the interview with Tommy?"

"If they did, I'm sure the film met with some kind of dropping accident involving electricity and water."

"Shit, Will. You numbered these pages yourself, right?"

"Yeah."

"One through twelve?"

"Right. What's going on?"

"Page number eleven is missing."

Will thumbed through his originals. They were all out of order.

She asked, "You're sure you numbered—"

"I know how to number pages, Faith." He muttered a curse as he saw that the eleventh page was missing from his copies, too.

"Why would someone take out a page and send the incident reports instead?"

"I'll have to see if Sara—"

He heard a noise behind him. A cough, maybe a sneeze. He guessed that Knox was standing in the viewing room listening to everything that was being said.

"Will?"

He stood up, stacking the pages together, putting them back in the file. "You still seeing your mom for Thanksgiving?"

She took her time answering, misinterpreting his meaning. "You know I'd ask you to come if—"

"Angie's planning a surprise for me. You know how she loves to cook." He walked into the hallway and stopped outside the storage room, where he rapped his knuckles on the door. "Thank you for your help, Officer Knox." The door didn't open, but Will heard feet shuffling on the other side. "I'll let myself out."

Faith didn't question him until he was in the squad room. "You clear?"

"Give me another minute."

"Angie loves to cook?" She gave a deep belly laugh. "When's the last time you saw the elusive Mrs. Trent?"

Seven months had passed since Angie had made an appearance, but that was none of Faith's business. "How's Betty doing?"

"I raised a child, Will. I think I can take care of your dog."

Will pushed open the glass front door and walked into the drizzle. His car was parked at the end of the lot. "Dogs are more sensitive than children."

"You've obviously never spent time around a sullen eleven-year-old."

He glanced over his shoulder. Knox, or at least a figure looking very much like Knox, was standing in the window. Will kept his gait slow, casual. He didn't speak again until he was safely inside the car. "There's something else going on with this girl's murder, Faith."

"What do you mean?"

"Call it gut instinct." Will looked back up at the station. One by one, the lights went off in the front of the building. "It's just convenient that the one person who could probably tell me the truth about what really happened is dead."

CHAPTER SIX

Lena held Brad's hand. His skin felt cool. The machines in the room beeped and blipped and hummed, yet none of them could tell the doctors how Brad was really doing. She'd heard a nurse use the phrase "touch and go" a few hours ago, but Brad looked the same to Lena. He smelled the same, too. Antiseptic, sweat, and that stupid Axe body wash he'd started using because of the TV commercials.

"You're going to be okay," she told him, hoping her words were true. Every bad thing she'd thought about Brad today was ringing in her head like a bell. He wasn't street smart. He wasn't cut out for the job. He didn't have the skills to be a detective. Was Lena to blame for Brad's injuries because she had kept her mouth shut? Should she have told Frank that Brad shouldn't be on the force? Frank knew this better than anybody. Every week for the last two years he'd muttered something about firing Brad. Ten minutes before Brad was stabbed, Frank was chewing him out.

But was it really Brad's fault? Lena could see this morning's events like a movie playing endlessly in her head. Brad ran down the street. He told Tommy to stop. Tommy stopped. He turned. The knife was in his hands. The knife was in Brad's stomach.

Lena rubbed her hands over her face. She should be congratulating herself for getting Tommy Braham to confess. Instead, she couldn't get past the feeling that she had missed something. She needed to talk to Tommy again, pull out more details about his movements before and after the murder. He was holding out on her, which wasn't unusual in murder cases. Tommy didn't want to admit that he was a bad person. That much had been evident the entire interview. He had skirted around the gory details, and Lena had let him because she wanted—needed—to get to Brad to see if he was okay. Lena wasn't so exhausted that she couldn't see that Tommy had more to say. She just needed some sleep before she went at him again. She had to make sure that her part of the case, at least the part she could control, was airtight.

The biggest problem was that Tommy was so damn hard to talk to. Less than a minute into his interrogation, Lena had figured out the kid wasn't right in the head. He wasn't just slow, he was stupid. Eager to fill in whatever blanks Lena left open so long as she gave him a map and directions. She had promised him he could go home if he confessed. She could still see the confused look on his face when she'd taken him back to the cells. He was probably sitting on his bunk right now wondering how on earth he had gotten himself into this mess.

Lena was wondering the same thing. All the pieces had come together so quickly this morning that she hadn't had time to consider whether they really fit or if she was just forcing them into place. The stab wound in Allison Spooner's neck. The suicide note. The 911 call. The knife.

The stupid knife.

Lena's phone vibrated in her pocket. She ignored it the same way she had ignored everything around her since she had gotten to the hospital. Two hours with Tommy at the station. Two hours driving to Macon. More hours spent standing vigil outside Brad's room. She had given blood. She'd drunk too much coffee. Delia Stephens, his mother, was getting some air now. She only trusted Lena to stay with her son.

Why? Lena was the last person on earth the woman should trust with her boy.

She got some tissue out of the box and wet the edge in the cup of water by the bed. Brad was on a ventilator, and some dried saliva was caked around his mouth. His lung had collapsed. His liver was damaged. There was lots of internal bleeding. They were worried about infection. They were worried he would not make it through the night.

She wiped his chin, surprised to feel stubble. Lena had always thought of Brad as a kid, but the hair on his face, the size of his hand that she held in hers, reminded her that he was a grown man. He knew the risks that came with being a cop. Brad had been on the scene when Jeffrey died, the first responding officer. He never talked about it, but Brad was different after that day. More grown up. The chief's death was a grim reminder that none of them was impervious to the bad guys they arrested.

Her phone vibrated again. Lena took it out of her pocket and scrolled through the numbers. She had called her uncle Hank in Florida to let him know she was okay in case he saw something on the news. Jared had called her as she was putting Tommy Braham in the back of the car. He was a cop. He'd heard about the stabbing on his radio. She had told him two words, "I'm okay," then hung up before she started crying.

All of the other incoming calls on her phone were from Frank. He had been trying to reach her for the last five hours. She hadn't seen him since he took off with Brad in the helicopter that had landed in the middle of the street. The look in his rheumy eyes had told a story she hadn't wanted to hear. And now he was worried that she was going to tell everyone what she knew.

He should be worried.

Her phone rang again as she held it in her hand, but Lena pressed the button until the device powered down. She didn't want to talk to Frank, didn't want to hear any more of his excuses. He knew what had gone wrong today. He knew that Brad's blood was on his hands just as much as it was on Lena's—maybe more so.

She should just quit. Her resignation letter was in her jacket pocket, had been for weeks. She had gotten Tommy's confession in record time. Let someone else get the details from him. Let another cop stare at Tommy Braham's slack-jawed face for another two hours trying to figure out what was going on in that tiny little brain of his. They could not fault Lena for her work. Jeffrey's ghost could not hold her here after what had happened today.

Delia Stephens came back into the room. She was a large woman, but she moved quietly around the bed, fluffing Brad's pillows, kissing his forehead. She stroked back her son's thinning blond hair. "He loves being a police officer."

Lena found her voice. "He's very good at it."

Delia had a sad smile on her face. "He always wanted to please you."

"He never failed to," she lied. "He's a good detective, Ms. Stephens. He's going to be back on the street in no time.”

Delia’s eyes clouded with worry. She rubbed Brad’s shoulder. “Maybe I can talk him into selling insurance with his uncle Sonny.”

“You’ll have plenty of time to persuade him,” Lena’s voice cracked. Her false optimism was fooling no one.

Delia stood up. She clasped her hands in front of her. “Thank you for watching him. I always feel safer when he’s with you.”

Lena felt dizzy again. The room was too small, too hot. “I’m just gonna go to the bathroom for a second.”

Delia smiled, her gratefulness so apparent that Lena felt like a knife was being twisted in her chest. “Take your time, sweetheart. You’ve had a long day.”

“I’ll be right back.”

Lena kept her head up as she walked down the hallway. There were a couple of Grant County patrolmen standing vigil outside the ICU waiting room. Inside, she could see local Macon cops milling around. Frank Wallace was nowhere to be seen. More than likely he was bellied up at a bar trying to drink the bad taste out of his mouth. It was probably best for her not to see him right now. If he’d been standing in the hallway, she would’ve called him out on his drinking, his lies—everything that she’d been ignoring for the past four years. No more. After today, Lena’s knee-jerk loyalty to the man was gone for good.

At least Gavin Wayne, the Macon chief of police, was there. He nodded as Lena walked by. A few weeks ago, he had talked to Lena about joining his force. She was picking up Jared from his shift because his truck was in the shop. Lena had liked Chief Wayne all right, but Macon was a huge, sprawling city. Wayne was more politician than policeman. He was nothing like Jeffrey, an obstacle that had seemed insurmountable when he’d mentioned a job.

Lena pushed open the door of the ladies’ room, glad to find it empty. She turned on the cold faucet. Water ran through her hands. She had washed them a thousand times but the blood—Brad’s blood as well as her own—was still stuck under her fingernails.

She had been shot in the hand. The bullet had taken a chunk of skin off the outside edge of her palm. Lena had doctored it herself, using the first aid kit at the station. Oddly, there hadn’t been much blood. Maybe the heat of the bullet had cauterized the wound. Still, it took three overlapping Band-Aids to cover it up. At first the pain was manageable, but now that the shock had worn off, her whole hand throbbed. She couldn’t have anyone at the hospital look at it. Gunshot wounds had to be reported. Lena would have to call in a favor for some antibiotics so she didn’t get an infection.

At least it was her left hand. She reached toward the faucet with her good hand and added hot water to the cold. Lena felt filthy. She wet a paper towel, added some soap from the dispenser, and washed under her arms. She kept going, giving herself a whore’s bath at the sink. How long had she been up? Brad’s call about the body in the lake came around three this morning. The last time she’d checked a clock, it was coming up on ten in the evening. No wonder she was punch-drunk from exhaustion.

“Lee?” Jared Long stood in the doorway. He was dressed in his motorcycle patrol uniform. His boots were scuffed. His hair was a mess. Lena’s heart jumped at the sight of him.

The words rushed from her mouth. "You shouldn't be here."

"My squad came over to donate blood." He let the door close behind him. It felt like forever as he crossed the room and took her into his arms. Her head rested on his shoulder. She fit into him like a puzzle being solved. "I'm so sorry, baby."

She wanted to cry, but nothing was left inside.

"I nearly died when I heard one of you got hurt."

"I'm okay."

He took her hand in his, saw the Band-Aids she had used to cover her wound. "What happened?"

She pressed her face against his chest again. She could hear his heart beating. "It was bad."

"I know, baby."

"No," she said. "You don't know." Lena pulled back, still letting him hold her. She wanted to tell him what had really happened—not what the reports would say, not what the newspapers would be told. She wanted to confess her complicity, to unburden her soul.

But when she looked into his deep brown eyes, words failed.

Jared was ten years younger than she was. She thought of him as pure and perfect. He didn't have crow's feet or lines around his mouth. The only scar on his body came from a bad tackle during a high school football game. His parents were still happily married. His younger sister worshipped him. He was the exact opposite of Lena's type. The exact opposite of any man she had ever been with.

She loved him so much that it frightened her.

He said, "Tell me what happened."

She settled on half of the truth. "Frank was drunk. I didn't realize how much until ..." She shook her head. "Maybe I just haven't been paying attention. He's been drinking a lot lately. He can usually handle it, but ..."

"But?"

"I'm through," Lena told him. "I'm going to resign. I've got some vacation time coming. I just need to get my head clear."

"You can move in with me until you figure out what to do."

"I'm serious this time. I'm really quitting."

"I know you are, and I'm glad." Jared put his hands on her shoulders so he could look at her. "But, right now, I just wanna take care of you. You've had a hard day. Let me be there for you."

She relented easily. The thought of handing over the next few hours of her life to Jared seemed like the best gift in the world. "You go first. I'll check in on Brad and then follow you in my car."

He tilted up her chin and kissed her mouth. "I love you."

"I love you, too."

He reached for the door just as it opened. Frank stood stock-still, staring at Jared as if he'd seen a ghost.

"Jesus Christ," he whispered. She could smell the whisky on him from five feet away.

"Go," Lena told Jared. "I'll meet you back at the house."

Jared wasn't so easily directed. He stood his ground, glaring at Frank.

"Please go," she begged him. "Jared. Please."

He finally moved his gaze from Frank to Lena. "You sure you're okay?"

"I'm fine," she told him. "Just go."

Reluctantly, he left. Frank stared after him so long that Lena had to close the door before he would look away.

"What the hell are you doing?" Frank demanded. He had to keep his hand on the wall to steady himself. "How old is he?"

"It's none of your damn business." Still, she told him, "He's twenty-five."

"He looks ten," Frank countered. "How long have you been seeing him?"

Lena wasn't in the mood to answer questions. "What are you doing here, Frank? You can barely stand up straight."

He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

"Did you drive here? Don't answer that." She didn't want to think about how many lives he had risked climbing behind the wheel.

"Is the kid okay?"

He meant Brad. "They don't know. He's stable for now. Have you had anything to drink today that didn't have alcohol in it?"

Frank's footing was off. He didn't go to the sink so much as fall into it.

Lena turned on the water for him. She had a flash of her childhood, her uncle Hank so drunk that he'd pissed himself. She tried to separate her emotions, to distance herself from the anger she was feeling. It didn't work. "You smell like a bar."

"I keep thinking about what happened."

"Which part?" she asked, leaning down so that her face was close to his. "The part where we didn't identify ourselves as cops or the part where we nearly shot a boy for holding up a letter opener?"

Frank gave her a panicked look.

"You didn't think I'd find out about that?"

"It was a hunting knife."

"It was a letter opener," she insisted. "Tommy told me, Frank. It was a gift from his grandfather. It was a letter opener. It looked like a knife, but it wasn't."

Frank spit into the sink. Lena's stomach roiled at the dark brown color of his phlegm. "It doesn't matter. He stabbed Brad with it. That makes it a weapon."

"What did he cut you with?" Lena asked. Frank had been writhing on the floor of the garage, clutching his left arm. "You were bleeding. I saw it. That's what set this whole thing in motion. I told Brad he cut you."

"He did."

"Not with a letter opener, and I didn't find anything else on him except a toy car and some chewing gum."

Frank glanced at himself in the mirror. Lena stared at his reflection. He looked like he was two steps from falling into the grave.

She peeled off the Band-Aids on the side of her hand. The wound was red and raw. "Your shot went wild. Did you even realize I was hit?"

His throat worked as he swallowed. He probably wanted a drink. By the looks of him, he needed it.

"What happened, Frank? You had your gun out. Tommy came for you. You pulled the trigger and shot me. How did you get cut on the arm? How did a hundred-thirty-pound wimp of a kid get past you with a goddamn letter opener?"

"I told you that he cut me with the knife. He was wrong about the letter opener."

"You know, for a cop, you're a shitty liar."

Frank braced himself on the sink. He could barely stand. "Tommy doesn't mention a letter opener in his confession."

Lena's voice was more like a snarl. "Because I've got about two drips of loyalty left for you, old man, and they've been circling the drain all damn day. Tell me what happened in that garage."

"I don't know. I don't remember."

"How did Tommy get past you? Did you black out? Did you fall?"

"It doesn't matter. He ran. That's the point. Everything that happened after that is on him."

"We didn't identify ourselves in the garage. We were just three people pointing guns at his head."

He glared at her. "I'm glad to hear you admitting you did something wrong today, princess."

Lena felt overwhelmed with fury, ready to do any kind of damage she could. "When Brad shouted 'Police,' Tommy stopped. He turned around. He had the letter opener in his hand. Brad ran into it. Tommy didn't mean to stab him. I'll tell that to anyone who asks me."

"He killed that girl in cold blood. You telling me you don't care about that?"

"Of course I care about that," she snapped. "Jesus, Frank, I'm not saying he didn't do it. I'm saying the minute Tommy gets a lawyer, you're screwed."

"I didn't do anything wrong."

"Let's hope the judge agrees with you, otherwise he'll invalidate the arrest, the confession, everything that came out of finding Tommy in that garage. That kid's gonna get away with murder because you can't stand up straight without a bottle of whisky in you." She put her face inches from his. "Is that how you want to be remembered, Frank? As the cop who let a killer get away because he couldn't stay off the booze while he was on the job?"

Frank turned on the faucet again. He splashed water on his face, the back of his neck. She saw his hands were shaking again. His knuckles were busted up. There were deep scratch marks on his wrist. How hard had Frank hit Tommy that the boy's teeth had managed to break through Frank's leather gloves?

She said, "It's your fault this went bad. Tommy got past you. I don't know what you were doing rolling on the floor, how your arm got cut, but I do know if you had done your job and stopped him at the door—"

"Shut up, Lena."

"Screw you."

"I'm still your boss."

"Not anymore, you drunk, worthless bastard." She reached into her pocket and pulled out her resignation. When he didn't take it, she threw it in his face. "I'm done with you."

He didn't pick up the letter. He didn't shoot back a stream of obscenities. Instead, he asked, "Which pen did you use?"

"What?"

"Your pen that Jeffrey gave you. Is that the one you used?"

"Are you trying to guilt me into staying? You're going to tread on Jeffrey's memory so I'll stick around to help you clean up this mess?"

"Where's your pen?" When she didn't volunteer it, he started searching her coat, patting her pockets. She resisted, and he slapped her around, throwing her against the wall.

"Get away from me!" She shoved him back into the sink. "What the hell is wrong with you?"

He looked her in the eye for the first time since he'd walked into the room. "Tommy killed himself in the cells."

Lena put her hand to her mouth.

"He cut his wrists open with an ink cartridge. The metal kind that you use in good pens. Good pens like the ones Jeffrey gave us."

Lena's hands wouldn't work for a few seconds. She found the pen where she always kept it—inside the spiral of the notebook in her back pocket. She twisted the barrel. The ballpoint didn't come out. "Shit," Lena hissed, unscrewing the cap. "No ... no ..." The pen was empty. "How did he get ..." She felt sick with grief. Her stomach clenched. "What did he ..."

Frank asked, "Did you frisk him before you put him in the cells?"

"Of course I—" Had she? Had Lena taken the time to pat him down or just thrown him into a cell as fast as she could so she could get to the hospital?

"It's a good thing he didn't attack anybody while he was back there. He already killed one person and stabbed a cop."

She couldn't stand anymore. Her knees gave out. She sank to the floor. "He's really dead? Are you sure?"

"He bled out."

Lena put her head in her hands. "Why?"

"What did you say to him?"

"I didn't ..." She shook her head, trying to clear out the image of Tommy Braham lying dead. He had been upset when she'd locked him up, but suicidal? She didn't think so. Even as rushed as she was to get to the hospital, Lena would have said something to the booking officer if she thought Tommy needed to be watched. "Why did he do it?"

"Must've been something you said."

She looked up at Frank. He was paying her back now. She could tell it by the petty look in his eyes.

He added, "At least that's what Sara Linton thinks."

"What does Sara have to do with this?"

"I called her because Tommy, your prisoner, wouldn't calm down. I thought she could give him something to help. She was there when I found him."

Lena knew she should be worried about her own hide, but all she could think about was Tommy Braham. What had gotten into him? What had pushed that stupid kid over the edge?

"She's got some bigwig from the GBI down here to look into the case. Knox has already dealt with him. He's figured out Tommy got the pen from one of us."

Lena tasted something awful in the back of her throat. Tommy was her prisoner. He was in her care. Legally, he was her responsibility. "Do they know the cartridge came from me?"

Frank dug around in his coat pocket. He tossed Lena a cardboard packet. She recognized the Cross logo. A new ink cartridge was wrapped in a plastic shell.

She asked, "Did you just buy this?"

"I'm not that stupid," he told her. "I buy them online. You can't get the cartridges local."

Everyone else did, too. It was a pain in the butt, but the gift meant a lot, especially now that Jeffrey was gone. Lena had a stack of ten cartridges in a box back home.

Frank said, "We're both in trouble on this."

Lena didn't respond. She was running through her time with Tommy, trying to figure out when he'd decided to take his own life. Had he said anything to her before she locked the cell door? Lena didn't think so. Maybe that was one of the many clues she had missed. Tommy had calmed down too quickly after she'd left the room to get him some tissues. She had taken him back to the cells shortly after. He'd been sniffing, but he'd kept his mouth shut, even as she shut the heavy metal door. They always said the quiet ones were the ones who had made up their minds. How had she missed that? How had she not noticed?

Frank said, "We need to stick together, get our stories straight."

She shook her head. How did she get into this mess? Why was it that the minute she crawled out of one pile of shit, she fell back into another one?

"Sara's out for blood. Your blood. She thinks she's finally found a way to punish you for what you did to Jeffrey."

Lena's head shot up. "I didn't do anything."

"We both know different from that, don't we?"

His words cut straight through her. "You're a bastard. You know that?"

"Yeah, well, back at you."

Lena felt her hand stinging. She was gripping the plastic packet hard enough to cut into her skin. She tried to pry it open, but her nails were too short. She ended up biting the cardboard with her teeth and ripping it away from the plastic.

Frank asked, "How solid is that confession?"

She jammed the new cartridge into her pen. "Tommy admitted to everything. He put it on paper."

"You better shout that to whoever listens or his daddy's gonna sue you for everything you have."

She snorted. "A fifteen-year-old Celica and an eighty-thousand-dollar mortgage on a sixty-thousand-dollar house? He can have the keys right now."

"You'll lose your badge."

"Maybe I should." She gave up on the pen. She gave up on everything. Four years ago, Lena would have been scrambling for a way to cover this up. Now, all she wanted to do was tell the truth and move on. "This doesn't change anything, Frank. Tommy was my responsibility. I'll take the consequences. But you'll have to take yours, too."

"It doesn't have to be like that."

She looked up at him, wondering at the sudden shift. "What do you mean?"

"Tommy killed that girl. You think anybody's gonna care about some little retard murderer slitting his wrists in a jail cell?" Frank wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "He killed that girl, Lee. He stabbed her through the neck like he was taking down an animal. All because she wouldn't let him get his pecker off."

Lena closed her eyes. She was so damn tired that she couldn't think. But she knew Frank was right. No one would care about Tommy's death. But that didn't mean it was okay. That didn't change what happened in the garage today, or fix the damage that had been done to Brad.

She told him, "Your drinking is out of hand. I didn't say anything about Brad being unfit. Maybe he'll be okay or maybe my silence will end up meaning the death of him. I don't know. I'm not gonna watch the same thing happen to you. You're not fit for duty, Frank. You shouldn't be behind the wheel of a car, let alone carrying a gun."

Frank knelt down in front of her. "There's a hell of a lot more you could lose than just your shield, Lena. Think about that."

"There's nothing to think about. I've made up my mind."

"I could always put in a word with Gavin Wayne about your little boyfriend."

"Be sure to brush the whisky off your breath before you do."

"We both know the kind of trouble I could make."

"Jared will know I made a mistake," Lena said. "And he'll know I stood up to take the consequences."

"When did you turn so noble?"

She didn't answer, but the thought of Tommy Braham sitting in those cells, scraping away at his wrists with Lena's ink pen, made her feel like the least noble person on the planet. How had she managed to fuck up so much in so little time?

Frank pressed, "Does your little boyfriend really know you, Lena? I mean, really know you?" His lips curled up in a smile. "Think about all the things you've told me over the years. All those squad cars we sat in together. All those late nights and early mornings after Jeffrey died." He showed his yellow teeth. "You're a dirty cop, Lee. You think your boyfriend's gonna forgive that?"

"I'm not dirty." She had stepped right up to the line many times, but Lena had never crossed it. "I'm a good cop, and you know it."

"You sure about that?" He sneered at her. "Brad got stabbed while you were standing with your thumb up your ass. You talked a nineteen-year-old retard into killing himself. I got a witness in the next cell who will say anything I tell him to as long as I let him go back to his wife."

Lena felt her heart stop in her chest.

"You think I'm just gonna walk away from my pension, lay down my gun and my shield, because you've developed a conscience?" He spat out a laugh. "Trust me, girl, you don't want me to start telling people what I know about you, because by the time I shut up, you'll be lucky if you don't find yourself sitting on the wrong side of a jail door."

"You wouldn't do that to me."

"You strut around town like you're some hot piece of shit wearing your bad reputation on your sleeve. Wasn't that what Jeffrey was always warning you about? Too many burned bridges. Too many people in town with knives in their backs."

"Shut up, Frank."

"The thing about having a bad reputation is that folks will believe just about anything people say about you." He sat back on his heels. "The chief could've gotten away with murder because no one thought he was capable of doing anything bad. You think people feel that way about you? You think they trust your character?"

"You can't prove anything and you know it."

"Do I need to?" He smiled again, his lips peeling back from his teeth. "I've lived in this town all my life. People know me. They trust me—trust what I tell them. And if I say you're a dirty cop ..." He shrugged.

Lena's chest was so tight she could barely breathe.

"Maybe I'll ask ol' Jared out for a beer," Frank continued. "I bet Sara Linton wouldn't mind tagging along, either. What do you think of that? The two of them together having a nice chat about you?" Lena stared her hate into him. Frank's rheumy eyes glared back. "Don't forget what a son of a bitch I am, girlie. And don't for a minute think I won't throw your worthless ass under the bus to save mine."

She knew he was serious. She knew the threat was as real and as dangerous as a ticking bomb.

Frank took out his flask. He carefully unscrewed the top and took a long drink.

Lena's voice was barely above a whisper. "What do you want me to do?"

Frank smiled in a way that made her feel like she was something he'd just scraped off his shoe. "Just stick to the truth. Tommy confessed to killing Allison. He stabbed Brad. Nothing else matters." Frank shrugged again. "You play by my rules until we're clear of this, and maybe I'll let you go over to Macon and be with your little boyfriend."

"What else?" she asked. There was always something else.

He pulled a plastic evidence bag out of his pocket. Now that it was close up, Lena wondered how she'd ever thought it was real—the thick, dull blade, the fake leather handle. The letter opener.

He tossed the bag onto her lap. "Get rid of it."

CHAPTER SEVEN

Sara sat at the dining room table thumbing through a magazine while her sister and mother played cards. Her cousin Hareton had joined them half an hour ago, dropping by without a phone call as usual. Hare was two years older than Sara. They had always competed in everything, which was why he had made her go out into the pouring rain to look at his brand-new BMW 750Li. How he could afford such a luxurious car on a rural doctor's salary was beyond her, but Sara had made the appropriate noises because she didn't have the strength to do otherwise.

She loved her cousin, but sometimes it seemed as if his goal in life was to get on her nerves. He made fun of her height. He called her "Red" just to annoy her. The worst part was that everyone thought he was charming. Even her own mother thought he walked on water—a particularly sore point considering Cathy did not extend this rose-colored view to her own children. The biggest problem Sara had with Hare was that he never came across a situation he couldn't make light of, which could be a heavy burden to those around him.

Sara finished her magazine and started over from the beginning, wondering why none of the pages looked familiar. She was too distracted to read and too smart to try to have a conversation with anyone at the table. Especially Hare, who seemed determined to catch her eye.

Finally, she asked, "What?"

He slapped a card down on the table. "How's the weather up there, Red?"

Sara gave him the same look she'd given him thirty years ago when he'd first asked her that question. "Balmy."

He put down another card. Tessa and Cathy groaned. "You're on vacation, Red. What's the problem?"

Sara closed the magazine, fighting the desire to tell him that she was sorry she wasn't more upbeat, but that she couldn't quite get the image out of her mind of Tommy Braham lying dead on the jailhouse floor. A quick glance at her mother told Sara that Cathy knew exactly what she was thinking.

"I'm expecting someone," she finally confessed. "Will Trent. He's an agent with the GBI."

Cathy's eyes narrowed. "What's a GBI agent doing here?"

"He's investigating the murder at the lake."

"And the death at the police station." Cathy spoke pointedly. "Why is he coming to the house?"

"He missed supper. I thought you could—"

"Am I responsible for feeding strangers now?"

Tessa, as usual, didn't help matters. "You're gonna be responsible for putting him up for the night, too." She told Sara, "The hotel's closed for remodeling. Unless he wants to drive forty-five minutes into Cooperstown, you'd better go straighten up the apartment over the garage."

Sara held back the curse that came to her lips. Hare was leaning forward, chin resting in his hands, as if he was watching a movie.

Cathy shuffled through the cards again. The noise was made louder by the tension. "How does this man know you?"

"Police officers are always at the hospital." Not technically a lie, but close enough.

"What's going on here, Sara?"

She shrugged, the gesture feeling so fake that she had trouble letting her shoulders drop back down. "It's complicated."

"Complicated?" Cathy echoed. "That sure did happen fast." She slapped the cards down on the table as she stood up. "I guess I'll go tell your father to put some pants on."

Tessa waited until their mother had left. "You might as well tell her, Sissy. She'll get it out of you somehow."

"It's none of her business."

Tessa gave a shocked bark of laughter. Everything was their mother's business.

Hare picked up the cards. "Come on, Red. Aren't you taking this a little too seriously? This is probably the most exciting thing that's happened to Brad Stephens in his entire life. The guy still lives with his mother."

"That's not funny, Hare. Two people are dead."

"A retard and a college student. The town mourns."

Sara bit her tongue so that she wouldn't cut him in two.

Hare sighed as he shuffled the cards between his hands. "All right. The thing about the girl in the lake was a cheap shot, but Tommy's fair game. People don't just up and kill themselves for no reason. He felt guilty for killing the girl. That's why he stabbed Brad. End of story."

"You sound like a cop."

"Well ..." He put his hand to his chest. "You know I did dress up as one for Halloween." He turned to Tessa. "Remember the thong?"

"That was my birthday party, not Halloween," Tessa reminded him. She asked Sara, "Why did you go to the jail in the first place?"

"Tommy needed ..." She didn't bother to finish the sentence. "I don't know why I went down there." She stood from the table. "I'm sorry. All right? I'm sorry I went to the station. I'm sorry for bringing this home. I'm sorry Mama's mad at me. I'm sorry I came here in the first place."

Tessa began, "Sissy—" but Sara left before she could say more.

Tears filled her eyes for the umpteenth time that day as she went down the hall and stood at the front door. She should go upstairs and talk to her mother. At the very least, Sara could try to come up with an explanation that would stop Cathy from worrying. Of course, Cathy would see right through any explanation Sara could come up with, because they both knew the truth: Sara was trying to get Lena in trouble. Her mother would take no joy in telling Sara that she might as well go outside and howl at the rain. She would be right—at least partially. Lena was good at lying, cheating, and doing whatever else it took to keep herself out of trouble. Sara was no match for the woman because she lacked the basic deviousness with which Lena approached every situation in her life.

And what about the dead girl? Sara was as bad as Hare. She had completely ignored Allison Spooner, treating her death as yet another springboard for attacking Lena. People around town who knew Allison were starting to talk. Tessa had been on the phone most of the afternoon and had the whole story for Sara by the time she got back from downtown. Allison was petite and cheery, the sort of girl with good country manners and a bright smile for strangers. She had worked at the diner during lunch and over the weekends. She must have a family somewhere, a mother and father who had just gotten the worst news a parent could ever hear. Surely they were on their way to Grant County right now, heavy hearts sinking further with every mile.

There were footsteps on the stairs behind her—Cathy, judging by the light tread. Sara heard her mother pause on the landing, then head toward the kitchen.

Sara let out a breath of air she hadn't realized she'd been holding.

"Sweetpea?" Eddie called from upstairs. He was listening to his old records, something he did when he was feeling melancholy.

"I'm all right, Daddy." She waited for the squeaking floorboards to signal he was going back to his room. They took an awful long time.

She closed her eyes again. Her father put on some Bruce Springsteen, the needle skipping on the vinyl record as he found the right place. She could hear her mother moving around the kitchen. Plates and pans banged. Hare said something that must have been funny, because Tessa's laugh rang through the house.

Sara stared out at the street, rubbing her arms to fight the chill that had come over her. This was silly, she knew, to stand at the door waiting for a man who might not even come. As much as Sara did not want to admit it, she wanted more than information from Will. He was from her Atlanta life. He was a reminder that there was something else waiting for her.

And thank God he was finally here.

For the second time that day, Sara watched Will hide the various electronics in his Porsche. It seemed to take longer this time, or maybe she was more impatient. Finally, he got out of the car. He held the file she had given him over his head to shield himself from the rain as he ran up the driveway.

She started to open the door, then reconsidered. She didn't want him to think she'd been standing here waiting for him. Then again, if she was trying to be covert, she probably shouldn't have been staring at him through the window.

"Idiot," she muttered, opening the door.

"Hi." He shook the rain out of his hair, taking advantage of the cover of the front porch.

"You want me to—" She reached for the wet file in his hand. Sara suppressed a groan of disappointment. It was soaked through. Everything would be ruined.

"Here," he said, lifting his sweater, untucking his undershirt. Sara saw the pages she'd given him pressed against his bare skin. She also saw what looked like a dark bruise fanning across his abdomen, disappearing into the waist of his jeans.

"What—"

He quickly pulled down his shirt. "Thanks." He scratched his face, a nervous habit she had forgotten about. "I think we can just throw the folder away."

She nodded, not knowing what to say. Will seemed at a loss for words, too. They stared at each other until the hall light snapped on.

Cathy stood in the kitchen doorway with her hands on her hips. Eddie came down the stairs. There was a brief moment of the most uncomfortable silence Sara had ever experienced in her life. She felt for the first time what a monumental mess she had made of the day. If she could've clicked her heels and gone back to the beginning, she would still be in Atlanta and her family would have been spared this awful situation. She wanted to melt into the floor.

The silence broke with her father. He held out his hand to Will. "Eddie Linton. Glad we can give you respite from this rain."

"Will Trent." Will gave him a firm handshake.

"I'm Cathy," her mother chimed in, patting Will on the arm. "Goodness, you're soaked through. Eddie, why don't you see if you can find him something dry?" For some reason, her father chuckled to himself as he ran up the stairs. Cathy told Will, "Let's get this sweater off before you catch a chill."

Will looked as uncomfortable as any man would look if an overly polite sixty-three-year-old woman told him to undress in her foyer. Still, he complied, lifting his sweater over his head. He was wearing a long-sleeved black T-shirt underneath. It started to ride up when he lifted his arms and Sara reached out without thinking, holding down the shirt.

Cathy gave her a sharp look that made Sara feel like she'd been caught stealing.

"Mama," Sara began, feeling a cold sweat coming on. "I really need to talk to you."

"We'll have plenty of time later, sweetheart." Cathy looped her hand through Will's arm as she led him down the hall. "You're from Atlanta, my daughter tells me?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"What part? I have a sister who lives in Buckhead."

"Uh ..." He glanced back at Sara. "Poncey-Highlands, it's near—"

"I know exactly where that is. You must live close to Sara."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Mother—"

"Later, honey." Cathy shot her a cat's smile as she took Will into the dining room. "This is Tessa, my youngest. Hareton Earnshaw is my brother's boy."

Hare gave him a look of open appraisal. "My, you're a tall drink of water."

"Just ignore him," Tessa advised as she shook Will's hand. "Nice to meet you."

Will started to sit in the closest chair, and Sara felt her heart drop in panic. Jeffrey's place.

Cathy was not completely devoid of a soul. "Let's put you at the head of the table," she suggested, tugging Will gently in the right direction. "I'll be right back with your dinner."

Sara sank down beside Will. She put her hand on his arm. "I am so sorry."

He feigned surprise. "About what?"

"Thank you for pretending, but we don't have much time before—" Sara jerked her hand away. Her mother was already back with a plate of food.

"I hope you like fried chicken."

"Yes, ma'am." Will stared down at the full plate. There was enough food for half the town.

"Sweet tea?" Cathy asked. Sara started to stand, but her mother nodded toward Tessa to fetch a glass. "Tell me how you know my daughter."

Will held up his finger for a minute so that he could swallow a mouthful of butterbeans. "I met Dr. Linton at the hospital."

Sara could have kissed him for his odd adherence to formality. She explained, "Mama, Agent Trent's partner was a patient of mine."

"Is that right?"

Will nodded, taking a healthy bite of fried chicken. Sara couldn't tell if he was hungry or just desperate to have a reason not to speak. She chanced a look at Hare. For once in his miserable life, he was choosing to be silent.

"Is your wife in law enforcement, too?"

Will stopped chewing.

"I noticed your ring."

He looked down at his hand. Cathy kept him trained in her sights. He chewed some more. Finally, he answered, "She's a private investigator."

"That must give you two a lot to talk about. Did you meet during the course of one of your investigations?"

He wiped his mouth. "This food is very good." Tessa put a glass of tea down in front of him. Will took a long drink, and Sara wondered if he was wishing there was something stronger in the glass.

Cathy kept up her subtle pressure. "I wish my daughters had been interested in cooking, but neither one of them took to it." She paused for a breath. "Tell me, Mr. Trent, where are your people from?"

Sara fought the urge to drop her head into her hands. "Mama, really. It's none of our—"

"That's all right." Will wiped his mouth with his napkin. He told Cathy, "I was raised in state care."

"Bless your heart."

Will didn't seem to know how to answer her. He took another long drink of tea.

Cathy continued, "Mr. Trent, my youngest daughter reminded me that the hotel is closed for renovations. I hope you'll accept the offer of my home while you're here?"

Will choked on his tea.

"There's an apartment over the garage. I'm sorry to say it's not much, but I wouldn't feel right making you drive all the way over to Cooperstown in this weather."

Will wiped the tea off his face. He looked to Sara for help.

She shook her head, helpless to stop the onslaught of her mother's southern hospitality.

The Linton home renovation had not extended to the laundry room. Sara had to go down the stairs into the unfinished part of the basement to get some clean towels for Will. The dryer was still running when she turned on the lights. She checked the towels. They were damp.

Sara turned the dryer back on. She started up the stairs, but stopped halfway and sat down. She had been acting pretty dimwitted throughout most of the day, but she wasn't crazy enough to offer herself up to her mother right now.

She rested her chin in her hand. Her cheeks had been beet red from the moment Cathy welcomed Will Trent into the house.

"Sis?" Tessa whispered from the top of the stairs.

"Quiet," Sara admonished. The last thing she needed was more of her mother's attention.

Tessa gently pulled the door to. She held one hand under her stomach and grabbed the railing with the other as she descended the stairs. "You all right?"

Sara nodded, helping Tessa sit on the stair above her.

"I can't believe they didn't move the laundry room upstairs."

"Her sanctuary?"

They both laughed. As teenagers, Tessa and Sara had studiously avoided the laundry room for fear of being ordered to help out. They'd both thought they were so clever until they realized their mother was actually enjoying the lack of company.

Sara placed her hand on her sister's stomach. "Hey, what's this?"

Tessa grinned. "I think it's a baby."

Sara spanned both of her hands across the width. "You're enormous."

"I love it," Tessa whispered. "You wouldn't believe all the shit I've been eating."

"You must be feeling it kick all the time now."

"She's going to be a soccer player."

"She?" Sara raised an eyebrow.

"I'm just guessing. Lem wants to be surprised."

"We could go to the clinic tomorrow." Elliot Felteau had bought Sara's practice, but she still owned the building. "I can just pretend I'm doing something landlord-y over by the ultrasound machine."

"I want to be surprised, too. Besides, I think you have enough on your plate right now."

Sara rolled her eyes. "Mother."

Tessa chuckled. "My God, that was epic. What a shakedown!"

"I can't believe how awful she was."

"You kind of sprung him on her."

"I thought ..." Sara shook her head. What had she been thinking? "Hare wasn't any help."

"He's taking this harder than you think."

"I doubt that."

"Tommy used to cut his grass, too." Tessa shrugged. "You know how Hare is. He's been through a lot."

Hare had lost many friends as well as his longtime lover to AIDS, but Sara thought she was the only person in her family who remembered that his casual attitude had predated the epidemic. "I hope he didn't embarrass Will."

"Will took care of himself just fine."

Sara shook her head as she thought about the mess she had made. "I'm sorry, Tess. I didn't mean to bring all of this to your doorstep."

"What's 'all this'?"

She thought about the question. "A vendetta," she admitted. "I think I've finally found a way to get Lena."

"Oh, honey, will it make a difference?"

Sara felt tears in her eyes. She didn't fight them this time. Tessa had seen her in much worse shape before. "I don't know. I just want ..." She paused for breath. "I want her to be sorry for what she did."

"Don't you think she's sorry?" Tessa tread carefully. "As awful as she is, she loved Jeffrey. She worshipped him."

"No. She's not sorry. She won't even accept that she's the reason Jeffrey died."

"You can't really think that she knew that bastard boyfriend of hers was going to kill Jeffrey."

"It's not what she wanted to happen," Sara admitted. "But it's what she let happen. Jeffrey would've never even known that the man existed but for Lena. She put him in our life. If someone throws a grenade, you don't say they're innocent because they never considered that it'd actually blow up."

"Let's not talk about her anymore." Tessa wrapped her arm around Sara's shoulder. "All that matters is that Jeffrey loved you."

Sara could only nod. This was the one truth in her life. She had known without a doubt that Jeffrey had loved her.

Tessa surprised her. "Will's nice."

Sara's laugh didn't sound very convincing, even to her own ears. "Tess, he's married."

"He was looking at you all googly-eyed at the table."

"That was fear you saw."

"I think he likes you."

"I think your hormones are making you see things."

Tessa leaned back on the stairs. "Just prepare yourself for the first time being awful." Sara's look must've given her away. Tessa's mouth dropped. "Oh, my God. Have you already slept with somebody?"

"Shh," Sara hissed. "Keep your voice down."

Tessa leaned forward. "Why am I trekking all the way to the only pay phone in Oobie Doobie to call you if you're not gonna tell me about your sex life?"

Sara waved her away. "There's nothing to tell. You're right. It was awful. It was too soon and he never called me again."

"What about now? Are you seeing anybody?"

Sara thought of the epidemiologist from the CDC. The fact that this was the first time all week that she'd really considered the man said it all. "Not really. I've been on a few dates, but ... What's the point?" Sara threw up her hands. "I'm never going to connect with anyone like that again. Jeffrey ruined me for everybody else."

"You'll never know if you don't try," Tessa countered. "Don't deny yourself, Sara. Jeffrey wouldn't want that."

"Jeffrey wouldn't want me to ever touch another man ever again and you know it."

"You're probably right." Still, she said, "I think Will could be good for you."

Sara shook her head, wishing Tessa would drop the subject. Even if Will was available—even if by some miracle he was interested—Sara would never date another cop again. She couldn't have a man leave her bed every morning not knowing whether or not he would come back in one piece that night. "I told you. He's married."

"Now, there's married and there's married." Tessa had dabbled in more than her share of trysts before settling down. She'd practically had a revolving door to her bedroom. "Where'd he get that scar on his lip?"

"I have no idea."

"Makes you want to kiss his mouth."

"Tess."

"Did you know about him growing up in a home?"

"I thought you were in the kitchen when he talked about that."

"I had my ear pressed to the door," she explained. "He eats like the kids at the orphanage."

"What do you mean?"

"The way he sort of wraps his arm around his plate so no one can steal his food."

Sara hadn't noticed, but now she realized it was true.

"I can't imagine growing up without parents. I mean—" She laughed. "After tonight, it seems ideal, but it must've been hard for him."

"Probably."

"Ask him about it."

"That would be rude."

"Don't you want to know more about him?"

"No," Sara lied, because of course she did. She wanted to know about the scars. She wanted to know how he had entered the system as an infant and never been adopted. She wanted to know how he could stand in a room full of people and still seem completely alone.

"The kids in my orphanage are so happy," Tessa said. "They miss their parents—there's no question about that. But, they get to go to school. They get three meals a day, clean clothes. They don't have to work. The other kids who still have parents are jealous." She smoothed out her skirt. "Why don't you ask Will what it was like for him?"

"It's none of my business."

"Give Mama another go at him and you'll find out everything." Tessa pointed her finger at Sara's chest. "You have to admit she was at the top of her game tonight."

"I don't have to admit anything."

Tessa affected their mother's soft accent. "Tell me, Mr. Trent, do you prefer boxers or briefs?" Sara laughed, and Tessa continued, "Was your first sexual experience from a missionary position or more of a canine nature?"

Sara laughed so hard that her stomach ached. She wiped her eyes, thinking this was the first time she was actually happy to be home. "I've missed you, Tess."

"I've missed you, too, Sissy." Tessa struggled to stand. "But right now, I'd better go to the bathroom before I pee in my pants from all this laughing." She made her way up the stairs, taking them one tread at a time. The door closed softly behind her.

Sara stared into the basement. Her mother's rocking chair and lamp were in a corner by a small window. The ironing board was out, ready to be used. Plastic containers along the back wall held all of Sara and Tessa's childhood mementos, at least the ones that her mother deemed worth keeping. Yearbooks, school photos, report cards, and class papers filled two boxes for each girl. Eventually, Tessa's baby would get her own box. She would have baby shoes and flyers from school plays and piano recitals. Or soccer trophies, if Tessa got her way.

Sara couldn't have children. An ectopic pregnancy while she was in medical school had taken away her ability. She'd been trying to adopt a child with Jeffrey, but that dream had disappeared the day he'd died. He had a son somewhere, a brilliant, strong young man who had never been told that Jeffrey was his real father. Jeffrey was just an honorary uncle, Sara an honorary aunt. She often thought about reaching out to the boy, but the decision was not hers. He had a mother and father who had done a very good job of raising him. Ruining that, telling him he had a father he could never talk to, seemed like an act of cruelty.

Except where Lena was concerned, Sara had an intense aversion to inflicting cruelty.

The dryer buzzed. The towels were ready enough, considering she had to walk outside in the pouring rain. She put on her jacket and left the house as quietly as she could. Outside, the rain had turned into a drizzle again. She glanced up at the night sky. Even with the dark clouds, she could see the stars. Sara had forgotten what it was like to be away from the lights of the city. The night was as black as coal. There were no sirens or screams or random gunshots piercing the air. There were only crickets and the occasional howl of a lonely dog.

Sara stood outside Will's door, wondering if she should knock. It was late. He might have already gone to sleep.

He opened the door just as she turned around. Will certainly wasn't looking at her all googly-eyed, as Tessa had stated. If anything, he seemed distracted.

"Towels," she told him. "I'll just leave them with you."

"Wait."

Sara held up her hand to keep the rain from pelting her in the eyes. She found herself staring at Will's mouth, the scar above his lip.

"Please come in." He stepped back so she could walk through the door.

Sara felt an unexplained wariness. Still, she went inside. "I am so sorry about my mother."

"She should teach a class on interrogation at the academy."

"I cannot apologize enough."

He handed her one of the clean towels to wipe her face. "She loves you very much."

Sara hadn't expected his response. She supposed a man who had lost his mother at such a young age had a different perspective on Cathy's obtrusiveness.

"Did you ever—" Sara stopped. "Never mind. I should let you get to sleep."

"Ever what?"

"I mean ..." Sara felt her cheeks redden again. "Were you in foster homes? Or ..."

He nodded. "Sometimes."

"Good ones?"

He shrugged. "Sometimes."

Sara was thinking about the bruise on his belly—not a bruise at all, but something far more sinister. She had seen her share of electrical burns in the morgue. They left their own distinct mark, like a dusting of gunpowder that got under the skin and never washed away. The dark branding on Will's body had faded with time. He'd probably been a child when it happened.

"Dr. Linton?"

She shook her head by way of apology. Instinctively, her hand went to his arm. "Can I get you anything else? I think there's some extra blankets in the closet."

"I've got some questions for you. If you have a few minutes?"

She had forgotten the reason she'd come up here in the first place. "Of course."

He indicated the couch. Sara sank into the old cushion, which nearly swallowed her. She looked around the room, seeing it as Will might. There was nothing fancy about the space. A galley kitchen. A tiny bedroom with an even tinier bathroom. The shag carpet had seen better days. Buckled wood paneling covered every vertical surface. The couch was older than Sara. And it was big enough for two people to comfortably lie down on, which was why Cathy had moved it from the den to the upstairs apartment when Sara turned fifteen. Not that Sara had boys lining up to lie on the couch with her, but Tessa, three years younger, had.

Will put the towels on the kitchen counter. "Can I get you some water?"

"No, thank you." Sara indicated the apartment. "I'm so sorry we couldn't offer you better accommodations."

He smiled. "I've stayed in a lot worse."

"If it's any consolation, this is actually nicer than the hotel."

"The food's better anyway." He gestured toward the opposite end of the couch. There was really nowhere else for him to sit. Still, he asked, "May I?"

Sara bent her legs up underneath her as he sat on the edge of the cushion. She crossed her arms, suddenly aware that they were alone in the same room together.

The uncomfortable silence was back. He played with his wedding ring, twisting it around his finger. She wondered if he was thinking about his wife. Sara had met the woman once at the hospital. Angie Trent was one of those vivacious, life-of-the-party types who never left the house without her makeup on. Her nails were perfect. Her skirt was tight. Her legs would have given the Pope second thoughts. She was about as different from Sara as a ripe peach was from a Popsicle stick.

Will clasped his hands together between his knees. "Thank you for dinner. Or, thank your mother. I haven't eaten like that in ..." He chuckled, rubbing his stomach. "Well, I'm not sure I've ever eaten like that in my life."

"I'm so sorry she questioned you like that."

"It's no bother. I'm sorry for imposing."

"It's my fault for bringing you down here."

"I'm sorry the hotel was closed."

Sara cut to the chase, afraid they would spend the rest of the night trading inconsequential apologies. "What questions did you have for me?"

He paused another few seconds, staring openly. "The first one is kind of delicate."

She tightened her arms around her waist. "All right."

"When Chief Wallace called you earlier today to come help Tommy ..." He let his voice trail off. "Do you always keep diazepam on you? That's Valium, right?"

Sara couldn't look him in the eye. She stared down at the coffee table. Will had obviously been working here. His laptop was closed, but the light was pulsing. Cables connected the machine to the portable printer on the floor. An unopened packet of colored folders was beside it. A wooden ruler was on top alongside a pack of colored markers. There was a stapler, paper clips, rubber bands.

"Dr. Linton?"

"Will." She tried to keep her voice steady. "Don't you think it's time you started calling me Sara?"

He acquiesced. "Sara." When she didn't speak, he pressed. "Do you always have Valium with you?"

"No," she admitted. She felt such shame that she could only look at the table in front of her. "They were for me. For this trip. In case ..." She shrugged the rest of her answer away. How could she explain to this man why she would need to drug herself through a family holiday?

He asked, "Did Chief Wallace know that you had the Valium?"

She tried to think back on their conversation. "No. I volunteered to bring it."

"You said you had some in your kit?"

"I didn't want to tell him they were for—"

"It's all right," he stopped her. "I'm really sorry that I had to ask such a personal question. I'm just trying to figure out how it happened. Chief Wallace called you to help, but how would he know that you'd be able to?"

Sara looked up at him. Will stared back, unblinking. There was no judgment in his gaze, no pity. Sara couldn't remember the last time someone had looked at her and really seen her. Certainly not since she'd gotten into town this morning.

She told him, "Frank thought I could talk to Tommy. Talk him down, I guess."

"Have you helped prisoners in the jail before?"

"Not really. I mean, I got called in a couple of times when there was an overdose. Once, someone had a burst appendix. I transferred them all to the hospital. I didn't really treat them at the jail. Not medically."

"And on the phone with Chief Wallace—"

"I'm sorry," Sara apologized. "Could you call him Frank? It's just—"

"You don't have to explain," he assured her. "On the phone before, when you said that you didn't really remember Tommy Braham, that there was no connection with him. Did you feel like Frank was trying to push you into coming to the station?"

Sara finally saw where this was going. "You think he called me after the fact. That Tommy was already dead." She remembered Frank looking through the cell door window. He had dropped his keys on the floor. Had that all been an act?

"As you know, time of death isn't an exact science," Will said. "If he called you right after he found Tommy—"

"The body was still warm," she remembered. "But the temperature inside the cells was hot. Frank said the furnace was acting up."

"Had you ever known it to act up before?"

She shook her head. "I haven't stepped foot in that station in over four years."

"The temperature was normal when I was there tonight."

Sara sat back on the couch. These were people who had worked with Jeffrey. People she had trusted all of her life. If Frank Wallace thought Sara was going to cover something up, he was sadly mistaken. "Do you think they killed him?" She answered her own question. "I saw the blue ink from the pen. I can't imagine they held Tommy down and scraped it across his wrists. There are easier ways to kill someone and make it look like a suicide."

"Hanging," he suggested. "Eighty percent of custodial suicides are achieved by hanging. Prison inmates are seven times more likely to kill themselves than the general population. Tommy fits just about every part of the profile." Will listed it out for her. "He was unusually remorseful. He wouldn't stop crying. He wasn't married. He was between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five. This was his first offense. He had a strong parent or guardian at home who would be angry or disappointed to learn of his incarceration."

She admitted, "Tommy was all of those things. But why would Frank postpone finding the body?"

"You're well respected here. A prisoner killed himself in police custody. If you say there's nothing hinky about it, then people will believe you."

Sara couldn't argue with him. Dan Brock was a mortician, not a doctor. If people got it into their heads that Tommy had been killed at the jail, then Brock would be hard-pressed to disprove the rumor.

"The cartridge from the pen that Tommy used," Will began. "Tonight, Officer Knox told me that your husband gave them all pens for Christmas one year. That's a very thoughtful thing to do."

"Not exactly," Sara said before she could catch herself. "I mean, he was busy, so he asked me to ..." She waved her hand, dismissing her words. She had been so annoyed with Jeffrey for asking her to track down the pens, as if her life was less busy than his. She passed this off by telling Will, "I'm sure there are things you ask your wife to do for you when you're tied up."

He smiled. "Do you remember where you got the pens?"

Sara felt another wave of shame crashing down. "I asked Nelly, my office manager at the clinic, to find them online. I didn't have time to ..." She shook her head, feeling like a heel. "I might be able to find the credit card receipt if it's important. This was over five years ago."

"How many did you get?"

"Twenty-five, I think? Everyone on the force got one."

"That's a lot of money."

"Yes," she acknowledged. Jeffrey hadn't given her a budget, and Sara's idea of an expensive gift had a higher price tag than Jeffrey's. It all seemed so silly now. Why had they wasted days being angry at each other? Why had it mattered so much?

Will surprised her, saying, "Your accent is different down here."

She laughed, taken off guard. "Do I sound country?"

"Your mother has a beautiful accent."

"Cultured," Sara said. Except for tonight, she had always loved the sound of her mother's voice.

He surprised her again. "You've kind of been dragged into the middle of this case, but in a lot of ways, you've put yourself there on your own."

She felt a blush brought on by his candor.

His expression was soft, understanding. She wondered if it was genuine or if he was using one of his interviewing techniques. "I know this sounds forward, but I'm assuming you had me meet you at the hospital in plain view of Main Street for a reason."

Sara laughed again, this time at herself, the situation. "It wasn't that calculated. It must seem that way now."

"I'm staying at your house. People are going to see my car parked on the street. I know how small towns work. They're going to think something's going on between us."

"But there's not. You're married and I'm—"

His smile was more of a wince. "The truth isn't much help in these types of situations. You must know that."

Sara looked back at his office supplies. He had separated the rubber bands by color. Even the paper clips were turned in the same direction.

Will said, "Something is going on here. I'm not sure if it's what you think, but something's not right at that station house."

"What is it?"

"I don't know yet, but you need to prepare yourself for some bad reactions." He spoke carefully. "Cases like this, where the police get questioned. They don't like that. Part of the reason they're good at their jobs is because they think they're right about everything."

"I'm a doctor. Trust me, it's not just cops who feel that way."

"I want you to be prepared, because when we get to the end of this, whether I find out Tommy was guilty, or Detective Adams screwed up, or if I find out nothing was wrong at all, people are going to hate you for bringing me down here."

"They've hated me before."

"They're going to say you're dragging your husband's memory through the mud."

"They don't know anything about him. They have no idea."

"They'll fill in the blanks themselves. It's going to get a lot harder than it is now." He turned his body toward her. "I'm going to make it harder. I'm going to do some things on purpose to get them mad enough to show their hand. Are you going to be okay with that?"

"What if I say no?"

"Then I'll find another way to do it that doesn't upset you."

She could see that his offer was genuine, and felt guilty for questioning his motives before. "This isn't my home anymore. I'm leaving in three days no matter what happens. Do what you have to do."

"And your family?"

"My family supports me." Sara wasn't certain about a lot of things these days, but this, at least, was true. "They may not agree with me, but they support me."

"All right." He looked relieved, as if he'd gotten the hard part out of the way. "I need to get Julie Smith's phone number from you."

Sara had anticipated the request. She took a sheet of folded paper out of her pocket and handed it to Will.

He pointed to the Princess phone beside the couch. "Is this the same line as the house?"

She nodded.

"I wanted to make sure the caller ID was the same." He picked up the phone and stared at the rotary dial.

Sara rolled her eyes. "My parents don't exactly embrace technology."

He started spinning the dial, but the rotary slipped out from under his finger in the middle of the number.

"Let me," she offered, taking the phone before he could protest. She spun the dial, the motion coming back to her more quickly than she wanted to admit.

Will put the receiver to his ear just as an automated squawk blared down the line. He held the phone between them so they both could hear the recorded voice advising the caller that the line he was trying to reach had been disconnected.

Will put the phone back on the hook. "I'll have Faith do a trace tomorrow. My bet is that it was a throwaway phone. Do you remember anything else about Julie? Anything she said?"

"I could tell that she was calling from a bathroom," Sara told him. "She said that Tommy had texted her that he was in jail. Maybe you can get the transcript from his phone?"

"Faith can do that, too," he offered. "What about Julie's voice? Did she sound young? Old?"

"She sounded really young and really country."

"Country how?"

Sara smiled. "Not like me. At least I hope not. She sounded more like the wrong side of the tracks. She used the word 'you'uns.' "

"That's mountain talk."

"Is it? I'm not up on dialects."

"I had an assignment in Blue Ridge a while back," he explained. "Do you hear that word around here much?"

She shook her head. "Not really. Not that I can remember."

"All right, so we've got someone young, probably a transplant from north Georgia or Appalachia. She told you that she was Tommy's friend. We'll dump his phone line and see if they've ever called each other."

"Julie Smith," Sara said, wondering why it had never occurred to her that the girl might be using an alias.

"Maybe the phone taps will give us something."

Sara indicated the photocopies she'd made. "Were these helpful?"

"Not in the way you're thinking." He thumbed through the pages. "I asked the station secretary, Mrs. Simms, to fax these to Faith. Can you look at them for me?"

Sara glanced through the pages. There were handwritten numbers at the top. She stopped on the eleventh page. Someone had written the number twelve in the corner. The two was backward. "Did you number these?"

"Yes," he said. "When I got them back from Mrs. Simms, one of the pages was missing. Page eleven. The page right after Detective Adams's field report."

Sara thumbed back to the second page. The two was written the correct way. She checked the third and fifth page. Both numbers were facing the correct direction. The pen had been pressed so hard that the paper felt embossed.

He asked, "Can you remember what's missing?"

Sara went through them again, concentrating on the content instead of the numbering. "The 911 transcript."

"You're sure?"

"There was another page from Lena's notebook. It was taped on the sheet of paper by itself. She wrote down the contents of the 911 call."

"Can you remember what it said?"

"I know that it was a woman's voice. I can't really remember the rest."

"Did they trace the number she called from?"

"I didn't see anything indicating they had." She shook her head. "Why can't I remember what else it said?"

"We can get it from the call center."

"Unless they managed to lose it."

"It's no big deal," he told her. "You got the file from Frank, right?"

"From Carl Phillips."

"The booking officer?"

"Yes. Did you talk to him tonight?"

"He's gone on vacation with his family. No idea when he'll be back. No phone. No cell. No way to get in touch with him."

Sara felt her mouth drop open.

"I doubt he's really gone. They're probably keeping him away from me. He might even be at the station tomorrow, hiding in plain sight."

"He's the only African American on the force."

Will laughed. "Thanks for the tip. That narrows things down considerably."

"I can't believe they're doing this."

"Cops don't like to be questioned. They circle their wagons, even if they know it's wrong."

She wondered if Jeffrey had ever done anything like this. If he had, it was only because he wanted to be the one to clean out his own house. He would never let someone come in and do his job for him.

Will asked, "Where did you make the copies?"

"At the front of the room."

"The copier that's on the table by the coffeemaker?"

"That's right."

"Did you get some coffee?"

"I didn't want to dawdle." Everyone had been staring at her like she was a monster. Sara's only goal had been to make the copies and get out of there as soon as possible.

"So, you're standing by the copier waiting for the pages to come out. That looked like an old machine. Does it make a noise?"

She nodded, wondering where this was going.

"Like a whirring or a clunking?"

"Both," she answered, and she could hear the sound in her head.

"How much coffee was left in the pot? Did anyone come up?"

She shook her head. "No. The pot was full." The machine was older than the copier. She could smell the grounds burning.

"Did anyone talk to you?"

"No. No one would even look at—" She saw herself standing by the copier. The machine was old, the kind you had to feed the pages into one at a time. She had read the file to keep from staring aimlessly at the wall. "Oh."

"What do you remember?"

"I skimmed the 911 transcript while I was waiting for the copier to warm up."

"What did it say?"

She could see herself standing back in the station reading the files. "The woman called it a possible suicide. She said she was worried her friend had done something." Sara narrowed her eyes, trying to force the memory to come. "She was worried Allison was going to kill herself because she'd gotten into a fight with her boyfriend."

"Did she say where she thought Allison was?"

"Lover's Point," she recalled. "That's what town people call it. It's the cove where Allison was found."

"What's it like?"

"A cove." Sara shrugged. "It's romantic if you're out for a walk, but not in the pouring rain and cold."

"Is it secluded?"

"Yes."

"So, according to this caller, Allison got into a fight with her boyfriend. The caller was worried Allison was suicidal. The caller also knew she was going to be at Lover's Point."

"It was probably Julie Smith. Is that what you're thinking?"

"Maybe, but why? The caller wanted to bring attention to Allison's murder. Julie Smith was trying to help Tommy Braham get away with murder. They seem to have opposite goals." He paused. "Faith is trying to track her down, but we're going to need more than a disconnected number to find her."

"Frank and Lena are probably thinking the same thing," Sara guessed. "That's why they hid the transcript. They either don't want you to talk to her or they want to talk to her first."

Will scratched his cheek. "Maybe." He was obviously considering another option. For her part, Sara could not get past Marla Simms hiding information in a formal investigation. The old woman had worked at the station longer than anyone could remember.

Will sat up on the couch. He thumbed through the pages on the coffee table. "Mrs. Simms took it upon herself to send some extra information. I had Agent Mitchell scan these in so I could print them out." He found what he was looking for and handed it to Sara. She recognized the form, a two-page incident report. Patrolmen filled out dozens of these a week to notate cases where they had been called in but no arrest had been made. They were useful to have in case something bad happened later, sort of like a progress report on a person or an area of town.

Will said, "These are incident reports documenting Tommy's run-ins with the law." He indicated the pages in Sara's hands. "This one talks about a girl he got into a screaming match with at the roller rink."

She saw there was a yellow dot in the corner of the report.

He asked, "Did you ever know Tommy to have a temper?"

"Never." Sara checked through the other incident reports. There were two more, each two stapled pages, each with a dot from a colored marker in the corner. One was red. The other was green.

She looked back up at Will. "Tommy was pretty even-keeled. Kids like that tend to be very sweet."

“Because of their mental state?”

Sara stared at him, thinking back on their conversation in the car. “Yes. He was slow. Very gullible.”

Much like Sara.

She handed a different report back to Will, showing it to him upside down. She pointed to the middle of the page where Carl Phillips had described the incident. “Did you read this part?”

She watched Will’s eyes go to the red dot. “The barking dog. Tommy started screaming at his neighbor. The woman called the cops.”

“Right.” She took the third report and handed it to him in the right direction. “Then there’s this.”

Again, his eyes went not to the words, but to the colored dot. “Loud music reported a few days ago. Tommy yelled at the officer.”

She was silent, waiting for him to send out another feeler.

He took his time, finally asking, “What are you thinking?”

She was thinking he was incredibly clever. Sara looked at the folders, the markers. He color-coded everything. His penmanship was awkward, like a child’s. He’d written the number two backward, but not with any consistency. He couldn’t tell whether a page was upside down or not. Sara might not have even noticed under different circumstances. Hell, she hadn’t noticed the last time she’d spent time with him. He’d been in her home. She had watched him work and never realized there was a problem.

He joked, “Is this some kind of test?”

“No.” She couldn’t do this to him. Not like this. Maybe not ever. “I was looking at the dates.” She shuffled through the forms to give herself something to do. “All the incidents happened within the last few weeks. Something must have set him off. Tommy didn’t have a temper until recently.”

“I’ll see what I can find.” He took back the pages and stacked them on the table. He was nervous, and he was not stupid. He had spent a lifetime looking for cues, searching for tells and ticks, so that he could keep his secret hidden.

Sara put her hand on his arm. “Will—”

He stood up, moving out of her reach. “Thank you, Dr. Linton.”

Sara stood, too. She fumbled for something to say. “I’m sorry I couldn’t help more.”

“You’ve been great.” He walked to the door and held it open for her. “Please thank your mother for her hospitality.”

Sara left before she was pushed out. She got to the bottom of the steps and turned around, but Will had already gone inside.

“Good Lord,” Sara mumbled as she walked across the wet grass. She’d actually managed to make Will feel more uncomfortable than her mother had.

The distant sound of a car came from up the road. Sara watched a police cruiser roll by. This time, the cop behind the wheel did not tip his hat at her. In fact, he seemed to glare at her.

Will had warned her this would happen, that the town would turn against her. Sara hadn’t thought the time would come so quickly. She laughed at herself, the circumstances, as she crossed the driveway and went into the house. Will might have trouble reading the words on a page, but he was pretty damn good at reading people.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Jason Howell paced back and forth across his tiny dorm room, the shuffling of his feet blending with the shushing of the rain outside his window. Papers were strewn across the floor. His desk was cluttered with open books and empty Red Bull cans. His ancient laptop made a sound like an exhausted sigh as it went to sleep. He needed to be working, but his brain was spinning in his head. Nothing could hold his attention for more than a few minutes—not the broken lamp on his desk or the emails flooding his inbox and certainly not the paper he was supposed to be working on.

Jason rested his palm just below the keyboard on the laptop. The plastic was hot to the touch. The fan that cooled the motherboard had started clicking a few weeks ago, around the same time he'd nearly gotten a third-degree burn on his legs from keeping the computer on his lap. He guessed there was something bad happening between the battery and the charger plugged into the wall. Even now there was a slight tinge of burning plastic in the air. Jason grabbed the plug but stopped short of yanking it out of the socket. He chewed the tip of his tongue as he stared at the snaking electrical cord in his hand. Did he want the machine to overheat? A dead laptop was a life-altering catastrophe. Maybe his work would be lost, his footnotes and research and the last year of his life melting into one giant lump of stinking plastic.

And then what?

He didn't have any friends left. Everyone in the dorm avoided him when he walked down the hall. Nobody talked to him in class or asked to borrow his notes. He hadn't been out for a drink in months. Except for his professors, Jason couldn't recall one meaningful conversation he'd had with anyone since before Easter break.

Anyone but Allison, but that didn't count. They weren't really talking lately. All they did was end up screaming at each other about the stupidest things—who was supposed to order the pizza, who forgot to shut the door. Even the sex was bad. Confrontational. Mechanical. Disappointing.

Jason couldn't blame Allison if she hated him right now. He couldn't do anything right. His paper was a mess. His grades had started to slip. He was running out of money from his grandfather's trust. Papa had left him twelve thousand dollars to supplement Jason's scholarships and loans for school. At the time, the number had seemed enormous. Now that Jason was a year into his graduate program, it seemed like a pittance. And that pittance was getting smaller every day.

No wonder he was so depressed he barely had the strength to raise his head.

What he really wanted was Allison. No, scratch that—he wanted the Allison he had known for one year and eleven months. The one who smiled when she saw him. The one who didn't burst into tears every five minutes and yell at him for being a bastard when Jason asked her why she was sad.

"Because of you," she would say, and who wanted to hear that? Who wanted to be blamed for somebody else's misery when you were knee-deep in your own?

And Jason was miserable. It radiated off him like the heat lamp over the french fries at McDonald's. He'd lost track of the last time he'd showered. He couldn't sleep. Nothing could make his brain shut down long enough for rest. As soon as he lay down, his eyelids started going up and down like a lazy yo-yo. Darkness tended to bring it all fresh into his mind, and before long that monster weight of loneliness started pressing on his chest so that he felt like he couldn't breathe.

Not that Allison cared. He could be dead right now for all she knew. He hadn't seen another human being since the dorm cleared out for Thanksgiving break three days ago. Even the library had closed early on Sunday, the last stragglers clawing at the steps as the staff finally locked the doors. Jason had watched them go from his window, wondering if they were going to be alone, if they had anyone to spend their holiday with.

Except for the constant hum of the Cartoon Network and Jason's occasional mumblings to himself, the place was completely silent. Even the janitor hadn't shown his face in days. Jason probably wasn't supposed to be in the building. The heat had been turned off when the last students left. He was sleeping in his warmest clothes, holed up under his winter coat. And the one person who was supposed to care about this evidently didn't give a shit.

Allison Spooner. How had he fallen in love with a girl who had such a stupid name?

She had called him like crazy for days, and then yesterday—nothing. Jason had watched his phone light up each time with her caller ID and each time he hadn't answered it. Her messages were all the same: "Hey, call me." Would it kill her to say something else? Would it kill her to say that she missed him? He had conversations in his head where he asked her these questions and she said, "You know what? You're right. I should be a better girlfriend."

Conversations. More like fantasies.

For three days, all the phone did was ring. He started to worry that Allison's caller ID would get etched into the screen on his phone. He'd watched the bars for the battery indicator disappear one by one. With each bar, he told himself he would answer the phone if she called before the next one disappeared. Then it would blink off with no call and he'd say the next one. Then the next one. Finally, the phone had turned itself off while he was sleeping. Jason had panicked as he searched for the charger. He'd plugged it into the wall and—nothing.

Her silence was loud and clear. You didn't give up on somebody like that if you loved them. You kept calling. You left messages that said something more deep and personal than "Hey, call me." You apologized. You didn't send a stupid IM every twenty minutes saying "where r u?" You banged on their door and yelled at the top of your lungs for them to please, please see you.

Why had she given up on him?

Because he didn't have any balls. That's what she had told him the last time they talked. Jason wasn't man enough to do what needed to be done. He wasn't man enough to take care of her. Maybe she was right. He was afraid. Every time they talked about what they were going to do, he felt like his intestines were squeezing up on him. He wished that he had never talked to that asshole from town. He wished that he could take it all back—everything they had done over the past two weeks. Allison acted like she was fine with it, but he knew she was afraid, too. It wasn't too late. They could back out of this. They could pretend like it didn't happen. If only Allison would see that there was no good way out. Why was Jason the only person in this whole damn mess who seemed to be cursed with a conscience?

Suddenly, there was a noise outside. He threw open the door and went into the hallway. Jason stood in the dark, glancing around like a madman. No one was there. No one was watching him. He was just being paranoid. Considering the number of Red Bulls he'd chugged and the two bags of Cheetos that were sitting like a brick in his stomach, it was no wonder he was feeling wired.

Jason went back into his room. He opened the window to let in some air. The rain had slacked off, but the sky hadn't given up the sun in days. He checked his bedside clock, unsure whether it was morning or night. Midnight was only a few minutes away. A stiff wind was blowing, but he had been holed up inside for so long that he welcomed fresh air, even if it was cold enough to make his breath appear as a cloud in front of his face. Outside, he could see the empty student parking lot. In the distance, a dog barked.

He sat back down at his desk. He stared at the lamp by his laptop. The neck was broken. The shade dangled from two wires, hanging its head as if in shame. The light cast weird shadows in the room. He had never liked the dark. It made him feel vulnerable and lonely. It made him think about things he didn't want to think about.

Thanksgiving was a few days away. Last week, Jason had made the usual call to his mother, but she wasn't interested in seeing him. She never was. Jason was from his mother's first marriage, to a man who'd gone out for beer one day and never come back. Her second husband made it clear from the start that Jason wasn't his son. They had three daughters who barely knew Jason existed. He wasn't invited to family get-togethers. He didn't get invitations to weddings or holidays. His mother's only connection to him was through the U.S. Postal Service. She mailed a check for twenty-five dollars every birthday and Christmas.

Allison was supposed to make things different. They were supposed to spend all of their holidays together. They were supposed to create their own family. That's what they'd done for the last year and eleven months. They went to movies or ate Chinese food while the rest of the planet was holed up with relatives they didn't like, eating food they didn't enjoy. That was their thing—they were two against the world, filled with combined glee because they had each other. Jason had never known what it was like to be inside something good. He was always on the outside, his face pressed against the glass. Allison had given him that, and now she had taken it away.

He didn't even know if she was still in town. She might have gone home to visit her aunt. Maybe she had run off with another guy. Allison was attractive. She could do a hell of a lot better than Jason. He wouldn't be surprised if she was screwing some new guy right now.

A new guy.

The thought cut him like a knife. Their legs and arms entangled, her long hair draped across another guy's chest. Probably it was a hairy chest, the kind of chest that men had, not a concave, pasty white chest that hadn't changed since junior high school. This new guy would have balls the size of grapefruits. He would pick Allison up in his arms and take her like a beast whenever he wanted.

How could she be with another guy? Jason knew from the first time they kissed that he was going to marry her. He'd given her that ring with the promise that as soon as all of this was over, he'd buy her a better one. A real one. Had Allison forgotten that? Could she really be that cruel?

Jason chewed at his tongue, rolling it around with his front teeth until he tasted blood. He stood up and started pacing again. The broken lamp traced his movements in an eerie shadow that swung back and forth across the wall. Six paces one way. Six paces back. The shadow hesitated, stopped and started, clinging to Jason like a bad dream. He raised his hands, hunched his shoulders, and the shadow grew into a monster.

Jason dropped his hands, thinking he was going to freak himself out if he didn't stop this.

If he could just get through Thanksgiving, all of this would be over. He and Allison would be rich, or at least not as poor. Tommy would be able to buy enough equipment to start his own gardening business. Allison would be able to quit her job at the diner and concentrate on school. Jason would ... What would Jason do?

He would buy Allison that ring. He would block that other guy and his stupid hairy chest from his mind, and he and Allison would go on and live their lives together. They could get married. Have children. They'd both be scientists, doctors. They could buy a new house, new cars, leave the air-conditioning on sixty all summer if they wanted to. The last three months would be a distant memory, something they would talk about in ten, fifteen years when it was all behind them. They would be at a dinner party. Allison would've had a little too much to drink. Talk would turn to wild college days, and her eyes would sparkle in the candlelight as she looked at Jason, a smile tugging at her lips.

"Oh, we can top that," she would say, and proceed to shock them all with the crazy mess they had gotten themselves into over the last few weeks.

That's what it would end up being—a party story, like the one Jason told about the first time his papa took him duck hunting and Jason had accidentally maimed two decoys.

He needed to finish his paper for that to happen. He couldn't just settle for a degree now. He had to be the best, the top in his class, because Allison didn't say it, but she liked having nice things. She liked the idea of being able to go into a store and buy whatever she wanted. She hated having to balance her checkbook down to the last penny every month. Jason wasn't going to be the kind of husband who asked how much a pair of shoes cost or why she needed another black dress. He was going to be the kind of husband who made so much money that Allison could fill ten closets with designer clothes and there would still be money left over to go to Cancún or St. Croix or wherever it was filthy rich people went on their private jets for the holidays.

Jason rested his fingers on the keys but did not type. He felt feverish. Guilt had always been a problem for him. There was no punishment that anyone could mete out that was worse than the distress brought on by Jason's own disappointment in himself. And he should be disappointed. He should be feeling horrified by what he had done. He should have protected Allison from all of this, told her that no matter how much money was involved, it wasn't worth it. He'd endangered her. He'd gotten Tommy mixed up in it, too, because Tommy was stupid enough to go along with anything as long as you pushed him in the right direction. Jason was responsible for both of them. He was supposed to protect his friends, not push them into oncoming traffic. Were their lives really worth so little? Was that what it boiled down to at the end of the day, twenty-something years of life for less money than what a janitor brought home?

"No," he said, the sound of his voice drowned out by the howling rain. He couldn't let all of them get dragged down into this. Allison was wrong. Jason had balls. He had balls enough to do the right thing.

Instead of working on his paper, he opened his Internet browser. A quick search brought him to the right place. He found the contact information buried in the site map. Jason clicked on the icon to write new mail, but changed his mind. He didn't want this traced back to him. It was the coward's way out, but Jason would rather be an honest coward than a jailed whistle-blower. There was no denying his culpability in all of this—extortion, fraud, who knew what else. The feds would be involved. This might even count as attempted murder.

Jason opened up the Yahoo account he used for porn and pasted the contact address into the email. He spoke aloud as he wrote, "I don't know if you are the right person to talk to about this, but there is something seriously wrong going on at your Grant County ..." Jason's voice trailed off as he searched for the right word. Was it a site? A location? Facility?

"Hey."

Jason jerked up his head, surprised. "You scared the crap out of me." He fumbled for the mouse to close the browser.

"You all right?"

Jason glanced nervously at the computer. "What are you doing here?" The stupid email program was asking if he wanted to save. Jason moved the mouse again to minimize the page. It still asked if he wanted to save.

"What are you writing?"

"School stuff." Instead of hitting Save, Jason pressed the Delete key. The program closed down. He could hear the laptop's fan clicking, trying to cool the processor enough to complete the request. His dissertation flashed up, then disappeared. The screen went black.

"Shit," he whispered. "No, no, no ..."

"Jason."

"Just give me a minute." Jason tapped the space bar, trying to wake the computer. Sometimes that's all it took. Sometimes, it just needed to know he was paying attention.

"You asked for this."

"Wha—" Jason pitched forward, his jaw snapping shut as his face slammed into his computer. The plastic was hot against his cheek. Dark liquid pooled around the keys. He had the crazy thought that the computer was injured, bleeding.

Wind gusted in from the open window. Jason tried to cough. His throat wouldn't comply. He coughed again. Something wet and thick came out of his mouth. He stared at it, thinking it looked like a piece of pork. Pink flesh. Raw meat.

Jason gagged.

He was staring at his tongue.

TUESDAY

CHAPTER NINE

Will felt like a thief as he sneaked across the Linton yard and climbed into his Porsche. At least the driving rain gave him an excuse to keep his head down and move quickly. He jammed the key in the lock and was inside the car before he realized there was something trapped under his windshield wiper. Will groaned. He pushed open the door and tried to reach around to the wiper, but his arm wasn't long enough. His sleeve was nearly soaked through by the time he got out of the car again to retrieve the plastic sandwich bag.

Someone had left him a note. The paper was folded in two, safe inside the plastic. Will glanced around, trying to see up and down the street. No one was milling about, which was unsurprising, considering the awful weather. There were no parked cars with the engines running. Will unzipped the bag. He caught a whiff of a familiar scent.

Fancy soap.

He stared at the folded piece of paper, wondering if Sara was playing some kind of joke. He'd paced the floor of her family's romper room half the night, replaying in his mind the last five minutes of their conversation. She hadn't said anything, really. Or had she? There was definitely a look in her eyes. Something had changed between them, and it wasn't a good change.

Other than Will's wife, there were only two people in his life who knew about his dyslexia. Both of them had found their own special ways to make him miserable about it. Amanda Wagner, his boss, threw out occasional bon mots about him being professionally incompetent at best and mentally incapacitated at worst. Faith was more well-meaning, but she was too nosy for her own good. Once, she'd peppered Will with so many questions about the disorder that he'd stopped talking to her for two whole days.

His wife, Angie, was a combination of both responses. She had grown up with Will, helped him write school assignments and work on papers and fill out applications. She'd been the one who reviewed his reports and made sure he didn't sound like a backward chimp. She was also prone to dangling her help in exchange for things she wanted. And they were never good things. At least not good for Will.

In their own way, all three women made it clear that they thought something was wrong with him. Something not quite right with his head. With the way he thought. With the way he handled things. They didn't pity him. He was pretty sure Amanda didn't even like him. But they treated him differently. They treated him like he had a disease.

What would Sara do? Maybe nothing. Will wasn't even sure if she had figured it out. Or he could just be fooling himself. Sara was smart—that was part of the problem. She was a hell of a lot smarter than Will. Had he tripped up? Did she have some kind of special doctor's tool to trap unsuspecting morons? He must have said something or done something that had given himself away. But what?

Will glanced back at the Linton home to make sure no one was watching him. Sara had developed a weird habit of lurking behind closed doors. He unfolded the notebook paper. There was a smiley face at the bottom.

Did she think he was a child? Was she out of gold stars?

He pressed his fingers to his eyes, feeling like an idiot. There was nothing sexy about a barely literate thirty-five-year-old man.

He looked back at the note.

Thankfully, Sara didn't write in cursive. She didn't write like a doctor, either. Will put his finger under each letter, moving his lips as he read. "Fun ..." His heart did a weird double beat in his chest, but quickly he realized his mistake. "Funeral." He knew the next word, and numbers had never been a problem for him.

He stared back at the front door. The window was clear. He checked the note again. "Funeral home 11:30."

And a smiley face, because apparently she thought he was intellectually disabled.

Will stuck his key into the ignition. Obviously, she was talking about the time for the autopsies. But was this also some kind of test to see how well he could read? The thought of Sara Linton examining him like a lab rat made him want to pack his bags and move to Honduras. She would feel sorry for him. Worse, she might try to help him.

"Hello?"

Will jumped so hard he slammed his head into the ceiling. Cathy Linton was standing outside his car with a pleasant look on her face. She had a large umbrella over her head. She motioned for him to roll down the window.

"Good morning, Mr. Trent." She was all smiles again, but he had fallen for her sweet-southern-lady crap once before.

"Good morning, Mrs. Linton."

Her breath was visible in the cold. "I hope you slept well."

He looked back at the house, wondering why this was the only time Sara wasn't lurking behind the door. "Yes, ma'am. Thank you."

"I just went for my walk. Exercise is the best way to start the morning." She smiled again. "Won't you come in and have some breakfast with us?"

His stomach rumbled so loudly he was sure the car was shaking. The energy bar he'd found at the bottom of his suitcase this morning hadn't exactly hit the spot. A woman like Cathy Linton would know how to make a good biscuit. There would be butter and ham. Probably grits. Eggs. Sausage patties. It was like she was inviting him into the woods to visit her cottage made of candy.

"Mr. Trent?"

"No, ma'am. I need to get to work, but I appreciate it."

"Dinner, then." She had a way of saying things that sounded like a suggestion at first but ended up being a strict order. "I hope the apartment wasn't too horrible last night."

"No, ma'am. It was fine."

"I'll just slip up there later and do some dusting. Eddie and I haven't used the place since the girls were here. I cringe to think of the state it must be in."

Will thought about the dirty clothes he'd left piled on the couch. He'd packed in Atlanta thinking he'd wash everything at the hotel. "That's all right. I—"

"Nonsense." She tapped her hand on the car door like a judge passing down an edict. "I can't have you breathing in all that dust."

He knew there was no way to stop her. "Just ... uh ... Just ignore my mess. Please. I'm sorry."

Her smile changed to something much kinder than he'd seen before. He could see now where Sara got her beauty. Cathy reached into the car and gently rested her hand on his arm. Sara had touched him on the arm a lot last night. They were obviously a touchy-feely kind of family, which was just as foreign to Will as if they were from Mars.

She squeezed his arm. "Dinner's at seven-thirty sharp."

He nodded. "Thank you."

"Don't be late." Her smile changed back to the one he was more familiar with. She winked at him before turning on her heel and walking back toward the house.

Will rolled up his window. He put the car in gear and headed up the road, too late remembering that he was going in the wrong direction. Or maybe not. Sara had told him that Lakeshore was just a big circle. Will had lately gone around in enough circles to last a lifetime, but he wasn't going to risk driving past the Linton home again.

The road was empty, he assumed because of the early hour. Will was timing his arrival at the police station so that he'd get there before most of the cops came on shift. He wanted to look eager and alert. He wanted them to feel like he was stepping on their toes.

He slowed his car as he rounded a curve. The road was more like a stream, rainwater flooding across the asphalt. He maneuvered the Porsche into the opposite side of the street to keep his floorboards from flooding. Will had spent ten years of his life and a chunk of his savings restoring the 9-11 by hand. Most of that time, he was bent over manuals and schematics, trying to figure out how the car was supposed to work. He'd learned to weld. He'd learned to do body work. He'd learned that he wasn't particularly fond of either.

The engine was solid, but the gears were temperamental. He felt the clutch slip as he downshifted. Once he was out of the floodwaters, he idled the car, thinking he'd let the undercarriage drain, wondering if such a thing was even possible. Up ahead, a blue mailbox with an Auburn University logo painted on it rocked in the strong wind. He recalled the first house number Sara had written on the outside of the folder when she was giving him directions to her parents' house. Will had always been good at remembering numbers.

In Atlanta, Sara lived in the old dairy factory, one of those industrial complexes that had been turned into luxurious lofts back during the real estate boom. He'd remarked then that the place didn't really seem like her type of home. The lines were too hard. The furniture too sleek. He had imagined she lived somewhere warm and welcoming, more like a cottage.

He had been right.

The Auburn mailbox belonged to a shotgun-style, one-story home with plants overflowing in the front yard. Sara had lived on the lake, and the sky was just light enough so that Will could see the glorious aspect of her backyard. He wondered what Sara's life had been like when she lived here. She didn't strike him as the kind of wife who would have dinner and a dry martini waiting when her husband got home, but maybe occasionally she had filled the role out of kindness. There was something about her that indicated a tremendous capacity for love.

The porch light came on. Will put the car in gear and continued around the lake. He missed the turnoff for Main Street and had to back up. He felt his wedding ring on his hand, making a mental note that the turn would be on that side. Over the years, he had trained his mind to recognize his watch, not the ring. Probably because the watch was more permanent.

Will had met Angie Polaski when he was eight years old. Angie was three years older, thrown into the system because her mother had overdosed on a nasty combination of heroin and speed. While Diedre Polaski lay comatose in the bathroom, Angie was being looked after by her mother's pimp in the bedroom. Finally, someone had called the police. Diedre was put on life support at the state hospital, where she remained to this day, and Angie was sent to the Atlanta Children's Home for the remaining seven years of a childhood that had already been lost. Will had fallen in love with her on sight. At eleven, she'd had a chip on her shoulder and hell in her eyes. When she wasn't giving boys handjobs in the coat closet, she was beating the snot out of them with her unsurprisingly quick fists.

Will had loved her for her fierceness, and when her fierceness had worn him down, he had clung to her for her familiarity. Last year, she had married him on a dare after years of empty promises. She cheated on him. She pushed him to the breaking point, then sank her claws into his flesh and yanked him back. His relationship with Angie was more akin to a twisted hokey pokey. She was in Will's life. She was out. She was in. She was shaking him all about.

Will found Main Street after a couple of wrong turns. The rain wasn't coming down in sheets anymore, so he could make out the small shops lining the road. One place was obviously a hardware store. The other looked like a shop to buy ladies' clothing. Directly across from the station was a dry cleaners. Will thought about his dirty laundry piled on the couch. Maybe he could find time to sneak back and get it. He usually wore a suit and tie to work, but he hadn't had a lot of options this morning. There was just one T-shirt and a pair of boxers left. His jeans were clean enough to last another day. The sweater was the one he wore last night. The cashmere blend hadn't responded well to the rain. He felt the material tighten every time he flexed his shoulders.

Will pulled into the farthest space from the front door, backing in so that the Porsche was facing the street. Catty-corner to the station, he saw a low office building with glass brick on the front. The faded sign out front had a teddy bear holding some balloons. Probably a daycare center. A squad car rolled down the street but didn't stop, going ahead through the gates of what must have been the college. Will's was the only car in the lot. He supposed Larry Knox was inside the station, or maybe they'd given him a relief when Will left last night. Either way, he wasn't going to spend the next twenty minutes standing in the rain outside the locked door.

He dialed Amanda Wagner's number, holding out slim hope that she wasn't in the office yet.

His luck took a nasty turn. Amanda answered the phone herself.

"It's Will," he said. "I'm outside the station house."

Amanda never gave anyone the benefit of the doubt, not least of all Will. “Did you just get there?”

“I got in last night.” He felt a slight bit of relief. In the back of his mind, he’d been worried that Sara would call Amanda and ask that Will be taken off the case. She would want the best the GBI had to offer, not a functional illiterate with a suitcase full of dirty laundry.

Amanda’s tone was clipped. “Run it down for me, Will. I haven’t got all day.”

He told her Sara’s story: that she had gotten a call from Julie Smith, then Frank Wallace. That she had gone to the jail and found Tommy Braham dead. He didn’t tell her about Sara’s beef with Lena Adams, instead skipping ahead to the Cross pens that Jeffrey Tolliver had given his staff. “I’m pretty sure the ink cartridge Braham used came from one of those pens.”

“Good luck finding out whose.” Amanda picked at the same thread Will had spotted. “There’s no way of knowing exactly when Tommy Braham died—before or after Frank Wallace called Sara.”

“We’ll see what the autopsy brings. Dr. Linton is going to do it.”

“There’s a bright spot in a bleak day.”

“It’s good to have someone down here who knows what they’re doing.”

“Shouldn’t that be you, Will?”

He let the remark go unanswered.

She asked, “What’s your impression on the Allison Spooner homicide?”

“I’m fifty-fifty. Maybe Tommy Braham did it. Or maybe her killer’s assuming he got away with murder.”

“Well, figure it out and get back here fast, because they’re not going to like you very much if you prove he’s innocent.”

She was right. One thing cops hated more than bad guys was being proven wrong about the bad guys. Will had seen an Atlanta detective nearly go into convulsions as he argued that the DNA exonerating his suspect had to be wrong.

Amanda told him, “I called Macon General this morning. Brad Stephens had to be taken back into surgery. They missed a bleeder the first time.”

“Is he all right?”

“Prognosis is guarded. They’re keeping him sedated for the time being, so he’s not going to talk to anyone anytime soon.”

“I’m pretty sure he’s not going to remember anything useful except that his fellow officers saved his life.”

“Be that as it may, he’s still a cop. You need to go over there at some point and share in the camaraderie. Donate some blood. Buy him a magazine.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

“What’s your game plan?”

“I’m going to rattle some cages this morning and see if anything falls out. Faith is working on the paper trail for Julie Smith and Carl Phillips. Talking to them is my priority, but we’ve got to find them first. I want to check out the lake where Spooner was found, then go see the garage where she lived. It feels like her murder is at the center of this. Whatever they’re hiding from me goes back to her death.”

“You don’t think they’re tap-dancing because of the suicide?”

“They might be, but my gut is telling me something else is going on.”

“Ah, your famous women’s intuition.” Amanda never missed an opportunity to insult him. "What about Adams?"

"I'll keep her close by."

"I met her once. She'll be a hard nut to crack."

"So I hear."

"Loop me in at the end of the day."

She hung up the phone before Will could respond. He rubbed his fingers through his hair, wondering if the damp was from the rain or his own sweat.

For the second time that morning, Will jumped when someone knocked on the window of his car. This time the knocker was an older black man, and he stood at the passenger door, grinning at Will's reaction. He made a rolling motion with his arm. Will leaned over and opened the door.

"Come in out of the rain," Will offered, thinking the man was the first nonwhite face he'd seen since he'd arrived in Grant County. He didn't want to make assumptions, but he would've bet half his paycheck that the African Americans in town didn't make a habit of approaching investigators outside the police station.

The man groaned as he climbed into the bucket seat. Will saw that he walked with a cane. His leg was stiff, and bent awkwardly at the knee. Rain dripped from his heavy coat. A slight mist clung to his salt-and-pepper beard. He wasn't as old as Will had first thought—maybe early sixties. When he spoke, his voice was like sandpaper scratching through gravel.

"Lionel Harris."

"Will Trent."

Lionel took off his glove and they shook hands. "My father was named Will. Short for William."

"Me too," Will told him, though his birth certificate said no such thing.

Lionel pointed up the street. "Daddy worked at the diner for forty-three years. Old Pete closed it down back in oh-one." He rubbed his hand along the leather dashboard. "What year is this?"

Will assumed he meant the car. "Seventy-nine."

"You do all the work yourself?"

"Is it that obvious?"

"Nah," he said, though he'd found the kink in the leather under the handle of the glove box. "You did a good job, son. Real good job."

"I take it you're interested in cars?"

"My wife would tell you I'm too interested for my own good." He glanced pointedly at Will's wedding ring. "You known Sara long?"

"Not too long."

"She took care of my grandson. He had asthma real bad. She'd rush over in the middle of the night to help him. Sometimes she'd still be in her pajamas."

Will tried not to think of Sara in her pajamas, though he imagined from Lionel's story that they were probably not the ones his mind had conjured.

"Sara's from good people." He ran his finger along the trim on the door, which, thankfully, Will had done a better job covering. Lionel seemed to agree. "You learned from your mistakes. Got a good fold on this corner here."

"It took me half the day."

"Worth every minute," he approved.

Will felt foolish even as he asked, "Your son isn't Carl Phillips, is he?"

Lionel gave a deep, satisfied laugh. “ ’Cause he’s black and I’m black—”

“No,” Will interrupted, then, “Well, yes.” He felt uncomfortable even as he explained, “There doesn’t seem to be much of a minority population around here.”

“I guess coming from Atlanta, you’ve had a bit of a culture shock.”

He was right. In Atlanta, Will’s white skin made him a minority. Grant County stood as a stark contrast. “I’m sorry.”

“That’s all right. You aren’t the first person to do that. Carl goes to my church, but I don’t know him other than that.”

Will tried to steer the conversation away from his own stupidity. “How do you know I’m from Atlanta?”

“License plate says Fulton County.”

Will smiled patiently.

“All right, you got me,” Lionel relented. “You’re here to look into that stuff with Tommy?”

“Yes, sir.”

“He was a good kid.”

“You knew him?”

“I saw him in town a lot. He’s the kind of kid got thirty different jobs—mowing lawns, walking dogs, hauling trash, helping people move house. Just about everybody in town knew him.”

“How do people feel about him stabbing Brad Stephens?”

“About how you’d expect. Confused. Angry. Torn between thinking there was some mistake and thinking ...” His voice trailed off. “He was a bit tetchy in the head.”

“He’d never been violent before?”

“No, but you never know. Maybe something set him off, turned on the crazy.”

In Will’s experience, people were either prone to violence or not. He didn’t think Tommy Braham was an exception. “Do you think that’s what happened—he just snapped?”

“I don’t know what to think about nothin’ anymore, and that’s the God’s honest truth.” He gave a weary sigh. “Lord, I feel old today.”

“The weather gets into your bones,” Will agreed. He’d broken his hand many years ago, and every time it got cold like this, his fingers ached. “Have you lived here all your life?”

Lionel smiled again, showing his teeth. “When I was a boy, people called where we lived Colored Town.” He turned to Will. “Can you believe that? Colored Town, and now I live on a street with a bunch of professors.” He gave a deep laugh. “A lot’s changed in fifty years.”

“Has the police force?”

Lionel stared openly at Will, as if he was trying to decide how much to say. Finally, he seemed to make up his mind. “Ben Carver was chief when I left town. I wasn’t the only young black man who thought it was a good idea to leave while the gettin’ was good. Joined the army and got this for my trouble.” He knocked on his leg. There was a hollow sound, and Will realized the man wore a prosthetic. “Laos. Nineteen and sixty-four.” Lionel paused for a minute as if to reflect on the loss. “There was two kinds of living for people back then, just like there was two kinds of law under Chief Carver: one for black and one for white.”

"I heard Carver retired."

Lionel nodded approvingly. "Tolliver."

"Was he a good cop?"

"I never met the man, but I can tell you this: A long while back, my father was working at the diner when a lady professor from the college got killed. Everybody saw a black face and made their assumptions. Chief Tolliver spent the night at Daddy's house just to make sure he woke up the next morning."

"It was that bad?"

"Chief Tolliver was that good." Lionel added, "Allison was a good girl, too."

Will got the feeling that they had finally reached the point of Lionel's impromptu visit. "You knew her?"

"I own the diner now. You believe that?" He shook his head as if he still could not believe it himself. "I came back a few years ago and took it off Pete's hands."

"Is business good?"

"It was slow at first, but most days now we're full up. My wife works the books. Sometimes my sister pitches in but it's better if she doesn't."

"When was the last time you saw Allison?"

"Saturday night. We're closed on Sundays. I guess except for Tommy, I was one of the last people to see her alive."

"How was she?"

"Same as usual. Tired. Glad to be getting off work."

"What sort of person was she?"

His throat worked, and he took a few moments to collect himself before he could continue. "I never hire kids from the college. They don't know how to talk to people. They just know how to type into their computers or their phones. No work ethic and nothing's ever their fault no matter how red-handed you catch 'em. Except for Allison. She was different."

"How so?"

"She knew how to work for a living." He pointed to the open gates at the end of Main Street. "Not a kid in that school knows how to do an honest day's work. This economy is their wake-up call. They're gonna have to learn the hard way that a job is something you earn, not something you're given."

Will asked, "Did you know much about Allison's family?"

"Her mama was dead. She had an aunt she didn't talk about much."

"Boyfriend?"

"She had one, but he never bothered her at work."

"Do you know his name?"

"She never mentioned him except in passing, like I'd ask what she was going to do over the weekend and she'd say she was going to study with her boyfriend."

"He never called her or dropped by? Not even once?"

"Not even once," he confirmed. "She was mindful that I was paying for her time, you see. I never saw her on her cell phone. She never had her friends come in and take up her time. It was work for her, and she knew that she had to take care of business."

"Did she make a good living?"

"Hell no." He laughed at what must have been a surprised look on Will's face. "I don't pay much and my customers are cheap—mostly old men and cops, sometimes students from the school who think it's funny to run out on the bill. Or, try to run out. Pretty stupid thinking you're gonna stiff the check in a room full of cops."

"Did she carry a purse or book bag with her?"

"She had this pink book bag with a tassel on the zipper. Left it in her car when she was at work. Except her wallet. She wasn't one'a them primpin' girls, can't stay away from a mirror."

"Was there anyone suspicious hanging around her? Customers who were too attentive?"

"I would've taken care of that myself. Not that I'd need to. That girl was street-smart. She knew how to take care of herself."

"Did she carry a weapon? Maybe pepper spray or a pocket knife?"

"Not that I ever saw." He held up his hands. "Now, don't get the impression she was hard. She was a real sweet girl, one'a them who just wanted to go along to get along. She didn't take to confrontation, but she stood up for herself when it mattered."

"Had her attitude changed lately?"

"She seemed a little more stressed than usual. She asked me a couple of times could she study when we were slow. Don't get me wrong—I'm an easy man to work for so long as you do your job. I let her crack open her books when we weren't busy. I made sure she had a hot meal before she went home."

"Do you know what kind of car she drove?"

"Old Dodge Daytona with Alabama plates. You remember those? Based on the Chrysler G platform. Front-wheel drive, kind of low to the ground."

"Four door?"

"Hatchback. The pistons were blown. She kept the trunk tied down with a bungee cord. I think it's a '92, '93." He tapped his head. "Mind ain't as good as it used to be."

"What color?"

"Red, you could say. Mostly it's primer and rust. Spits out smoke from the tailpipe every time she cranks it."

"Where did she park?"

"Behind the diner. I checked this morning. It's not there."

"Did she ever walk home from work?"

"Sometimes when the weather was good, but it ain't been good in a long while, and she wasn't making her way home." He pointed behind them. "The lake's back there. Behind the station. Behind the diner." He pointed across the street. "When she walked home, she always went that way, out the front door."

"Do you know Gordon Braham?"

"I believe he works for the power company. He also dates the woman who works at the five and dime across from the diner. They come in for lunch every couple'a three days."

"You seem to know a lot about people."

"This is a small town, Mr. Trent. Everybody knows a lot about everybody else. That's why we live here. Cheaper than cable TV."

"Who do you think killed Allison?"

Lionel didn't seem surprised by the question, but he gave the expected answer. "Police say it was Tommy Braham."

"What do you say?"

He looked at his watch. "I say I'd better go fire up the grill before the breakfast crowd comes in." He put his hand on the door, but Will stopped him.

"Mr. Harris, if you think somebody—"

"I don't know what to think," he admitted. "If Tommy didn't do it, then why'd he stab Brad? And why'd he kill himself?"

"You don't think he did it." Will wasn't asking a question.

Lionel gave another weary sigh. "I guess I'm a bit like old Chief Carver. There's good people and there's bad people. Allison was good. Tommy was good. Good people can do bad things, but not that bad."

He started to leave again.

"Can I ask you—" Will waited for him to turn back around. "Why did you come to talk to me?"

"Because I knew Frank wouldn't be knocking on my door. Not that I've been able to tell you much, but I wanted to say something on the girl's behalf. She ain't got nobody speaking up for her right now. It's all about Tommy and why'd he do it, not about Allison and what a good girl she was."

"Why do you think Chief Wallace wouldn't want to talk to you?"

"Meet the new boss, same as the old boss."

Will knew he didn't mean Jeffrey Tolliver. "Ben Carver?"

"Frank and Ben—they were cut from the same cloth. White cloth, if you catch my drift."

"I think I do."

Lionel still had his hand on the door handle. "When I got back to town after Daddy died, I saw a lot of people had changed. On the outside, I'm talking—not on the inside. You gotta go through a special kind of hell or a special kind of love to change who you are inside. Outside's a whole different story." He rubbed his beard, probably thinking about the gray in it. "Now, Miss Sara, she got prettier. Her daddy Mr. Eddie got more hair sprouting out of his eyebrows. My sister got older and fatter, which ain't never a good combination for a woman."

"And Frank?"

"He got careful," Lionel said. "I may not be living in Colored Town anymore, but I still remember what it feels like to have that man's foot on my neck." He pulled the handle on the door. "You get you a heat gun and work it just the tiniest little bit around that leather on your glove box and you'll be able to get that kink out." He picked up his leg so he could get out of the car. "Just a tiny bit, though. Too much heat, and you'll burn a hole right through." He stared his meaning into Will. "Not too much heat, son."

"I appreciate your advice."

Lionel struggled to get out of the Porsche, finally gripping the roof and pulling himself up. He steadied himself on the cane and held out his hand, giving Will a gymnast's finish and a "tah-dah," before gently closing the door.

Will watched Lionel lean heavily on the cane as he made his way up the street. He stopped in front of the hardware store to talk to a man who was sweeping debris from the sidewalk. The rain had died down, and they seemed to be taking their time. Will imagined they were talking about Allison Spooner and Tommy Braham. In a place as small as Grant County, there wouldn't be anything else to occupy people's minds.

An old Cadillac pulled into the parking lot. Even from a distance, the gospel music hummed in Will's ears. Marla Simms parked her car as far from Will's as she could. She checked her makeup in the mirror, arranged her glasses—did all of the things that made it obvious she was ignoring him—before getting out of the car.

He walked across the lot to meet her, putting as much cheer into his voice as he could manage. "Good morning, Mrs. Simms."

She tossed him a wary look. "No one's here yet."

"I see that." He held up his briefcase. "I thought I'd go ahead and get set up. If you wouldn't mind bringing me the evidence from the lake and anything collected from Tommy Braham's person?"

Marla didn't bother to acknowledge him as she threw back the bolt on the door. She turned on the lights and walked into the lobby. Again, she leaned over the gate and buzzed herself through. Will caught the door before it latched closed.

"Cold in here," Will said. "Something wrong with the furnace?"

"The furnace is fine," she said defensively.

"Is it new?"

"Do I look like I work for the furnace company?"

"Mrs. Simms, I'd be lying if I didn't say that you look like you know everything that goes on in this station, if not the entire town."

She made a grumbling noise as she took the carafe from the coffeemaker.

"Did you know Tommy Braham?"

"Yes."

"What was he like?"

"Slow."

"What about Allison Spooner?"

"Not slow."

Will smiled. "I should thank you, Mrs. Simms, for those incident reports you sent to my partner last night. It shows an interesting pattern with Tommy. He'd had some trouble with his temper lately. Is that what you wanted me to know?"

She gave him a look over her glasses, but her mouth stayed closed as she walked to the back of the room. Will watched her push open the heavy steel door. She'd left him alone in the dark.

He went to the fax machine and checked under the table, giving Marla Simms the benefit of the doubt. There were no loose pages underneath, no 911 transcript that had fallen through the cracks. He opened the copier and saw the glass staring back at him. Something sticky was in the center. Will used his thumbnail to pry off the substance, which would transfer to every copy made on the machine. He held it up to the light. Glue, maybe? Gum?

He flicked it into the trashcan. None of the copies Sara had made for him yesterday showed a mark. Maybe someone else had used the machine after her and unwittingly transferred the gum onto the glass.

The office on the side of the squad room was empty, just as he'd thought. Will tried the knob. The door was unlocked. He went in and opened the blinds, giving him a nice view of the desks where the detectives sat. There were nail holes in the walls. In the slim ray of light coming through the outside window, he could see the shadows where photographs had once been. The desk was empty but for a telephone. All the drawers were cleaned out. The chair squeaked when he sat down.

If he was the betting type, Will would have put ten bucks on this being Jeffrey Tolliver's old office.

He opened his briefcase and set out his files. Finally, the overhead lights flickered on. Will saw Marla through the glass in the wall. She stared at him, mouth open. With her tight bun and dirty glasses, she looked like one of those beady old ladies from a Gary Larson comic strip. Will plastered a smile on his face, tossed her a wave. Marla gripped the handle of the carafe so hard he could almost feel her desire to smash the glass into his face.

Will reached into his pocket and found his digital recorder. Every cop in the world kept a spiral notebook in which to record details of their investigations. Will did not have that luxury, but he'd learned to compensate.

He checked the window for Marla before putting the recorder to his ear and pressing play. The volume was low, and he heard Faith's voice reading Tommy Braham's confession. Will had not wasted the entire night worrying about his schoolgirl crush on Sara Linton. He'd prepared himself for the day by reading every single word in the reports and listening to Tommy Braham's confession over and over again until he had memorized almost every word. He listened to the whole thing again in the office, the cadence of Faith's voice so familiar that he could have spoken along with her.

Her tone was dispassionate, offering no inflection. "I was in Allison's apartment. This was last night. I don't know what time. Pippy, my dog, was sick. It was after I took her to the doctor. Allison said she would have sex with me. We started to have sex. She changed her mind. I got mad. I had a knife on me. I stabbed her once in the neck. I took the extra chain and lock and drove her to the lake. I wrote the note so people would think she had killed herself. Allison was sad. I thought that would be reason enough."

There were murmurs in the squad room. Will glanced up to find a couple of uniformed cops staring at him in disbelief. One of them started toward the office, probably to confront him, but his partner stopped him.

Will leaned back in the chair, hearing the squeak again. He took out his cell phone and called Faith. She picked up on the fourth ring. Her hello was more like a grunt.

"Did I wake you up?"

"It's seven-thirty in the morning. Of course you woke me up."

"I can call back."

"Just gimme a minute." He heard her moving around. She yawned so loudly that Will felt his own jaw twitching to open. "I pulled up some info on Lena Adams."

"And?"

She yawned again. "Let me get to my laptop."

Will couldn't stop his own yawn. "I'm sorry I got you out of bed."

"You've got me until four this afternoon. That's when I meet my doctor at the hospital."

Will started talking so she wouldn't explain the procedure again. "That's great, Faith. I guess your mom is driving you. She must be excited. What about your brother? Have you called him?"

"You can shut up now. I'm at my computer." He heard keys being tapped. "Salena Marie Adams," Faith said, probably reading from the woman's personnel file. "Detective first grade. Thirty-five years old. Five-four and a hundred and twenty pounds." Faith mumbled a curse. "God, that's enough to make me hate her right there."

"What about her history?"

"She was raped."

Will was taken aback by her abruptness. He'd been expecting date of birth, maybe some commendations. Sara had said that she suspected Lena had been raped by her ex-boyfriend, but he'd been under the impression no formal charges had been filed. He asked Faith, "How do you know that?"

"The case came up when I cross-referenced her file. You really should Google more."

"When did it happen?"

"Ten years ago." He heard her fingers pecking the keyboard. "Her file is pretty clean. She's worked some interesting cases. You remember that south Georgia pedophile ring awhile back? She and Tolliver broke it open."

"Does she have any black marks?"

"Small-town forces don't air their dirty laundry on paper," Faith reminded him. "She took some time off the job six years ago. She worked security at the college less than a year, then went back on the job. That's all I've got on her. Have you found anything else?"

"I had an interesting conversation with the man who runs the diner this morning."

"What did he say?"

"Not a whole lot. Allison was a good kid. Hard worker. He didn't know much about her personal life."

"Do you think he killed her?"

"He's sixty-something years old with a fake leg."

"A real fake leg?"

Will thought about Lionel knocking on the prosthesis, the hollow sound. "I'll see if I can confirm it, but he was putting on quite an act if the leg is real."

"You never know with those small towns. Ed Gein was a babysitter."

Faith was never one to miss an opportunity to compare a kindly old man to one of the twentieth century's most notorious serial killers.

She said, "Spoooner's background check didn't offer much, either. She's got a bank account with eighteen dollars and change. She must be a cash-and-carry gal. The only checks she's written in the last six months are to the college and the campus bookstore. The statements are delivered to the Taylor Drive address. Other than that, she's got no credit cards. No utilities in her name. No credit history. No cell phone on record. No car."

"The old guy at the diner says she drove a Dodge Daytona with Alabama plates."

"It must be registered in someone else's name. Do you think the locals know about it?"

"I don't know. My source also says that Allison had a pink book bag she kept in the car when she was working."

"Hold on a second." Faith was obviously doing something on her computer.

"All right, I'm not finding any BOLOs for the car coming out of Grant County or any towns in the vicinity." If Frank Wallace knew about Allison's car, he would have posted a "be on the lookout" to all neighboring counties.

Will said, "Maybe they already know where the car is but they don't want me to find it."

"I'm posting a BOLO around the state right now. Your chief will have to tell his boys to look for it during their briefing this morning."

"It's an old car. Allison's lived here a couple of years without changing the plates."

"College town. Wouldn't be odd to have cars with out-of-state tags. The only reason not to register a car is because it's not insured," Faith pointed out. "I'd buy that. This girl was living on the margins. She barely made a blip on the radar."

Will saw that the squad room was filling up. The crowd of cops had gotten bigger. A more fearful man might call them a growing mob. They kept stealing looks at Will. Marla was pouring them coffee, glaring at him over her shoulder. And then, as if on cue, they all looked toward the front door. Will wondered if Frank Wallace had deigned to make an appearance, but quickly saw this was not the case. A woman with olive skin and curly, shoulder-length brown hair joined the group. She was the smallest in the bunch, but they parted for her like the Red Sea.

Will told Faith, "I think Detective Adams has decided to grace us with her presence."

"How does she look?"

Lena had spotted him. Her eyes burned with hatred.

He said, "She looks like she wants to rip out my throat with her teeth."

"Be careful. You know you have a weakness for bitchy, spiteful women."

Will didn't bother to argue. Lena Adams had the same color skin and hair as Angie, though she was obviously of Latin descent, whereas Angie's origins were vaguely Mediterranean. Lena was shorter, more athletic. There was none of Angie's womanliness about her—Lena was too cop for that—but she was an attractive woman. She also seemed to share Angie's talent for stirring things up. Several of the cops were staring at Will with open hostility now. It wouldn't be long before someone grabbed a pitchfork.

Faith asked, "What's this email from you?" She answered her own question. "Julie Smith. All right, I'll see if I can trace the number. The warrant for Tommy Braham's phone records shouldn't be a problem considering he's dead, but I may need an official cause of death before we get access."

Will kept his eyes on Lena. She was saying something to the group. Probably telling them to check their weapons. "Can you fudge that a little? Julie Smith told Sara that Tommy texted her from jail. The transcript might help find out who she is. Maybe Amanda can call in some favors."

"Oh, great. Just who I want to talk to first thing in the morning."

"Can you get her to rush through a search warrant for the garage, too? I want to show the locals what proper procedure looks like."

"I'm sure she'll fall over herself trying to accommodate your requests." Faith gave a heavy groan. "Anything else you want me to ask her?"

"Tell her I want my testicles back."

"They're probably already at the bronzer."

Lena took off her jacket and threw it on a desk. "I need to go." Will hung up the phone just as the detective stomped toward the office.

Will stood up. He gave one of his winning smiles. "You must be Detective Adams. I'm so glad to finally meet you."

She stared at the hand he offered. He thought for a minute she might rip it off.

"Is there something wrong, Detective?"

She was obviously so angry she could barely speak. "This office—"

"I hope you don't mind," Will interrupted. "It was empty, and I want to make sure I stay out of your way." His hand was still extended between them. "We're not to that point yet where you can't shake my hand. Are we, Detective?"

"We passed that point the minute you sat behind that desk."

Will dropped his hand. "I was expecting Chief Wallace."

"Interim Chief," she corrected, just as raw as Sara on the subject. "Frank's at the hospital with Brad."

"I heard Detective Stephens had a rough night, but he seems all right this morning."

She didn't answer him, which was just as well. Her accent was full of south Georgia twang, and anger made her words blend like cake batter.

Will indicated the chair. "Please have a seat."

"I'll stand."

"Hope you don't mind if I sit." The chair squeaked as he settled back in it. Will steepled his fingers together. He noticed that a pen was clipped to Lena's breast pocket. It was silver, a Cross just like the one Larry Knox had clipped to his shirt last night. Will glanced at the group of officers who were milling around the coffee machine. They all had pens clipped to their chest pockets, too.

Will smiled. "I'm sure your chief already told you why I'm here."

He saw her eye twitch. "Tommy."

"Right, Tommy Braham, and by extension, Allison Spooner. I hope we can wrap this up quickly. I'm sure we'd all rather have this off our plate going into Thanksgiving."

"This good-guy bullshit isn't really going to work with me."

"We both have badges, Detective. Don't you think you should try to cooperate so we can get to the truth of this matter?"

"You know what I think?" She crossed her arms high on her chest. "I think you're down here where you don't belong, sleeping in places you have no right, and trying to get a lot of good people into trouble for shit that's beyond their control."

There was a loud knock at the open door. Marla Simms stood ramrod straight, a medium-sized cardboard box gripped between her hands. She walked to the desk and dropped the box with a thud in front of Will.

"Thank you," he told her retreating back. "Mrs. Simms?" She didn't turn, but she stopped. "If you don't mind, I need the audiotape of the 911 call reporting Allison Spooner's alleged suicide."

She left without acknowledging the request.

Will looked over the top of the box, eyeing the contents. There were several plastic evidence bags, obviously taken from the scene of Allison Spooner's death. A pair of white sneakers was in one. Streaks of mud went up the sides and stuck into the treads.

The ring and watch mentioned in Lena's report were in the other bag. He studied the ring, which was cheap, the sort of thing you gave a girl when you were fifteen and spending fifty dollars on a piece of jewelry from the locked display at Walgreens was a big deal.

He held up the ring. "I gave my wife one of these when we were kids."

Lena's nasty look resembled the same one Angie had shown Will when he'd given her the ring.

He pulled another bag out of the box. There was a closed wallet inside. Will managed to pry it open through the plastic. He found a photo of an older woman beside a young girl and another photograph of an orange cat. There were some bills in the cash compartment. Allison Spooner's student ID and driver's license were tucked in the back sleeves.

Will looked at the girl's picture. Faith had guessed right. Allison was very pretty. She also looked younger than her given age. Maybe it was her size. She seemed delicate, almost fragile. He flipped back to the photograph of the older woman, realizing now that the girl beside her was Allison Spooner. The picture had obviously been taken a few years ago. Allison looked like a teenager.

He asked Lena, "Is this all you found in the wallet?" He listed it out for her. "Two photos, forty bucks, the license, and student ID?"

She was staring at the open wallet in his hands. "Frank catalogued it."

Not exactly an answer, but Will knew that he'd need to choose his battles. He saw there was one more evidence bag in the box. He guessed it contained the contents of Tommy Braham's pockets. "Gum, thirty-eight cents, and a metal Monopoly game piece of a car." He looked back up at Lena. "He didn't have a wallet on him?"

"No."

"Cell phone?"

"Is there one in the bag?"

Her combative answers were telling him more than she realized. Will asked, "What about his clothes and shoes? Any blood on them? Any stains?"

"Per protocol for a suicide in custody, Frank sent them to the lab. Your lab."

"The Central GBI lab in Dry Branch?"

She nodded.

"What about the sheath?"

She seemed confused.

"In Tommy's confession, he said he had a knife on him when he killed Allison. I imagine he had a sheath on his belt? A knife sheath?"

She shook her head. "He probably got rid of it."

"He doesn't mention in his confession what kind of knife he used."

"No, he doesn't."

"Did you find any knives in the house where Tommy lived?"

"We can't search his house without a warrant or permission from his father, who's the owner of the property."

Well, at least she knew the law. That she was choosing to follow it now was a bit of a mystery. "Are you assuming Tommy used the same knife to stab Detective Stephens that he used to kill Allison Spooner?"

Lena was silent for a few seconds. She had conducted enough interviews to recognize what a corner felt like when it was pressing against your back. "I've found in my career that it's better not to make assumptions about what a suspect will and will not do."

"That's a valuable lesson for any officer," he allowed. "Any reason why the Spooner evidence wasn't sent to Central?"

She hesitated again. "I assume because the case is closed."

"You're sure about that?"

"Tommy ran from the police. He stabbed a police officer. He confessed to the crime. He killed himself because he couldn't take the guilt. I'm not sure how you do it in Atlanta, but down here we generally stop throwing money at an investigation once it's closed."

Will rubbed the back of his neck. "I really wish you'd sit down. This is going to take a while and I don't think I can keep looking up at you without getting a crick."

"What's going to take a while?"

"Detective Adams, perhaps you don't comprehend the import of this investigation. I'm here to interview you about the death of a prisoner who was in your custody, in your jail, in your town. In addition to that, a young woman was murdered. A police officer was badly wounded. This isn't going to be a quick chat over coffee and doughnuts, not least of all because I've been advised not to take any food from y'all that isn't sealed in a container." He smiled. She didn't smile back. "Would you please sit down so we can talk to each other like rational people?" She still didn't move, and Will took it a step further. "If you'd rather go to one of the interrogation rooms instead of being in your dead chief's office, then I'd be more than happy to accommodate you."

Her jaw tightened. They had a long, drawn-out staring match that Will nearly lost. Lena was hard to look at. Her pain and exhaustion showed on every line of her face. Her eyes were swollen, the whites shot through with red. Her hand was resting on the chair in front of her, yet still she swayed, as if her knees wanted to give out.

Finally, she said, "Yes."

"Yes, what?"

"Yes, I think you're the enemy." Still, she pulled out the chair and sat down.

"I appreciate your candor."

"Whatever." She kept opening and closing her fist. He saw two flesh-colored Band-Aids wrapped around the palm of her hand. Her fingers looked swollen.

He asked, "That happen yesterday?"

She didn't answer.

Will took a red folder out of his briefcase and left it unopened on the desk. Lena glanced down nervously. "Would you like a lawyer present?"

"Do I need one?"

"You should know better than to ask an investigator for legal advice, Detective. How about your union rep?"

She gave a short, sharp laugh. "We don't have unions down here. We barely have uniforms."

He should have remembered. "Do I need to remind you of your Miranda rights?"

"No."

"Should I mention that lying to a state investigator during the course of an active investigation is a felony that can result in fines and imprisonment up to five years?"

"Didn't you just do that?"

"I guess I did. Where was she stabbed?"

He'd caught her off guard. "What?"

"Allison Spooner. Where was she stabbed?"

"Here." She put her hand to the back of her neck, her fingers resting a few inches from the spine.

"Was that the only wound?"

She opened her mouth, then closed it. Finally, she answered, "As you said, Frank noticed ligature marks around her wrist."

"Did you notice them?"

"The body was in the water for a long time. I'm not sure what I saw except for the knife wound in the neck."

The detail bothered him, mostly because it was the first point where Frank Wallace's story didn't dovetail with Lena's. "Have you found Spooner's car?"

"She doesn't have one."

"That strikes me as odd."

"It's a college town. Kids walk everywhere or drive their scooters." Lena shrugged. "If they need to go somewhere, they can usually bum a ride."

"Could Allison have a car without you knowing about it?"

"Not at the school. They'll tow you if you take up two spaces. They're really good about policing the campus. And, there aren't a lot of places around town to ditch a car, either. I can put out a BOLO at the morning briefing if you want, but it's a dead end. This isn't Atlanta. If people see abandoned cars, they call the police."

Will studied Lena, trying to read any deceit. "What about Allison's boss at the diner? Have you talked to him?"

"Lionel Harris. Frank said he talked to him last night. He doesn't know anything."

Either Frank had lied or Lena was making things up as she went along.

Will asked, "How does Mr. Harris look for the murder?"

"He's got one leg and he's older than Jesus."

"I'll take that as an unlikely." Will opened the red folder. The photocopy of Tommy Braham's confession was on top. He saw a flash of recognition in Lena's eyes. "Take me through it."

"Which part?"

He knew she was expecting him to get straight to the point—the stabbing, what went down outside the garage. He went the opposite direction, hoping to throw her off. "Let's start with you bringing Tommy Braham into the station and work our way forward. Did he say anything in the car?"

"No."

Will hadn't yet seen the booking pictures or the crime scene photos Sara had taken of Tommy Braham in the cell, but he knew that a cop had been stabbed while two other able-bodied officers were at the scene. He hazarded a guess about what happened next. "What condition was Tommy in at this time?"

She stared at him blankly.

"Did he fall down a couple of times during the arrest?"

Again, she took her time. "You'll have to ask Frank about that. I was tending to Brad."

"You saw Tommy in the car. What kind of state was he in?"

Lena pulled a spiral-bound notebook out of her back pocket. She slowly flipped to the pages she wanted. Will saw the paper was taped back into the notebook and assumed these were the originals Sara had photocopied last night.

Lena cleared her throat. "I brought in the suspect, Thomas Adam Braham, at approximately eight-thirty yesterday morning." Lena scrutinized him. "You're not going to take notes?"

"Why, do you want to let me borrow your pen?"

Her composure cracked just a tiny bit, and Will saw what he had been looking for from the minute Lena walked into the room. No matter what she thought about Tommy Braham, she was upset about his death. Not upset because it might get her into trouble, but upset because he was a human being who had been in her care.

Will said, "I've already read your notes, Detective. Tell me the parts that aren't on the pages."

She started picking at the Band-Aid.

"Who did the death notifications?"

"I did."

"On both Spooner and Braham?"

She nodded. "Elba, where Allison's from, is a small town. The detective I talked to went to school with her. He says her mother died eight years ago. The father's unknown. There's an aunt, Sheila McGhee, but she's not home much. She works for a crew that's remodeling roach motels along the Panhandle. The detective's going to try to track her down. I left a message on her answering machine, but she won't hear it until she gets home or calls to check her messages."

She was actually sounding like a detective now. Will asked, "No cell phone?"

"Not that I can find."

"Was there an address book in Allison's apartment?"

"We didn't have time to do a search." Her tone became clipped again. "A lot was going on yesterday. My partner was bleeding to death in the street."

"I'd like to know when Ms. McGhee returns your call."

She nodded.

"What about Tommy's relations?"

"There's just his dad, Gordon. I talked to him early this morning, told him what happened."

"How did he take it?"

"No father wants to hear that his son's confessed to murder."

"How did he take the suicide?"

"About how you'd expect." Lena looked down at her notes, though Will could tell she was buying time to collect herself. "Gordon's driving up from Florida right now. I don't know how long that'll take. Seven, maybe eight hours."

Will wondered where Frank Wallace was in all of this, and why the hardest parts of the case had fallen to Lena. He asked, "Did you know Allison Spooner?"

"Half the town did. She worked at the diner down the street."

"Did you know her?"

"I never met her."

"You don't go to the diner?"

"Why does that matter?" She wasn't looking for an answer. "Tommy laid it all out. You've got his confession right in front of you. He said that he wanted to have sex with her. She didn't. So he killed her."

"How long did it take for him to confess?"

"He dicked around for about an hour, then I got it out of him."

"Did he offer an alibi? Initially, I mean."

"He said he was at the vet. He's got this dog, Pippy. She swallowed a sock or something. Tommy took her to the emergency vet over on Conford. The office staff can't vouch for him being there the entire time."

"Does he have a car?"

"A green Chevy Malibu. It's at the shop. Tommy said the starter's been acting up. He dropped the keys in the lockbox at Earnshaw's yesterday morning."

Will hadn't been expecting that. "Earnshaw?"

"Sara's uncle."

"Is there security footage of the lot?"

"No, but I called the garage. The car is there." She shrugged. "Tommy could've left it there after he killed Allison."

"Have you searched the car?"

"I planned on doing that today." Her tone indicated that Will was the major obstacle standing between her and doing her job.

Will didn't back down. "How did Tommy know Allison?"

"She rented space from his dad—a converted garage apartment." Lena looked at her watch.

"What was Tommy like?"

"Stupid," she told him. "Slow in his thinking. I'm sure Sara's already told you all about it."

"According to Dr. Linton, Tommy's IQ was around eighty. He wasn't bright, but he held down a job at the bowling alley. He was a good kid. Good except for the trouble he'd been in lately."

"I'd call murder a bit more than trouble."

"I was referring to the incident reports."

She hid her surprise well, but he could see the flicker of a question in her eyes.

"There are three reports detailing altercations over the last month. Mrs. Simms was kind enough to provide them." She remained silent, so he asked, "You knew about them, right?"

Still, Lena didn't respond. Will slid the incident reports across the desk so she could see them.

She skimmed the summaries. "Small problems. He obviously had a temper."

"Who told you to arrest Tommy for Allison's murder?"

"Frank—" She looked like she wanted to take back the word. "Frank and I discussed it. It was a joint decision."

At least he knew what she looked like when she was lying. The bad news was that her lying face looked a lot like her honest one. "When did you first hear there was a body in the lake?"

"Brad called me around three yesterday morning. I woke everybody else up, started the investigation."

"Have you talked to any of Allison's teachers at school?"

"They're all off for Thanksgiving break. I've got phone numbers for them, but I haven't made any calls yet. Most of them are local. They're not going anywhere. I was going to track them down this morning, but ..." She held out her arms, indicating the space between them.

"What else were you going to track down?" He listed out her plans so far. "Talk to the teachers. Maybe talk to the office staff at the vet. Look at Tommy's car. Try to track down Allison's known associates. I guess you'd get that through the school, maybe Lionel Harris?"

She shrugged. "Maybe."

"Were you planning on talking to Tommy again? Had he lived, I mean."

"Yes."

"Why?"

"I wanted to get his confession on tape. He was a compelling witness against himself."

"But everything else made sense to you—his motivations, stabbing her in the neck?"

"There were things I wanted to clear up. Obviously, I wanted to find the murder weapon. I assume it's in his garage somewhere. Or his car. He must have taken Allison to the lake. There would have been trace evidence. Stop me if any of this reminds you of something you might have read in a textbook when you were in GBI school."

"That's a good word to use for it—'textbook.'" He pointed out, "Seems like a lot of work for a case you considered closed. Isn't that what you told me a few minutes ago, that it was closed?"

She stared at him again. Will knew she was waiting for him to ask about the 911 call.

He said, "You must be tired."

"I'm fine."

"You've had a pretty tough couple of days." He indicated her field notes. "You got Brad's call around three a.m. yesterday. Suspected suicide. You went to the lake. Found Spooner was dead, possibly murdered. Went to Spooner's house and your boss got hurt, your partner got stabbed. You arrested Tommy. Got his confession. I'm sure you were at the hospital all night."

"What's your point?"

"Was Tommy a malicious person?"

She didn't equivocate. "No."

"Did he show any anger during your interrogation?"

She was silent again, gathering her thoughts. "I don't think he planned to hurt Brad. But he did stab him. And he killed Allison, so ..."

"So?"

She crossed her arms again. "Look, we're just going in circles here. What happened to Tommy was bad, but he confessed to killing Allison Spooner. He stabbed my partner. Frank was hurt."

Will carefully weighed her words. She obviously believed Tommy was guilty of killing Allison Spooner. She got sketchier when she talked about Brad Stephens being stabbed and Frank Wallace getting cut.

Lena checked her watch again. "Are we finished here?"

She was very good at this, but she couldn't keep it up forever. "The lake is behind the station, right?"

"Right."

"Between the college and Lover's Point."

"Not exactly between."

"Do you think I can borrow a jacket?"

"What?"

"A raincoat. Jacket. Whatever you have." Will stood up from the desk. "I'd like for us to go for a walk."

The rain had turned unrelenting, dark clouds rolling across the sky, tossing down buckets of water that all seemed to fall directly on Will's head. He was wearing a police-issue jacket meant for a man with considerably more girth than Will carried. The sleeves hung down past his thumbs. The hood fell into his eyes. The reflective panels on the back and front slapped against him with every step.

Will had always had trouble finding clothes that fit, but usually the opposite was the problem: short cuffs, tight seams stretching against his shoulders. He had been expecting Lena to offer him one of her own coats as a sort of joke. Apparently, she had come up with a better idea. Will stared down at the stitching on the breast pocket as they made their way around the lake. The jacket belonged to Officer Carl Phillips.

He stuck his hands into the pockets as the wind picked up. He could feel some latex gloves, a measuring tape, a plastic pen, and a small flashlight. At least he hoped it was a small flashlight. Despite Lena's worst intentions, the jacket was nice, a North Face rip-off with tons of zippered pockets and enough insulation to keep the wind out. Will had the brand-name version back at home. He hadn't brought it because in Atlanta, cold weather never lasted more than a few days, and even then, the sun came up to burn off the chill. The thought of the jacket hanging in his closet gave him a longing to be back home that surprised him.

Lena stopped, turning back toward the police station. She raised her voice to be heard over the rain. "The college is back there, past the station."

Will guessed they had been walking for about fifteen minutes. He could barely make out a bunch of buildings resting in the curve of the lake just beyond the police station.

Lena said, "There's no reason for Allison to walk this way."

"Where's Lover's Point?"

She pointed in the opposite direction. "That cove about a half mile away."

Will followed the line of her finger to the indentation in the shoreline. The cove was smaller than he'd thought it would be. Or perhaps the distance made it seem that way. Large boulders were scattered along the shore. He imagined people built campfires when the weather was better. It looked like the kind of place a family might pull up a boat to for a long picnic.

"Are we just going to stand here?" Lena had her hands deep in her pockets, head down against the wind. Will didn't need ESP to figure out she didn't want to be out here in the pouring rain. It was so cold by the water that he had to fight to keep his teeth from chattering.

He asked, "Where are the roads again?"

She gave him a look that said she wasn't going to play this game much longer. "There." She pointed into the distance. "That's the fire road. It hasn't been used in years. We checked it when we pulled the body out of the lake. Nothing's there."

"That's the only egress from here to Lover's Point, right?"

"Like I showed you on the map back at the station."

Will had never been good with maps. "That place over there." He pointed to an area just past the cove. "That's the second road that people normally use to get to the cove, right?"

"Empty, like I told you. We checked it, all right? We're not total morons. We checked for cars. We checked for tire tracks, footprints. We checked both roads and neither one of them showed any signs of use."

Will tried to get his bearings. The sun wasn't doing much to help light the way. The sky was so dark that it could've been nighttime instead of smack in the middle of morning. "Where's the residential area?"

She pointed across the lake. "That's where Sara lives. Her parents. Over here"—she pointed farther along—"all of this shoreline, including where we're standing, belongs to the State Forestry Division."

"Do people take their boats out?"

"There's a dock at the campus for the rowing teams. A lot of the homeowners go boating during the summer. No one would be stupid enough to be out here in this rain."

"Except us." Will put as much cheer into his voice as he could muster. "Let's keep going."

She trudged along ahead of him. Will could see her sneakers were soaked. The running shoes he had found in the back of his car weren't faring much better. Allison's shoes, or at least the ones found near her body, were dirty, but not caked in mud. If she had walked along the shore, the terrain had been a lot harder than the red Georgia clay that was sliding out from under his feet.

Will had checked the weekly weather report last night on his computer. Temperatures had been lower the morning Allison was found, but the same rain they were seeing now had been pounding down the night before. It was a good time to kill somebody. Trace evidence on the shore would be lost. The cold water would make guessing when the murder occurred next to impossible. Except for the 911 caller, no one would have known there was a body in the lake.

Lena slipped in the mud. Will reached out, catching her before she fell into the water. She was so light that he could almost pick her up with one hand.

"Christ." She braced her hand against a tree. She was breathing hard. He realized she had been walking fast to keep a few paces between them.

Will asked, "Are you okay?"

She pushed away from the tree, a look of determination on her face. Will watched her feet as she picked her way across the large roots and fallen branches that riddled the shoreline. He had no way of knowing whether or not Allison had made her way to Lover's Point along this same route. His goal was to get Lena Adams out of the station, out of her element, so that she would talk to him. Between the pounding rain and the rough going, he was thinking that it might be wise to set the bar lower. For instance, he could aim not to let them both freeze to death.

Lena was so certain that Tommy Braham had killed Allison Spooner—just as certain as Sara was that Tommy had not. Will felt caught in the middle, and was mindful that it would be wrong to let either woman influence his thinking. He supposed for Lena the question of Tommy's innocence carried with it a lot more guilt than she wanted to shoulder. To believe otherwise would mean that the kid had killed himself for nothing. That she had given him the means—and the motivation—to take his life. For Sara's part, admitting Tommy was a murderer would mean admitting that Lena wasn't as ruthless as she wanted to believe.

Will didn't feel the rain let up so much as hear it. The constant tapping of water against leaves died down to a gentle whisper. He heard a bird, a bunch of crickets. Up ahead, a large tree blocked the path. Thick roots jutted into the air, earth dripping from the tendrils. Lena lifted herself up and over. Will followed her, looking around, trying to get his bearings again. They were near the fire road. At least he thought they were.

"There," she said, pointing to a pile of stacked logs. "That's the end of the road." She took off her hood. Will followed suit. Two strips of earth about the width of the front end of a car lined the road for about ten feet, then gave way to thick forest. He understood why Lena was convinced the road was untraveled. You'd need a bulldozer to get through.

She told him, "The road on the other side is the one most people use, but it's about a hundred yards west of the cove. I told you, we had to clear out a path to get the emergency vehicles back here."

Will guessed they hadn't been looking for tire tracks on the way to a suicide. They had probably destroyed any evidence of another car out by the cove. He asked, "If Allison didn't have a car, how did she get here?"

Lena stared at him. "Tommy brought her here."

"But you just said you checked for cars."

"He had a scooter. He could've used that."

Will agreed, but he couldn't see Tommy balancing a dead body on the handlebars while he maneuvered his way through the forest. "Where was she before Tommy killed her?"

"Home, waiting to be killed." She stamped her feet to fight the cold. "All right. The school library closed at noon on Sunday. She could've been there."

"What about work?"

"The diner's closed on Sunday."

"Would Allison go this way to get home?"

Lena shook her head. "She would go through the woods across from the station. She'd be home in ten minutes."

At least she was being honest about that. Lionel Harris had told Will the same thing. He asked, "So, why was Allison here?"

Lena dug her hands into her pockets as the breeze picked up.

"Detective?"

"She was here because Tommy brought her here." She started walking again, trudging through the mud. Her shoes made a sucking sound with every step.

Will's stride was twice Lena's. He caught up with her easily. "Let's profile our killer.”

She snorted a laugh. “You believe in that shit?”

“Not really, but we’ve got some time on our hands.”

“This is stupid.” She slipped again, but caught herself. “Are you really going to make me walk all the way to the cove?”

If Will could make her do anything, it would be for her to tell the truth. That didn’t seem to be an option, so he said, “Let’s do the profile.”

“Sure,” she muttered, pushing forward. “He’s a retarded kid between the ages of nineteen and nineteen and a half who drives a green Chevy Malibu and lives with his father.”

“Let’s take Tommy out of this for just a minute.”

She gave him a wary look.

Will asked, “What took place?”

Lena picked her way around another fallen tree.

“What took place?” he repeated.

She let her reluctance hang on every word. “You mean the murder?”

“Right. What happened?”

“Allison Spooner was stabbed in the neck Sunday night or early Monday morning.”

“Was it messy?”

She shrugged, but then said, “Probably. There’s all kinds of stuff in the neck. Arteries and veins. There would’ve been a lot of blood, which explains why Tommy had a bucket and sponge at Allison’s apartment. He was trying to clean up the mess.”

“Why did it happen?”

She laughed, incredulous. “This is profiling?”

Will’s version, at least. He didn’t share Lena’s certainty. She was so sure she was right about Tommy Braham that she hadn’t considered the possibility that a savage killer might be sharpening his knife for the next victim. “Why did the killer decide to kill? Anger? Opportunity? Money?”

“He killed her because she wouldn’t have sex with him. Did you actually read his confession?”

“I thought we were going to take Tommy out of this.” She shook her head, and Will tried again, “Just humor me, Detective. Let’s say there’s some mystery killer out there who wanted Allison dead. Other than Tommy Braham.”

“That’s quite a fantasy considering he admitted to doing it.”

He took her elbow to help her over a large puddle. “Did the murderer bring the weapon to the scene?”

Lena seemed to consider the question. “Maybe. He also had the cinder blocks, the chain, and lock.”

Will assumed the blocks and chain had been planted at the scene ahead of time, but now didn’t seem like a good time to bring up the theory. “So, this was premeditated.”

“Or, these were things lying around his house.” She added, “On Taylor Drive.”

Will didn’t rise to the bait. If Allison was killed at the lake rather than the garage, then Lena’s whole theory about Tommy’s guilt started to break down. He asked, “Was the killer angry?”

“The wound in her neck is pretty violent.”

"But not furious. That's controlled. Deliberate."

"He probably freaked out when he got a mouthful of blood back in his face." She jumped over a puddle. "What else?"

"Let's look at what we know: Our killer is organized. Not opportunistic. Has good knowledge of the area. He knows Allison. He drives a car."

She nodded. "I'd buy that."

"Go over the sequence of events."

Lena stopped. They were about thirty feet away from the cove. "All right. Tommy, or your mystery guy, kills Allison, brings her here." She squinted her eyes. "Probably he lays her down on the shore. He wraps the chains around her waist, ties her to the cinder blocks, then tosses her into the water."

"Tosses her how?"

Lena stared at the cove. Will could almost hear her mind working. "He would have to carry her. She was found about fifteen feet out in the water, where the bottom drops off. The cinder blocks were heavy. Maybe he would've floated her out to the water, then bolted the chain and blocks around her. That makes more sense. There's no way she could have been thrown in the water from the shore and ended up there."

Will kept leading her along. "So, the killer walks her into the water, then chains her down. It was cold that night."

"He'd need waders or something. He'd have to get back into his car to drive away. What's the point of disposing of the body in water if you're going to take the lake with you back into the car?"

"Being in the water wouldn't necessarily be a bad idea."

"Right. He would've been covered in blood."

"Our killer didn't want the body found. He walked her out to the deep end so she'd stay there. He weighted her down."

Lena was silent again, but he knew she was too smart not to be thinking the same thing he was.

Will said it for her. "Someone wanted the body found. There was the call to 911."

"Maybe one of Tommy's neighbors saw something."

"And followed him to the lake, watched him dump the body, and ..."

"You think he had an accomplice?"

"What do you think?"

"I think at best we've got a material witness. We'll need to talk to her at some point, but why does this matter when the guy who admitted to killing Allison is dead?"

Will looked around. They were standing in mud up to their ankles. The earth was darker here, turning almost black as it dipped into the water. Allison's shoes had black mud on them, not red clay.

Will asked, "Did Tommy mention whether or not Allison had a boyfriend?"

"Don't you think we'd be talking to him right now if he had?"

Will saw a fat squirrel scamper up a tree, tail twitching. Several twigs had been snapped in two. The ground covering was bent down. He heard a car in the distance. "Is there a road close by?"

"About a mile out." She pointed in the direction of the noise. "There's a divided highway."

“Any residences?”

Lena pressed her lips together. She wouldn't look at him.

“Detective?”

She stared down at the ground, knocked some mud off her shoe. “Tommy lived out that way.”

“So did Allison Spooner.” Will glanced back at the lake. The water was churning. The wind coming off the water was like ice against his skin. “Have you ever heard the name Julie Smith?”

Lena shook her head. “Who is she?”

“Did Tommy mention any friends? Either his or Allison's?”

“That wasn't the focus of the interview.” Her tone was terse. “I was trying to get him to confess to murder, not give me his life story.”

Will kept his eyes on the lake. He was looking at this the wrong way. Their killer was smart. He knew that water would get rid of trace evidence. He knew to walk the body into the deeper part of the lake. He had probably lured Allison out here after careful deliberation. The wet terrain, the mud and underbrush, all would serve to help cover his tracks.

Will rolled up the legs of his jeans. His shoes were already soaked, so he didn't bother to take them off before walking into the lake. The cold water sloshed into his sneakers.

“What are you doing?”

He went out a few feet and scanned the shoreline, studying the trees, the underbrush.

Lena had her hands on her hips. “Are you crazy? You're going to get hypothermia.”

Will studied each tree, each branch, each section of weeds and moss. His feet were completely numb by the time he found what he was looking for. He walked toward a large oak that was leaning away from the shore. Its knotty roots coiled into the lake like an open fist. At first, Will had thought he was seeing a shadow on the bark, but then he remembered you had to actually have sun or some other source of light to cast a shadow.

Will stood in front of the tree, his shoes sinking into the silt at the bottom of the water. The tree was deciduous, its bony canopy reaching up at least a hundred feet overhead. The trunk was about three feet around and bowed away from the water. Will wasn't an arborist, but there were enough oaks around Atlanta so that he knew their red-brown furrows of bark turned the color of charcoal as the tree aged. The scaly bark had absorbed the rain like a sponge, but there was something else Will had noticed from his vantage point in the water. He scraped at a small section of bark with his fingernails. The wood left a wet, rust-colored residue. He rolled the grit between his fingers, squeezing out the moisture.

Blood really was thicker than water.

“What is it?” Lena asked. She kept her hands in her pockets as she leaned out into the water.

Will remembered the flashlight in his jacket pocket. “Look.” He traced the light along a dark stain that sprayed up the trunk. He thought about what Sara had said about Allison's injury, that there would be a high-velocity spray, like a hose turned on full blast. Four to five pints of blood. That was over half a gallon.

Will said, "She must have been facedown on the ground, just shy of the water. Her blood splattered up and back in an arc. You can see the dispersement is thicker here at the base of the tree, closer to her neck. Then it starts to dissipate at the top."

"That's not—" Lena stopped. She saw it now. He could see from her shocked expression.

Will glanced up at the sky. The clouds were letting loose a few drops at a time. They hadn't been given much of a reprieve. It didn't matter. Short of scrubbing the bark, there was no way to completely clean the tree. The wood had absorbed the mark of death the same way it would absorb smoke from a fire.

Will asked, "You still think our murderer is a nineteen-year-old boy who lives with his father?"

The wind whipped off the lake as Lena stared at the tree. Tears came into her eyes. Her voice shook. "He confessed."

Will quoted Tommy's words back to her. "'I got mad. I had a knife on me. I stabbed her once in the neck.'" He asked, "Did you find blood in the garage?"

"Yes." She wiped her eyes with the heel of her hand. "He was cleaning it up when we got there. I saw a bucket, and there was ..." Her voice trailed off. "There was blood on the floor. I saw it."

Will rolled down the legs of his jeans. His shoes were sinking into the mud at the base of the tree. He saw there was a new color mixed in with the soil, a deep rust that soaked into the mesh on the toe of his sneaker.

Lena saw it, too. She fell to her knees. She stuck her fingers deep into the ground and grabbed a fistful of earth. The soil was soaked, but not just with rainwater. She let the dirt fall back to the ground. Her hand was dark red, streaked with Allison Spooner's blood.

CHAPTER TEN

Lena pressed a wet paper towel to her neck. She was sitting with her back against the stall of the locker room toilet. A patrolman had tried to come in while she was dry-heaving. He'd left without saying a word.

She'd never had a strong stomach. Her uncle Hank used to say that Lena didn't have the guts for the kind of life she was living. He wouldn't have taken any pleasure in seeing that he was right.

"Oh, God," she whispered, as close to a prayer as she'd come in a long while. What had that stupid kid gotten himself into? What else had she missed?

She closed her eyes. Nothing made sense right now. Nothing was fitting together the same way it had yesterday morning.

He did it. Lena knew Tommy had killed Allison. People didn't confess to murder unless they were guilty. Even without that, less than fifteen minutes after they pulled the girl out of the lake, they had found Tommy in Allison's apartment going through her things. Wearing a black ski mask. He ran when they confronted him. He stabbed Brad, even if it was with a letter opener. Lena had seen him stab Brad with her own eyes. She had listened to Tommy's confession. She had watched him write down everything in his own stupid words. And he had killed himself. The guilt had gotten to him and he had sliced open his wrists because he knew what he had done to Allison was wrong.

So why was Lena doubting herself?

Suspects lied all the time. They never wanted to confess to all the horrors they'd committed. They split hairs. They admitted to rape but not murder. They admitted to punching but not beating, stabbing but not killing. Was it as simple as that? Had Tommy lied about killing Allison in the garage because he'd wanted to make the crime seem more understandable, more spur of the moment?

Lena pressed her head against the wall.

That stupid profile Will Trent came up with kept coming back to her. Cold. Calculated. Deliberate. That wasn't Tommy. He wasn't smart enough to think of all the variables. He would've had to plan ahead, get the cinder blocks and chains ready, carry them out to the lake ahead of time. Even if Tommy got the blocks after the fact, he would've had to anticipate the blood, and plan on the rain covering his tracks.

All that blood. The ground was soaked in it.

Lena scrambled to her knees and held her head over the toilet. Her stomach clenched, but nothing was left to come up. She sat back on her heels, staring at the back of the tank. The cool white porcelain stared back. This was her stall, and only her stall. This toilet was the one piece of ground she had managed to stake out solely for herself in the unisex locker room. The urinals were stained like old-lady teeth. The other two stalls were disgusting. They reeked of excrement no matter how many times they were cleaned. This morning, it didn't seem to stop there. The whole place reeked of shit. And it was all coming from the top down.

Lena wiped her mouth with the paper towel. Her hand was throbbing where she'd been shot. She was probably getting an infection. The skin felt hot down to her wrist. She squeezed her eyes shut. She wanted to be away from here. She wanted to be back in bed with Jared. She wanted to go back to yesterday and shake Tommy Braham until he told her the truth about what really happened. Why was he in Allison's apartment? Why was he going through her things? Why was he wearing the ski mask? Why did he run? And why, in God's name, did he kill himself?

"Lena?" Marla Simms's creaky voice was just above a whisper. "Can I have a minute?"

Lena pressed herself up to standing. It was not lost on her that the only spot she could call her own in this entire godforsaken place was the toilet.

Marla stood with a folded sheet of paper in her hands. "You all right?"

"No," she said, because there was no use lying. She need only glance in the mirror to see the truth. Her hair was disheveled. Her face was red and blotchy. She was punch-drunk with lack of sleep and her nerves were so raw that she felt like she was vibrating even standing dead still.

"Agent Trent wanted this." Marla held out the sheet of paper between her fingers, giving Lena a meaningful look, as if they were two spies passing a briefcase in front of the Kremlin. "He didn't see it last night."

Lena had to tug the sheet before Marla would release it. She recognized her own handwriting. The copied page was from her notebook. The transcript she had made of the 911 call. She tried to pick out the words but her eyes blurred. "I thought he asked for the tape?"

"If he wants more than this, then he's going to have to drive down to Eaton to get it." She tucked her hands into her wide hips. "And you can tell him from me that I'm not his personal secretary. I don't know who he thinks he is, ordering people around."

He was the man who was going to shut down this force if they didn't do everything he said. "Have you talked to Frank this morning?"

"I'm guessing he came by last night. My files were a mess when I got here."

Lena already knew Frank had stolen Tommy's phone and taken the photograph from Allison's wallet, but this new information sent a chill straight to her chest. "Which files?"

"All of them. I don't know what he was looking for, but I hope he found it."

"You gave Trent those incident reports."

"What of it?"

"Why?"

"No one wants to speak ill of the dead, but I'll come on out and say it to whoever asks. Tommy wasn't acting right lately. He was getting into trouble, yelling at people, threatening them. Don't get me wrong. He was a good boy when he was little. Had those precious little blond curls and pretty blue eyes. That's what Sara's remembering. But she doesn't know what he was like lately. I think something just clicked in his head. Maybe it was there all along and we just didn't notice. Didn't want to notice." Marla shook her head in a tight half-circle. "This is just a mess. A grade-A, certified pile of doo."

Lena focused on Marla for the first time. The old woman wasn't one of her biggest fans. At best, she managed a nod for Lena when she walked through the door in the morning. Most times, she never bothered to look up from her desk. "Why are you talking to me? You never talk to me."

Marla bristled. "Excuse me for trying to help." She turned on her heel and stomped out.

Lena watched the door slowly close on its hinges. The room felt small, claustrophobic. She couldn't stay here all day, but her instinct to hide from Will Trent was hard to overcome. Larry Knox had told Frank that Will was a suit, not a cop. Lena's first impression had been the same. With his cashmere sweater and metrosexual haircut, Will looked like he'd be more at home behind a desk, clocking out at five and going home to the wife and kids. The old Lena would have dismissed him as a fraud, not on her level and not deserving of the badge.

That old Lena had been burned so many times by her snap judgments that she'd practically self-immolated. Now, she could look past her knee-jerk reaction and see the truth. Will had been sent down by a deputy director who was a heartbeat away from the top job. Lena had met Amanda Wagner many years ago. She was a tough old bitch. There was no way Amanda would've sent her second string down here, especially at the request of Sara Linton. Will was probably one of the best investigators on her team. He had to be. In less than two hours, he had shattered Lena's case against Tommy Braham into tiny pieces.

And now she had to go back out there and face him again.

Lena's feet still ached from the long trek through the forest. Her shoes were soaking wet. She went to her locker. The combination left her mind as soon as she turned the dial. She pressed her forehead against the cool metal. Why was she still here? She couldn't keep this up with Will Trent. There were so many lies and half-truths dangling out there that she couldn't remember them all. He kept laying traps, and with each one, she felt herself getting closer and closer to falling in. She should go home before she said too much. If Trent wanted to stop her, he would have to do it with handcuffs.

The combination came into her head. Lena spun the dial, opening the locker. She looked at her rain jacket, her toiletries, the various crap she'd collected over the years. There was nothing here she wanted except the extra pair of sneakers she kept in the bottom. She started to close the locker but stopped at the last minute. Inside a box of tampons was a picture of Jared that had been taken three years ago. He was standing outside Sanford Stadium at the University of Georgia. The place was packed. Georgia was playing LSU. There was a crowd of students around him, but he was the only one looking back at the camera. Looking back at Lena.

This picture was the moment that she had fallen in love with him—outside that noisy stadium, surrounded by drunken strangers. Lena had actually managed to capture on film that exact moment when everything in her life had changed. Who would be around to capture it when it all changed back?

Probably the booking officer who took her mugshot.

The door popped open. Four patrolmen came in, so lost in conversation that they barely acknowledged Lena. She tucked Jared's picture into her back pocket. Her socks were soaking wet, but she slid on her spare sneakers anyway. She just wanted to get out of here. She would walk through the squad room, right past

Will Trent, get into her car and go home to Jared.

Lena would start packing tonight. She'd be one of those people who left her house key in the mailbox for the bank. Her car was in good shape. She had enough in savings to last her three months, four if Jared didn't expect her to help out with rent. She would move in with him and try to get over this, try to find a way to live her life without being a cop.

If she wasn't in jail for obstructing an investigation. If she wasn't convicted of negligence. If Gordon Braham didn't sue her into the ground. If Frank didn't fill Jared's ear with poison. Poison Jared would believe, because the great thing about lying was people believed it so long as the lie was close enough to the truth.

Lena slammed the locker closed, pressing her hand against the cool metal.

One of the patrolmen said, "You let that GBI asshole slip and hit his head, we're not going to shed any tears."

They were all suiting up, pulling on their heavy rain gear. Will had taken photographs and samples from the bark and soil by the tree, but he had ordered a full-scale search of the woods. He wanted more photographs, drawings, diagrams. He wanted to make sure the force knew that they had made a mistake. That Lena had made a mistake.

"Fucking retard," another cop said.

Lena didn't know if he meant Will or Tommy. Either way, she managed some false bravado. "Wish he was a little smarter so he knew how stupid he was."

They were all laughing when she left the locker room. Lena pulled on her jacket. She walked through the squad room with more swagger than she felt. She had to get her composure back. She had to steel herself against the next barrage of questions from Will Trent. The fewer answers she gave him, the better off she would be.

The paper Marla had given her was in her hand. Lena skimmed the words as she walked so she wouldn't have to talk to anybody. She stopped as she reached the front door. She read the transcript again. The words were in her handwriting, but the last few lines from the call were missing. The caller had mentioned that Allison had gotten into a fight with her boyfriend. Why was that part taken out?

She glanced at Marla behind the front desk. Marla stared back, one eyebrow raised above her glasses. She was either still pissed or sending Lena a message. It was hard to tell. Lena looked at the transcript again. The last part was gone, the cut clean so that you would never know it was missing. Had Marla taken a shot at tampering with police evidence? Frank had gone through her files last night. Why would he edit the transcript without telling Lena? Christ, she had her notebook in her back pocket with the original transcript. All Trent had to do was ask her to see it and Lena would be looking at an obstruction charge for tampering with evidence.

The front door opened before Lena could reach it. Will Trent had obviously grown impatient waiting outside.

"Detective," he said by way of greeting. He'd changed back into his dress shoes and shed Carl Phillips's jacket. He looked as eager as she was reticent.

Lena handed him the paper. "Marla told me to give you this. She said you'd have to track down the audio from Eaton yourself."

Will called to Marla at the desk. "Thank you, Mrs. Simms." He took the paper from Lena's hand. His eyes scanned back and forth. "You heard the call, right?" He looked up. "You made the transcript from the audio?"

"They dictated it to me from the screen. The audiotapes are stored off-site. They're not hard to get." Lena held her breath, praying that he would not ask her to track them down.

"Any idea who made the call?"

She shook her head. "It was a woman's voice. The number was blocked and she wouldn't leave her details."

"Did you make this copy for me?"

"No. Marla handed it to me."

He pointed at a black dot on the page. "You've got some gum on the glass in your copier."

Lena wondered why the hell he was telling her this. Will Trent was like no cop she had ever seen. He had a habit of skirting around the real questions, making random comments or observations that seemed to lead nowhere until suddenly it was too late and she felt the noose tighten around her neck. He was playing chess and she was sucking at checkers.

Lena tried her own diversion. "We should get out to the crime scene if you want to be back in time for the autopsies."

"Weren't we just at the crime scene?"

"We don't know for a fact what happened. Tommy could've lied. That happens in Atlanta, right? Bad guys lie to the cops?"

"More often than I'd like." He slipped the transcript into his briefcase. "What time are the procedures supposed to start?"

"Frank said eleven-thirty."

"This was when you talked to him last night?"

Lena tried to remember the answer she had given Will the first time he'd asked this question. She had talked to Frank twice. Both times he had drilled her on Tommy's confession. Both times he had renewed his threat to tear down her life if she didn't cover his drunk ass.

Lena cast out a nonanswer, hoping Will would bite. "It's like I told you before."

He held open the front door for her. "Any idea why the press isn't all over this?"

"The press?" She would have laughed if she hadn't been standing up to her knees in shit. "The paper's closed for the holiday. Thomas Ross always goes skiing this time of year."

Will laughed good-naturedly. "You gotta love small towns." A cold wind made him have to put his shoulder into closing the glass door. He tucked his hands into his jeans pockets. The cuffs of his pants were still wet. "Let's take your car."

She felt uncomfortable having him in her Celica, so she nodded toward Frank's Town Car. Lena pulled her key chain from her pocket. The county was on a tight budget and they both were supposed to share the car.

She pressed the button to unlock the doors.

Will didn't get in. Instead, he scowled at the smell that wafted through the morning air. "Smoker?"

"Frank," she said. The stink was worse than usual. He must have chain-smoked the whole trip to and from Macon last night.

Will asked, "This is Chief Wallace's car?"

She nodded.

"Where's Chief Wallace if this is his car?"

Lena managed to swallow the bile in her throat. "He took a cruiser to the hospital."

Will didn't comment, though she wondered if he'd made a mark in his book. Frank had taken the cruiser so he wouldn't get stopped along the way. Speeding during a nonemergency situation was illegal, but it was the sort of illegal cops danced around all the time.

Will asked, "Can you drive a stick?"

It was her turn to scowl. Of course she could drive a stick.

Will said, "Let's take my car."

"Are you kidding me?" Lena had heard about the Porsche before she'd made it to the station this morning. The whole town was talking about it—what it must've cost, why a state investigator would be driving it, and, more important, that it was parked in front of the Linton house all night.

Will didn't wait to see if she followed as he walked toward the opposite end of the lot. He talked as he made his way to the car, his leather briefcase swinging gently at his side. "I'm curious about Allison Spooner. You said she's from Alabama?"

"Yes."

"And she's a student at Grant Tech?"

Lena was careful with her answer. "She's registered at the school."

Will turned to her. "So, that means she's a student?"

"It means she's registered. We haven't talked to her teachers yet. We don't know if she was actively attending classes. We get a lot of calls from parents this time of year wondering why they're not getting report cards."

He asked her again, "Do you think Allison Spooner dropped out?"

She tried a new strategy. "I think that I'm not going to tell you something unless I know it's the absolute truth."

He gave one of his quick nods. "Fair enough."

Lena waited for another question, another insinuation. Will just kept walking, his mouth closed. If he thought this new technique was going to break her, he was dead wrong. Lena had been dealing with silent disapproval her entire life. She had made an art out of ignoring it.

She tucked her head down against the cold. Her mind kept going back to her earlier conversation with Will. She had been so furious about him being in Jeffrey's office that she hadn't really paid attention to what he was saying at first. But then he had pulled out Allison's wallet and she had seen that the third photograph was missing.

The picture showed Allison sitting beside a boy who had his arm around her waist. An older woman sat on her left, some distance between them. They were all on a bench outside the student center. Lena had stared at the photo long enough to remember the details. The boy was around Allison's age. He had been wearing the hood of his sweatshirt pulled down low on his head but she could tell he had brown hair and eyes. A smattering of a goatee was on his weak chin. He was chubby the way most of the guys at Grant Tech tended to be, from too many days spent in classrooms and nights wasted in front of video games.

The woman in the photograph was obviously from the poor part of town. She was in her forties, maybe older. Past a certain age, it was difficult to tell with hard-looking women. The good news was that they stopped aging. The bad news was that they already looked ninety. Every line on her face said she was a smoker. Her bleached-blond hair was so dry it looked more like straw.

Also missing from evidence was Tommy's cell phone. Frank had handed it to Lena in the street. He'd found it in Tommy's back pocket when he frisked him before putting him into the back of the squad car. She had sealed the phone in a plastic bag, written out the details, and logged it into evidence.

And at some point last night, both the photo from Allison's wallet and Tommy's phone had gone missing.

There was only one person who could've hidden the evidence, and that was Frank. Marla said he'd gone through her files. He had probably doctored the 911 transcript, too. But why? Both the picture and the call brought up the possibility of Allison having a boyfriend. Maybe Frank was trying to track down the kid before Will Trent found him. Frank had told Lena that they both should stick to the truth, or at least a close version of it. Why was he going behind her back and looking for another suspect?

Lena wiped her eyes with her hand. The wind was cutting, making her nose run, her eyes water. She had to carve out ten, fifteen minutes alone so she could think this through. Will's presence made it impossible for her to do anything but worry about the next question that would come out of his mouth.

"Ready?" Will asked. They had reached the Porsche. The car was an older model than Lena thought. There was no remote to unlock the door. Will did the honors, then handed her the key.

Lena felt a new wave of nervousness wash over her. "What if I crash this thing?"

"I'd really appreciate it if you didn't." He reached in and tucked his briefcase behind the front seat.

Lena couldn't move. This felt like a trap but she couldn't see the reason.

"Is there a problem?" Will asked.

Lena gave in. She climbed into the bucket seat, which was more like a recliner. With her feet stretched toward the pedals, the back of her calves were only a few inches off the floorboard.

Will opened the passenger door. She asked, "You don't have a car from the job?"

"My boss wanted me to get here as soon as possible." He had to let the seat back before he got into the passenger's side of the car. "It adjusts on the front," he told Lena. She reached down and dragged herself closer to the steering wheel. Will's legs were about ten feet longer than hers. Lena was practically pressed into the steering wheel by the time her feet found the clutch and gas.

For his part, Will couldn't get his seat right. He pushed it to the end of the track, then cranked it down as low as it would go so his head wouldn't hit the roof. Finally, he folded himself into the car like a piece of origami. She waited for him to buckle in, chancing a look at him. He was fairly average except for his height. He was lean, but his shoulders were broad, muscled, like he spent a lot of time at the gym. His nose had obviously been broken at some point in his life. Faint scars were on his face, the sort of damage you got from fighting with your fists.

No, he definitely was not Amanda Wagner's second string.

"All right," Will said, finally settling into the seat.

She reached toward the ignition, but there wasn't one.

"It's on the other side."

She found the ignition on the left-hand side of the steering wheel.

Will explained, "It's from Le Mans racing. So you can start the engine with one hand while you change the gears with the other."

She was extremely right-handed and it took a few tries before she managed to get the key to turn. The engine roared to life. The seat vibrated underneath her. She could feel the clutch pushing back against the ball of her foot.

Will stopped her. "Can you give her a few minutes to warm up?"

Lena took her foot off the pedal. She stared across the street. He'd parked on the far side of the lot, the nose of the car facing out. She had a clear view to the children's clinic across the way. Sara's clinic. She wondered if he had parked here on purpose. He seemed to be very deliberate about everything he did. Or maybe her paranoia was such that she couldn't watch his chest rise and fall without thinking it was part of some master plan to trip her up.

Will asked one of his random questions. "What do you think about the 911 call?"

She told him the truth. "It bothers me that it came from a blocked number."

"She called in a fake suicide. Why?"

Lena shook her head. The caller was the last thing on her mind right now. "Tommy might have talked to her. She could be a co-worker. An accomplice. A jealous girlfriend."

"Tommy didn't strike me as a player."

No, he hadn't. During the interrogation, Lena had asked him to be explicit because she wasn't sure he really knew what sex was.

Will asked, "Did Tommy say anything about dating anyone?"

She shook her head.

"We can ask around. At the very least, the girl who called in the fake suicide knew something wasn't right. She was obviously laying down a foundation for Tommy's defense."

Lena's head jerked around. "How so?"

"The phone call. She said Allison got into a fight with her boyfriend. That's why she was worried she'd committed suicide. She didn't say anything about Tommy."

Lena felt every ounce of blood in her body freeze. Her hand gripped the steering wheel. Frank's amended transcript didn't mention a boyfriend. Will must have already contacted the call center in Eaton. So why had he asked Marla for the audio?

To set a trap. And Lena had just fallen right into it.

Will's tone of voice was even. "Obviously, we'll need to find the boyfriend. He'll probably be able to lead us to the caller. Did Allison have any photographs in her apartment? Love letters? A computer?"

Photographs. Did he know about the missing picture? Lena's throat felt so raw that she couldn't swallow. She shook her head.

Will took his briefcase from behind the seat. He snapped open the locks. She could hear a high-pitched alarm in her ears. Her chest was tight. Her vision blurred. She wondered if this was what a panic attack felt like.

"Hmm," Will mumbled, rifling through the case. "My reading glasses aren't in here." He held out the transcript. "Do you mind?"

Lena's heart shook against her rib cage. Will held the paper in his hand, the edge fluttering in the air blowing out from the heater.

Her voice was barely a whisper. "Why are you doing this?"

Fear saturated her every word. Will stared at her for a long while—so long that she felt as if her soul was being peeled away from her body. Finally, he gave one of his patented nods, as if he'd made a decision. He put the transcript back in his case and snapped the locks shut.

"Let's go to Allison's."

Taylor Drive was less than ten minutes from the station, but the trip seemed to take hours. Lena felt so panicked that she slowed down a couple of times, thinking she was going to be sick. She needed to concentrate on Frank, to figure out how many nails he could put in her coffin, but she was thinking about Tommy Braham instead.

He had died on her watch. He was her prisoner. He was her responsibility. She hadn't patted him down when she put him in the cells. She had assumed because he was slow that he was without guile. Who was the stupid one now? Lena thought the kid was capable of murder but considered him so harmless that she'd let him walk into a cell with a sharp object hidden on his person. Frank was right—she was lucky Tommy didn't turn the weapon on someone else.

When had Tommy taken the ink cartridge out of her pen? He must have known when he did it that he was going to use it for something bad. By the time he finished writing his confession, Tommy was in tears. The Kleenex box was empty. Lena had left him alone for no more than half a minute to get more tissues. When she came back into the room, his hands were under the table. She had wiped his nose for him like he was a child. She had soothed him, rubbed his shoulder, told him everything was going to be okay. He seemed to believe her. He'd blown his nose, dried his eyes. She had thought at the time that Tommy had resolved himself to his fate, but maybe the fate he had decided on was a lot different from the one that Lena had imagined.

Was it sympathy for Tommy or her instinctual need for self-preservation that had kept Lena from getting rid of the letter opener he had used on Brad Stephens? Last night, she had thought about tossing it over one of the thousands of concrete bridges between here and Macon. But she hadn't. It was still wrapped in its bag, buried under the spare tire in the trunk of her car. Lena hadn't wanted it in the house. Now, she didn't like that it was so close to the station. Frank had doctored paperwork. He'd broken the chain of custody. He'd tampered with evidence. She wouldn't put it past the old man to rummage through her car.

Christ. What else was he capable of?

She took a right onto Taylor Drive. The rain had come in torrents last night, washing away the blood on the street. Still, she could see it in her mind's eye.

The way Brad had blinked away the rain. The way his skin had already started to turn gray by the time the helicopter landed.

Lena steered the car onto the far side of the road and stopped. "This is where Brad was stabbed."

Will asked, "Where's Spooner's apartment?"

She pointed up the road. "Four houses, left-hand side."

He stared straight down the street. "What's the number?"

"Sixteen and a half." Lena put the car into gear and rolled past the scene of Brad's stabbing. "We got the address from the college. We came here to see if there was a roommate or landlord we could talk to."

"Did you have a warrant to search the house?"

He had asked the question before. She gave him the same answer. "No. We didn't come to search the house."

She waited for him to ask something else, but Will was silent. Lena wondered if what she had told him was the truth. If Tommy hadn't been in Allison's apartment, they still would have found a way to get into the garage. Gordon Braham was out of town. Knowing Frank, he would've broken the lock and gone into Allison's apartment anyway. He would have made some comment about how it was better to ask for forgiveness than permission. No one would have minded a simple breaking and entering when a young girl from the college had been murdered.

Will asked, "Did you canvass the neighbors?"

Lena stopped the car in front of the Braham house. "Patrol did. No one saw anything different from what happened."

"And what exactly did happen?"

"Brad was stabbed."

"Tell me from the beginning. You pulled up here ..."

She tried to take a breath. Her lungs would only fill to half capacity. "We approached the garage—"

"No," he interrupted. "Go back to the very beginning. You drove up to the scene. Then what?"

"Brad was already here." She didn't tell him about the pink umbrella or Frank's screaming fit.

"You got out of the car?" Will prodded. He really was going to make her go through this step-by-step.

She opened her door. Rain splattered her face with lazy, fat drops. Will had gotten out of the car, too. She told him, "The rain had died down. Visibility was good." She started up the driveway. Will was beside her with his briefcase in his hand. At the top of the hill, she could see that the garage was marked with yellow crime scene tape. Frank must have come back last night. Or maybe he had sent patrol to mark the space so it looked like they were taking this seriously. There was no telling anymore what he was doing or why.

Will opened his briefcase and pulled out a sheet of paper. "The search warrant came in while you were getting your coat."

He handed the document to Lena. She saw it had been issued by a judge out of Atlanta.

He asked, "What next? I take it the garage door was closed when you approached?"

She nodded. "We were standing about here. All three of us. The lights were out. There weren't any cars in the driveway or on the street." She pointed to the scooter. Mud was caked around the plastic fenders. "The lock and chain appeared to be the same." Lena stared at the scooter, feeling good about the debris lodged in the tires. Tommy could have gone to the woods on the scooter. They wouldn't be able to find tracks, but the mud on the wheels would match the mud around the lake.

"Detective?"

Lena turned around. She had missed his question.

"Did you knock on the front door of the house?"

She glanced back at the house. The lights were still off. There was a small bouquet of flowers propped against the door. "No."

Will leaned down and opened the garage's metal door. The noise as it rolled up was deafening, a loud clanging that must have been heard by half the neighborhood. Lena saw the bed, the table, the scattered papers and magazines. There was a small pool of blood where Frank had fallen by the mouth of the entrance. Ice glazed the top. The cut in his arm was deeper than she thought. There was no way the letter opener had done the damage. Had he stabbed himself?

Will asked, "Is this how you found the garage?"

"Pretty much." Lena crossed her arms over her chest. She could feel the cold seeping in through her jacket. She should have come back to the scene after getting Tommy's confession and searched Allison's things for more clues to back up Tommy's story. It was too late for that now. The best thing Lena could do for herself was to start thinking like a detective instead of acting like a suspect. The murder weapon was probably in here. The scooter was a good lead. The stain by the bed was an even better one. Tommy could've hit Allison in the head, then taken her into the woods to kill her. Maybe his plan was to drown her by the lake. The girl had come to, and he'd stabbed her in the back of the neck. Tommy had lived in Grant County all his life. He'd probably been to the cove hundreds of times. He would know where the bottom dropped in the lake. He would know to take the body out deep so that she wouldn't be easily found.

Lena exhaled. She could breathe now. This was making sense. Tommy had lied to her about how he'd killed Allison, but he had killed her.

Will cleared his throat. "Let's go back a few steps. All three of you were standing here. The garage was closed. The house looked empty. Then what?"

Lena took a minute to regain her composure. She told him about Brad seeing the masked intruder inside, the way he had circled the building before they fanned out to confront the suspect.

Will seemed to be only half listening as she laid out the events. He stood just under the garage door with his hands behind his back, scanning the contents of the room. Lena was telling him about Tommy refusing to lower the knife when she noticed that Will was focusing on the brown stain by the bed. He walked into the garage and knelt down for a better look. Beside him was the bucket of murky water she had seen yesterday. The crusty sponge was beside it.

He looked up at her. "Keep going."

Lena had to think to find her place. "Tommy was behind that table." She nodded to the table, which was crooked.

Will said, "That door isn't exactly quiet when it rolls up. Did he already have the knife in his hand?"

Lena stopped, trying to remember what she'd said the first time Will asked her the question. He wanted to know if Tommy had a sheath on his belt where he kept a knife. He wanted to know if it was the same knife that had killed Allison Spooner.

She said, "When I saw him, he already had the knife in his hand. I don't know where it came from. Maybe the table." Of course it had come from the table. There was a partially opened envelope there, the kind of junk mail that contained coupons nobody used.

"What else did you notice?"

She indicated the bucket of brown water by the bed. "He'd been cleaning. I guess he hit her in the head or knocked her out here. He put her on the scooter and—"

"He didn't mention cleaning up in his confession."

No, he hadn't. Lena hadn't even thought to ask him about the bucket. All she had been thinking about was Brad, and how gray his skin had looked the last time she'd seen him. "Suspects lie. Tommy didn't want to admit how he did it. He made up a story that painted him in a better light. It happens all the time."

Will asked, "What happened next?"

Lena swallowed, fighting the image of Brad that kept popping into her head. "I approached the suspect from the right."

Will had opened his briefcase on the bed. "Your right or his?"

"My right." She stopped talking. Will had taken some kind of field kit out of his briefcase. She recognized the three small glass bottles he took out of the plastic pouch. He was going to do a Kastle-Meyer test on the stain.

Will didn't prompt her to continue the story. He took a clean swab from the kit. He opened the first bottle and used the dropper to wet the cotton tip with ethanol. He touched the swab to the stain, gently rolling it so that the brown substance would transfer. He added the reagent, phenolphthalein, from the second bottle. Lena held her breath as he used the last dropper to add hydrogen peroxide to the mix. She had studied the procedure in class, performed it a hundred times herself. If the brown stain was human blood, the tip of the swab would rapidly turn bright pink.

The swab didn't turn.

Will started to pack the kit back up. "What happened next?"

Lena had lost her place. She couldn't take her eyes off the stain. How could it not be blood? It had the same shape, the same color, as a bloodstain. Tommy was in Allison's apartment, going through her things. He was dressed like a burglar. He was standing two feet away from her blood with a knife in his hand.

Not a knife. A letter opener.

And not Allison's blood.

Will prodded her to continue. "So, you flanked Tommy on your right. Interim Chief Wallace was on your right?"

"My left, your right."

"Is this when you identified yourself as police officers?"

Lena held her breath. She would have to lie to him. There was no way she could say she didn't remember, because that would be taken as an admission that she hadn't followed the most basic procedure when confronting a suspect.

"Detective?"

Lena let out a slow breath. She tried to muster some sarcasm. "I know how to do my job."

He gave a solemn nod. "I hope so." Instead of jamming his foot down harder, he let up. "Tell me what happened next."

Lena continued the story as Will walked around the garage. The space was small, but there wasn't one inch that he didn't study at some point. Every time he stopped to examine an item more closely—the bracing along the back wall, a strip of metal jutting out from the track for the garage door—her heart skipped.

Still, she told him about Tommy running into the street, Brad chasing him. The stabbing. The LifeFlight's arrival. Lena finished, "The helicopter took off, and I went to the car. Tommy was already inside, handcuffed. I took him to the station. You know the story from there."

Will scratched his jaw. "How much time would you say elapsed between when Tommy knocked you to the floor and when you were able to regain your footing?"

"I don't know. Five seconds. Ten."

"Did you hit your head?"

Lena's head still ached from the bruise. "I don't know."

Will was at the back of the room. "Did you notice this?"

She had to force herself to walk into the garage. She followed his pointing finger to a hole in the wall. It was round with jagged edges, about the size of a bullet. Without thinking, Lena looked back at the front of the garage where Frank had been standing. The trajectory matched up. There were no casings on the floor. She hoped to God Frank had thought to look behind the garage. The bullet hadn't stopped after grazing her hand and punching a hole in the metal siding. It was out there somewhere, probably buried in mud.

Will asked, "Did anyone fire their weapons?"

"Mine wasn't fired."

He looked at the Band-Aids on the side of her hand. "So, you were here on the floor." He walked to the bed, standing where she had fallen.

"That's right."

"You stood up and saw that Frank Wallace was on the ground. Was he facedown? On his side?"

"On his side." Lena followed Will as he slowly walked to the front of the garage. She stepped over magazines that had scattered in the struggle. She saw a flash of an older model Mustang clinging to the side of a racetrack.

Will pointed to the jagged metal sticking out from the garage door track. "This looks dangerous."

He opened his briefcase again. With a steady hand, he used a pair of tweezers to pull a few threads of light tan material from the sharp metal. Frank's coat was tan, a London Fog he'd been wearing for as long as Lena had known him.

Will handed her the K-M test kit. "I'm sure you know how to do this."

Her hands trembled as she took the kit. She went through the same procedure Will had followed, using the dropper to add the reagent. When the tip of the swab turned bright pink, Lena didn't think either of them was too surprised.

Will turned back around and looked at the garage. She could almost hear his mind working. For Lena's part, she had the benefit of her own involvement to paint a picture of the truth. Tommy had shoved the table toward Lena. Frank had panicked, or startled, or something—for whatever reason, he'd ended up pulling the trigger on his gun. The shot had gone wild, taking a chunk out of Lena's hand. Frank had dropped the gun. The Glock's recoil had probably been unexpected. Or maybe he was so drunk by then that his balance was off. He'd pitched to the side, cutting open his arm on the sharp metal that jugged out from the track for the door. He'd fallen to the floor. He was clutching his arm by the time Lena had gotten up. By then, Tommy was running down the driveway with the letter opener in his hand.

Keystone Kops. They were a fucking joke.

How many drinks had Frank had yesterday morning? He was sitting in the car with his flask while Lena was watching Allison being dragged from the lake. He'd taken three or four swigs on the drive over. What about before then? How many drinks did it take him just to get out of bed these days?

Will was silent. He took back the swab, the bottles, and put everything back in its proper place. She waited for him to say something about the scene, about what had really happened. Instead, he asked, "Where's the bathroom?"

Lena was too confused to answer anything other than "What?"

"The bathroom." He indicated the open space, and Lena realized that he was right. The room was just one big box. There was no bathroom. There wasn't even a closet. The furnishings were Spartan, nothing more than a bed that looked like it had been bought from a military supply store and a folding table of the sort they used at church bake sales. There was a small television in the corner with aluminum foil on the antennae and a Playstation jacked into the front. Instead of a chest of drawers, there were metal shelves bolted to the walls. T-shirts spilled over. Jeans. Baseball hats.

Will said, "What did Tommy say about why he was wearing a ski mask?"

Lena felt like she had swallowed a handful of gravel. "He said he had it on because it was cold."

"It's pretty cold in here," Will agreed. He put the kit in his briefcase. Lena flinched when he snapped the locks shut. The sound echoed like a gunshot. Or a cell door closing.

The car magazines. The dirty sheets on the bed. The lack of even the most basic facilities. There was no way Allison Spooner had lived in this desolate garage.

Tommy Braham had.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Brock's funeral home was housed in one of the oldest buildings in Grant County. The Victorian castle, complete with turrets, had been built in the early 1900s by the man in charge of maintenance at the railroad yard. That he had used funds embezzled from the railroad company was a matter later settled by the state prosecutor. The castle had eventually been auctioned on the courthouse steps to John Brock, the local mortician.

Sara had heard from her grandpa Earnshaw that everyone in town had breathed a sigh of relief when the Brocks left Main Street—especially the butcher who'd had the unfortunate luck of being their next-door tenant. The basement and first floor of the Victorian had been turned into a funeral parlor, while the top floor was reserved for the family.

Sara had grown up with Dan Brock. He'd been an awkward, serious boy, the sort of child who was more comfortable around adults than children his own age. She witnessed firsthand the relentless teasing Dan had experienced in grade school. Bullies had latched onto him like piranha and had not stopped until junior high, when Dan shot past six feet tall. As the tallest girl in her class, then the tallest person in school but for Dan, Sara had always appreciated having him around.

And yet, she still couldn't look at him without seeing the gangly ten-year-old boy girls had screeched at on the bus for having dead people's cooties.

A funeral was just letting out as Sara pulled into the parking lot. Death was a brisk business, even in the worst economies. The old Victorian was well cared for. The paint was fresh and there was a new tile roof. Sara watched the mourners leaving the house, preparing to make the short trek to the burial.

There was a marble headstone at the cemetery with Jeffrey's name on it. Sara had his ashes back in Atlanta, but his mother had suddenly found her religion and insisted on a proper funeral. The church was so full during the service that the back doors were opened so the people lining the steps could hear the preacher's voice. People walked to the cemetery rather than drive behind the hearse.

Those closest to Jeffrey had each put something in the coffin that reminded them of their friend, their boss, their mentor. There was an Auburn football program with Jeffrey on the cover supplied by his boyhood friends. Eddie had added a hammer Jeffrey used to help him build a shed in the backyard. Her mother had put in her old frying pan because she'd taught Jeffrey how to fry chicken with it. Tessa provided a postcard he had sent her from Florida. He had always loved teasing her. The postcard read, Glad you're not here!

A few weeks before Jeffrey had been killed, Sara had given him a signed first edition of MacKinlay Kantor's Andersonville. Sara had a hard time letting the book go, even though she knew she had to. She couldn't let the ground cover Jeffrey's coffin of memories without her own contribution. Dan Brock had sat with her in the living room of her house for hours until she was ready to relinquish the book. She had looked at each page, touched her fingers to the spots where Jeffrey's hands had rested. Dan had been patient, quiet, but when the time came for him to go, he was crying as hard as Sara.

She took a tissue out of the glove compartment and wiped her eyes. She was going to end up bawling like a baby if she let her mind continue along this track. Her jacket was on the seat beside her but Sara didn't bother to put it on. She found a clip in the pocket and pulled back her hair. She checked the frizzy mess in the mirror. She should've put on some makeup this morning. The freckles across her nose were more pronounced. Her skin looked pale. Sara pushed away the mirror. It was too late to do anything about it now.

The last car pulled into the funeral procession. Sara jumped out of her SUV, barely missing a deep puddle. The rain was beating down and she covered her head with her hands in futility. Brock stood in the doorway, waving to her. His hair looked a bit thinner on the top, but with his three-piece suit and lanky frame, Dan Brock looked much as he had in high school.

"Hey there." He gave her a quick smile. "You're the first one here. I told Frank we'd start around eleven-thirty."

"I thought I could get a head start laying everything out."

"I think I may have beat you to that." He gave her a smile that seemed reserved for mourners. "How you holding up, Sara?"

She tried to return the smile, but was unable to answer the question. She'd skipped the pleasantries at the jail yesterday when Brock showed up to claim Tommy Braham's body, and she felt a little awkward around him now. As usual, Brock smoothed over the moment.

"Aw, come here." He grabbed her in a bear hug. "You're looking great, Sara. Really good. I'm so glad you came back for the holiday. Your mama must be happy."

"My father is, at least."

He kept his arm around her and led her into the house. "Let's get out of this inclement weather."

"Wow." She stopped at the door, glancing around the wide central hallway. Her parents weren't the only ones who'd been remodeling lately. The staid décor of the house had been considerably updated. The heavy velvet drapes and dark green carpeting had been replaced with Roman shades and a muted Oriental rug that covered beautiful hardwood floors. Even the viewing rooms had been updated so they no longer resembled formal Victorian parlors.

Brock said, "Mama hates it, so I must've done something right."

"You've done a lovely job," she told him, knowing Brock probably hadn't gotten many compliments.

"Business has been good." Brock kept his hand on her back as he led her down the hall. "I'll have to admit, I'm real torn up about Tommy. He was a good kid. He cut my grass for me." Brock stopped walking. He looked down at Sara, his attitude changed. "I know people think I'm naïve, give folks too much of the benefit of the doubt, but I can't see him doing any of this."

"Killing himself or killing the girl?"

"Both." Brock chewed his bottom lip for a moment. "Tommy was a happy kid. You know what he was like. Never had a cross word for anybody."

Sara was circumspect. "People can surprise you."

"Maybe with their ignorance, thinking just because the kid was slow that his brain just snapped one day and he went on a rampage."

"You're right." Tommy was disabled. He wasn't psychotic. One had nothing to do with the other.

"The thing that gets me is, she wasn't killed bad. Not like in a fury."

"What do you mean?"

He tucked his hand between the buttons of his vest. "You'd just expect more, is all."

"More?"

His demeanor changed back just as quickly. "Listen to me. You're the doctor here. You'll see for yourself, and probably find a lot more than I ever could." He put his hand on her shoulder. "It's really good to have you back, Sara. And I want you to know that I'm real happy for you. Don't listen to what anybody else says."

Sara didn't like the sound of that. "Happy about what?"

"Your new fella."

"My new—"

"Whole town's buzzing about it. Mama was on the phone all last night."

Sara felt her face turning red. "Brock—Dan. He's not really—"

"Shh," Brock warned. She heard shuffling on the stairs above them. He raised his voice. "Mama, I'm gonna go to the cemetery now to help Mr. Billingham's people. Sara'll be downstairs working, so don't you go and bother her. You hear?"

Audra Brock's voice was frail, though the old biddy would probably outlive them all. "What'd you say?"

He raised his voice again, cutting to the chase. "I said leave Sara alone."

There was something like a "humph," then more shuffling as she made her way back to her room.

Brock rolled his eyes, but his good-natured smile was still on his face. "Everything downstairs is the same as when you left it. I should be back in an hour or so to lend you a hand. Should I put a sign on the door for your fella?"

"He—" Sara stopped herself. "I'll do it."

"My office is still in the kitchen. I spiffed it up a bit. Lemme know what you think about it." He gave her a wave before leaving through the front door.

Sara walked to the back of the house. She had left her purse in the car so she didn't have a paper or pen to leave Will a note. The Victorian's kitchen had always served as the office. Brock had finally taken out the old sink and washboard, making the space more conducive to the business of managing death. The coffin display was built into the breakfast nook. Catalogues of flower arrangements were artfully spread out on a mahogany table. Brock's desk was glass and steel, a very modern design considering he was the oldest soul she had ever met.

She took a Post-it off his blotter and started to write Will a note, then stopped herself. Frank was planning to make an appearance. What could she put on this small square of paper that would tell Will where to go without making Frank suspicious?

Sara tapped the pen to her teeth as she walked to the front door. She finally settled on “down stairs,” writing it as two words, each on its own line. To make it as clear as possible, she drew a large, downward-pointing arrow. That might not do any good, though. Every dyslexic was different, but there were certain characteristics that the majority of them shared. Primary among these was a lack of any sense of direction. It was no wonder Will had gotten lost driving down from Atlanta. Making a phone call wouldn’t have helped matters. Telling a dyslexic to turn right was about as useful as telling a cat to tap-dance.

Sara pressed the note to the glass on the front door. She had agonized over the message this morning, writing it six different times, signing it, not signing it. The smiley face had been a last-minute addition, her way of trying to let Will know that everything was okay between them. A blind man could’ve seen how upset he was last night. Sara felt horrible for embarrassing him. She had never been a smiley face person, but she’d drawn two eyes and a mouth at the corner of the note before sticking it in a baggie under his windshield, hoping that he would take it the right way.

It seemed wildly inappropriate to leave a smiley face on the front door of a funeral home, but she drew a small figure—two eyes and a curved mouth—thinking at least she’d get points for consistency.

The floorboards overhead creaked, and Sara trotted quickly back toward the kitchen. She left the basement door wide open and took the stairs two at a time to avoid Brock’s mother. There was a burglar door at the bottom of the landing. Black metal bars and a mesh screen kept anyone from breaking into the embalming area. You wouldn’t think that a person would want to come down here unless they had to, but many years ago, a couple of kids from the college had busted open the old door in their quest to steal some formaldehyde, a popular choice for cutting powder cocaine. Sara assumed the combination on the keypad hadn’t changed. She entered 1-5-9 and the door clicked open.

Brock kept the area immediately across from the door empty so that no one would accidentally glance through the mesh screen and see something they should never have to see. The buffer zone continued down the long, well-lit hallway. Storage shelves contained various chemicals and supplies with the labels all turned toward the wall so the viewer would not know what he was looking at. Small shoe boxes filled the last metal cabinet; cremains no one had ever bothered to pick up.

At the end of the hall, Brock had posted a sign that Sara recognized from the hospital morgue: Hic locus est ubi mors gaudet succurrere vitae. Roughly translated, “This is the place where death delights to teach the living.”

The swinging doors to the embalming suite were propped open with old bricks from the house. Artificial light bounced off the white tile walls. While the upstairs had been drastically changed, the downstairs looked exactly the same as Sara remembered. There were two stainless steel gurneys in the middle of the room with large industrial lights spring-mounted above them. A workstation stood at the foot of each gurney, plumbing connected at the ends to help evacuate the bodies. Brock had already laid out the autopsy tools—the saws, the scalpels, the forceps, and scissors. He was still using the pruning shears Sara had bought at the hardware store to cut through the breastbone.

The back of the room was wholly devoted to the funeral business. Beside the walk-in freezer was a rolling tray containing the metal trocar that was used to pierce and clean out organs during the embalming process. Neatly tucked into the corner was the embalming machine, which looked like a cross between a buffet-style coffee warmer and a blender. The arterial tube hung limply in the sink. Heavy rubber gloves were laid out on the basin. A butcher's apron. A pair of construction goggles. A splatter mask. An industrial-sized box of roll cotton for stopping leaks.

Incongruously, there was a hair dryer and a pink makeup kit opened on top of the cotton box. Pots of foundation and various shades of eyeshadows and lip glosses were inside. The logo for "Peason's Mortuary makeup" was embossed on the inside of the lid.

Sara took a pair of disposable surgical gloves from the box mounted on the wall. She opened the freezer door. A gust of cold air met her. There were three bodies inside, all zipped into black bags. She checked the tags for Allison Spooner.

The bag unzipped with the usual hassle, catching on the bulky black plastic. Allison's skin had taken on the waxy, iridescent tone of death. Her lips were blackish blue. Pieces of grass and twigs were stuck to her skin and clothing. Small contusions pebbled her mouth and cheeks. Sara slipped on the surgical gloves and gently folded back the girl's bottom lip. Teeth marks cut into the soft flesh where Allison's face had been pressed into the ground. The wound had bled before she died. The killer had held her down in order to kill her.

Carefully, Sara turned Allison's head to the side. The rigor had already dissipated. She could easily see the gaping stab wound at the back of the girl's neck.

Brock was right. She wasn't killed bad. There was no fury written on the body, just a deadly, precise incision.

Sara pressed her fingers to the top and bottom of the wound, stretching the skin to reconstruct its probable position at the time of injury. The knife would have been thin, approximately half an inch wide, probably no more than three and a half inches long. The blade had gone in at an angle. The bottom of the incision appeared curved, which meant that the knife had been twisted to ensure maximum damage.

Sara pulled up the girl's jacket, matching the slice in the material to the wound in the neck. Lena was right about this, at least. The girl had been stabbed from behind. Sara guessed the killer had been right-handed, and very sure of himself. The blow would have been as swift as it was deadly. The hilt of the knife had bruised the skin around the injury. Whoever had killed Allison had not hesitated in driving home the blade, then twisting it for effect.

This was not the work of Tommy Braham.

Sara zipped back the bag with the same difficulty. Before she left the freezer, she put her hand on Tommy's leg. Obviously, he couldn't feel the pressure—it was too late for Sara to give him comfort—but it made her feel better knowing that she was going to be the one to take care of him.

She slipped off the gloves and tossed them into the trash as she made her way to the back of the basement. There was a small windowless room that, in the Victorian's early days, was meant to store wine. Red bricks lined the walls and wrapped around the floor and ceiling. Brock used the space as an office, despite the fact that the temperature was much cooler inside. Sara grabbed the jacket hanging by the door, then quickly changed her mind when she smelled Brock's aftershave.

The desk was empty but for the autopsy forms and an ink pen. Brock had put together two packets for the procedures. He'd stuck Post-it notes on each with the name, date of birth, and last known address for each victim.

Georgia law required a medical autopsy to be performed only under certain circumstances. Violent death, death in the workplace, suspicious death, sudden death, unattended death, and surgical death all required further investigation. For the most part, the information gathered was always the same: legal name, aliases, age, height, weight, cause of death. X rays were taken. The stomach contents would be examined. Organs were weighed. Arteries, valves, and veins were explored. Contusions were noted. Traumas. Bite marks. Stretch marks. Lacerations. Scars. Tattoos. Birthmarks. Every detail, remarkable or not, that was found on or in the body had to be noted on the corresponding form.

Sara had hooked her reading glasses on her shirt before getting out of the car. She slipped them on and started on the forms. Most of the paperwork would have to be filled out after the procedures, but every label attached to a specimen or sample had to have her name, the location, and the proper date and time. In addition to that, every form had to have the same information at the bottom along with her signature and license number. She was halfway through the second packet when she heard someone knocking at the metal door.

"Hello?" Will's voice echoed through the basement.

Sara rubbed her eyes, feeling as if she'd just woken from a nap. "I'll be right there." She pushed herself back from the desk and walked toward the stairs. Will was standing on the other side of the security door.

She pushed open the latch. "I guess my notes worked."

He gave her a careful look, almost like a warning.

Sara waved him back to the autopsy suite.

"Quite a spread," Will told her, taking in the room. His hands were in his pockets. She saw that his jeans were wet and muddy at the hem.

She asked, "How did it go this morning?"

"The good news is that I found out where Allison was killed." He told her about his walk in the forest. "We were lucky the rain didn't wash it all out."

"Blood is five times more dense than water. It would take weeks for the soil to filter it out, and I'd bet that water oak will hold on to it for years." Sara explained, "The plasma would break down, but the proteins and globulin would remain in an indefinite colloidal stage."

"That's exactly what I was thinking."

She smiled. "What's the bad news?"

He leaned his hand on the gurney, then thought better of it. "I executed a search warrant on the wrong property and tainted some evidence."

Sara didn't speak, but her expression must have conveyed her surprise.

"Tommy lived in the garage, not Allison. The search warrant Faith got listed the garage address. Anything I found is tainted. I doubt a judge would let it through in court."

She suppressed a rueful laugh. At least he was seeing firsthand how Lena managed to screw up everything and everyone around her. "What did you find?"

"Not a lot of blood, if that's what you mean. Frank Wallace was cut while he was standing at the front of the garage. The stain on the floor by the bed was probably from Tommy's dog, Pippy, trying to hork up a sock."

Sara winced. "Do you still think Tommy did this? His confession doesn't line up with the facts."

"Lena's been working on the theory that Tommy took Allison out to the woods on his scooter and murdered her there. I suppose he was sitting on the cinder blocks the way you'd put a kid on some phone books at the kitchen table."

"That sounds completely believable."

"Doesn't it just?" He scratched his jaw. "Have you examined Allison's body yet?"

"I took a preliminary look at the wound. The attacker was behind her. Most knife injuries to the throat are from behind, but usually the blade is drawn across the front of the throat, oftentimes resulting in a partial decapitation. Allison was stabbed from behind with the blade going into the neck from the rear, the trajectory going toward the front of the throat. It was one thrust, very calculated, almost like an execution, then the killer twisted the blade just to make sure."

"So, she died from the stab wound?"

"I can't say for sure until I have her on the table."

"But you have an idea."

Sara had never liked giving her opinion unless she had strong medical fact to support it. "I don't want to make assumptions."

"It's just us down here. I promise I won't tell anybody."

She was only vaguely aware that she was relenting much more easily than she should have. "The angle of the wound was designed to deliver a quick death. I haven't cut her open yet, so I'm not sure—"

"But?"

"It looks like the carotid sheath was cut, so we're talking an instant interruption of the common carotid and more than likely the internal jugular. They're branched together like this." She lined up the index fingers of both her hands. "The carotid's job is to carry oxygenated blood at a rapid speed from the heart into the head and neck. The jugular is a vein. It's gravity fed. It collects the deoxygenated blood from the head and neck and sends it back to the heart via the superior vena cava, where it's oxygenated again and the whole process starts all over. You follow?"

Will nodded. "Arteries are the water supply, veins are the drain. It's a closed system."

"Right," she agreed, giving him points for the plumbing analogy. "All arteries have a little muscle spiraling around them that relaxes and contracts to control blood flow. If you cut an artery in two, sever it, the muscle contracts, curling up like a broken rubber band. That helps stanch the blood flow. But, if you slice open the artery without cutting it in two, the victim dies from exsanguination, usually very quickly. We're talking seconds, not minutes. The blood shoots out, they panic, their heart beats faster, blood shoots out faster, and they're dead."

"Where is the carotid?"

She put her fingers alongside her trachea. "You've got one carotid on each side, mirror images. I'll have to excise the wound, but it appears that the knife followed this route, entering near the sixth cervical vertebra and traveling along the angle of the jaw.”

He stared at her neck. “How hard is that to hit from behind?”

“Allison is very small framed. Her neck is the width of my palm. There’s so much going on in the back of the neck—muscles, blood vessels, vertebrae. You would have to pause, to take a second, to aim so that you hit the exact spot. You couldn’t go straight in from the back. You’d have to go from the back toward the side. With the right knife, at the right angle, the odds are pretty good that you’ll end up opening both the carotid and the jugular.”

“The right knife?”

“I’m guessing it had a three-and-a-half- to four-inch blade.”

“So, we’re talking about a kitchen knife?”

He obviously wasn’t good with measurements. She showed him the distance using her finger and thumb. “Three and a half inches. Think about the size of her neck. Or my neck, for that matter.” Sara kept the measurement between her fingers and held her hand to her neck. “If the blade had been any longer, it would’ve exited the front of the neck.”

He crossed his arms. She couldn’t tell if he was pleased or annoyed with the visual aids. He asked, “How wide do you think the blade was?”

She narrowed the space between her thumb and finger. “Five-eighths? Three-quarters? The skin is elastic. She must have struggled. The incision is wider at the bottom, so the killer jammed in the knife to the hilt, then twisted the blade to make sure he was doing maximum damage. I’m sure it wasn’t over an inch wide.”

“That sounds like a large folding knife.”

Sara thought he was right based on the bruise from the hilt, but she told him, “I really need to look at the wound in a better setting than inside the freezer.”

“Was it serrated?”

“I don’t think so, but really, let me get into the wound and I can tell you everything you need to know.”

He chewed his lip, obviously thinking about what she had told him. “It takes less than two pounds of pressure to penetrate skin.”

“As long as the knife is pointed and sharp and the blade is forcefully thrust.”

“Sounds like something a hunter would know how to do.”

“Hunter, doctor, mortician, butcher.” She felt the need to add, “Or anyone with a good search engine. I’m sure you can find all kinds of anatomical diagrams on the Internet. Whether they’re accurate is up for debate, but whoever did this was showing off his skills. I hate to keep banging the same drum, but Tommy had an IQ of eighty. It took him two months to learn how to tie his shoes. Do you really think that he committed this crime?”

“I don’t like to speculate.”

She gave him his own words. “It’s just us down here. I won’t tell anyone.”

Will didn’t give in as easily as Sara had. “Was Tommy a hunter?”

“I doubt Gordon would’ve let him have a gun.”

Will took a moment before asking his next question. “Why not drown her? She was standing by a lake.”

“The water must have been close to freezing. There was the chance of a struggle. She could’ve yelled. My house is—was—across the lake from Lover’s Point, but sometimes when the wind was right, I could hear music playing, kids laughing. Certainly, any number of people would have heard a young girl screaming for her life."

"Wouldn't it be easier to cut the front of the throat instead of going in through the back?"

She nodded, saying, "If you cut the trachea, the victim wouldn't be able to speak, let alone yell for help."

Will pointed out, "Women tend to use knives."

Sara hadn't considered the possibility, but she was grateful his mind was moving off Tommy. "Allison was small. A woman could have overwhelmed her, then carried her to the water."

"Was the killer left-handed? Right-handed?"

"Well—" Sara was going to ask if it mattered to someone who could not tell the difference, but answered him instead. "I'm assuming right-handed." Sara held up her right hand. "The attacker would have been at a superior position, standing above her, possibly straddling her, when the blade went in." She paused. "This is why I don't like to make assumptions. I need to check her stomach and lungs. If we find lake water, then that means she was probably facedown in the water when he stabbed her."

"Knowing whether she was in the water or in the mud when she was stabbed will be instrumental to my investigation."

She furrowed her brow. "Are you being a smart-ass, Agent Trent?"

"Based on how you asked that question, I think my answer should be no."

Sara laughed. "Good call."

"Thank you, Dr. Linton." He looked around the embalming suite and gave a shiver. "It's cold down here. Aren't you cold?"

She realized he was wearing the same clothes from yesterday but for the black T-shirt, which he'd changed for a white one. "Didn't you bring a coat?"

He shook his head. "I'm in an awful situation with my clothes. I need to borrow your mom's washer and dryer tonight. Do you think she'll mind?"

"No. Of course not."

"Have you heard from Frank Wallace today?"

She shook her head.

"It's starting to annoy me that he hasn't bothered to show up. Does he normally let Lena do all the heavy lifting?"

"I don't know how they work together now. She used to go back and forth between Frank and my husband, whoever needed her at the time."

"I'm just wondering if she's reporting back to Frank or if they're both doing their own thing." Will gestured toward the gurneys. "Can I help you with anything?"

"What's your squeamish level?"

"I don't like rats and I'm bad around vomit."

"I think we're safe on both points." Sara wanted to get started so she wasn't here past midnight. "Can you help me get Allison onto the table?"

The joking camaraderie from before quickly turned into a more serious collaboration. They worked in silence, rolling the gurney into the freezer, lifting the body in unison. There was a scale in the floor. The digital readout already took the gurney into account. Sara rolled the bed onto the plate. Allison Spooner had weighed 102 pounds.

When Sara put on a pair of surgical gloves, Will followed suit. She let him help unzip the body bag and roll the girl left, then right, to slide the black plastic out from under her. He held one end of the measuring tape so she could get the girl's height.

Will said, "Sixty-three inches. Five foot three."

"I need to write this down." Sara knew there was no way she could remember all these numbers. There was a whiteboard mounted to the back wall over the counter. Sara used the marker hanging on a string to record Allison's height and weight. To be thorough, she then added age, sex, race, and hair color. The girl's eyes were open, so she noted that her eye color was brown.

When Sara turned around, she found Will looking at the numbers. Sara had used abbreviations that even a reading person would have trouble understanding. She pointed to the letters. "Date of birth, height, weight—"

"I got it," he said. His tone was as close to curt as she'd ever heard.

Sara resisted the urge to talk about the elephant in the room, to tell him that it was foolish for him to be ashamed. He had spent a lifetime hiding his dyslexia, and she wasn't going to fix that by confronting him about it in the basement of the funeral home. Not to mention that it was none of her business.

She walked to the tall locker beside the office, assuming Brock still kept his supplies in the same place. "Crap," she mumbled. The camera and all its pieces were laid out on velvet cloths covering two shelves. She picked up a lens. "I'm not sure I know how this thing goes together."

"Mind if I try?" Will didn't wait for her response. He picked up the lens and twisted it onto the camera, then bolted on the lights, the flash, and the metal guide that recorded depth. He pressed several buttons until the LCD display blinked on, then scrolled through all the icons until he found the one he was looking for.

Sara had two degrees and a board certification under her belt, but hell would have frozen over before she would've been able to figure out anything to do with the camera. Curiosity broke her earlier resolve. "Have you ever been tested?"

"No." He stood behind Sara, holding the camera in front so she could see. "Zoom here," he said, flicking the toggle.

"You could probably—"

"This is macro."

"Will—"

"Super macro." He kept talking over her until she gave up. "Here's where you adjust for color. This is light. Anti-shake. Red-eye." He clicked through the features like a photography instructor.

Sara finally relented. "Why don't I point and you shoot?"

"All right." His back was stiff, and she could tell that he was irritated.

"I'm sorry I—"

"Please don't apologize."

Sara held his gaze for a few moments longer, wishing she could fix this. There was nothing to say if he wouldn't even let her apologize.

She told him, "Let's start."

Sara directed him around the table as he photographed Allison Spooner head to toe. The warm-up jacket. The stab wound that went through to her neck. The sliced material where the knife had cut through. The teeth marks on the inside of her lip.

She folded back the torn jeans, exposing the knee. There was a half-moon-shaped tear, the skin hanging on by a flap. A dark bruise outlined the area of impact. "This kind of laceration comes from blunt trauma. She fell very hard on her knee, probably with her full weight, definitely on something hard, like a rock. The impact busted open the skin."

"Can we look at the wrists?"

The jacket had bunched up around the girl's hands. Sara pushed up the material.

He took a few photographs. "Ligature marks?"

Sara leaned down for a closer look. She checked the other wrist. The veins were an iridescent blue. Lines of red shot through the skin where clots held the blood in place.

She explained, "Bodies start to float anywhere from two hours to two days after they're in the water. Decomposition starts quickly—as soon as the heart and lungs stop, the body turns on itself. Bacteria leaks out of the intestines. Gases build up, causing buoyancy. The cinder blocks would have kept her from floating to the surface. The cold water would've retarded decomposition. I don't know what the temperature of the lake was, but we can assume it was close to freezing. She was probably facedown, her hands hanging in front of her. Livor mortis settled into her fingertips, pooled up into her wrists. I suppose you could mistake the discoloration for ligature marks. It would've been dark that time of morning." Sara couldn't make any more excuses for Frank. "Honestly, I thought Frank was lying to me when he said it the first time."

"Why lie about that?" Will asked. "The stab wound is evidence enough that something was seriously wrong."

"You'll have to ask Frank."

"I've got a lot of questions for him if he ever shows up."

"He's probably with Brad. Frank has known him since he was a kid. We all have."

Will only nodded.

Sara put the ruler by Allison's wrist so he could take a photograph. When he was finished, she turned the hand over. There was a faint scar along the crease of the wrist. She checked the other hand. "She tried to kill herself before. A razor, maybe a sharp knife. I'd say within the last ten years."

Will studied the raised white lines. "What was Tommy like?"

She was surprised by the question because her focus was on Allison. Sara hadn't slept much last night. She'd had a lot of time to think about Tommy. "He was cheerful," she told Will. "I don't think there was ever a time I didn't see him smile. Even when he felt bad."

"Did you ever see him angry?"

"No."

"Did he have many broken bones or bruises?"

She shook her head, knowing where this was going. "Gordon was very gentle with him. The only time I saw him angry was when Tommy ate a whole jar of paste."

Will smiled fondly. "I used to eat paste." He held the camera at his side. "I wonder if it tastes as good as it used to.”

Sara laughed. “I wouldn’t recommend finding out. Tommy was sick for days.”
“You didn’t tell me Lena was raped.”

The observation came out of nowhere. Sara was taken off guard, which was probably what he had intended. “It was a long time ago.”

“Faith found it on the Internet.”

She busied herself over by the back counter, finding a roll of brown paper under the cabinet so she could lay out the clothes. “Does it matter?”

“I don’t know. It bothers me that you left it out.”

Sara spread out the paper. “A lot of women have been raped.” She looked up when he didn’t respond. “Don’t feel sorry for her, Will. She’s so good at making people feel sorry for her.”

“I think she regrets what happened to Tommy.”

Sara shook her head. “You can’t expect good from her. She’s not a normal person. There’s no kindness in her.”

He spoke carefully, staring his meaning into Sara. “I’ve met a lot of people in my life who were truly unkind.”

“Still—”

“I don’t think Lena’s completely devoid of a soul. I think she’s angry, and self-destructive, and feeling trapped.”

“I used to think that, too. And I felt sorry for her. Right before she got my husband killed.”

There wasn’t much more Sara could say after that. She unbuttoned Allison’s shirt and continued to undress the girl. Will changed out the memory card and took photographs when she asked him to. She didn’t ask for his help when she draped a clean white sheet over Allison’s body. Their companionable silence was a distant memory. The tension was so great that Sara felt herself getting a headache. She was angry with herself that it mattered. Will Trent was not her friend. His dyslexia, his quirky sense of humor, his dirty clothes—none of this was her concern. All she needed for him to do was get his job done and then go back to his wife.

Out in the hall, the metal door slammed shut. Moments later, Frank Wallace came into the room carrying a cardboard box. He was wearing a long trench coat and a pair of leather gloves. His hair was wet from the rain.

Will said, “Chief Wallace. It’s nice to finally meet you. I was beginning to think you were avoiding me.”

“You wanna tell me why you’ve got half my guys out chasing their tails in the pouring rain?”

“I assume you’ve heard that we found the crime scene where Allison Spooner was stabbed.”

“You test that blood yet? Could be an animal for all I know.”

Will told him, “Yes, I tested it on scene. It’s human blood.”

“All right, so he killed her in the woods.”

“It appears so.”

“I called off the search. You can bring in your own team if you wanna comb through six inches of mud.”

“That’s a very good idea, Chief Wallace. I think I will call in a team.”

Frank was obviously finished with Will. He dropped the box at Sara’s feet.

"Here's all the evidence we've got." She held her breath until he backed away. He smelled rancid, a combination of mouthwash, sweat, and tobacco.

Will said, "I hope you don't mind, Chief Wallace. I've got Detective Adams canvassing the neighborhood and checking with Allison's teachers from school."

"Do whatever you want," Frank grunted. "I'm finished with her."

"Is there a problem?"

"You wouldn't be here if there wasn't." Frank coughed into his gloved hand. Sara winced at the sound. "Lena screwed this whole thing up top to bottom. I'm not covering for her anymore. She's a bad cop. Her work's sloppy. She managed to get somebody killed." He gave Sara a meaningful look. "Somebody else."

She felt hot and cold at the same time. Frank was saying all the things that she wanted to hear—all the things she knew in her heart—but the words sounded dirty coming from his mouth. He was exploiting Jeffrey's death, while Sara was trying to avenge it.

Will said, "Lena told me you spoke with Lionel Harris last night?"

Suddenly, Frank seemed nervous. "Lionel doesn't know anything."

"Still, he might have some personal information about Allison."

"Lionel's daddy raised him right. He knows better than to be sniffing around a little white girl from the college."

Sara felt her mouth open in surprise.

Frank shrugged off her shock. "You know what I'm saying, Sweetpea. There's not a lot that a sixty-three-year-old black man has in common with a twenty-one-year-old white girl. At least not if he knows what's good for him." He nodded toward Allison. "What did you find?"

Sara couldn't find her voice to answer him.

Will provided, "Knife wound to the neck. There's no definitive cause of death yet."

Will caught Sara's eye. She nodded her complicity, though she still felt shocked by what Frank had said. He had never talked this way around her parents. Eddie would have shown Frank the door if Cathy hadn't beaten him to it. Sara wanted to chalk it up to his exhaustion. He certainly looked worse than he had the day before. Every item of clothing he wore, from his cheap suit to his trench coat, was wrinkled as if he had slept in it. His skin sagged off his face. His eyes glistened in the light. And he still hadn't taken off his leather gloves.

Will broke the moment. "Chief Wallace, have you completed your report yet on the incident in the garage?"

Frank's jaw clenched tighter. "I'm working on it."

"Can you run it through for me now? Just the highlights. I'll get the details when you turn in your report."

Frank's voice was gruff, making it clear he didn't like being questioned. "Tommy was in the garage with a knife in his hand. We told him to put it down. He didn't."

Sara waited for more, but it was Will who prompted, "And then?"

Frank gave another sloppy shrug. "The kid panicked. He pushed Lena out of the way. I went to help her. He came toward me with the knife, cut my arm. Next thing I know, Tommy's tearing down the driveway. Brad went after him. I told Lena to go, too." He stopped. "She sure took her time."

"She hesitated?"

"Lena usually runs the other way when there's a fire." He glanced at Sara, as if he expected her to agree. In Sara's experience, the opposite was true. Lena stood as close to the fire as she could. It was the best vantage point from which to watch people burn.

Frank continued. "She trotted after them. Brad ended up being the one to pay for it."

Will leaned against the counter, one hand resting on the edge. His interview style was certainly unusual. Put a beer in his hand and he could be talking football around a barbecue. "Did anyone discharge their weapon?"

"No."

Will nodded slowly, drawing out his next question. "When you opened the garage door, did Tommy already have the knife in his hand?"

Frank leaned down and pulled an evidence bag out of the cardboard box. "This knife."

Will didn't take the bag, so Sara did. The hunting knife was serrated on one side and sharp on the other. The hilt was large. The blade was at least five inches long and an inch and a half wide. It was a miracle Brad was still alive. Without thinking, she blurted out, "This isn't the knife that was used on Allison."

Will took the weapon from Sara. He gave her a look that Tommy Braham had probably gotten every day of his life. He told Frank, "This looks new."

Frank gave the knife a cursory glance. "So?"

"Was Tommy a knife enthusiast?"

Frank crossed his arms again. There was a bead of sweat on his forehead. Even with the colder temperature in the basement, he seemed to be burning up in the coat and gloves. "Obviously, he had at least two. Like the doc said. This isn't the same one that was used on the girl."

Sara would have melted into the floor if she had the power.

Will asked, "What made you suspect Tommy was involved in Allison's murder? Other than the knife in his hand?"

"He was in her apartment."

Will didn't offer any information to the contrary, but Sara saw that he'd managed to get a question answered. If Lena had talked to Frank, then she hadn't mentioned that Tommy lived in the garage, not Allison.

Frank's patience had obviously run out. "Listen, son, I've been doing this a long time. There's two reasons a man does this to a woman: sex and sex. Tommy already confessed. What's the point of all this?"

Will smiled. "Dr. Linton, I know you haven't done a full exam on Allison Spooner, but are there any signs of sexual assault?"

Sara was surprised to find herself back in the conversation. "Not that I can see."

"Were her clothes torn?"

"There was a tear in the knee of her jeans where she fell. Her jacket was cut by the knife."

"Are there any other significant wounds except for the one in her neck?"

"Not that I've found."

"So, Tommy wanted to have sex with Allison. She told him no. He didn't tear her clothes. He didn't try to force her anyway. He puts her on his scooter and takes her out to the lake. He stabs her once in the neck. And then he dumps her in the lake with the chains and cinder blocks, writes a fake suicide note, and goes back to clean up her apartment. Is that about right, Chief Wallace?"

Frank lifted his chin. Hostility radiated off him like heat from a fire.

Will said, "The note is what's bothering me. Why not just dump her in the lake and leave it at that? It's doubtful anyone would have found her. The lake is pretty deep, right?" He looked at Sara when Frank did not answer. "Right?"

She nodded. "Right."

Will seemed to be waiting for an answer from Frank that wasn't going to come. Sara waited for him to ask about the 911 call, the boyfriend. Will didn't. He just kept leaning against the counter, waiting for Frank to say something. For his part, Frank seemed to be scrambling for an explanation.

He finally came up with "The kid was retarded. Right, Doc?"

Sara told him, "I wish you wouldn't use that word. He—"

"It is what it is," Frank interrupted. "Tommy was stupid. You can't reason with stupid. He stabbed her once? So what. He left a note? So what. He was retarded."

Will let Frank's words hang for a few seconds. "You knew Allison, right? From the diner?"

"I seen her around."

"Have you found her car yet?"

"No."

Will smiled. "Did you process Tommy's car?"

"I hate to break the news to you, Einstein, but the retard confessed. End of story." He looked at his watch. "I can't stick around jerking you off for the rest of the day. I just wanted to make sure you had all the evidence." He nodded to Sara. "You can reach me on my cell if you need me. I gotta get back to Brad."

Will didn't protest the abrupt departure. "Thank you, Chief. I appreciate your cooperation."

Frank couldn't figure out if he was being sarcastic or not. He ignored the comment, telling Sara, "I'll let you know about Brad," before stomping out of the room.

Sara wasn't sure what to say. Will had let all the important questions go unanswered. Jeffrey's style of interviewing had been much more aggressive. Once he had Frank on the ropes, he would've never let the man walk out of the room. She turned to Will. He was still leaning against the counter.

She wasn't going to ignore the hundredth elephant that had just walked into the room. "Why didn't you ask Frank about the boyfriend?"

He shrugged. "An answer doesn't really matter if it's a lie."

"I admit he was being an ass, but he was also being forthcoming." She snapped off her gloves and tossed them into the trashcan. "Did it occur to you that he has no idea Lena's been doctoring all this evidence?"

Will scratched his jaw. "I've found that people tend to hide things for different reasons. They don't want someone else to look bad. They think they're doing the right thing, but they're really not. They're actually hindering an investigation."

Sara had no idea where this was going. "I've known Frank for a long time. Despite that stupid, ignorant thing he said about Lionel, he's not a bad man."

"Sweetpea."

She rolled her eyes. "I know it seems like I'm too close—"

"Those were nice gloves he was wearing."

Sara found herself holding her breath. "I walked right into that, didn't I?"

"Tommy took a beating."

She sighed. Sara's instinct had been to protect Frank. She'd never considered that Will would see this for what it was—hiding evidence. "Frank's hand was cut up pretty badly. They must've sutured him at the hospital."

"I don't imagine they asked very many questions."

"Probably not." Even at Grady, cops were given a free pass on suspicious injuries.

"How dangerous is a gunshot wound if it grazes your hand?"

"Who was shot?"

Will didn't answer. "Let's say your hand was grazed. You didn't get medical attention. You had a first aid kit to clean it out yourself, then you slapped some Band-Aids on it. What are the chances of getting an infection?"

"Extremely high."

"What are the symptoms?"

"It depends on the type of infection, whether or not it gets into the bloodstream. You could be looking at anything from fever and chills to organ failure and brain damage." She repeated her question. "Who was shot?"

"Lena." Will held up his hand and pointed to the palm. "Here on the side."

Sara felt her heart sink, though not for Lena. She was more than capable of taking care of herself. "Frank shot her?"

He shrugged. "It's likely. Did you see the cut on his arm?"

She shook her head again.

"I think he ripped it open on some metal that was sticking out of the garage door."

Sara put her hand on the counter, needing the support. Frank had stood right in front of her and said that Tommy had cut him with the knife. "Why would he lie about that?"

"He's an alcoholic, right?"

She shook her head, but this time it was more from her own confusion. "He never drank on the job before. At least not that I ever saw."

"And now?"

"He was drinking yesterday. I don't know how much, but I smelled it on him when I got to the station. I just assumed that he was shaken up because of Brad. That generation ..." She let her voice trail off. "I guess I glossed it over because Frank's from a time when it was all right to take a couple of drinks during the middle of the day. My husband would've never tolerated it. Not while Frank was on duty."

"A lot has changed since he died, Sara." Will's voice was gentle. "This isn't Jeffrey's police force anymore. He's not here to keep them in line."

She felt tears come to her eyes. Sara wiped them away, laughing at herself. "God, Will. Why am I always crying around you?"

"I'm hoping it's not my aftershave."

She laughed halfheartedly. "What now?"

Will knelt down and started rummaging through the box of evidence. "Frank knows Allison has a car. Lena didn't. Lena knows Allison didn't live in the garage. Frank doesn't." He found a woman's wallet and opened the clasp. "It's odd that they're not working together on this."

"Frank made it clear he's finished with her. My personal vendetta aside, he has ample reason to cut her loose."

"I gather they've been through a lot. Why cut her off now?"

Sara couldn't think of an answer. Will was right. Lena had done a lot of things in her career that Frank had covered for. "Maybe this is just the last straw. Tommy is dead. Brad was badly injured."

"I talked to Faith on the ride over. There's no Julie Smith that she can find. The cell phone number you gave me was for a throwaway purchased at a Radio Shack in Cooperstown."

"That's about forty-five minutes away."

"Tommy and Allison must've had throwaways, too. Neither one has a record of a phone. We'll need their numbers before we can track back where the phones were purchased, but that's not going to make much of a difference, I think." He held up the knife Frank had given them. "This doesn't appear to have blood on it. Would they clean it during surgery?"

"They'd throw iodine on it, but they wouldn't clean it like this." She studied the weapon. "You'd expect blood around the hilt."

"You would," he agreed. "I'm going to have the local field agent do a lab run for me. Can I leave some samples here so he can take everything when you're done?"

"Nick Shelton?"

"You know him?"

"He worked with my husband all the time." She offered, "I'll call him when I'm finished."

Will held up the suicide note and stared at the words. "I don't understand this."

"It says 'I want it over.' "

He gave her a sharp look. "Thank you, Sara. I know what it says. What I don't understand is who wrote it."

"The killer?" she tried.

"Possibly." Will sat back on his heel, staring at the line of text that ran along the top section of the paper. "I'm thinking there's two people out there—the killer and the 911 caller. The killer did his thing with Allison, and the caller is trying to get him in trouble for it. And then Julie Smith was trying to get Tommy off the hook by enlisting your help."

"It sounds a lot like you've taken him off your list of suspects."

"I thought you didn't like to make assumptions."

"I'm fine when other people do it."

Will chuckled, but he kept his gaze on the note. "If the killer wrote this, who's he telling he wants it over?"

She knelt down to look over his shoulder. "The handwriting doesn't look like Tommy's." She pointed to the "I" at the beginning of the sentence. "See this? In Tommy's confession, he used a formal capital with—" Sara realized how useless her words were to him. "Okay, think about it this way: if the first stroke of the 'I' is like a stem, and there are branches ... Well, not branches, more like bars ..." She let her voice trail off. Trouble visualizing the shape of letters was at the core of his language problem.

“It’s frustrating,” Will agreed. “If only he had written something easier. Like a smiley face.”

Sara was saved a response by Will’s phone ringing.

“Will Trent.” He listened for at least a solid minute before saying, “No. Keep canvassing. Tell him I’ll be there in a few minutes.” He closed the phone. “This day just keeps getting worse.”

“What’s wrong?”

“That was Lena. We’ve got another dead body.”

CHAPTER TWELVE

Will followed Sara in his car as she drove to the campus. He was starting to recognize landmarks, houses with fences and play sets that were familiar enough for him to remember the turns. The campus was new territory, and like most schools, it seemed to follow no particular design. Buildings had been added on when the money was there to construct them. Consequently, the campus sprawled over several acres like a hand with too many fingers.

He had spent all morning with Lena Adams, and he thought he could read her mood by now. Her tone on the telephone had been strained. She was getting to the breaking point. Will wanted to press her a little harder but there was no way he could have Lena meet him at the crime scene right now. Sara had made it obvious that she wasn't going to be in the same room with the woman she believed killed her husband. Right now, Will needed Sara's forensic eye more than he needed Lena's confession.

He dialed Faith's number as he steered his car around the curve of the lake. Will saw the boathouse Lena had pointed out to him earlier. Canoes and kayaks were stacked up against the building.

"You've got me for three more hours," Faith said by way of greeting.

"We've got a second victim. They think his name is Jason Howell."

"That's good news." Faith was hardly the optimistic type, but she was right. A new victim meant a new crime scene, a new set of clues to follow. They had absolutely no useful information on Allison Spooner. The aunt was nowhere to be found. Allison hadn't made any connections at home or school. The only person who seemed to mourn her loss was Lionel Harris from the diner, and he was hardly a close friend. But Jason Howell's death would surely open up new leads. A second body meant a second course of investigation. Find one detail, one person or friend or enemy, that tied together both Allison Spooner and Jason Howell, and usually that detail could lead to the murderer. Even the most careful killer made mistakes. Two crime scenes meant twice as many mistakes.

Faith told him, "You're going to have a hard time getting a warrant for all the names of the students in that dorm building."

"I hope the college will be compliant."

"I hope this baby comes out clutching a bag full of gold."

She had a point. Colleges were notorious for their desire for privacy. "Where are we on the warrant for Allison's room?"

"You mean the real one?" She seemed to be enjoying this. "I faxed it to the station about ten minutes ago. There's no landline to the Braham house, so that's a dead end. Did you get anything from the autopsy?"

He told her about Allison's injury. "It's unusual that the killer stabbed her through the back of the neck instead of slicing through the front."

"I'll run it through ViCAP right now." She meant the FBI's Violent Criminal Apprehension Program, a database designed to detect similarities in criminal behavior. If Allison's killer had used this method before, ViCAP would have a record of the case.

Will asked, "Can you give Nick Shelton a call, too? He's the local field agent here. Sara knows him. I want him to run some stuff to the Central lab for me. Sara's going to let him know when she's got everything ready."

"What else?"

"I still need that audiotape of the 911 call. I want Sara to listen to the voice and see if it belongs to our Julie Smith."

"Can you say a sentence that doesn't have 'Sara' in it?"

Will scratched his jaw, his fingers finding the scar that ran down his face. He felt jittery again, much as he'd felt when he'd been talking to Sara in the basement of the funeral home.

She said, "You know that Charlie is at Central this week?"

"No." Charlie Reed was on Amanda's team. He was the best forensics guy Will had ever worked with. "Central's an hour away from here."

"You want me to give him a call and see if he can come out?"

Will thought about the garage, the crime scene in the woods. He was working two cases now—one against Lena Adams and Frank Wallace and another against the man who had killed Allison Spooner and possibly their new victim. "I told the local chief I was bringing out a team. Might as well follow through on it."

"I'll give him a call," Faith offered. "ViCAP shows no similar hits on a killer using a knife to cut from the rear through the carotid sheath, the carotid, the jugular, or the carotid and jugular. I cross-referenced the twist, too. No MO matches."

"I guess that's good news."

"Or really bad news," she countered. "That's a clean kill, Will. You don't do that your first time out. I have to agree with Sara on this one. I don't see your retarded kid doing this."

"Intellectually disabled." Now that Sara had pointed it out, the word was starting to grate. Will supposed he should feel some solidarity with Tommy Braham since they both had a problem. "Call me when you hear from Charlie."

"Will do."

Will closed his phone to end the call. Ahead, Sara's SUV took a turn up a circular drive that led to a three-story brick building. She parked behind a campus patrol car at the front entrance. The rain was still unrelenting. She pulled up the hood of her jacket before running up the steps to the entrance.

Will got out of his car and ran up after her, his shoes kicking up puddles. His socks hadn't dried since he'd stepped into the lake this morning. They were in the process of rubbing a large blister on his heel.

Sara waited for him in a small alcove between two sets of glass doors. The sleeves of her jacket were dripping wet. She knocked on the doors. "No one is in the patrol car out front." She cupped her hands to the glass. "Is someone supposed to be here?"

"The security guard was told to remain in the building until we got here." Will punched a few buttons on the keypad by the door. The LCD screen remained blank. He turned around, trying to find a camera.

"Back door's open."

Will looked through the glass. The building was wider than it was deep. A set of stairs faced the front door. A long hallway shot off to the side. At the back of the building, an exit sign glowed softly over the open fire door.

Sara asked, "Where are the police?"

"I told Lena not to call anyone."

Sara turned to look at him.

"She got the call on her cell phone. Apparently, the campus police have her as an after-hours contact."

"She didn't call Frank?"

"No. Funny, right?"

"'Funny' isn't the word I'd use."

Will didn't respond. Sara's personal ties were clouding her view. She wasn't looking at this as a criminal investigation. With two suspects, you always worked one against the other to see who would flip first to get the better deal. Self-preservation generally won out over loyalty. The garage where Tommy lived painted a grim story for Frank and Lena. At this point, it was just a matter of who would talk first.

Sara looked back through the glass door. "Here he is."

Will saw a small black man making his way up the hall. He was young and skinny, the shirt of his uniform puffing out like a woman's blouse. He gripped his cell phone close to his chest as he approached them. With the other hand, he waved his key card over a pad by the door. The lock clicked open.

Sara rushed in. "Marty, are you all right?"

Will could see why she was worried. The man's face was ashen.

"Dr. Linton," the man said. "I'm sorry. I was just outside trying to catch my breath."

"Let's sit down." Sara helped him to a bench by the door. She kept her arm around his shoulders. "Where's your inhaler?"

"I just used it." He reached his hand out to Will. "Sorry for my state. I'm Marty Harris. I think you met my grandfather this morning."

"Will Trent." Will shook his hand. The man's grip was weak.

Marty waved his phone in the air. "I was talking to Lena about what happened." He coughed. The color was slowly returning to his face. "I'm sorry, it just got me worked up again."

Will leaned his back against the wall. He tucked his hands into his pockets. He had figured out a long time ago that showing his irritation tended to get the exact opposite result he was looking for. "Can you tell me what you told Detective Adams?"

He coughed a few more times. Sara rubbed his back. "I'm all right now," he told her. "It's just hard to recollect it all. I've never seen anything like that in my life."

Will fought to keep his patience. He looked up and down the hallway. The lights were still off, but his eyes were adjusting. There wasn't a camera on the front door. He guessed the entrance keypad was meant to catch students and visitors going into the building. There was a camera over the fire exit in the back, though, and he could see it was tilted up toward the ceiling.

"It was like that when I got here," Marty told him. He put his phone in his shirt pocket and pushed his glasses up his nose.

"When was that?"

"About thirty minutes ago, I guess." Marty looked at his watch. "It seems like it's been a lot longer than that."

"Can you tell me what happened?"

He patted his hand to his chest. "I was making my rounds. I do that every three hours. With the students gone for the holiday, I wasn't checking the dorms. We do drive-bys to make sure the front and back doors are okay, but we don't go in." He coughed into his hand before continuing. "I was at the library when I noticed one of the windows on the second floor was open. The second floor to this building." He paused for breath. "I figured the wind must've pulled it open. Those old windows never shut tight. With the rain, there'd be a lot of water damage if I didn't do something about it." He paused again. Will could see he was sweating despite the fact that the building was cold. "I went up there and saw him, and ..." He shook his head. "I called the emergency number."

"Not 911?"

"We got a direct number we're supposed to call if something happens on campus."

Sara explained, "The dean doesn't like bad publicity."

"Can't get more bad than this." Marty gave a harsh laugh. "Lord, what was done to that boy. The smell is the worst part. I don't think I'll ever get it out of my breath."

Will asked, "Did you come in through the front door or the back door?"

"Front." He indicated the fire exit. "I know I shouldn't'a gone out the back, but I needed air."

"Was the back door locked?"

He shook his head.

Will saw the red warning signs plastered all around the door. "Does the alarm go off when it's opened?"

"Students usually bypass the alarm the first week they're here. We can't keep up with them. The minute we hook it up, they disconnect it again. Lots of engineers and computer folks in this place. They look at it as a challenge."

"They bypass the alarm for fun?"

"It's easier to get to the library that way. The back entrance for the cafeteria is there, too. They're not supposed to go through the loading docks because of safety concerns, but they sneak back through anyway."

Will pointed to the camera mounted over the door. "Is that the only camera in the building?"

"No, sir, and like I said, it was tilted up like that when I got here. There's another one on the second floor that's been tilted up, too."

Will saw how easy it would be to get into the building undetected. As long as you knew where the camera was, you could stand underneath it and use a broom handle or something similar to push it up, then go on your merry way. Still, he asked, "Do you have footage from the cameras?"

"Yes, sir. It's all sent to a central building on campus. I don't have the key, but my boss, Demetrius, is on the way. Should be here in an hour or two." He told Sara, "He's in Griffin with his daddy's people."

Will asked, "What about exterior cameras?"

"The cold got to 'em. They're all out. Half are frozen solid, the rest cracked like walnuts. We had one fall on a student's car the other day. Broke the back windshield.”

Will rubbed his jaw. “Does anyone else know the cameras are out?”

He thought about it. “Demetrius, the dean, maybe some other people if they happened to look up. Some of the damage is pretty obvious even from the ground.”

“I saw the keypad by the door. Is that the only way to get in through the front?”

“Yeah, and I already checked the logs. I can run a system diagnostic on the keypad. No one’s been in or out the front door since Saturday afternoon. The only key card not scanned out belongs to Jason Howell. The room he’s in is registered to that name, too.” He told Sara, “I don’t know why he’d stay here. Heat’s off. Campus is shut down. Library closed at noon on Sunday. I thought this place was deserted.”

“It’s not your fault,” Sara told him, though Will had some issues about the man opening the exit door. She redeemed herself by asking, “Do you think you could get a list of all the students in this dorm? It might be good if Agent Trent had them.”

“That’s not a problem at all. I can print them up for you right now.”

Will asked, “Do you remember what you touched upstairs?”

“Nothing. The door was open a little. I got this feeling, like this really bad feeling. I pushed open the door with my foot and saw him and ...” He looked down at the ground. “I wish I could take a pill to forget all this.”

Will said, “I’m sorry to push you, Mr. Harris, but do you remember if the lights were on or off?”

“All the switches are downstairs.” He pointed to a set of light switches by the stairs. They were high up, probably to discourage students from flicking them on and off at will. “I turned on the lights before I went up, but then I turned them all back off like I found them.”

“Thank you for your time, Mr. Harris.” Will nodded toward the stairs, indicating he was ready to go.

Sara stood up, but she didn’t leave. “Did you know Jason?”

“No, ma’am. I’d seen that girl at the diner—Allison. You know how Granddaddy is, had her running around every second she was on the clock. I’d smile at her but we never talked. Something like this happens, and you realize you need to be paying more attention to the people around you. I’d hate to think there was something I could’ve done to stop all this.”

Will could tell the man was genuinely distressed. He put his hand on Marty’s shoulder. “I’m sure you did everything you could do.”

They walked back to the stairs. Sara reached into her jacket pocket and pulled out two pairs of paper booties to cover their feet. Will slipped them on, watching her do the same. She pulled on a latex glove and reached up, flipping the light switch. Light came down the stairwell.

Will went first. The right way to do this would be to send in a team to clear the building, but Will knew that the killer was long gone. Bodies didn’t smell when they were fresh.

The building was old, but solid, with an institutional feel that wasn’t exactly welcoming. The stairs went straight up to the third floor, creating a wind chamber for cold air. Will looked down at the black rubber treads. They would need to be checked for traces of blood. He hoped Faith had managed to get in touch with Charlie Reed. Their killer was smart, and he knew how to cover his tracks. But he didn't have the benefit of a giant lake to wash away his presence this time. If anyone could find trace evidence, it was Charlie.

The view at the top of the second-floor landing was familiar: a long hallway lined with closed doors, but for one. At the end of the hall was a cased opening, the inside obscured by shadows.

"Bathrooms," Sara guessed.

Will turned around and found the security camera mounted high in the corner by the stairs. The lens pointed up toward the ceiling. Jason's killer had probably pressed himself along the stair railing, stood on the bottom step leading to the third floor, and used something to push up the camera.

"You smell that?"

Will took a shallow breath. "He's been here a while."

Sara had come prepared. She reached into her pocket and pulled out a paper mask. "This should help."

Will was torn between his need to be a gentleman and his need to not throw up. "Do you only have one?"

"I'll be okay."

She continued down the hall. Will slipped on the mask. The air got marginally more breathable. Jason Howell's room was closer to the bathroom than the stairs. Their footsteps echoed around them, bouncing off the walls. The closer they got, the stronger the smell became. Will saw that the students all had bulletin boards on their doors. Papers were pinned on top of photographs and messages. The board on Jason's door was empty.

Sara put the back of her hand to her nose. "God, that's bad."

She took a breath through her mouth before going into the room. Will stood in the doorway. He held his breath as the smell of death washed over him.

The kid was lying on his back, bloodshot eyes staring at the ceiling. His face was swollen, almost crimson. His nose was broken. Dried blood circled his nostrils and mouth. One hand dangled to the floor. The thumb was cut. The tip of the pinky finger hung by a few threads.

"Looks like a match." Sara had found Jason's student ID hanging from the closet door. She showed the picture to Will. Even with all the damage, there was no mistaking the resemblance.

Oddly, Jason was clothed in layers—a pair of sweatpants over pajama bottoms; several shirts, a terry cloth housecoat, and a zippered jacket. His body was swollen from the early signs of decomposition. Gases filled his stomach. The skin on his hands was turning green. His shoes were loosely tied but his feet were so swollen that the laces cut into his socks.

Knife wounds punctured his chest. The blood had dried in thick chunks around the material of his jacket. More blood was on the floor, smeared in a streak to the desk opposite the bed. The computer, the notebooks and papers scattered around, were all covered in blood and pieces of brain matter.

Sara put her hand to the boy's wrist. The check for a pulse was routine, though hardly necessary. "I count eight stab wounds to the chest, three more to the neck. The bacteria from the gut is what's causing the smell. His bowel was pierced. He's filled with toxins."

Will asked, "How long do you think he's been dead?"

"Judging by the rigor mortis, at least twelve hours."

"You think we're looking at the same killer?"

"I think whoever killed Jason knew him. This is hatred." She pressed her fingers to one of the wounds in Jason's neck, stretching the skin back into place. "Look at this. There's the same twist at the bottom that I saw on Allison." She checked the other wounds on the neck. "All of them are the same. The killer plunged in the blade, then twisted it to make sure he hit the mark. You can see bruising from the hilt. I'd guess the same type of knife was used. I'll have to get them both on the table, but it's an educated guess that this is the work of the same killer."

"Jason was a lot bigger than Allison. He wouldn't be as easy to overpower."

Gently, she slid her hand under the back of the head. "The skull is fractured." When she pulled her hand back, it was sticky with blood.

"Window's closed," he pointed out. A sizable puddle covered the floor under the sash. Marty had been in the room after all.

Sara had noticed, too. "He did you a favor. The rain could've flooded the floor and washed away the trace."

"Charlie's not going to be happy." Will realized he hadn't told her that a team was coming. "He's our forensics guy. He'll probably want to keep the body here until he's processed the scene."

"I'll let Brock know. Do you want me to do the autopsy?"

He thought he might be stepping on her toes. "If it's not too much of an imposition."

"I'll do whatever you want."

Will didn't know what to say. He was used to the women in his life making things more difficult, not easier. "Thank you."

She asked, "Do you think Jason was Allison's boyfriend?"

"They're close in age. They go to the same school. They both ended up dead by the same killer's hand. I think it's not a big leap." Will asked, "Assuming you hate to hypothesize, what do you think happened here?"

Sara changed into fresh gloves, telling him, "I assume Jason was at the computer when he was hit with something. Statistically, we can guess a baseball bat. I'll know pretty quickly. There will be splinters in his scalp." She pointed to spatter on the wall that Will hadn't noticed before. Unlike the oak tree by the lake, the white walls of the dorm showed clear signs of the violence that was done. "Medium velocity. I don't think the blow was meant to kill him. The killer wanted to stun him." She pointed to the red streaks on the floor. "He was dragged over to the bed and stabbed, but it doesn't make sense."

"Why?"

She looked under the bed. "There should be a lot more blood than this." She indicated a fleshy chunk on the desk. "Obviously, he bit off his tongue—"

Will gagged. "Sorry. Keep going."

"Are you sure?"

His voice sounded unnaturally high even to him. "Yes. Please keep going."

She gave him a careful look before continuing. "It's not uncommon with blows to the back of the head for the victim to bite their tongue. Usually it doesn't come clean off, but it explains the volume of blood on the keyboard. His mouth would've been engorged with blood." She indicated the wall above the desk. "The spatter here is what you'd expect from the baseball bat making contact with the head, but over by the bed is a different story."

"Why?"

"From the position of the wounds, I can tell that major arteries were hit in the chest and neck." Sara explained, "Think about it this way—Jason's on the bed. We assume he's conscious because of the defensive wounds on his hand. He almost lost his finger. He must've grabbed the knife by the blade. His heart would've been pounding like crazy." She patted her fist to her chest, mimicking the quick beat. "Spray, spray, spray. All over the wall."

Will looked at the wall. She was right. Except for two splotchy-looking stains close to the body, the white paint was hardly marked at all.

Sara suggested, "Maybe the killer was wearing something like a clean suit. He could've put down plastic. He'd have to cover the room, tape the walls. This was really planned."

"I think that's a little complicated." Will had yet to meet a killer who was that fastidious. "Most killers keep it simple. They're opportunistic."

"I wouldn't call taking a couple of cinder blocks, a padlock, and a chain to the middle of the woods opportunistic."

"I just think you're making this too complicated. Couldn't the killer cover Jason's body with something and stab him underneath?"

Sara looked at the body. "The stab wounds are closely patterned. I don't know. What are you talking about? Plastic?" She nodded to herself. "The killer could've covered him in plastic. Look at the floor. There's a drip line here."

Will saw the line. It was irregular, following the shape of the bed.

She said, "Plastic doesn't absorb. The line wouldn't be thin like that. It would come off in sheets."

"Sheets."

Sara leaned down and checked the bed. "Fitted sheet, top sheet."

"Blanket?" Will asked. The kid had been freezing cold. It didn't make sense that he'd go to bed without a blanket.

Sara opened the closet door. "Nothing." She started on the drawers. "I think you're right. It must have been something absorbent that—"

Will walked down the hallway to the bathroom. The lights were off, but he found the switch by the door. The fluorescents flickered overhead. Green light bounced off the blue tiles. Will had never lived in a dorm, but he'd shared a communal bathroom with fifteen other boys until he was eighteen years old. They were all the same: sinks in the front, showers in the back, toilets on the side.

He found a wadded-up blanket in the first stall. Blood coated the blue cotton, making it stiff as cardboard.

Sara came up behind him.

He told her, "Simple."

Will looked for the house with the swing set that marked the turn on Taylor Drive. Though the route was familiar, he was loath to take it. Searching Allison Spooner's room was a necessary chore, but Will's instincts told him that Jason Howell's dorm room held more promising leads. Unfortunately, Will wasn't a crime scene technician. He didn't have the credentials or equipment to process such a complicated scene. He would have to wait for Charlie Reed and his team to drive over from the Central GBI lab. Two students were already dead and Will had no idea what was motivating the killer. Time was definitely not on his side.

Still, there were procedures to be followed. He had dropped by the station to pick up the warrant to search the Braham house. While he was there, he'd sent Faith the list Marty Harris had printed out of all the students in the dorm. She didn't have time to do all the background checks, but she was going to get started on them now and send the rest of the list to Amanda's secretary before she went to the hospital.

The police station had been oddly quiet. Will guessed they were all either on the street or at the hospital with Brad Stephens, who was still in a medically induced coma. Still, something was going on. The patrolmen milling around the desks hadn't glared at Will with the expected hatred. Marla Simms had handed him the fax without having to be asked. Even Larry Knox had stared at the floor as he walked to the coffee machine to refill his cup.

There were two cars parked in front of the Braham house. One was a police cruiser. The other was a four-door Ford pickup. Will parked behind the truck. Exhaust drifted up from the tailpipe. He could see two figures in the cab. Lena Adams was in the passenger seat. A man was behind the wheel. His window was down, even though the rain hadn't let up. He held a cigarette in his hand.

Will went to the driver's side. His hair was plastered to his head. He was freezing. His socks were still soaking wet.

Lena made the introductions. "Gordon, this is the agent from Atlanta I told you about. Will Trent."

Will shot her a glance that he hoped conveyed his intense level of irritation. Lena was being investigated for her part in Tommy's death. She had no business talking to his father. "Mr. Braham, I'm so sorry to be meeting you under these circumstances."

Gordon held the cigarette to his mouth. He was crying openly, tears streaming down his face. "Get in."

Will climbed into the back seat. There were a couple of fast-food bags on the floor. Work orders with the Georgia Power logo were stacked in an open briefcase on the seat opposite. Even with the open window, smoke hung in the air like a shroud.

Gordon stared ahead at the road. Raindrops popped against the hood of the truck. "I can't believe my boy would do any of this. It's not in his nature to be hurtful."

Will knew there was no use wasting time with kindness. "Can you tell me what you know about Allison?"

He took another hit off the cigarette. "Paid her rent on time. Kept the house clean. I gave her a discount for doing the laundry, looking after Tommy."

"Did he need looking out for?"

Gordon glanced at Lena. "He knows, right?"

Will answered, "I know that he was slow, Mr. Braham. I also know that he held down several jobs and was well respected in town."

The man looked down at his hands. His shoulders shook. "He did, sir. He worked real hard."

"Tell me about Allison."

Gordon's composure came back slowly, but his shoulders were still slumped. When he moved the cigarette to his mouth, it looked as if his hands were weighted down. "Was she raped?"

"No, sir. There were no signs of that."

He let out a ragged, relieved breath. "Tommy had a crush on her."

"Did she feel the same way?"

He shook his head. "No. And he knew it. I taught him early on to be careful around girls. Look but don't touch. He never had any trouble. Girls saw him like a puppy dog. They didn't see that he was a man." He repeated himself, "He was a man."

Will gave him some time before asking, "Allison was living in the house?"

He lit a new cigarette off the old one. Will could feel the smoke clinging to his wet hair and clothes. He made an effort not to cough.

Gordon said, "She rented the garage at first. I didn't want to let her. That's no place for a girl to be living. She started talking about discrimination, said she had lived in worse, so I told her fine. I figured she'd move out in a month."

"How long had she been renting from you?"

"Almost a year. She didn't want to live in the dorm. Said all the girls there were boy crazy, staying up too late. She knew how to flirt to get what she wanted, though. Had Tommy wrapped around her little finger."

Will didn't address the tone of blame in the father's voice. "She wasn't living in the garage, though."

He didn't answer immediately. "That was Tommy. He said it wasn't right for her to be out there when it was so cold, having to run back and forth to get to the bathroom in the middle of the night. He changed rooms with her. I didn't know until after the fact." He blew out a dark plume of smoke that wreathed around his head. "I told you, she had him wrapped around her finger. I should've put my foot down, paid more attention to what was going on." He inhaled sharply, fighting his emotions. "I knew he had a crush on her, but he'd had crushes before. He liked the attention she was giving him. He didn't have a lot of friends."

Will knew he couldn't tell the man details about an active case, especially one that could result in a nasty lawsuit. But he felt for the father, wished he could give him some words of comfort about his son. Instead, he asked, "Did you spend much time at home?"

"Not much. Mostly, I'm at my girlfriend's house. Tommy didn't know, but we were planning on getting married in the spring." He exhaled sharply. "I was gonna ask him to be my best man once I got back from Florida."

Will gave the man a few minutes to collect himself. "Did you know Allison's boyfriend?"

"Jay. James."

Will guessed, "Jason?"

"That's right." He wiped his nose with the back of his hand. "He wasn't around much. I didn't let her have anybody sleep over. Wasn't right for a girl that age to be fooling around."

"Did Tommy know Jason?"

He shook his head, but said, "I guess. I don't know. I wasn't involved in his life as much as when he was little. He was grown. He had to figure out how to be on his own.” His breath caught as he tried to inhale some smoke. “I know my son. He would never hurt anybody. I know what he did to Brad, but that’s not my boy. I didn’t raise him that way.”

Lena cleared her throat. “I saw what happened, Gordon. Tommy was running, but then he turned around. Brad didn’t have time to slow down. I don’t think your son meant to stab him. I think it was an accident.”

Will chewed the inside of his cheek, wondering if she was lying to help the man feel better or telling the truth.

Gordon seemed to have the same question. He wiped his eyes again. “Thank you. Thank you for telling me that.”

Will asked, “Was Tommy acting differently lately?”

He swallowed hard. “Frank called me a week ago about some mess he’d gotten into. One of the neighbors got mad at him. He never yelled at people before. Never had a temper. I sat him down and talked to him. He said they were giving him grief about Pippy barking too much.” Gordon blew out some smoke. “He loved that stupid dog.”

“Did he drink?”

“Never. He hated the taste of beer. I tried to get him used to it, thought we could sit around on Saturdays, have some brews and watch the game together, but it never took. He got bored. Basketball was his sport. He couldn’t keep up with all the rules for football.”

“Did he have any friends? Was anyone giving him trouble lately?”

“He never met a stranger,” Gordon answered. “But I don’t think there was anybody specific he was close to. Like I said, he was into Allison, and she was sweet to him, but more like you’d be with a little brother.”

“Did they hang out much?”

“I wasn’t here to see it. He talked about her a lot. I won’t deny that.”

“When is the last time you spoke with your son?”

“I guess the night he ...” Gordon didn’t finish the sentence. He took a hit off his cigarette. “He called because he needed permission to use the credit card. He thought Pippy swallowed one of his socks. I told him to take her to the vet.”

“We haven’t found his cell phone.”

“I made him get one of those pay-as-you-go deals. He had a good job. He was a hard worker. He didn’t mind paying his own way.” Gordon flicked his cigarette out into the street. “I can’t be here anymore. I can’t go into that house. I can’t see his things.” He told Lena, “You can go on in there. Take whatever you like. Burn the place down. I don’t care.”

Will opened the door, but he didn’t leave. “Did Tommy collect knives?”

“I never let him near knives. I don’t know where he got one. Do you?”

Will answered, “No, sir.”

Gordon shook out another cigarette from the pack. “He liked to take things apart,” the man said. “I’d get to work and try to write my service orders and the pen wouldn’t work. Tommy would take the springs out. I’d find a bunch of them in his pockets when I was doing laundry. Tore up the motor in the dryer once. I thought it was something to do with his problem, but Sara told me he was playing me. He liked practical jokes. Liked trying to make people laugh.” Gordon wasn’t finished. He glanced into the rearview mirror, looking Will in the eye. "I knew early on he was different. I knew I wasn't gonna have that kind of life with him, the kind of life fathers have with sons. But I loved him, and I raised him right. My boy is not a murderer."

Lena put her hand on Gordon's arm. "He was a good man," she told him. "He was a very good man."

Gordon put the car in gear, making it clear he didn't want to continue the conversation. Will and Lena got out. They watched the Ford drive up the street.

The rain had slacked off, but Lena still pulled the hood of her jacket up to cover her head. She took a deep breath and let it go slowly. "Tommy didn't kill Allison."

Will had figured that out a while back, but he was surprised to hear the admission. "What brought about this epiphany?"

"I've spent most of the day talking to people who knew him. The same as I would have done if Tommy was still alive." She crossed her arms. "He was a good kid. He ended up in trouble the same way a lot of good kids do—he was at the wrong place at the wrong time. And he had a knife in his hands."

"I think you mean that he was in the right place at the wrong time. Tommy was in his apartment. His garage apartment."

She didn't contradict him. "He stabbed a police officer."

"Accidentally, from what I've heard."

"Accidentally," she agreed. "And we had no legal right to go into that garage. Brad got the address, but it's not on the building. I led us here. I was the one who said that the garage was Allison's apartment. That's why Brad looked in the window. That's what started everything." She took a shallow breath. He could tell she was scared, but determined. "How does this work? Do I make a statement? Do I write out a confession?"

Will tried to figure out her grand scheme. It couldn't be this easy. "Let's back up a second. What are you confessing to?"

"The false search of the apartment. I guess that's breaking and entering. My negligence led to a police officer being injured. Two officers. I elicited a false confession. I'm the one who walked Tommy back to the cells. I'm the one who didn't frisk him. The ink cartridge was from my pen. I had some extra ones, so I changed it out, but Tommy got the cartridge from me. And we both know I've been dicking you around all day." She gave a forced laugh. "So, that's obstruction of justice, right?"

"Right," he agreed. "Are you willing to put all that on paper?"

"I'll let you tape it." She pulled the hood off her head and looked up at Will. "What am I looking at? Jail time?"

"I don't know," he admitted, but the truth was she had skated a thin line. Her negligence wasn't willful. The false confession had been taken in good faith. She was cooperating now, even if she'd been recalcitrant before. She wasn't shifting blame. "In the immediate term, I imagine you'll be suspended pending a review of my investigation. You'll have to go in front of the board. They might come down on you hard or they might not. Your pension is probably gone. If it's not, you could take a hit on years of service, get a period of unpaid leave. If they don't pull your badge, this is going to be on your record until you die. Finding someone to hire you might prove difficult. And Gordon Braham might bring a civil suit against you."

None of this seemed to surprise her. She reached into her pocket. "Do I give you my badge now?"

"No," Will told her. "I'm not in charge of that part. I just file my report. There's bound to be some political involvement with your city council and various other civilian boards. As for whether or not you're suspended pending the outcome, I would assume Chief Wallace is the one who gets to decide what to do with you."

She gave a rueful laugh. "I think he's already decided."

Will felt oddly conflicted. He knew that Lena had screwed up, but she wasn't alone in this debacle. The evidence in the garage told a story that she could use to get herself out of this mess, or at least lessen some of the pain. He felt compelled to ask, "Are you sure about this?"

"Tommy was my prisoner. He was my responsibility."

Will couldn't argue the point. "Why did you call Marty Harris after you talked to me?"

She hesitated, and he saw some of her old slyness come back. "I wanted to know the details."

"Which were?"

She gave him a halfhearted account of the same story Will had heard from Marty Harris an hour ago. She told Will, "I got Jason's contact information and called his mother. She lives in West Virginia. She didn't seem too concerned that the police were calling about her son."

"How were you sure about the victim's identity?" Will realized the answer before he finished the sentence. "You went to the school." She must have called Will from the building, a detail Lena had seen fit to leave out. "Well?" he asked.

"I was already there checking Allison's school records when Marty called me." She shrugged. "I needed to see if it was the same killer."

"And?"

"I don't know. It makes sense. Jason was Allison's boyfriend. They both turn up murdered within a day of each other. Tommy doesn't fit into the puzzle anymore."

That at least explained part of her sudden turnaround. Tommy was dead before Jason was killed. Lena would know that he was innocent of the first crime because he couldn't have committed the second one. "Did you close the window in Jason's dorm?"

"I used a glove. I didn't want the rain to wash away any trace. I also covered my shoes and hair. I was careful, but you can get my rule-out samples at the station. They should be on file with the GBI."

Will wasn't going to waste time berating her. "What did you find out at the school? You said you were going through Allison's records."

She took out her spiral-bound notebook and thumbed to the right page. "Allison was taking four courses this semester. I won't bore you with the details—chemistry stuff. I managed to talk to three of her professors. One on the phone and two in person. They say Allison was a good student, kept her head down, did her work. They never noticed her hanging out with a particular group. She was a bit of a loner. Her attendance was perfect. No missed days. Her grades were A's and high B's. Campus security didn't know her name. She's never filed a report with them or been the subject of a report."

"What about the fourth teacher?"

"Alexandra Coulter. She's out of town for the holiday. I left a message on her cell and home."

"Any other known associates?"

"None of them knew about Jason, but it makes sense. He was a couple of years ahead of her, taking graduate classes. She was undergrad. They wouldn't mix except outside of class. She didn't have friends. I tossed around the name Julie Smith because you brought it up earlier. She's not a student."

"Did you get a warrant for searching Allison's records?"

"No one asked for one, so I didn't volunteer." She added, "I also talked to Tommy's boss at the bowling alley. I showed him Allison's picture. He says he's seen her around with another kid—male, dark hair, chubby, obviously Jason Howell. Tommy was giving them free games, but the manager put a stop to it when he found out."

"At least we know they've all met each other," Will said. "What else?"

"There aren't any Julie Smiths in town. I checked the phone directory. There are four Smiths—three in Heartsdale, one in Avondale. I called all four numbers. None of them know a Julie or are related to a Julie. Are you going to tell me who she is?"

"No," Will said, but only because he didn't know the answer himself. "Have you heard from Allison's aunt yet?"

"Nothing. I called the Elba detective a few minutes ago. He seemed annoyed to hear from me again, said he'd call when he had something to say."

"Annoyed because he thought you were pushing him?"

"He doesn't strike me as the type who likes a woman telling him what to do." He should try Will's job. "What else?"

"I've talked to the neighbors, everybody but Mrs. Barnes, who lives there." She pointed at the yellow ranch house across the street. There was an old Honda Accord parked by the mailbox. "There's no mail in the box, her newspaper's been taken in, and her car isn't in the carport, so I assume she's out doing chores."

"What about the Accord?"

"I looked in the windows. It's spotless. I can run the tag through the computer."

"Do that," he told her. "What did the other neighbors say?"

"Exactly what our guys found when they canvassed the street yesterday. Tommy was great. Allison was quiet. None of them socialized; this is a pretty old street. Not a lot of kids."

"Any criminal activity?"

"Not a lot. There are two foreclosures. The kid at the end of the block was caught joyriding in his mama's Cadillac two weeks ago. Two houses over, there's an ex-crack addict living with his grandparents. He's been clean as far as we know. Three doors the other way is a Peeping Tom who's in a wheelchair. He doesn't get out as much as he used to since his father took the ramp off the front porch."

"And this seemed like such a nice neighborhood."

"Only two people were home when Brad got stabbed." She pointed to a house two doors down from the Barnes residence. "Vanessa Livingston. She was late for work because her basement flooded. She was waiting on her contractor and looking out the window right when Brad was stabbed."

"And she saw ...?"

"Exactly what I saw. Brad was chasing after Tommy. Tommy turned. He had the knife here." She held her hand at her waist. "Brad was stabbed."

"And the second neighbor?"

"Scott Shepherd. Professional gambler, so he's on the computer all day. He didn't see anything until after the fact. Brad on the ground. Me beside him."

"Frank apprehending Tommy?"

She pursed her lips. "You want to talk to Shepherd?"

"Is he going to tell me that Frank was beating Tommy or is he going to tell me that he can't remember?"

"He told me that he didn't see Frank. He went into the house and called the station."

"Not 911?"

"Scott's a volunteer fireman. He knows the direct number for the station."

"Lucky for you."

"Yeah, I feel really lucky right now." Lena flipped her notebook closed. "That's all I've got. Gordon says there's a spare key under the mat. I guess I should go home and call around for a lawyer."

"Why don't you help me instead?"

She held his gaze. "You just told me I'm going to lose my badge."

"You've still got it in your pocket, right?"

"Don't bullshit me, man. There's only two other days in my life I can think of that were worse than this one—the day my sister died and the day I lost Jeffrey."

"You're a good detective when you want to be."

"I don't think that's going to matter anymore."

"Then what've you got to lose?"

Will walked up the driveway, listening for Lena's steps behind him. He didn't really need her help, but Will hated to be lied to. Frank Wallace was knee-deep in this crap, and seemed content to let one of his officers take the fall for his own bad leadership. Will didn't feel any loyalty to Lena, but the thought of a drunk, crooked cop running this town's police force did not sit well with him.

Will found the key under the front doormat. He was opening the door when Lena joined him on the porch steps.

He asked, "Have you heard anything about Detective Stephens?"

"No change. I guess that's good."

"Why didn't you call Chief Wallace about the body in the dorm?"

She shrugged. "Like you said, I'm only a good cop when I choose to be."

Will pushed open the front door. Lena went in first. Her hand was high on her side, a motion she probably didn't realize she'd made. Will had seen Faith take this same stance many times. She'd been a beat cop for ten years. There were some things your muscles couldn't unlearn.

The living room was right off the entrance. The furniture was old and sad, duct tape keeping the stuffing in the cushions. The carpet was an orange shag that went into the hallway. Will could feel it clinging to his shoes as he walked back to the kitchen. The carpet gave way to yellow linoleum. Gordon hadn't bothered to update anything except the stainless steel microwave that rested on top of an old Formica table.

"Dishes," Lena said. Two plates, two forks, and two glasses were in the drainer in the sink. Allison had shared a meal with someone before she died, then cleaned up after herself.

Lena pulled a paper towel from the roll and covered her hand so she could open the refrigerator. There was a line of blue painter's tape down the middle. Store-brand sodas filled each shelf. There was no food except for a dried-up orange and a Jell-O pudding cup. Lena opened the freezer. The same taped line split the compartment, but the moisture had weakened the adhesive. One side was stacked full of frozen dinners. The other had a box of Popsicles and some ice cream sandwiches.

Will used the edge of his palm to raise the lid on the kitchen trashcan. He saw two empty boxes of Stouffer's French bread pizza. "I'll ask Sara about stomach contents."

"Tommy would've had more time to digest."

"True." He used the toe of his shoe to push open a pair of louvered doors, expecting to find a pantry but finding a toilet, small shower, and even smaller sink. The bathroom was by the back door. He assumed this was the toilet tenants used when they rented the garage. It certainly looked like a young man had used the facilities. The sink was filthy. Hair clogged the shower drain. Towels were strewn on the floor. A pair of dingy-looking briefs was wadded up in the corner. There was one sock on the floor, a footie that went up to the ankle. Will imagined the other sock was slowly making its way through Pippy's digestive track.

Will realized Lena wasn't behind him anymore. He walked through the dining room, which had a glass table and two chairs, and found her in a small study off the family room. The room looked hastily abandoned. Stacks of papers lined the floor—magazines, old bills, newspapers. Gordon must have been using this as a dumping ground for all the paperwork associated with his life. Lena checked the desk drawers. From what Will could see, they were piled with more invoices and receipts. The lone bookshelf in the room was bare and dusty except for a plate that contained a moldy, unrecognizable piece of food. A glass was beside it, the liquid dark and murky.

The carpet showed tracks from a vacuum cleaner but it still had the same grungy feel as the rest of the house. There was an ancient-looking computer monitor on the top of the desk. Lena pressed the power button, but nothing happened. Will leaned down and saw that the thing was not connected to a power supply. Or a computer.

Lena noticed this, too. "He probably took the computer to Jill June's. That's his girlfriend."

"Did you see a laptop in the garage?"

She shook her head. "Could Tommy even use one?"

"He probably ran the machines at the bowling alley. That's all computer controlled." Will shrugged because he didn't know for certain. "Gordon disconnected the landline. I doubt he was springing for Internet service."

"Probably." Lena opened the last drawer in the desk. She held up a sheet of paper that looked like a bill. "Fifty-two dollars. This place must be better insulated than it looks.”

Will guessed she had found a power or gas bill. “Or Allison kept the heat turned down. She grew up poor. She was willing to live in the garage. She probably wasn’t big on wasting money.”

“Gordon’s pretty cheap himself. This place is a dump.” She dropped the bill on the desk. “Moldy food on the shelf. Dirty clothes on the floor. I wouldn’t walk through this carpet with my shoes off.”

Will silently agreed. “The bedrooms are probably upstairs.”

The design of the house was a typical split-level, with the stairs running off the back of the family room. The railing was coming loose from the wall. The carpet was worn to the backing. At the top of the stairs, he saw a narrow hallway. Two open doors were on one side. A closed door was on the other. At the mouth of the hall was a bathroom with pink tile.

Will glanced into the first room, which was empty but for some papers and other debris stuck into the orange shag carpet. The next room was sparsely furnished, slightly larger than the first. A basket of folded clothes was on the bare mattress. Lena pointed to the empty closet, the opened drawers in the chest. “Someone moved out.”

“Gordon Braham,” Will supplied. He looked at the basket of neatly folded clothes. For some reason it made him sad that Allison had done the man’s laundry before she died.

Lena slipped on a latex glove before trying the last room. Her hand went up to her gun again as she pushed open the door. Again, there were no surprises. “This must be Allison’s.”

The room was cleaner than the rest of the house, which wasn’t saying much. Allison Spooner hadn’t been the neatest woman on the planet, but at least she managed to keep her clothes off the floor. And there were a lot of them. Shirts, blouses, pants, and dresses were packed so tightly into the closet that the rod bowed in the middle. Clothes hangers were hooked on the curtain rod and the trim over the closet door. More clothes were draped over an old rocking chair.

“I guess she liked clothes,” Will said.

Lena picked up a pair of jeans in a pile by the door. “Seven brand. These aren’t cheap. I wonder where she got the money.”

Will could hazard a guess. The clothes he’d worn as a kid generally came from a communal pile. There was no guarantee you’d find a good fit, let alone a style you liked. “She probably had hand-me-downs all her life. First time away from home, making her own money. Maybe it was important to her to have nice things.”

“Or maybe she was shoplifting.” Lena tossed the jeans back onto the pile. She continued the search, lifting the mattress, sliding her hand between clothes, picking up shoes and putting them back in place. Will stood in the doorway, watching Lena move around the room. She seemed more sure of herself. He wanted to know what had changed. Confession was good for the soul, but her newfound attitude couldn’t be solely traced back to her revelation about Tommy. The Lena he’d left this morning was ready to burst into tears at any moment. The one thing she was sure about was Tommy’s guilt. Something else had been weighing her down, but now it was gone.

Her certainty was making him suspicious.

"What about that?" Will pointed to the bedside table. The drawer was cracked open. Lena used her gloved hand to open it the rest of the way. There was a pad of paper, a pencil, and a flashlight inside.

"You ever read Nancy Drew?" he asked, but she was ahead of him. Lena used the pencil to shade the paper on the pad.

She showed it to Will. "No secret note."

"It was worth a try."

"We can toss this place, but nothing's jumping out at me."

"No pink book bag."

She stared at him. "Someone told you Allison had a pink book bag?"

"Someone told me she had a car, too."

"A rusted red Dodge Daytona?" she guessed. She must have heard about the BOLO Faith put on the car this morning.

"Let's try the bathroom," he suggested.

He followed her up the hallway. Again, Will let her conduct the search. Lena opened the medicine cabinet. There was the usual array of lady things: feminine aids, a bottle of perfume, some Tylenol and other pain relievers as well as a brush. Lena opened the packet of birth control pills. Less than a third of the pills remained. "She was current."

He looked at the prescription label on the birth control. The logo at the top was unfamiliar. "Is this a local pharmacy?"

"School dispensary."

"How about the prescribing doctor?"

She checked the name and shook her head. "No idea. Probably from her hometown." Lena opened the cabinet under the sink. "Toilet paper. Tampons. Pads." She checked inside the boxes. "Nothing that shouldn't be here."

Will stared at the open medicine cabinet. Something was off. There were two shelves and space at the bottom of the cabinet that served as a third. The middle shelf seemed devoted to medication. The birth control packet had been wedged in between the Motrin and Advil bottles, which were shoved to the far end of the shelf close to the hinge. The Tylenol was on the opposite side, also shoved to the end. He studied the gap, wondering if there was another bottle that was missing.

"What is it?" Lena asked.

"You should get your hand looked at."

She flexed her fingers. The Band-Aids were looking ragged. "I'm fine."

"It looks infected. You don't want it getting into your bloodstream."

She stood up from the cabinet. "The only doctor in town rents space at the children's clinic. Hare Earnshaw."

"Sara's cousin."

"He wouldn't exactly welcome me as a patient."

"Who do you normally see?"

"That's not really any of your business." She pulled back the cheap mini-blind on the window. "There's a car parked in Mrs. Barnes's driveway."

"Wait for me outside."

"Why do you—" She stopped herself. "All right."

Will walked behind her down the hall. When he stopped outside Allison's room, Lena turned. She didn't say anything, but continued down the stairs. Will didn't think there was anything of note in the girl's room. Lena had done a thorough search. What struck Will the most was what was missing: There was no laptop. No schoolbooks. No notebooks. No pink backpack. No sign that a college student was living here except for the enormous amount of clothing. Had someone taken Allison's school things? More than likely, they were in her Dodge Daytona, whereabouts unknown.

Will heard the front door open and close. He looked out the window and saw Lena heading down the driveway toward the cruiser. She was on her cell phone. He knew she wasn't calling Frank. Maybe she was looking for a lawyer.

He had more pressing things to think about right now. Will went to the bathroom and used the camera on his cell phone to take a picture of the medicine cabinet. Next, he went downstairs to Tommy Braham's bathroom. Will stepped over the towels and underwear to get to the medicine cabinet. He opened the mirrored door. An orange plastic pill bottle was the only thing inside. Will leaned in. The words on the label were small. The light was bad. And he was dyslexic.

He used his phone to take another picture. This time, he sent the image to Faith with three question marks in the message.

Sara had kept his handkerchief again. Will looked around for something to use so his fingerprints wouldn't get on the bottle. Tommy's underwear and dirty sock were not an option. Will rolled off some toilet paper from the roll stuck on the back of the toilet and used it to pick up the bottle. The cap wasn't securely screwed down. He opened the top and saw a handful of clear capsules with white powder inside. Will shook one into his hand. There was no writing on the side, no pharmaceutical logo or maker's mark.

In movies, cops always tasted the white powders they found. Will wondered why drug dealers didn't leave piles of rat poison lying around just for this particular reason. He put the bottle on the edge of the sink so he could photograph the capsule in his hand. Then he took a closer shot of the prescription label and sent both images to Faith.

As a rule, Will stayed away from doctors. He couldn't read them his insurance information when he called to make an appointment. He couldn't fill out their forms while he was sitting in the waiting room. One time, Angie had been kind enough to give him syphilis and he'd had to take a regimen of pills four times a day for two weeks. Consequently, Will knew what a prescription label looked like. There was always an official logo from the pharmacy at the top. The doctor's name and date were listed, the Rx number, the patient's name, the dosage information, the warning stickers.

This label seemed to have none of those things. It wasn't even the proper size—he'd guess it was half the usual height and shorter in length. There were plenty of numbers typed across the top, but the rest of the information was written in by hand. A cursive hand, which meant Will didn't know if he was staring at heroin or acetaminophen.

His phone rang. Faith asked, "What the hell is that?"

"I found it in Tommy's medicine cabinet."

"'Seven-nine-nine-three-two-six-five-three,' " she read. "'Tommy, do not take any of these' is written across the middle in cursive. Exclamation point at the end. The 'do not' is underlined."

Will said a silent prayer of thanks that he hadn't tasted the white powder. "Is the handwriting feminine?"

"Looks like it. Big and loopy. Slanted to the right, so she's right-handed."

"Why would Tommy have a bottle of pills that said don't take them?"

"What about the three letters at the bottom? Looks like 'H-O-C' or 'H-C-C' ...?"

Will stared at the fine print in the corner of the label. The words were so blurry that his head started to ache. "I have no idea. The last photo is as tight as I can get. I'm going to get Nick to take it to the lab with the other stuff. Anything on Jason Howell?"

"He's worse than Allison, if that's possible. No phone. No street address, just a PO box at the school. He's got four thousand dollars in a savings account out of a bank in West Virginia."

"That's interesting."

"Not as much as you'd think. The amount's been going down slowly over the last four years. I'd guess it's some kind of college fund." She told him, "He also has a car registered in his name. Ninety-nine Saturn SW. Green. I already put out a BOLO."

That was at least something. "I'll check at the school to see if it's there. How are the background checks going on all the students who lived in Jason's dorm?"

"Slow and boring. None of these kids even have parking tickets. My mother had gotten me out of a DUI and a shoplifting charge by the time I was that age." She laughed. "Please promise me you won't remind me of that when my children get into trouble."

Will was too shocked to promise anything. "Did you track down the 911 audio?"

"They said they'd email it to me but it hasn't shown up yet." Her breath was short, and he guessed she was walking through the house. "Let me do a computer search for those initials on the pill bottle."

"I'll ask Gordon if his son was taking any medication."

"Are you sure you should do that?"

"Meaning?"

"What if Tommy was selling illegal drugs?"

Will had a hard time imagining Tommy Braham as a drug kingpin. Still, he admitted, "Tommy knew everybody in town. He was always walking the streets. It'd be a perfect cover."

"What does the dad do for a living?"

"I think he's a lineman for Georgia Power."

"How are they living?"

Will glanced around the crappy kitchen. "Not very well. Gordon's truck is about ten years old. Tommy was living in a garage without a toilet. They were renting out a room to help make ends meet. The house must have been really nice thirty years ago, but they haven't done much to keep it that way."

"When I did the sweep on Tommy, I found a checking account at the local bank. His balance was thirty-one dollars and sixty-eight cents. Did you say the dad was in Florida?"

He saw where she was going with this. Florida was the beginning of a major drug corridor that went from the Keys up into Georgia and on to New England and Canada. "This doesn't strike me as a drug thing."

"That knife wound to the neck sounds gang to me."

Will couldn't deny she was right.

Faith asked, "What else do you have?"

"Detective Adams has seen fit to accept her part in Tommy Braham's suicide."

For once, Faith didn't have a quick comeback.

"She said that Tommy didn't kill Allison, and it's her fault he managed to kill himself in custody, and that she'll take all the blame."

Faith made a thinking noise. "What's she hiding?"

"What isn't she hiding?" Will countered. "She's lied and covered up so much that it'd be like pulling a piece of string on a ball of yarn." He went into the kitchen, hoping to find a plastic bag. "Allison had a lot of nice clothes."

"What was she studying in college?"

"Chemistry."

"How do you manage to dress yourself in the morning?" Faith sounded frustrated by his slowness. "Chemistry? Synthesizing chemicals to produce more complex products, like turning pseudoephedrine into methamphetamine?"

Will found a box of Ziplocs in the last drawer he checked. "If Allison was cooking meth, or shooting it, she was being careful about it. She didn't have any needle marks. There aren't any pipes or drug paraphernalia around the house or in the garage. Sara will do a tox screen as part of the autopsy, but I'm not buying it."

"And Tommy?"

"I'll have to call Sara." He waited for her to say something snarky about his using Sara's name too many times.

Miraculously, Faith let the opportunity pass. "There's no H-O-C or H-C-C in Grant County. I'll try the number at the top of the label. Eight digits. Too long for a zip code, too short for zip-plus-four. One digit too many for a phone number. One too little for Social Security. Let me plug it in and see if I get anything." Will sealed the pill bottle in the plastic bag as he waited for the results.

Faith groaned. "My God, does every single search have to turn up porn?"

"It's God's gift to us."

"I'd rather have a live-in nanny," she countered. "I'm not finding anything. I can make some phone calls around the state. You know how some of the yokels are slow to enter their case files into the network. I'm just waiting around for Mama to come pick me up and take me to the hospital."

"I'd appreciate anything you feel like doing."

"If I watch one more home-remodeling show, I'm going to come down there and hope someone puts a knife in the back of my neck. And I've got the worst gas. I feel like—"

"Well, I should go now. Thanks again for your help." Will closed his phone to end the call. He locked up the house and put the pill bottle in his Porsche.

Lena was still on the phone, but she got off when she saw Will. "Honda belongs to a Darla Jackson. She's on parole for kiting some checks two years ago. She's already paid it off. The charge will roll off her sheet in January."

"Did you talk to her?"

Lena glanced over his shoulder. "I think we're about to get our chance."

He turned around. An elderly woman was making her way down the driveway of the house across the street. She leaned heavily on a walker with a wire basket on the front. Bright yellow tennis balls were stuck on the back legs. The front door to her house opened, and a woman dressed in a pink nurse's uniform called, "Mrs. Barnes! You forgot your coat!"

The old woman didn't seem concerned, though she was wearing nothing more than a thin housedress and slippers. The wind was blowing so hard that the hem kicked up as she navigated the steep drive. Fortunately, the rubber soles of her terry cloth slippers kept her from sliding down the concrete.

"Mrs. Barnes!" The nurse jogged down the driveway with the coat. She was a big girl with broad shoulders and ample cleavage. She was out of breath when she finally caught up to the old woman. She wrapped the coat around her shoulders, saying, "You'll catch your death out here."

Lena approached the women. "Mrs. Barnes, this is Agent Trent from the Georgia Bureau of Investigation."

Mrs. Barnes did everything but wrinkle her nose. "What do you want?"

Will felt like he was back in third grade and being yelled at for various schoolboy atrocities. "I'd like to talk to you about Allison and Tommy, if you have a minute."

"It seems like you've already made up your mind about that."

Will glanced back at her mailbox, remembering the street number from one of the incident reports. "Someone from your house called the police about Tommy's dog barking. Your name wasn't on the report."

"That was me," the nurse volunteered. "I look after Mrs. Barnes in the evenings. Usually I'm not here until seven, but she needed help with some chores and I didn't have anything better to do."

Will hadn't realized how late in the day it was. He checked his cell phone and saw it was almost three o'clock. Faith had a little over an hour left before she went to the hospital. He asked the nurse, "You're here every night?"

"Every night but Thursday, and I get the last Sunday of the month off." Will had to slow down her words in his head to understand what she was saying. The woman had more of a twang than anyone Will had yet to meet in Grant County.

Lena took out her pen and notebook. She asked the nurse, "Can you tell me your name?"

"Darla Jackson." She reached into her pocket and pulled out a business card. Her fingernails were bright red press-ons that complemented her caked-on makeup. "I work out of the E-Med Building over on Highway 5."

Lena pointed to the ancient Accord parked in front of the house. She already knew the answer, but she asked, "Is that yours?"

"Yes, ma'am. It ain't much, but it's paid for. I pay all my bills on time." She gave them a meaningful look, and Will gathered that Mrs. Barnes didn't know about the bad checks.

Lena handed Will the card. He looked down at it for a few seconds before asking Darla, "Why did you call the police about Tommy?"

She opened her mouth to answer, but Mrs. Barnes took over, directing her words toward Will. "That boy never did anybody any harm. He had the sweetest heart and the most gentle disposition."

Will put his hands in his pockets, feeling like the cold was going to snap his fingers in two. He needed to find out more about Tommy's sudden mood change in case Faith was right about the drugs he'd found in the kid's medicine cabinet. "The incident report says that Tommy was yelling at someone. I take it that was you, Ms. Jackson?" The nurse nodded, and Will wondered why Darla's name hadn't been listed in the report. It seemed odd that the cop hadn't recorded it along with all the other details. "Can you tell me what happened?"

"Well, first off, I didn't know he was retarded," she said, almost like an apology. "As a registered nurse, I try to be more compassionate with people of special needs, but that dog was just yapping its head off and Mrs. Barnes was trying to go to sleep—"

"I have terrible insomnia," the old woman interjected.

"I guess I let my temper get the best of me. I went over there to tell him to quiet it down, and he told me he couldn't and I said that I'd call the pound if he didn't find a way and they'd make that dog real quiet. As in dead quiet." She seemed embarrassed. "Next thing I know, I hear this loud noise. I look out the front window and it's cracked. You can see I put some tape on it." Will looked up at the house. The glass in the window had a crooked silver line of tape along the bottom. "That wasn't in the report."

Mrs. Barnes took over. "Lucky for us it was Carl Phillips they sent. I taught him in the fifth grade." She put her hand to her chest. "We all agreed it was best to handle this with Gordon when he got back from Florida."

Will asked the nurse, "You're here every night. Does that include Sunday night and last night?"

"Yes. I've been up with Mrs. Barnes for the last three days. Her new medication has been giving her an awful time with her insomnia."

"It's true," the woman agreed. "I can't even get my eyes to close."

"Did you see anything happening over at the house? Cars coming and going? Did Tommy use his scooter for anything?"

"The bedroom's at the back of the house," Darla explained. "We were both back there all night on account of it's close to the toilet."

"Darla, please," Mrs. Barnes warned. "There's no need for them to hear about that."

Lena asked, "Did either of you know Allison Spooner? She lived across the street in Tommy's house."

They both became more circumspect. Darla offered, "I saw her around."

"Did you see her boyfriend?"

"Sometimes."

"Did you know his name?"

Darla shook her head. "He was in and out a lot. I heard them screaming sometimes. Arguing. Struck me as the type of boy with a temper."

In Will's experience, teachers were pretty good at making accurate snap judgments of people. He asked, "What about you, Mrs. Barnes?"

"I saw him once or twice" was all she offered.

"Did you ever hear him fighting with Allison?"

She touched her fingers to her ear. "I don't hear very well."

Will thought she was being uncharacteristically polite, since she'd certainly heard the dog barking. Of course, not many people wanted to speak ill of the dead. He imagined Mrs. Barnes would've had plenty to say about Allison Spooner last week. "Have you seen her car in the driveway recently?"

"Gordon asked her to park it in the street because it was leaking oil," Mrs. Barnes said. "I haven't seen it there in a while. At least not this weekend."

"Me neither," Darla confirmed.

"What about the boyfriend's car? Did you notice what he was driving?"

Both women shook their heads. Again, Darla spoke. "I'm not good with those things. It was a station wagon. Green or blue. I know that's not real helpful."

He asked, "Did Allison ever have any friends come around? Men or women?"

Darla offered, "Just that boyfriend. He was a beady-eyed little thing."

Will felt a drop of rain hit the top of his head. "Did you ever talk to him?"

"No, but I can spot a loser a mile away." She gave a shockingly rough laugh. "I sure have dated plenty of 'em in my life."

"The point is," Mrs. Barnes interjected, "Tommy did not hurt that girl." She glared at Lena. "And you know that."

Lena said, "I do."

That shut her up. She glanced back at the nurse. "I think I should go now."

Will started, "Mrs. Barnes—"

She cut him off. "My son is a lawyer. Any more questions you have for me should be directed to him. Come, Darla. It's time for my show."

With that, she twisted the walker and began the slow climb back up her driveway. Darla shrugged an apology before she followed.

Will said, "I don't think I've ever had an elderly woman in a walker lawyer up to me before."

There was a buzzing in the air, like a bunch of cicadas decided to start singing at the same time. The rain didn't fall so much as turn into a light mist. Will blinked, feeling beads of water forming on his eyelashes.

Lena asked, "What now?"

"I guess that's up to you." Will looked at his phone again to check the time. Charlie would be here soon. "You can go back to the college with me or you can go look for a lawyer."

She didn't have to think about her answer. "My car or yours?"

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

They'd barely left Taylor Drive when the sky opened up. Visibility was short. Lena kept the speedometer just below thirty as she navigated the flooded streets. The cold was making her injured hand ache. She flexed her fingers, trying to get some blood circulating. There was definitely an infection. She felt hot and cold at the same time. A slow ache was building in the back of her head.

Still, she felt better than she'd felt in a long time. Not just because she'd taken responsibility for Tommy, but because she had found a way to get herself free one last time. And it would be the last time. Lena was going to do things the right way from now on. She wasn't going to take shortcuts. She wasn't going to take risks.

Frank couldn't fault her for falling on her own sword, and if he did, then he could go screw himself. Will Trent had figured out everything that happened in the garage, but he couldn't prove it without Lena and Lena wasn't going to talk. That was her leverage over Frank. That was her ticket to freedom. If Frank wanted to drink himself to death, if he wanted to risk his life out on the street, then that was on him. She washed her hands of it.

The death of Tommy Braham was the only thing that still weighed on her. She needed to talk to a lawyer about how to handle things with the county, but she wasn't going to fight them. She deserved to be punished. Tommy was her prisoner. Lena had just as good as handed him the means to take his life. Working the system, finding a loophole, was out of the question. Maybe Gordon Braham would sue her or maybe not. All Lena knew was that she was finished with this town. As much as she loved being a cop, as much as she craved the adrenaline rush, the feeling that she was doing a job that hardly anybody else in the world wanted to do—or could do—she had to move on.

Will shifted in the seat beside her. He'd been standing in the rain half the day. His sweater was wet. His jeans had never really dried. You could say a lot of things about the man, but you couldn't claim he wasn't determined.

She asked, "When are we going to do this? My confession, I mean."

"Why the rush?"

She shrugged. He wouldn't understand. Lena was thirty-five years old and she was looking at having to start her life back over again from scratch in the worst job market since the Great Depression. She just wanted to get it over with. The not knowing was the hard part. She was getting out, but how much blood was she going to have to leave on the table?

He told her, "You can still work a deal."

"You have to have something valuable to get a deal."

"I think you do."

She didn't acknowledge the fact. They both knew taking down Frank would make her landing a lot softer. But Frank had leverage Will didn't know about. For this to work, Lena had to keep her mouth closed. It was too late to back out now.

He said, "Tell me about the drug situation in town."

The question surprised her. "There's not much to say. Campus security handles most of the small infractions at the school—pot, a little coke, a tiny bit of meth."

"What about in town?"

"Heartsdale is pretty upscale. Rich people are much better at hiding their addictions." She slowed down as she came to the red light on Main Street. "Avondale is all right, about what you'd expect—mostly middle-class people, working moms smoking meth after they put the kids to bed. Madison is the sore spot. Very poor. High unemployment, one hundred percent federal lunch assistance for all the kids. We've got a couple of small gangs running meth. They tend to kill each other, not civilians. There's not much money in the police budget for setting up sting operations. We catch them when we can, but they're like cockroaches. You take out one and there are ten more waiting to take their place."

"Do you think Tommy might have been dealing drugs?"

Her laugh was genuine. "Are you kidding me?"

"No."

"Absolutely not." She shook her head, vehement. "If he was, Mrs. Barnes would've beat Nurse Darla to the phone. There were too many people in his life who were watching him too closely."

"What about Allison? Could she have been using?"

Lena considered the question more seriously. "We haven't uncovered anything that says drugs with her. She was barely getting by, living in a dump of a house. Her grades were good. She hadn't missed a day of school. If she was selling drugs, she was doing a bad job, and if she was using drugs, she was holding on pretty well."

"All good points." He changed the subject. "It's really convenient that Jason Howell died before we could question him."

She stared up at the light, wondering if she should just run it. "I guess the killer was afraid he would talk."

"Maybe."

"Did Sara find anything?"

"Nothing remarkable."

Lena glanced at Will. He was good at leaving things out.

He shrugged. "We'll see what she finds in the autopsies."

The light finally turned. Lena wrenched the wheel to the side. The back tires slipped as she pressed on the gas. "Listen, I know you're sleeping with her."

Will gave a surprised laugh. "All right."

"It's not a bad thing," she allowed, even though it hurt her to admit it. "I knew Jeffrey. I worked with him most of my career. He wasn't the kind of guy who went around sharing his feelings, but with Sara, everyone knew the score. He'd want her to find somebody. She's not the type of person who's good at being alone."

He didn't speak for a few seconds. "I guess that's a nice thing for you to say."

"Yeah, well, I'm not holding my breath for her to say anything nice about me." Lena turned the windshield wipers on high as rain slammed into the car.

"I'm sure she's told you a lot of stories."

"What would she tell me?"

"Nothing good."

"Is she right?"

It was Lena's turn to laugh. "You're always asking questions that you already know the answer to." Her cell phone started ringing, filling the car with the opening lines of Heart's "Barracuda." She checked the caller ID. Frank. Lena sent the call to voice mail.

Will asked, "Why does the school have your direct number to call when there's a problem?"

"I know a lot of the guys on the security staff."

"From when you worked there before?"

She was about to ask him how he'd found out about that, but Lena didn't think she'd get much of an answer. "No, I know them from working as the liaison. The guys who were there when I was are all gone."

"Frank sure does let a lot of the job fall to you."

"I can handle it," she said, but then realized that didn't matter anymore. From now on, the only early morning phone calls that came to her house were going to be wrong numbers.

"What's the security setup on campus? The same as when you were there?"

"It changed a lot after Virginia Tech."

Will was familiar with the college massacre, the deadliest in American history.

She explained, "You know how institutions are—they're reactive, not preventative. The bulk of the murders at Virginia Tech took place in the engineering building, so all the other schools tightened down security around their classrooms and labs."

"The first victims were killed in their dorm."

"It's hard to police that. Students have to have key cards to get in and out, but it's not a foolproof system. Look at what they did at Jason's dorm. How stupid is that to cut a fire alarm?" Her phone started ringing again. Frank. Lena sent it to voice mail.

"Someone's trying to get in touch with you."

"You're right." Lena realized she was starting to talk like Will Trent. Maybe that wasn't a bad thing considering he was running circles around her. She slowed the car to fifteen miles per hour as the rain rocked the car. Water flooded across the road, making the asphalt look rippled. The windshield wipers couldn't keep up. She slowed the car to a stop, saying, "I can't see in front of me. Do you want to drive?"

"I can't do any better than you. Let's wait it out and talk about our murderer."

Lena put the car in park. She stared at the whiteness ahead. "Do you think we're looking at a serial killer?"

"You have to have at least three victims on three different occasions for it to qualify as a serial."

Lena turned in her seat to face him. "So, we've got to wait for a third body?"

"I hope it doesn't come to that."

"What about your profile?"

"What about it?"

She tried to remember his earlier questions. "What took place? Two kids murdered, both with knives, both while they were alone. Why did it happen? The killer planned it out. He brought the knife. He knew the victims, probably knew Jason better than Allison because he was obviously furious when he killed him."

Will continued, "He has a car. He knows the town, the topography of the lake and the placement of the cameras in the dorm. So, he's someone who went to the school or goes to the school now."

She shook her head, laughing at herself. "This is the problem with profiles. You could be talking about me."

"It's possible a woman committed these crimes."

Lena gave him a tight smile. "I was with my boyfriend Jared last night and with you all day."

"Thanks for the alibi," Will told her. "But I'm being serious. Allison was small. A woman could have overpowered her. A woman could have floated her out into the lake, then chained her down with the cinder blocks."

"You're right," she admitted. "Women like knives. It's more personal." Lena had carried a knife herself a few years ago.

Will asked, "Who are the women we've come up against on this case?"

She listed them out. "Julie Smith, whoever she is. Vanessa Livingston, the woman whose basement was flooded. Alexandra Coulter, one of Allison's professors. Allison's aunt Sheila, who hasn't returned my calls yet. Mrs. Barnes from across the street. Darla the nurse with the long red nails."

"Mrs. Barnes gives Darla a pretty tight alibi. She says she was up with her all night both nights."

"Yeah, well, my uncle Hank says he never sleeps, but every time I stay over I hear him snoring like a freakin' chainsaw." Lena took out her notebook. Heat rushed through her body, but not from the infection in her hand. She kept her notebook angled away from Will as she thumbed past the 911 transcript, then quickly went to the page where she'd recorded Darla's details. "The cell number of the 911 caller is a 912 area code. Darla's is a 706."

"Did her accent sound unusual to you?"

"Kind of trashy, but she's obviously pulled herself up."

"She didn't sound Appalachian to you, did she?"

Lena stared at him openly. "She sounded like everyone I grew up with in south Georgia. Where are you getting Appalachia?"

"Do you know any women in town who moved down from the mountains in the last few years?"

She guessed this was another bit of information he was going to keep to himself. Two could play at that game. "Now that you mention it, we had some hillbillies a while back but they loaded up their truck and moved to Los Angeles."

"Beverly Hills?" He chuckled appreciatively before throwing out one of his sudden subject changes. "You should have your hand looked at."

Lena looked down at her injured palm. Her skin was sweating so badly that the Band-Aids were peeling off. "I'll be all right."

He told her, "I talked to Dr. Linton about gunshot wounds today."

"You two kids know how to have fun."

"She says the probability of an untreated gunshot wound getting infected is very high.”

No shit, she wanted to say. Instead, she told him, “Let’s go back to the profile.”

He hesitated long enough to let her know he wasn’t happy about letting someone else change the subject. “What’s the sequence of events?”

Lena tried to wrap her brain around the question. “We already went through what happened to Allison. With Jason, I guess the killer came into the dorm, moved the cameras, stabbed him, then left.”

“He covered Jason’s body with a blanket. He knew there would be a lot of blood.”

That was new. “Where was the blanket?”

“I found it in the bathroom at the end of the hallway.”

“You should check the drains, the—” She stopped herself. Will would know to do all of these things. He didn’t need her help. “There were four questions for the profile, right?”

“The last one is, you have to ask yourself who would have done these things in this order for these reasons.”

“Allison was killed before Jason. She could’ve been a warning that Jason didn’t heed.”

“Jason was holed up in his dorm room. We don’t even know if he heard about the murder.”

“So, the killer is antsy, worried that the message hasn’t gotten through.” A thought occurred to her. “The suicide note. The killer left it as a warning. ‘I want it over.’ ”

“Right,” he agreed, and she assumed he’d figured this out a while ago without telling her.

Still, she said, “It would make sense that the killer would be angry with Jason for not taking Allison’s death as a warning. He was stabbed at least eight or nine times. That speaks to a lot of anger.”

Will looked up at the sky. “Rain’s let up.”

Lena sat up in the seat, sliding the gear into drive. She rolled the car slowly forward. The road was still flooding. Streams of water gushed back toward Main Street. “Both Allison and Jason were students. They could be mixed up in something to do with the school.”

“Like what?”

“I don’t know. A grant. There’s all kinds of government money going in and out of there. Defense spending. The engineering school works on medical devices, nanotechnology. The polymer labs are testing all kinds of adhesives. We’re talking hundreds of millions of dollars.”

“Would a grad student have access to the money?”

She thought about it. “No. The doctoral candidates might, but the grad students basically do shitwork around the labs and the undergrads can’t wipe their own asses without getting permission. I used to date a guy who was in one of the master’s programs. They’re not involved in anything remotely interesting.”

They had reached Jason Howell’s dorm. There were two black vans parked outside. They each had the GBI logo on their doors and CRIME SCENE UNIT emblazoned in white on the sides. Despite herself, Lena felt excited, like a bloodhound who’d caught a scent. The sensation quickly faded. She had spent countless hours at this school studying for a degree that she would probably never get to use. At best, her education would go toward being one of those annoying people who point out everything they get wrong on CSI.

Will looked at his cell phone. "I need to make a quick call to my partner, if you don't mind."

"Sure." Lena parked the car. The rain was still pounding down, and she bolted from the car and ran up the steps, holding down the hood of her jacket with both hands.

Marty was sitting inside reading a magazine. She knocked on the door. He jerked up his head, his glasses tilting on his nose. He buzzed her in with his card.

He said, "You look bad."

Lena was taken aback by the comment. She ran her fingers through her hair, feeling a damp that hadn't come from the rain. "It's been a long day."

"For you and me both." Marty sat back on the bench. "I'll be glad when it's over."

"Anything happening?"

"They got three men upstairs. Two more went over to the parking decks. The guy in charge, he's got a handlebar mustache like he's outta the circus. He found some car keys up in the room and drove around clicking the alarm until it went off."

Lena nodded her approval, thinking the guy was pretty smart for a circus freak.

Marty admitted, "I never checked the parking decks. He was parked on the third level by the ramp."

Lena gave him a pass. "I never checked the decks when all the kids were gone, either."

"Uh-oh. Here he comes." Marty reached over and pressed his key card against the pad.

Will pushed open the door, stamping his feet on the floor. "Sorry," he apologized. "Mr. Harris, thank you for giving us your time today. I'm sorry we're taking you away from your family."

"Demetrius told me to stay here as long as you need me."

"Can you tell me who was on shift last night?"

"Demetrius. He's my boss. We've been switching back and forth so we each get some time off for the holiday." He put down the magazine. "He doesn't remember anything, but he'll be happy to talk to you whenever you want."

Lena thought there were more important things for Will to work on right now. "Marty told me that one of your people found Jason's car over in the deck. They're looking at it now."

Will smiled. She could almost feel his relief. "That's good. Thank you, Mr. Harris."

He offered, "Demetrius is at the office pulling all the security tapes for you. I can drive you over if you want."

Will glanced at Lena. Staring at videotaped footage for hours on end hoping to find two seconds of a clue was the kind of mind-numbing work that could make you want to put a bullet in your head. Lena wanted to be at that car combing through the carpet fibers, looking for traces of blood or fingerprints, but there was no point.

She volunteered, "I'll go look at the tapes if you want."

"It's not going to be fun."

"I think I've had enough fun lately."

Lena sat in the interrogation room at the police station where she had talked to Tommy Braham two days before. She had rolled in the television cart with the old VCR and newer digital equipment that they sometimes used to record interviews. The film from the campus security cameras was a combination of both—digital for the outside cameras and regular VCR tape for inside. Demetrius, the chief of security, had given her everything he had.

As far as Lena knew, she was the only person in the station right now except for Marla Simms, who never left her desk, and Carl Phillips, who was back in the cells working as booking officer for the night. Carl was a big guy who didn't take a lot of crap off anybody, which was why Frank had stuck him with booking duty. Carl was incredibly honest. Frank was doing everything he could to keep the man away from Will Trent.

Lena had already gotten the story from Larry Knox, who gossiped like a woman. She knew Carl had protested kicking out some of the more talkative prisoners in the cells after Tommy's body was found. Frank had told Carl to leave if he didn't approve, and Carl had taken him up on the offer. The only prisoners Frank hadn't let go were either comatose or stupid. Top among this last designation was Ronald Porter, a twat of a man who'd beaten his wife so many times that her face had caved in. Frank had found a way to bully Ronny into keeping quiet. He was trying to push Carl around. He was lying to Will Trent. He was hiding evidence, probably postponing the delivery of the audio from the 911 tape. He thought he was blackmailing Lena.

The old man had a lot on his plate.

Lena rubbed her eyes, trying to clear her vision. The room was stuffy and hot, but that wasn't the problem. She was pretty sure she had a fever. Her hand was already sweating through the fresh Band-Aids she'd found in the first aid kit. The flesh underneath was raw and hot. She had heard from Delia Stephens that they were going to wake Brad in the morning. Lena would go over first thing and find a nurse to take a look at her injury. She'd probably need a shot and have to answer a lot of questions.

There would be worse questions tonight. She would have to tell Jared what was going on. At least part of what was going on. Lena didn't want to burden him with the whole truth. And she hadn't laid herself in front of an oncoming train for nothing. Losing Jared on top of giving up her badge was the kind of sacrifice she was not willing to make.

Lena turned back to work. The videotapes she'd been watching for the last two hours ranged from tedious to boring. She should've just gone home but Lena felt a weird sense of duty toward Will Trent. He'd made her into a reluctant Cinderella. Lena figured it would take until midnight to watch all these tapes, around the same time her badge turned into a pumpkin.

She had found the good stuff early on. According to the time code, last night at eleven-sixteen and twenty-two seconds, the fire door at the back of Jason's building was opened. Lena was familiar with the layout from her own days with campus security. The dorm, the cafeteria, and the back of the library formed an open U with loading docks in the middle. The school didn't let students use the area as a shortcut because a kid had fallen off one of the docks several years ago and broken his leg in three places. The resulting lawsuit had been a hard blow, and they'd blown even more money putting in xenon lights that lit up the place like a Broadway stage.

The camera over the exit door recorded in color. The light coming through the door when it was opened showed xenon blue. Then the camera jerked and showed the ceiling with a pie-shaped wedge of blue light cutting the darkness. The door was closed, and the ceiling went dark.

At eleven-sixteen and twenty-eight seconds, a figure came into the second-floor hallway. The camera wasn't night-vision equipped, but the light from the open dorm room picked out the form. Jason Howell's clothes were bulky, the same as Lena had seen when the kid was lying dead in his bunk. Jason looked around nervously. His movements were panicked. He had obviously heard a noise, but he dismissed it easily enough. At eleven-sixteen and thirty-seven seconds, he went back into his room. From the sliver of light in the hall, she could tell he'd left his door slightly ajar.

The killer took his time climbing the stairs. Maybe he wanted to make sure Jason was caught truly unaware. It wasn't until eleven-eighteen on the dot that the second-floor camera tilted up. The killer wasn't as adept this time. Lena imagined he'd slipped on the stairs. The camera had only tilted slightly, at an angle rather than straight up, and she worked the pause until she caught sight of the tip of a wooden baseball bat. The rounded end was easily distinguishable, but the Rawlings logo gave it away. She recognized the lettering style from her softball days.

At eleven-twenty-six and two seconds, the xenon light once again flashed against the first-floor ceiling as the exit door opened. The killer had taken roughly eight minutes to end Jason's life.

Marla knocked on the door as she walked into the room. Lena paused the tape she was staring at—the digital film of the empty parking lot in front of the library. "What is it?"

"You've got a visitor." Marla turned on her heel and left.

Lena tossed down the remote, thinking Marla Simms was one person she would not miss when she left this place. Actually, now that she gave it some consideration, Lena could not name one person in town she couldn't live without. It seemed odd to feel so detached from a group of people who had comprised her world for the last several years. Lena had always thought of Grant County as her home, the police force as her family. Now, she could only think about how good it would feel to finally be rid of them.

She pushed open the metal fire door and walked into the squad room. Lena stopped when she saw the woman waiting in the lobby, instantly recognizing Sheila McGhee from the picture Frank had taken out of Allison's wallet. They had all been sitting on a bench in front of the student center. The boy Lena now knew was Jason Howell had his arm around Allison's waist. Sheila sat beside her niece, close but not too close. The sky was deep blue behind them. The leaves had started to fall.

In person, Sheila McGhee looked thinner, harder. Lena had thought from the photo that she was local town trash, and now she guessed Sheila was the Elba, Alabama, version of the same. She was the sort of stick thin you got from eating too little and smoking too much. Her skin hung limply from the bones of her face. Her eyes were sunken. The woman in the photo had been smiling. Sheila McGhee looked like she would never smile again.

She nervously clutched her purse in front of her stomach as Lena approached. "Is it true?"

Marla was at her desk. Lena reached across and pressed the buzzer to open the gate. "Why don't you come back?"

"Just tell me." She grabbed Lena's arm. She was strong. The veins along the back of her hand looked like braided pieces of twine.

"Yes," Lena confirmed. "Allison is dead."

Sheila wasn't convinced. "She looked like a lot of girls."

Lena covered the woman's hand with her own. "She worked at the diner down the street, Mrs. McGhee. Most of the cops who work here knew her. She was known to be a very sweet girl."

Sheila blinked several times, but her eyes were dry.

"Come back with me," Lena offered. Instead of leading her to the interrogation room, she went into Jeffrey's office. Oddly, Lena felt a sudden pang of loss. She understood that somewhere in the back of her mind, she'd thought that in ten, maybe fifteen years, she'd rightfully have this office. Lena hadn't realized the dream was even there until she'd lost it.

Now wasn't the time to dwell on her own broken dreams. She indicated the two chairs on the other side of the desk. "I'm so sorry for your loss."

Sheila sat on the edge of the seat, her purse in her lap. "Was she raped? Just tell me right out. She was raped, wasn't she?"

"No, she wasn't raped."

The woman seemed confused. "Did that boyfriend of hers kill her?"

"No, ma'am."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, ma'am." Lena sat down beside her. She kept her hand in her lap. The skin was hotter than before. Every heartbeat shot a throb through her fingers.

Sheila said, "His name's Jason Howell. She's been seeing him a couple of years. They weren't getting along lately. I don't know what was going on. Some kind of disagreement or something. Allison was torn up about it but I told her to just let him go. Ain't no man worth that kind of misery."

Lena flexed her hand. "I've just come from the college, Mrs. McGhee. Jason Howell is dead. He was murdered last night."

She looked as shocked as Lena had felt when she'd heard the news from Marty. "Murdered? How?"

"We think he was killed by the same man who murdered your niece."

"Well..." She shook her head, confused. "Who would kill two college students? They didn't have a dime between them."

"That's what we're trying to figure out." Lena paused, giving the woman time to recover. "If you could think of anybody in Allison's life, a person she mentioned, maybe something she'd gotten mixed up in that she couldn't—"

"That don't even make sense. What could Allison do to anybody? She never hurt nobody.”

“Did she ever tell you about her friends? Talk about anybody in her life?”

“There was that Tommy. He’s retarded, got a thing for her.” Realization dawned. “Have you talked to him?”

“Yes, ma’am. We cleared him of the crime.”

She kept clutching the purse in her lap. “What about that landlord? Seemed like he had a jealous girlfriend.”

“They were both in Florida when the crime was committed.”

Tears moistened her eyes but didn’t fall. She was obviously trying to think of someone else who could have done this. Finally, she gave up, taking a short breath and letting it out between her lips. Her shoulders slumped. “None of this makes sense. None of it.”

Lena kept her own counsel. She had been a cop for fifteen years and she had yet to work a murder case that made much sense. People always killed for the stupidest reasons. It was depressing to think that life held such little value.

Sheila opened her purse. “Can I smoke in here?”

“No, ma’am. Would you like to go outside?”

“Too damn cold.” She chewed at her thumbnail as she stared at the wall. The rest of her nails were chewed to the quick. Lena wondered if Allison had picked up the habit from her aunt. The girl’s nails had been painfully short.

Sheila said, “Allison had a professor she was mad at because he gave her a bad grade.”

“Do you remember his name?”

“Williams. She’s never made a C on a paper in her life. She was pretty upset about it.”

“We’ll look into that,” Lena told her, but she’d already talked to Rex Williams. He’d been in New York with his family since Saturday afternoon. A call to Delta confirmed his alibi. “Did Allison have a car?”

Her eyes shifted to the floor. “It was her mama’s. She kept it in Judy’s name because the insurance was cheaper that way.”

“Do you remember the make and model?”

“I don’t know. It was old, held together by spit and rust. I can look it up when I get home.” She clutched her purse as if she was ready to leave. “Do you need me to do that now?”

“No,” Lena told her. She was fairly certain Allison drove a red Dodge Daytona. “Did you talk to your niece much on the phone?”

“Once a month. We got closer after her mama passed.” A look crossed her face. “I guess it really is just me now.” She swallowed hard. “I got a son in Holman stamping out license plates. About the only thing he’s ever done right in his life.”

She meant Holman State Prison in Alabama. “What’s he in for?”

“Being stupid.” Her anger was so palpable that Lena resisted the urge to lean back in her chair. “He tried to rob a liquor store with a water pistol. That boy’s been in prison more days than he’s been out.”

“Is he affiliated with a gang?”

“Well, who the hell knows?” she demanded. “Not me, that’s for sure. I ain’t talked to him since they sent him up. Washed my hands of it all.”

“Was he close to Allison?”

"Last time they were together was when she was thirteen, fourteen. They were out swimming and he held her head under the water until she threw up. Little shit ain't no better than his daddy." She started rummaging around in her purse, but then seemed to remember she couldn't smoke. She pulled out a pack of gum and shoved two pieces into her mouth.

"What about Allison's father?"

"He's living in California somewhere. He wouldn't know her if she passed him on the street."

"Was she seeing a counselor here at school?"

Sheila gave her a sharp look. "How did you know about that? Was it the counselor did it?"

"We don't know who did it," Lena reminded her. "We're looking into all angles. Do you know her counselor's name?"

"Some Jew. A woman."

"Jill Rosenberg?" Lena knew the psychiatrist from another case.

"That sounds like it. Do you think she could'a done it?"

"It's not likely, but we'll talk to her. Why was Allison seeing Dr. Rosenberg?"

"She said the school made her."

Lena knew freshmen were required to see a counselor once a semester, but after that, attendance was left to them. Most students found better ways to spend their time. "Was Allison depressed? Was she ever suicidal?"

Sheila looked down at her torn fingernails. Lena recognized the shame in her face.

"Mrs. McGhee, it's all right to talk about it in here. All of us want to find out who did this to Allison. Even the smallest bit of information might help."

She took a deep breath before confirming, "She cut her wrists eight years ago when her mama died."

"Was she hospitalized?"

"They kept her for a few days, gave her some outpatient therapy. We were supposed to keep it up, but there ain't no money for doctors when you can barely put food on the table."

"Did Allison seem better?"

"She was good off and on. Like me. Probably like you. There are good days and bad days, and as long as there aren't too many of either, you get along with your life fine."

Lena thought that was one of the most depressing ways to live your life that she had ever heard. "Was she taking medication?"

"She said the doctor gave her something new to try. Far as I could see, it wasn't helping much."

"Did she complain about school? Work?"

"Never. Like I said, she put on a good face. Life is hard, but you can't get down about every shitty thing that happens to you."

"I found a picture of you in Allison's wallet. She was with you and Jason. It looked like you were all sitting on a bench in front of the student center."

"She kept that in her wallet?" For the first time, Sheila's features relaxed into something close to a smile. She searched her purse again and found a photograph that was a match for the one in her niece's wallet. She stared at the image a long while before showing it to Lena. "I didn't know she kept a copy for herself.”

“When was it taken?”

“Two months ago.”

“September?”

She nodded, smacking her gum. “The twenty-third. I had a couple of days off and thought I’d drive over and surprise her.”

“What was Jason like?”

“Quiet. Arrogant. Too touchy. He kept holding her hand. Stroking her hair. Would’ve drove me up the wall having some boy pawing me like that, but Allison didn’t care. She was in love.” She put enough sarcasm in her voice to make the word sound obscene.

Lena asked, “How much time did you spend around Jason?”

“Ten, fifteen minutes? He said he had a class, but I think he was nervous around me.”

Lena could understand why. Sheila didn’t seem to have a high opinion of men.

“What made you think Jason was arrogant?”

“He just had this look on his face like his shit don’t stink. You know what I’m saying?”

Lena had a hard time reconciling the chubby grad student she had seen on Jason’s student ID with the arrogant prick Sheila was painting. “Did he say anything specifically?”

“He’d just bought her this ring. It was cheaper than dirt, and not good for her color, but he was all puffed out like a peacock about it. Said it was a promise ring to buy her a nicer one by Thanksgiving.”

“Not by Christmas?”

She shook her head.

Lena sat back in the chair, thinking about what the woman had said. You didn’t give people Thanksgiving Day gifts. “Did either of them say anything about expecting some money to come in?”

“Ain’t no money coming in for either one of ‘em. They were poor as church mice.” Sheila snapped her fingers. “What about that old colored man at the diner?”

Lena had thought Frank Wallace was the only person who still used that word. “We’ve talked to Mr. Harris. He’s not involved in this.”

“He was hard on her, but I told her it was good she was learning how to work with the colored. You look around big corporations now and they’re filled with black people.”

“That’s true,” Lena said, wondering if the woman thought her brown skin was the product of a bad home-tanning experiment. “Did Allison have other friends that she talked about?”

“No. There was just Jason all the time. Her whole world was wrapped up in him, even though I kept telling her not to put all her eggs in one basket.”

“Did Allison date anyone in high school?”

“Nobody. She was always about her grades. All she cared about was getting into college. She thought it would save her from ...” She shook her head.

“Save her from what?”

A tear finally fell from her eye. “From ending up exactly the way she did.” Her lip started to tremble. “I knew I shouldn’t let myself hope for her. I knew something bad would happen.”

Lena reached over and took the woman’s bony hand. “I’m so sorry about this.”

Sheila straightened her spine, making it clear she didn’t need comforting. “Can I see her?”

“It’d be better if you waited until tomorrow. The people who are with her now are taking care of her for you.”

She nodded, her chin dipping down once, then jerking back up again. Her eyes were focused somewhere on the wall. Her chest rose and fell, a slight wheeze to her breath from years of smoking.

Lena looked around the room, giving the woman some time to pull herself together. Until yesterday, she hadn’t been in Jeffrey’s office since his death. All his stuff had been sent to the Linton house after he died, but Lena could still remember what the room had looked like—the shooting trophies and photographs on the walls, the neatly stacked papers on the desk. Jeffrey had always kept a small framed picture of Sara by the phone. It wasn’t the sort of glamour shot you’d expect a husband to have of his wife. Sara was sitting on the bleachers at the high school. Her hands were tucked into a bulky sweatshirt. Her hair was blowing in the wind. Lena supposed the scene had a deeper meaning, just like her picture of Jared at the football stadium. Jeffrey tended to stare at the picture a lot when he was in the middle of a difficult case. You could almost feel his desire to be home with Sara.

The door cracked open. Frank looked in. He was visibly angry, fists clenched, jaw so tight with fury it looked like his teeth might break. “I need to see you.”

Lena felt a chill from his tone, like the temperature in the room had dropped twenty degrees. “I’ll be there in a minute.”

“Now.”

Sheila scrambled to stand, taking her purse with her. “I’ll be going.”

“You don’t have to rush.”

“No.” She glanced nervously at Frank. There was fear in her voice, and Lena suddenly understood that Sheila McGhee was a woman who had been on the receiving end of a lot of anger from the men in her life. “I’ve taken up your time when I know you’ve got better things to do.” She took out a piece of paper and handed it to Lena as she rushed toward the door. “This is my cell phone number. I’m staying in the hotel over in Cooperstown.” She turned away from Frank as she left the room.

Lena asked, “Why did you do that? She was obviously scared.”

“Sit down.”

“I don’t—”

“I said sit!” Frank slammed her into the chair. Lena nearly fell back onto the floor. “What the hell is wrong with you?”

He kicked the door closed. “What the fuck are you doing?”

Lena glanced out the window into the empty squad room. Her heart was in her throat, the pounding making it hard for her to talk. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“You told Gordon Braham that Tommy didn’t mean to stab Brad.”

She rubbed her elbow. It was bleeding. “So?”

“Goddamn it!” He pounded his fist on the desk. “We had a deal.”

“He’s dead, Frank. I was trying to give his father some peace.”

“What about my peace?” He raised his fists in the air. “We had a fucking deal!”

Lena held up her hands, afraid he would hit her again. She’d known Frank would be mad, but she had never seen him this furious in her life.

“Stupid.” He paced in front of her, fists still clenched. “You’re so fucking stupid.”

She told him, “Lookit, calm down. I took the blame for everything. I told Trent that it was all my fault.”

He stared, slack-jawed. “You did what?”

“It’s done, Frank. It’s over. Trent’s on to the homicides. That’s where you want him. We both know Tommy didn’t kill that girl.”

“No.” He shook his head. “That’s not true.”

“Have you been to the college? Jason Howell was murdered last night. There’s no way—”

He gripped his fist in his hand like he had to stop himself from punching her. “You said Tommy’s confession was solid.”

Lena’s voice took on a pleading tone. “Listen to what I’m saying.” She could barely catch her breath to speak. “I’ll take the fall for everything. Dereliction of duty. Negligence. Obstruction. Whatever they come up with, I’ll take it. I already told Trent you didn’t have anything to do with it.” He started shaking his head again, but Lena didn’t stop talking. “It’s just me and you, Frank. We’re the only witnesses and our stories will be exactly the same, because I’ll say whatever you want me to say. Brad didn’t see what happened in the garage. For better or worse, Tommy’s not going to come back from the grave and tell anybody different. It’s all gonna be whatever we tell them.”

“Tommy—” He put his hand to his chest. “Tommy killed—”

“Allison was killed by someone else.” Lena didn’t know why he couldn’t accept this. “Trent doesn’t care about Tommy anymore. He’s all excited about a serial killer.”

Frank’s hand dropped. All the color left his face. “He thinks—”

“You don’t get it, do you? Listen to what I’m saying. This case just went into the stratosphere. Trent’s got his lab guys down here processing Jason Howell’s dorm top to bottom. He’s going to have them in Allison’s room, the garage, out at the lake. Do you think he’s going to care about some stupid spic cop who let a kid kill himself in her custody?”

Frank sat heavy in Jeffrey’s chair. The springs squeaked. How many times had she sat in this office with Jeffrey and heard that chair groan as he sat back? Frank didn’t deserve to be here. Then again, neither did Lena.

She said, “It’s over, Frank. This is the end of the line.”

“There’s more to it, Lee. You don’t understand.”

Lena knelt down in front of him. “Trent knows the 911 transcript was changed. He knows Tommy had a phone that’s missing. He probably knows you took that picture from Allison’s wallet. He sure as hell knows Tommy went back into those cells with my pen and used it to cut his wrists.” She put her hand on his knee. “I already told him he can tape my confession. You were at the hospital. No one will blame you.”

His eyes worked back and forth as he tried to read her face.

“I’m not working a scam here. I’m telling you the truth.”

"The truth doesn't matter."

Lena stood up, frustrated. She was handing him everything on a platter and he was shoving it back in her face. "Tell me why not. Tell me where this blows back on anybody but me."

"Why couldn't you just follow my orders for once in your miserable fucking life?"

"I'm taking the fall!" she yelled. "Why can't you get that through your head? It's me, all right? It's my fault. I didn't stop Tommy from running out into the street. I didn't stop him from stabbing Brad. I screwed up the interrogation. I badgered him into writing a false confession. I let him go back into the cells. I knew he was upset. I didn't frisk him. I didn't put him on suicide watch. You can fire me or I can resign or whatever you want. Take me in front of the state board. I'll swear on a stack of Bibles that it was all my fault."

He stared at her as if she was the stupidest human being walking the face of the earth. "That easy, huh? You do all that and then you just walk away."

"Tell me where I'm wrong."

"I told you to stick to the story!" He banged his hand so hard against the wall that the glass rattled in the window. "Goddamn it, Lena." He stood up. "Where's that boyfriend of yours, huh? You think you're gonna squirm out of this so easy? Where's Jared?"

"No." She pointed her finger in his chest. "You don't talk to him. You don't ever say anything to him ever. You hear me? That's the deal. That's the only thing that keeps my mouth shut."

He slapped away her hand. "I'll tell him whatever I damn well please." He started to leave. Lena grabbed him by his arm, too late remembering his injury from the garage.

"Shit!" he screamed, his knees buckling. He swung his fist around, slamming it into her ear. The inside of Lena's head clanged like a bell. She saw stars. Her stomach clenched. She tightened her grip on his arm.

Frank was on all fours, panting. His fingers dug into the skin on the back of her hand. Lena tightened her grip so hard that the muscles screamed in her arm. She leaned down to look at his gnarled old face. "You know what I figured out this morning?" He was breathing too hard to answer. "You have something on me, but I've got even more on you."

His mouth opened. Saliva sprayed the floor.

"You know what I've got?" He still didn't answer. His face was so red that she could feel the heat. "I've got proof about what happened in that garage."

His head jerked around.

"I got the bullet you shot me with, Frank. I found it in the mud behind the garage. It's going to match your gun."

He cursed again. Sweat poured down his face.

"Those classes I've been taking? The ones you've been making fun of?" She took pleasure in telling him, "There's enough of your blood at the scene for them to get an alcohol level. What do you think they're going to find? How many swigs did you take from that flask yesterday?"

"That don't mean anything."

"It means your pension, Frank. Your health insurance. Your good fucking name. You stuck around all these extra years, and it won't mean a damn thing when they fire you for drinking on the job. You won't even be able to get hired on at the college."

He shook his head. "It's not gonna work."

Lena took some liberties with the truth. "Greta Barnes saw you give Tommy that beat-down. I bet that nurse of hers can tell some stories, too."

He gave a strained laugh. "Call them in. Go ahead."

"If I were you, I'd be careful."

"You don't see it."

Lena stood up and wiped the grit off her pants. "All I see is a tired old drunk."

He struggled to sit up. His breathing was labored. "You were always so sure you were right that you couldn't see the truth if it was standing there in front of you."

She took the badge off her belt and threw it on the floor beside him. The Glock she carried was her own, but the bullets belonged to the county. Lena ejected the magazine and thumbed out each round. The bullets gave off satisfying pings as they hit the tile floor.

He said, "It's not over."

She pulled back the slide and ejected the last round in the chamber. "It is for me."

The door was stuck. She had to yank it open. Carl Phillips stood at the back of the squad room. He tipped his hat at Lena as she walked out of the office.

Marla swiveled in the chair, her arms crossed over her large chest as she tracked Lena's progress through the room. She leaned down and pressed the buzzer for the gate. "Good riddance."

There should have been some kind of pull, some kind of loyalty, that made Lena look back, but she walked out into the parking lot, inhaling the wet November air, feeling like she had finally freed herself from the worst kind of prison.

She took a deep breath. Her lungs shook. The weather had cleared up a little, but a strong, cold wind dried the sweat on her face. Her vision was sharp. There was a buzzing in her ears. She could feel her heart rattling in her chest, but she forced herself to keep moving.

Her Celica was parked at the far end of the lot. She looked up Main Street. The waning sun was making a brief appearance, giving everything a surreal blue cast. Lena wondered how many days of her life had been spent going up and down this same miserable strip. The college. The hardware store. The dry cleaners. The dress shop. It all seemed so small, so meaningless. This town had taken so much from her—her sister, her mentor, and now her badge. There was nothing else that she could give. Nothing left to do but start over.

Across the street, she saw the Heartsdale Children's Clinic. Hareton Earnshaw's billion-dollar Beemer was parked in the lot, taking up two spaces.

Lena passed her Celica and kept walking across the street. Old man Burgess waved at her from the front window of the dry cleaners. Lena waved back as she climbed the hill to the clinic. Her hand was killing her. She didn't think she could wait to go to the hospital tomorrow morning.

During Sara's tenure, the clinic had always been well maintained. Now, the place was starting to go downhill. The driveway hadn't been pressure-washed in years. The paint on the trim was chipped and faded. Leaves and debris clogged the gutters so bad that water flowed down the side of the building.

Lena followed the signs to the rear entrance. There were cheap stepping-stones laid in the dead grass. At one time, there had been wildflowers back here. Now there was just a mud track leading to the creek that ran through the back of the property. The torrential rains had turned it into a fast-flowing river that looked ready to flood the clinic. Erosion had taken hold. The channel was wider now, at least fifteen feet across and half as deep.

She pressed the buzzer by the back door and waited. Hare had been renting space in the building since Sara left town. Lena had to think that Sara would've never let her cousin work alongside her when she owned the clinic. They were close, but everybody knew Hare was a different kind of doctor from Sara. He saw it as a job, whereas Sara saw it as a calling. Lena was hoping this was still the case, that a doctor like Hare would view her as a billable office visit instead of a blood enemy.

Lena pressed the buzzer again. She could hear the bell ringing inside along with the quiet murmur of a radio. She tried to flex her hand. There was less movement now. Her fingers were fat and swollen. She pulled back her sleeve and groaned. Red streaks traced up her forearm.

"Shit," Lena groaned. She put her hand to her cheek. She was burning up. Her stomach was sour. She hadn't felt right for the last two hours, but it all seemed to be catching up with her at once.

Her phone started to ring. Lena saw Jared's number. She gave the buzzer by the door one last push before answering. "Hey."

"Is this a bad time?"

She paced in front of the door. "I just quit my job."

He laughed like she had told an unbelievable joke. "Really?"

She leaned her back against the wall. "I wouldn't lie to you about that."

"Does that mean you'd lie about other things?"

He was kidding, but Lena felt her heart drop when she thought about how all of this could've blown up in her face. "I want to get out of town as soon as possible."

"All right. We'll start packing tonight. You can move in with me and we'll figure out later what you're going to do."

Lena stared at the river. She could hear the rush of the current. The sound was like boiling water in her ears. Even though the rain had stopped, the river was still rising. She conjured the image of a huge wave crashing down the hill, flooding out the street and taking away the police station.

"Lee?" Jared asked.

"I'm all right—" Her voice caught. She couldn't start crying now or she'd never stop. "I should be home in an hour or two." Her throat started to tighten. "I love you."

She ended the call before he could answer. Lena looked at her watch. There was a doc-in-the-box in the drugstore over in Cooperstown. Maybe she could find a physician's assistant who needed some cash and wouldn't ask questions. She pushed away from the wall just as the back door opened.

Lena said, "Oh."

"I didn't see your car out front."

"I'm parked across the street." Lena held up her hand, showing the dangling

Band-Aids. "I ... uh ... kind of have a problem I can't take to the hospital."

There was none of the expected reluctance. "Come on in."

The smell of bleach hit Lena as she walked into the building. The cleaning staff had been thorough, but the stench made her stomach turn.

"Go into exam one. I'll be right there."

"All right," Lena agreed.

Being in the doctor's office seemed to give her body permission to hurt. Her hand was throbbing with every heartbeat. She couldn't pull her fingers into a fist. There was a high-pitched noise in her ears. Then another one. She realized she was hearing sirens.

Lena bypassed the exam room and went to the front of the building to see what was going on. The pocket door to the front office took some coaxing to open. The blinds were drawn, the room dark. She turned on the lights and saw the source of the odor.

Two gallon jugs of bleach were on the desk. Leather gloves soaked in a stainless steel bowl. Cotton swabs and paper towels littered the floor. A wooden baseball bat was laid out on a sheet of brown craft paper. Blood was embedded in the letters around the Rawlings logo.

Lena put her hand to her gun, but she was too late. She felt a drop of blood trickle down her neck before her body registered the pain of the cold steel of a knife pressing into her skin.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Charlie Reed bounded down the dorm stairs with a smile showing under his mustache. He was in a white clean suit, covered head to toe in Tyvek. "Glad you're here. We were just about to start the magic."

Will tried to return his smile, but the effort failed. Charlie was a forensics expert. He had the luxury of looking at cases through the lens of a microscope. He saw bone and blood that needed to be photographed, analyzed, and catalogued, where Will saw a human being whose life had been ended by a cold-blooded killer who seemed to be doing a very good job of evading justice.

Despite Will's earlier hopes, none of the evidence they'd found so far had been useful. Jason Howell's Saturn station wagon was remarkably tidy. Aside from some breath mints and a couple of CDs, there was nothing personal in the car. The blanket Will had found in the bathroom stall held more promise, but that had to be analyzed in the lab. This process could take a week or more. The hope was that the killer had injured himself or leaned against the blanket, leaving trace evidence that might link him to the crime. Even if Charlie found DNA in the material that did not belong to Jason, they could only run it through the database and hope that their killer was in the system. More often than not, DNA was a tool used to rule out suspects, not track them down.

"This next bit should go a little faster." Charlie leaned down and rummaged through one of the open duffel bags at the bottom of the stairs. He found what he was looking for and told Will, "Suit up. We should be ready in five minutes." He bounded back up the steps two at a time.

Will grabbed one of the folded clean suits from the pile at the bottom of the stairs. He tore the package open with his teeth. The suit was meant to limit skin and hair transfer to the crime scene. It had the added bonus of making Will look like a giant, elongated marshmallow. He was tired and hungry. He was pretty sure he smelled, and though his socks were dry now, they had dried in such a way as to feel like sandpaper rubbing across the blister on his heel.

None of this mattered. Every second that ticked by gave Jason and Allison's killer the freedom to move about freely, planning his escape or, worse, planning his next murder.

Will glanced at Marty Harris. The man was still guarding the front door with his usual degree of thoroughness. Marty's head was back against the wall, glasses askew. His soft snores followed Will up the stairs.

Charlie knelt in the middle of the hallway, adjusting a fixture on top of a tripod. There were three more tripods spaced evenly across the hall, going all the way to the bathroom. Similarly Tyvek-suited men all adjusted gauges as Charlie told them to go up or down. They had been here for hours. Photographing the scene, graphing the measurements of the hall, the bathroom, Jason's room, his desk and his bed. They had documented every item from the inside out. Finally, they had given Dan Brock permission to remove the body.

Once Jason was gone, they had taken more photos, diagrammed more graphs, and finally started bagging any evidence that seemed pertinent to the case.

Jason's laptop was toast, soaked to the core. There was a Sony Cyber-shot with some provocative photos of Allison Spooner in her underwear. All of Jason's schoolwork and notebooks seemed to be what you'd expect. His Dopp kit contained the normal toiletries and no prescription bottles. The strongest drug he had in the room was an expired bottle of Excedrin PM.

Jason's cell phone was more interesting, if not more helpful. The contacts list contained three numbers. One belonged to Jason's mother. She wasn't pleased to be talking to the police twice in one day about a son she apparently didn't care that much about. The second number dialed the main switchboard to the physical engineering building, which was closed for the holiday. The third belonged to a cell phone that rang once, then announced that the voice mailbox was full. The cell phone company had no record of who the number belonged to—it was a pay-as-you-go deal—an expected revelation considering none of these kids seemed to have good enough credit to get a phone in their own names.

Will assumed the cell phone with the full mailbox belonged to Allison Spooner. She had called Jason fifty-three times over the weekend. Nothing came in after Sunday afternoon. Jason's only outgoing call had been made to his mother three days before he died. Of all the details that Will had discovered about the victims in this case, Jason Howell's sad, lonely life was the most depressing.

"Almost ready," Charlie said, the excitement building in his voice.

Will stared into the hallway, wishing he never had to see this place again. The dingy tan linoleum on the floors. The scuffed and dirtied white walls. Making it worse was the lingering smell of Jason's body, even though the kid had been removed several hours ago. Or maybe it was all in Will's mind. There were crime scenes he had visited years ago that felt like they'd left their mark on his nasal passages. Just thinking about them could evoke a certain odor or bring a sour taste into the back of his throat. Jason Howell would forever be trapped in the pantheon of Will's bad memories.

"Doug, move that a little to the left," Charlie said. He'd divided the crime scene into three areas: the hall, Jason's room, and the bathroom. They had all agreed that their best bet was finding something in the hallway. The group of assembled men hadn't needed to articulate the problems associated with looking for DNA in a communal boys' bathroom, but Will could tell none of them were looking forward to crawling around on that particular floor.

Charlie tinkered with the light on the tripod. "This is the ME-RED I told you about."

"Nice." Will had already gotten an earful about the extremely fascinating qualities of the Mobile Electromagnetic Radiation Emitting Diode, which as far as Will could tell was fancy jargon for a gigantic black light that had a longer range than the Wood's lamps that had to be carried around by hand. The lights would pick up visible traces of blood, urine, and semen, or anything else that contained fluorescent molecules.

For the traces that were less visible, Charlie and his team had sprayed the hallway with Luminol, a chemical that reacts to the presence of iron in blood. Crime shows had made the general public well aware of the blue glow emitted by Luminol when the lights were turned off. What they hadn't shared was that the glow usually lasted around thirty seconds. Long-exposure cameras had to be used to record the process. Charlie had set these up on tripods in all four corners of the hallway and staggered more around the entrance to Jason's dorm room. For good measure, he had tilted the security camera back down to capture it all in real time.

Will stood at the mouth of the stairs, watching the team make last-minute adjustments. He wondered if the murderer had paused here on the stairs to psych himself up for the kill. It was all so premeditated, so well thought out. Enter through the back door. Push up the cameras. Go up the stairs. Weapons in hand. Gloves on. Plan ready: Incapacitate Jason with the bat. Drag him to the bed. Cover him with the blanket. Stab him repeatedly. Hide the blanket in case it contained any trace evidence. Go back down the stairs. Leave by the back door.

Was it really as calculated as that? What went through a person's mind before they went to someone's dorm room, their home, and fractured their skull with a baseball bat? Would the killer's pulse quicken? Would his stomach tighten the way Will's did when he thought about the gruesome crime scene? There had been so much blood, so much brain and tissue, spattered around the room that Charlie and his team had been forced to make a grid so that they could clear a path to fully document the carnage.

What kind of person could stand over that bed and methodically stab another human being?

And what about poor Jason Howell? Lena was probably right that the killer had known Jason well enough to hate him. Despise him. What kind of trouble had the kid gotten himself into that he would become the object of such fury?

"I think we've got it." Charlie grabbed a handheld video camera and pulled Will toward Jason's room. He told Doug, "Go get the lights." Doug took off down the stairs and Charlie explained the plan to Will. "First we'll see what the Luminol brings out, then we'll go to the black light."

"Ready?" Doug called.

"Ready," Charlie yelled back.

The hall went dark. The Luminol responded quickly. Dozens of small, elongated circles glowed blue just outside Jason's open doorway. They were smeared where the killer had tried to wipe them up, but the pattern was easy to follow. The drops revealed his movements. After stabbing Jason to death, the killer had walked out of the room, heading toward the stairs, then changed his mind and doubled back toward the bathroom.

"The original plan was probably to take the blanket with him," Charlie said. He held the video camera low, documenting the drips. Will could hear the steady, slow click of the long-exposure cameras capturing the evidence.

He asked, "What about this?" A larger stain, more like a puddle, was on the floor just beside the bathroom entrance. Three feet above it was a patterned mark on the wall.

Charlie twisted up the LCD screen of the camera. Will saw the images in double as he recorded the luminescent blobs. "Our killer comes out of the room, heads toward the stairs, then he realizes the blanket is dripping. He goes toward the bathroom, but first—" Charlie pointed the camera toward the glowing stain on the floor. "He leans something against here. I'd guess a bat or a club. That's the mark on the wall." Charlie zoomed in close to the wall where the top of the weapon had rested. "Uh-oh, fingerprint."

Charlie got down on his knees and pointed his camera at an almost perfect circle. "Gloved, it looks like." He zoomed in closer. The glowing dot started to fade. "We're losing it."

The Luminol's reaction time varied depending on the content of iron in the blood. The dot slowly disappeared, then the puddle on the floor was gone. Charlie muttered a curse as the hall was plunged back into darkness.

Charlie rewound the camera to look at the print again. "He was definitely wearing gloves."

"Latex?"

"Leather, I think. There's a grain." He showed Will the LCD, but the light was too intense for him to see anything but a blob. "Let's see if it still shows up under the diodes." He called, "Black light, please."

There were a couple of popping noises, then a steady hum. The hallway lit up like a Christmas tree, illuminating every protein-based fluid ever left here.

"Impressive, right?" Charlie's lips glowed a bright blue, probably from the Vaseline in his lip balm. He knelt down on the floor. The blood trail that had glowed so brightly minutes before was barely visible. "Our killer did a good job cleaning up after himself." He took a few more photographs. "Good thing he didn't use bleach or we wouldn't be able to see any of this."

"I don't think he planned to leave a mess," Will said. "Our guy is careful, but the only things he probably brought with him were the weapons—the knife and a bat or club. He used the blanket on the bed to catch the spatter. He tried to leave with it, then like you said, he changed his mind because it was dripping." Will felt himself smile as he remembered, "There's a supply closet beside the stall where I found the blanket."

"You're a genius, my friend." They both went into the bathroom. Charlie flipped on the lights. Will clamped his hands over his face, feeling like his eyeballs were being stabbed.

"Sorry about that," Charlie apologized. "I should've warned you to close your eyes and open them slowly."

"Thanks." Spots exploded in front of his eyes with every blink. Will put his hand on the wall so he wouldn't trip over his own feet.

Charlie stood in front of the supply closet with his video camera. "We can check the photographs, but I'm sure this door was closed when we got here." His hands were still gloved. He carefully turned the knob.

The closet was shallow, a metal shelving unit taking up most of the space. There was nothing unusual about the contents of the shelves: gallon jugs of cleaning products, a box of rags, sponges, two toilet plungers, a mop tucked into a rolling yellow bucket. Two spray bottles hung from a bungee cord on the back of the door. Yellow liquid for spot-cleaning stains. Blue liquid for windows and glass.

Charlie documented the contents of the shelves with the camera. "These cleaners are industrial grade. They're probably thirty percent bleach."

Will recognized the Windex label on one of the spray bottles. He had the same cleaner at home. It contained vinegar to help cut the grease. "You can't mix vinegar and bleach, right?"

"Right. It forms a chlorine gas." Charlie followed Will's gaze to the spray bottle. He laughed as he made the connection. "I'll be right back."

Will let out a deep breath that he felt like he'd been holding for the last two days. Bleach glowed just as brightly as blood when sprayed with Luminol, obscuring any evidence. Vinegar, by contrast, formed a natural bond with iron, making it more visible when it was sprayed. That explained why the spots in the hall glowed with such intensity. The killer had used the Windex to clean up the floor. He might as well have drawn an arrow to the bloodstains.

Charlie was back with Doug and another assistant. They worked in tandem, taking photographs and handing Charlie the brush and powder to check the Windex bottle for fingerprints. Charlie was methodical, starting from the top down, going from one side of the bottle to the other. Will had expected him to find fingerprints immediately. The bottle was half full. The janitorial staff must have used it. The closet wasn't locked. The students would have access.

"It was wiped down," Will guessed. The trigger and the area around the grip were clean.

"Don't give up on me yet," Charlie mumbled. The brush swept back and forth across the label. All of them knelt down as Charlie dusted the bottom surface.

"Bingo," Will whispered. He could see a partial fingerprint on the bottom of the bottle. The black practically glowed against the dark blue liquid.

"What do you see?" Charlie asked. He took a flashlight out of his pocket and shone it on the clear plastic. "Holy Christ. Good catch, eagle eye." He traded the flashlight for a piece of clear tape. "It's a partial, probably the pinky finger." He sat back on his heels so he could transfer the tape to a white card.

Will said, "His gloves would've been bloody. He had to take them off to clean the floor."

Charlie stood up with Doug's help. "We'll drive this to the lab right now. I can wake some people up. It'll take time, but it's a good print, Will. This is a solid lead." He told his assistant, "The other evidence is in the van. There's a pill bottle in my tackle kit. Grab that, too."

Will had forgotten about the bottle in Tommy Braham's cabinet. "Did you field-test the capsules?"

"I did." Charlie started down the hall toward the stairs. The black lights bounced off their white Tyvek suits. "It's not coke, meth, speed, or any of the usual suspects. Was the kid into sports?"

"I don't think so."

"It could be a steroid or a performance enhancer. A lot of younger guys are using those to bulk up now. The Internet makes them easy to get. I sent some photos back to Central to see if they recognize the label or capsules. A lot of these dealers are into branding. They keep their labels consistent so their product gets advertised."

Tommy didn't strike Will as interested in weight lifting, but he'd been a skinny kid. Maybe he wasn't happy with that. "Did you find any fingerprints on the bottle?"

Charlie stopped at his tackle box. He pulled out the pill bottle, which had been sealed in a proper evidence bag instead of the Ziploc Will had found in the kitchen. "I lifted two sets. The first was adult, probably male. The second was a partial webbing.” He indicated the skin between his thumb and index finger. “I don’t know if it’s male or female, but I’d guess whoever wrote those words on the label held it in her hands while she did. I’m saying ‘her’ because it looks like a woman’s handwriting.”

“Can I keep the bottle? I want to show it around and see if anybody recognizes it.”

“I already have some of the capsules in the van.” Charlie gave him the bag as they walked down the stairs. “You still want a lift to the Braham house? I think I can spare one of my guys to process the garage now.”

“That’d be great.” Will had forgotten his Porsche was still at the Taylor Drive house. He checked the time on his phone. Knowing it was already past ten o’clock made Will feel even more exhausted than he had before. He thought about Cathy Linton’s dinner invitation and his stomach rumbled.

Downstairs, Marty was awake by the door. He was talking to a large man who was his exact opposite except in skin color.

“You Agent Trent?” The man slowly made his way over. He was built like a linebacker who’d gone to seed. “Demetrius Alder.”

Will was too busy unzipping his clean suit to shake the man’s hand. “Thank you for cooperating with us today, Mr. Alder. I’m sorry we’ve kept you out so late.”

“I gave Lena all the tapes. I hope she comes up with something.”

Will assumed he would have heard from her hours ago if Lena had found anything of note in the security footage. Still, he told Demetrius, “I’m sure they’ll prove useful.”

“The dean wanted me to give you his number.” He handed Will a card. “He had me check all the buildings. We didn’t find anything else. All the dorms are empty. Somebody’s coming to fix the cameras first thing after the holiday.”

Will sat down so he could pull off the rest of the suit. He remembered something Marty had said earlier. “What about the car that was hit by the security camera?”

“It was parked in the loading dock. Good thing it was empty. Camera busted straight through the hatchback window.”

“Hatchback?” Will stopped worrying about the suit. “What kind of car was it?”

“I think it was one’a them old Dodge Daytonas.”

The rain had turned into a light sleet by the time Charlie’s van reached the tow yard. Gusts of wind shook the vehicle. Water pooled in the parking lot. There was no way to get to the front door without getting soaked. Will felt his socks getting wet again. The blister on his heel was so raw that he was starting to limp.

“Earnshaw’s,” Charlie said, and Will guessed he meant the sign glowing over the building. There was a whippet-thin older man standing in the doorway dressed in bib overalls and a baseball cap. He held the door open for them as they ran into the building.

“Al Earnshaw.” The man offered his hand to both of them. He told Will, “You’re Sara’s friend, right? My sister’s told me a lot about you.”

Will guessed that explained the man's uncanny resemblance to Cathy Linton. "She's been very kind to me."

"Sure she has." Al bellowed a good-natured laugh, but he slapped Will on the arm hard enough to throw off his balance. "Car's in the back." He motioned them toward the door behind the counter.

The shop was large, with the usual array of girlie calendars and posters of sexy, bikini-clad ladies washing cars. There were six lifts, three on each side. The tool chests were neatly lined up, their covers locked down tight. Al had turned on the propane heaters, but the cold was still biting. The roll-up doors in the back rattled from the wind. Allison's Dodge Daytona was on the ground by the last lift. The back windshield was buckled in the center, just as Demetrius had said.

Will asked, "Did you call Allison to let her know you had her car?"

"We don't call people when we tow them. Signs are up all over the school with our number. I figured the owner got a ride home for the holiday and we'd get a call when they got back and saw the vehicle wasn't there." Al offered, "Tommy's Malibu is on the lot if you want to see it."

Will had forgotten about the young man's car. "Did you figure out what was wrong with it?"

"Starter was stuck again. He was crawling under there and hitting it with a hammer to get it unstuck." Al shrugged. "I went ahead and fixed it. Gordon's truck doesn't have much more life left in it. He'll need something to drive." He took a rag out of his pocket and wiped his hands. The gesture had the hallmark of a nervous tic. His hands were as clean as Will's.

Will asked, "Did you know Tommy well?"

"Yep." He tucked the rag into his pocket. "I'll leave you guys to it. Just holler if you need me."

"Thank you."

Charlie walked over to the car. He put his tackle box on the floor and opened the lid. "Sara?" he asked.

"She's a doctor in town." He corrected, "I mean, Atlanta. She works at Grady Hospital. She grew up here."

Charlie handed him a pair of latex gloves. "How long have you known her?"

"Little while." Will took a longer time putting on the gloves than the task warranted.

Charlie got the message. He opened the car door. The hinges squealed loudly. Lionel Harris had been right about the condition of the Daytona. It was more rust than paint. The tires were bald. The engine hadn't been started in days but the smell of burning oil and exhaust filled the air.

"I guess the rain got to it," Charlie said. The dash was a sturdy molded plastic, but the cloth seats were wet and moldy. A stream of water had poured in from the busted hatchback, soaking the carpets, flooding the footwells. Charlie pulled up the front seat and water sloshed onto his pants. School papers floated in the murky liquid. The ink had washed away. "This is going to be fun," Charlie muttered. He was probably wishing he was back at the campus with his fancy lights. "I suppose we should do this right." He took his video camera out of the tackle box. Will walked around the car while he got everything ready.

The trunk was held down with a frayed bungee cord. The glass was safety-coated with a transparent sheet that held the shattered pieces of the window together. Will had a spiderweb view inside the messy trunk. Allison was as sloppy as Jason was neat. Papers were scattered around, their ink smudged from the rain. Will saw a flash of pink. "That's her book bag." He reached down to loosen the bungee cord.

"Hold on, now." Charlie backed him off. He checked the rubber gasket around the window to make sure it was doing its job. "Looks like it held," Charlie told him. "Still, be careful. You don't want a sheet of glass coming down on your head."

Will figured there were worse things that could happen. He waited patiently as Charlie focused the camera on Will, narrating in an official-sounding voice for the benefit of the tape. "This is Agent Will Trent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. I'm Charles Reed, also with the bureau. We are at Earnshaw's Garage on Highway 9 in the city of Heartsdale, which is in Grant County, Georgia. It's Tuesday, November twenty-sixth, at approximately ten thirty-two in the evening. We are about to open the trunk of a Dodge Daytona reportedly belonging to murder victim Allison Spooner." He nodded, indicating Will could finally proceed.

The bungee cord was stretched to its limit. Will had to put some muscle into unhooking it from the bumper. The hatchback was heavy, and he remembered Lionel saying the pistons were blown. Allison had used a broken-off broom handle to prop it open. Will did the same. Tiny pieces of glass rained down as he opened the hatch all the way.

"Hold for just a second," Charlie said, zooming in on the book bag, the papers, and fast-food trash.

Finally, he gave the okay to remove the bag.

Will grabbed the strap. The bag had some heft to it. Despite the pink, the fabric looked waterproof. Under the camera's watchful eye, he pulled back the thick zipper. There were two heavy books on top, perfectly dry. From the drawings of molecules on the outside, Will assumed these were Allison's chemistry texts. There were four spiral-bound notebooks, each with different-colored covers. Will flipped through these for the camera, the pages blurring. He guessed these were Allison's class notes.

"What's that?" Charlie asked. A slip of paper was sticking out of the blue notebook.

Will unfolded the page. It was half a sheet of college-ruled paper. The side edge showed where it had been ripped away from the spiral. There were two lines of text on the page. All caps. Ballpoint pen. Will stared at the first word, trying to make out the shapes of the letters. His reading was always worse when he was tired. His eyes refused to focus. He held up the paper to the camera, asking, "You want to do the honors?"

Thankfully, Charlie didn't find the request odd. He narrated in his camera voice, "This is a note found in the pink book bag reportedly belonging to the victim. It reads, 'I need to talk to you. We'll meet at the usual place.'"

Will looked back at the words. Now that he knew what they said, he could better make out the letters. He told Charlie, "The 'I' looks familiar. It's similar to the one written on the fake suicide note." He pointed to the torn bottom half of the page for the benefit of the video camera. "The note found at the lake was written on the bottom half of a torn sheet of paper.” Will recalled Charlie’s words, “ ‘I need to talk to you. We’ll meet at the usual place.’ And then you add the last part from the fake suicide note, which is ‘I want it over.’ ”

“Makes sense.” Charlie’s voice changed again as he announced that he was stopping the tape. Wisely, he didn’t want to record their speculation for a future defense attorney to show in court.

Will studied the letters on the page. “You think a man or a woman wrote this?”

“I have no idea, but it doesn’t match Allison’s handwriting.” Will guessed he was using the girl’s class notes as a comparison. Charlie continued, “I saw some of Jason’s homework in his room. He wrote in all caps like that.”

“Why would Allison have a note like this from Jason?”

Charlie guessed, “He could’ve been an accomplice to her murder.”

“Could be.”

“And then the killer decided he didn’t want to leave any witness.”

Will’s brain was starting to hurt. The theory didn’t add up.

Charlie offered, “I’m not a professional, but I’d say the writing in Allison’s journal matches the writing on the pill bottle.”

“Her journal?”

“The blue notebook. It’s obviously some kind of journal.”

Will thumbed through the pages. Slightly less than half the notebook was filled. The remaining pages were blank. He checked the printing on the front of the plastic cover. The number 250 was in bold type with a circle around it. He assumed that was the number of total pages. “Doesn’t this seem like a weird choice for a diary?”

“She was twenty-one. Were you expecting one of those girly leather-bound lock-and-key deals?”

“I guess not.” Will flipped through the pages. Allison’s handwriting was awful, but her numbers were legible. There were dates at the top of each entry. Some entries were as long as two paragraphs. Sometimes, there was just a stray line or two. He flipped to the last entry. “November thirteenth. That was two weeks ago.” He checked the other dates. “She was pretty consistent up until that point.” He flipped to the front page. “The first entry was on August first. That’s a pretty short diary.”

“Maybe she starts a new one every year on her birthday.”

Will remembered Sara’s notation on the whiteboard at the funeral home. Allison Spooner’s birthday was two days before Angie’s. “She was born in April.”

“Can’t blame me for trying.” Charlie picked up his camera. “I guess we should get some of this on tape. Anything pop out at you?”

Will stared at the open journal. Allison’s handwriting looked like a series of loops and squiggles. He patted his pocket. “I think I left my glasses in my glove compartment.”

“Bummer.” Charlie turned off the camera. “I’ll run you by your car so you can get started. Between this and the Braham place, I’m going to be pulling an all-nighter, too.”

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Lena felt another ripple of tremors working its way through her body. It was like an earthquake, a slow rumble and then the world turned upside down. Her teeth started to chatter around the gag in her mouth. Her muscles quivered, working their way into full spasm. Her feet kicked. She saw flashes of light. There was no use fighting it. She could only lie there and wait for the sensation to pass.

With agonizing slowness, the spasms subsided. Her body began to relax. Her jaw loosened. Her heartbeat slowed, flopping in her chest like a fish caught in a net.

How had she let herself get into this situation? How had she been so easily fooled?

She was hog-tied, an entire length of rope wrapped around her body, her hands, her feet. Even without the bindings, she doubted she could do anything but lie there and sweat. Her clothes were saturated. The concrete beneath her had wicked the moisture so that she was surrounded by a pool of her own making.

And it was cold. It was so damn cold that even without the shaking, her teeth wanted to chatter. She could barely feel her hands and feet. Dread filled her body when she thought about another attack coming on. She wasn't going to be able to hold on much longer.

Was it the infection in her hand? Was that the reason she couldn't stop shaking? The throbbing had turned into a stabbing pain that ebbed and flowed with no discernible pattern. Her life wasn't flashing in front of her eyes, but she couldn't stop thinking about what had brought her here. If she managed to get out of this place, if she managed somehow to get free, then everything had to change. The fear flooding through her body had brought with it a clarity that Lena had never known. For so long, she had tricked herself into thinking that she held back the truth to protect other people—her family, her friends. Now she could see that she was only protecting herself.

If Brad managed to pull through, she would apologize to him every day for the rest of her life. She would tell Frank that she was wrong about him. He was a good man. He'd stuck by Lena all these years when a smarter man would've dropped her for the worthless friend she was. Her uncle had gone through hell with Lena. She had pushed him away so many times that it was a miracle he was still standing.

And she had to find a way to get Sara Linton alone. Lena would bare her soul, confessing her complicity in Jeffrey's death. She hadn't killed him with her own hands, but she had put him in harm's way. Lena had been Jeffrey's partner. She was supposed to have his back, but she had stood silently by while she watched him walk into the fire. She had practically pushed him in that direction because she was too much of a coward to face it on her own.

Maybe that was what was causing the seizures. The truth was like a shadow creeping through her soul.

Lena twisted around her good hand to reach her watch. The rope bit into her wrist. The pain barely registered as she pressed the button for the light.

Eleven fifty-four.

It was almost midnight.

Lena knew she had left the station around six. Jared would be wondering where she was. Or maybe Frank had gotten to him. Maybe Jared was on his way home to Macon right now.

Jared. The truth would lose him to her forever.

The punishment fit the crime.

Her jaw clenched. She closed her eyes, feeling another wave coming on. The tremble moved down her shoulders, through her arms and into her hands. Her feet kicked. She felt her eyes roll back. There were noises. Grunting. Screaming.

Slowly, Lena opened her eyes. She saw darkness. Her mind suddenly came back to her. She was tied up. She was gagged. Sweat covered her body. The stench of sweat and urine filled the air. She pressed the button on her watch. In the soft glow she could see the skin of her wrist. Red lines streaked up toward her shoulder, toward her heart. She looked at the display.

Eleven fifty-eight.

It was almost midnight.

WEDNESDAY

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Sara listened to the kitchen clock tick as the hands moved past midnight. She had been sitting at the table staring at the pile of dirty dishes stacked in and around the sink for longer than she cared to remember. It wasn't just lethargy that kept her rooted to the chair. Her mother's kitchen makeover included two dishwashers that were so modern it was impossible to tell whether or not they were running, yet she still insisted on hand washing her china and all the pots and pans. Or, insisted that Sara do the chore, which made Cathy's anachronistic ways even more outrageous.

The mindless task should have been a welcome end to Sara's day. Working at Grady Hospital was like trying to stand still on a spinning merry-go-round. The flow of patients never ebbed, and Sara generally was juggling twenty cases at any given time. Between consultations and her usual workload, she saw an average of fifty to sixty patients during any twelve-hour shift. Slowing all this down, focusing on just one patient at a time, should have been an easier task, but Sara found that her mind worked differently now.

She realized that the constant pressure of the ER was a gift in many ways. When Sara had lived in Grant County, her life had taken on a far more leisurely pace. She usually ate breakfast with Jeffrey in the morning. Two or three times a week, they had supper with her family. Sara was the team doctor for the local high school football team. She helped coach volleyball in the summer. Her free time was infinite if she managed her schedule right. Going to the grocery store could take several hours if she ran into a friend. She clipped articles from magazines to share with her sister. She'd even joined her mother's book club, until they started reading too many serious books to make it fun anymore.

By contrast, the fast pace of her work in Atlanta kept Sara from thinking about her life too much. Usually by the time she finished dictating her charts, all she could do was drag herself home and take a bath before falling asleep on the couch. Her days off were equally wasted with what she now saw was busywork. Her chores were something to get out of the way quickly. She scheduled lunches and dinners so that she didn't have too much time alone with herself. Alone with her thoughts.

All of her usual crutches had disappeared in the basement of Brock's funeral home. An autopsy certainly required a great deal of attention, but after a point, the motions were rote. Measure, weigh, biopsy, record. Neither Allison Spooner nor Jason Howell had left any remarkable clues in their deaths. The only thing that bound them together was the knife that had been used to kill them. The stab wounds were nearly identical—each made by a small, sharp blade that had been twisted before it was removed to ensure maximum damage.

As for Tommy Braham, Sara had found only one item that stood out: the boy had a small metal spring in the front pocket of his jeans, the type that you usually found in a ballpoint pen.

The hall light snapped on. Cathy yelled, "Those dishes aren't going to wash themselves."

"Yes, Mama." Sara glared at the kitchen sink. Hare had come for dinner, but she guessed the spread put on was really intended for Will. Cathy loved cooking for an appreciative audience and Will certainly fit that bill. Her mother had used every piece of china in the house, serving coffee in teacups with saucers, which Sara thought was very sweet until her mother informed the table that Sara was going to wash every last piece. Hare had brayed like a donkey at the expression on her face.

"Try twitching your nose while you stare at them," Tessa offered as she came into the kitchen. She was dressed in a billowing yellow nightgown that formed a tent over her belly.

"You could always offer to help."

"I read in People magazine that dishwater is bad for the baby." She opened the refrigerator and stared at the mountains of food inside. "You should've watched the movie with us. It was funny."

Sara sat back in her chair. She wasn't up for a romantic comedy right now. "Who called a while ago?"

Tess pushed around the Tupperware containers lining the shelves. "Frank's ex. You remember Maxine?" Sara nodded. "He's still refusing to go to the hospital."

Frank had suffered a mild heart attack at the police station this afternoon. Fortunately, Hare was down the street at the diner or things might have been a lot worse. Five years ago, Sara would have rushed to Frank's side. Today, when she had heard the news at the funeral home, all she could muster was sadness. "What did Maxine want?"

"Same as usual. To complain about Frank. He's a stubborn old coot." Tessa put a tub of Cool Whip on the table and went back to the fridge. "You all right?"

"I'm just tired."

"Me too. Being pregnant's hard work." She sat down across from Sara with a leg of fried chicken in her hand. She scooped it into the Cool Whip.

"Please tell me you're not going to eat that."

Tessa offered her the leg.

Despite her better judgment, Sara tried the ungodly mix. "Wow. It's sort of salty and sweet at the same time." She passed the leg back to her sister.

"I know, right?" Tessa dipped it into the tub again and took a bite. She chewed thoughtfully. "You know, I pray for you every night."

Sara laughed before she could catch herself. She apologized as quickly as she could. "I'm sorry. I just ..."

"Just what?"

She thought now was as good a time as any for the truth. "I didn't think you really believed in all that."

"I'm a missionary, you dumbass. What do you think I've been doing with my life for the last three years?"

Sara struggled to dig herself out of an ever-deepening hole. "I thought you wanted to go to Africa and help children." She didn't know what else to say. Her sister had always enjoyed life. Sometimes it felt like Tessa was enjoying it for both of them. Sara had always had her mind on school and then work. Meanwhile, Tessa dated whom she pleased, slept with whoever struck her fancy, and never made apologies for any of it. "You have to admit that you're not a typical missionary."

"Maybe not," she allowed, "but you've got to believe in something."

"It's hard to believe in a God who would let my husband die in my arms."

"You can't fall off the floor, Sissy. If somebody throws you a rope, then you better start climbing."

Cathy had told Sara as much when she'd first lost Jeffrey. "I'm glad you've found something that gives you peace."

"I think you've found something, too." Tessa had finished the chicken leg, but she used the bone to spoon up more Cool Whip. "You're different from when you first got here. You're doing the work that you want to do."

"I don't know about that."

"Where's Will?"

Sara groaned. "Please don't start that again."

"The next time you see him, take that band out of your hair. You look prettier with it down."

"Please, please stop."

Tessa reached out and took her hand. "Can I tell you something?"

"As long as it's not advice on chasing after a married man."

She squeezed Sara's hand. "I'm really in love with my husband."

Sara gave a careful "Okay."

"I know you think Lem is boring and too earnest and too self-righteous, and believe me, he can be all those things, but a thousand times a day, I hear a song, or I think of something funny, or Daddy says one of his stupid puns, and the first thing that comes into my head is 'I want to tell Lem about this.' And I know that halfway around the world, he's thinking the same thing." She paused. "That's what love is, Sara, when there are so many things about you that you only want one person in the world to know."

Sara remembered how that felt. It was like being wrapped in a warm blanket.

Tessa laughed. "Good Lord, I'm gonna start crying. When Lem gets home, he's gonna think I'm some kind of basket case."

Sara put her hand over Tessa's. "I'm glad you've found someone." Her words were genuine. She could see that her sister was happy. "You deserve to be loved."

Tessa smiled knowingly. "So do you."

Sara chuckled. "I walked right into that."

"I'd better get to bed." She groaned as she stood. "Wash your hands. You smell like chicken and Cool Whip."

Sara smelled her hands. Her sister was right. She stared again at the full sink, thinking she might as well start on the dishes so she could go to bed. She groaned as loudly as Tessa had when she got up from the table. Her back was hurting her from leaning over all day. Her eyes were tired. She rummaged under the cabinet for the dish liquid, hoping that her mother was out so she would have a legitimate excuse to leave the dishes until morning.

"Crap," Sara mumbled, finding the Dawn behind a full box of dishwashing powder that her mother had never opened. She heard footsteps in the hall. "Did you come back for the Cool Whip?" she asked. Tessa didn't answer, but Sara was sure that she was there. "Don't tell me you're here to help." She went into the hall and saw not Tessa, but Will Trent.

"Hey."

He stood in the center of the hall. His leather briefcase was at his side. There was something different about him that Sara couldn't quite put her finger on. He looked the same. He was even wearing the same clothes she'd seen him in for the last two days. There was definitely something wrong, though. He had a sadness about him that cut straight through.

She waved him into the kitchen. "Come on in." Sara put the dish liquid on the counter. Will hovered in the kitchen doorway.

"I'm sorry," he said. "Your sister let me in. I was staring through the window in the door trying to figure out if y'all were still awake. I know it's late." He stopped, his throat working as he swallowed. "It's really late."

"Is everything okay?"

He nervously moved his briefcase from one hand to the other, then back again. "Please tell your mother I'm sorry I couldn't make it to dinner. We had a lot to do, and I—"

"It's all right. She understands."

"Did the autopsies—" He stopped again, wiping his forehead with his sleeve. His hair was wet from the rain. "I was thinking while I was driving over here that maybe Jason's murder was a copycat."

"No," she told him. "The wounds were identical." Sara paused. Obviously, something awful had happened. "Let's sit down, okay?"

"That's all right, I—"

She sat down at the table. "Come on. What's wrong?"

He glanced back toward the front door. She could tell he didn't want to be here, but he seemed incapable of leaving.

Sara finally took his hand and pulled him to the chair. He sat, the briefcase in his lap. "I'm sorry about this."

She leaned forward, resisting the urge to hold his hand. "Sorry for what?"

He swallowed again. She let him speak in his own time. His voice was low in the large room: "Faith had her baby."

Sara put her hand to her mouth. "Is she all right?"

"Yeah, she's fine. Both of them are fine." He took his cell phone out of his pocket and showed her a picture of a red-faced newborn in a pink knit hat. "I guess it's a girl."

Faith had given the baby's weight as well as her name in the message. Sara told him, " 'Emma Lee.' "

"Eight pounds, six ounces."

"Will—"

"I found this." He put the briefcase on the table and opened the locks. She saw a stack of papers, an evidence bag with a red seal. He pulled a college notebook with a blue plastic cover from one of the pockets. Black fingerprint powder spotted the cover. "I tried to clean it up," he said, wiping the grime on the front of his sweater. "I'm sorry. It was in Allison's car and I ..." He flipped through the pages, showing her the scrawled handwriting. "I can't," he said. "I just can't."

She realized that Will hadn't looked at her once since walking into the room. He had such an air of defeat about him, as if every word that came from his mouth caused him pain.

Sara's purse was on the counter. She got up and found her reading glasses. She told Will, "Mama fixed a plate for you. Why don't you eat something and I'll start on this?"

He stared at the notebook in front of him. "I'm not really hungry."

"You've already missed supper. If you don't eat that food, my mother will never forgive you."

"I really can't—"

Sara opened the warming drawer. Her mother had cooked for an army again, this time roast beef, potatoes, collards, green beans, and snap peas. The cornbread was wrapped in aluminum foil. Sara put the plate in front of Will, then went back to get silverware and a napkin. She poured a glass of iced tea and found some lemon in the refrigerator. While she was up, she turned on the oven so that she could warm the cherry cobbler sitting on the counter.

She sat down across from Will and opened the notebook. She looked at him over her glasses. He hadn't moved. "Eat," she said.

"I really—"

"That's the deal," she told him. "You eat. I read." She stared at him, making it clear that she wasn't going to back down.

Reluctantly, Will picked up the fork. She waited until he had taken a bite of potatoes to open the spiral-bound notebook.

"Her name's on the inside of the cover with the date, August first." Sara went to the first page. "'August first. Day one.'" She thumbed through the pages. "Each entry has the same format. Day two, day three ..." She flipped to the back. "All the way to day one hundred four."

Will didn't comment. He was eating, but she could tell he was having difficulty swallowing. Sara could not imagine his frustration over having to have the journal read to him. He clearly took it as a personal failure. She wanted to tell him it wasn't his fault, but obviously, asking for Sara's help had taken so much out of him that she couldn't risk pushing him any further.

She returned to the first page. "'Day one,'" she repeated. "'Prof. C was sarcastic today. Cried later for about twenty minutes. Just couldn't stop. Was really annoyed in Dr. K's class because D behind me kept passing notes to V and I couldn't concentrate because they kept laughing.'" "

She turned the page. "'Day two. Cut myself shaving my leg pretty bad. Hurt all day. Was two minutes late for work but L didn't say anything. Felt paranoid all day that he was going to yell at me. Can't take him being mad.'" "

Sara kept reading, page after page of Allison's thoughts on L at the diner and J who had forgotten that they were supposed to meet for lunch. Every notation described Allison's feelings about the situation, but never in florid detail. She was either happy or sad or depressed. She cried, usually for a period of time that seemed unusually long given the circumstances. Despite the emotional revelations, there was something clinical about the telling, as if the girl was an observer watching her life go by.

Getting through the entire journal took over an hour. Will finished his supper, then ate most of the cobbler. He folded his hands on the table and stared straight ahead at the wall. He paced until he realized the distraction slowed down her reading. When Sara's voice started to falter, he got her a glass of ice water. Eventually, he noticed the dishes in the sink, and she read over her shame as he turned on the faucet and started cleaning. Her legs started to cramp from sitting so long. Sara ended up standing by him at the sink, so at least there was the appearance of her helping. Will had made it through all the pots and pans and was starting on the china when Sara finally reached the last entry.

“Day one hundred four. Work was all right. Concentration bad all day. Slept nine hours last night. Took a two-hour nap during lunch. Should have studied. Felt guilty and depressed all day. No word from J. I guess he hates me now. Can’t blame him.” She looked up at Will. “That’s it.”

He glanced up from the bread plate in his hands. “I counted all the pages. There are two hundred fifty.”

She checked the front cover, noting the page count. The girl hadn’t torn out any pages. Sara told him, “She stopped writing two weeks before she died.”

“Something happened two weeks ago that she didn’t want to write down.”

Sara put the notebook on the table and grabbed a towel. Will was doing a much more thorough job than Sara ever had. He changed out the water often and dried everything as he went along. There wasn’t much space left on the counters, so he’d made educated guesses about where things went. Sara would have to go back through and put the pots and pans in their proper place, but she didn’t want to do that in front of Will now.

He saw the towel in her hands. “I’ve got this.”

“Let me help.”

“I think you’ve helped enough.” She thought he was going to leave it at that, but Will told her, “It’s been worse today than usual.”

“Stress is a contributing factor—when you get tired or if something emotional happens.”

He scrubbed hard at the plate in his hands. Sara saw that he hadn’t bothered to roll up his sleeves. The cuffs of his sweater were soaked. He said, “I’ve been trying to dig a new sewer line to my house. That’s why my laundry is behind.”

Sara had been expecting a non sequitur, but she’d hoped he could hold off for a few moments longer. “My father built this house with money from people who try to do their own plumbing.”

“Maybe he can give me some pointers. I’m pretty sure the trench I started is filled in by now.”

“You didn’t use a trench box?” Sara stopped drying the plate. “That’s dangerous. You shouldn’t go past four feet without shoring up the sides.”

He gave her a sideways glance.

“I’m my father’s daughter. Call me when you’re back in Atlanta. I know my way around a backhoe.”

He picked up a bread plate. “I think you’ve done me enough favors to last a good long while.”

Sara watched his reflection in the window over the sink. His head was down as he concentrated on the task at hand. She reached back and loosened her ponytail. Her hair fell to her shoulders.

She said, “Go sit down. I can finish the washing.”

Will glanced up at her, then did a double take. She thought he was going to say something, but he picked up another plate and dunked it into the soapy water instead. Sara opened the drawer to put away the silverware. Her hair hung down in her face. She was glad for the cover.

He said, "I hate leaving dishes lying around."

She tried for levity. "Don't let my mother hear that. She'll never let you leave."

"I had this foster mother named Lou once." Will waited for her to look up in the window. "She worked all day at the supermarket, but she came home at noon to fix me lunch no matter what." He rinsed the plate and handed it to Sara. "She always got home after I'd gone to bed, but one night I heard her come in. I went into the kitchen and there she was in her uniform—it was brown, too tight for her—and she was standing in front of the sink. It was piled with all the plates and dishes and leftover food from lunch. I hadn't done anything while she was gone. I just watched TV all day." He glanced up again at Sara's reflection. "Lou was standing there looking at the mess in the sink and just bawling. Like, the kind of crying you do with your whole body." He took the next dish off the pile. "I went into that kitchen and cleaned every single dish I could find, and for the rest of the time I was there, I never made her have to clean up after me again."

"Did she try to adopt you?"

He laughed. "Are you kidding? She left me alone all day except for lunch. I was eight years old. They took me away when the school counselor noticed I hadn't been to class in two months." He pulled the drain on the sink. "She was a nice lady, though. I think they let her have an older kid."

Sara asked the question before she could stop herself. "Why weren't you ever adopted? You were an infant when you entered the system."

Will kept his hand under the stream of water as he adjusted the temperature. She thought he was going to ignore her question, but he finally said, "My father had custody of me at first. The state took me away after a few months. They had good reasons." He plugged the drain so the sink could fill. "I was in the system for a while, then an uncle showed up and tried to make a go of it. He meant well. I hope he meant well. But he wasn't really equipped to take care of a child at that point in his life. I was in and out of his house, in and out of foster homes and the children's home. Eventually, he gave up. By that time I was six years old and it was too late."

Sara looked up. Will was staring at her reflection again.

He said, "You've heard about the six-year rule, right? You and your husband were trying to adopt. You must've heard it."

"Yes." Sara felt a lump in her throat. She couldn't look at him. She dried the saucer again, though not a drop of water was left on the surface. The six-year rule. She'd heard the phrase in her pediatric practice, long before Jeffrey had ever suggested they adopt. A child who had been in the system more than six years was considered tainted. Too many bad things had happened to him by then. His memories were too fixed, his behaviors too ingrained.

Years ago, someone in Atlanta had heard this warning, too. Probably from a friend or maybe even a trusted family doctor. They had gone to the children's home, seen six-year-old Will Trent, and decided he was too broken.

He asked, "Does that journal sound like a twenty-one-year-old girl's journal to you?"

Sara had to clear her throat so she could speak. "I'm not sure. I didn't know Allison." She forced herself to think about his question. "It seems off to me."

"It doesn't sound like a 'Dear Diary' sort of thing." He started on the last stack of dishes. "It's more like a long list of complaints about people, professors, her job, lack of money, her boyfriend."

Sara admitted, "She sounds kind of whiny."

"The point of whining is so other people hear you and feel sorry for you." He asked, "Does she sound depressed?"

"There's no doubt about that. The journal makes it clear that she was having a very rough time of it. She tried to kill herself once before, which points to at least one depressive episode in her past."

"Maybe she was in a suicide pact with Jason and a third person."

"That's a pretty awful way to die if you want to kill yourself. Pills would be much easier. Hanging. Jumping off a building. Also, I think if there was a pact, they'd do it together."

"Did you find any signs of drug use on Tommy, Allison, or Jason?"

"No outward signs. They were all healthy, of average or above average weight. The blood samples and tissues are on their way to Central. We'll get something back in a week to ten days."

"Charlie and I were kicking around this theory that Jason could have been involved in Allison's murder. We're pretty sure the killer used him to lure Allison to the lake. Or at least his handwriting." He turned off the water and wiped his hands on his jeans as he walked to his briefcase. "This was tucked inside the journal."

Sara took the plastic evidence bag he gave her. There was a note inside. "That paper looks familiar." She read the words. " 'I need to talk to you. We'll meet at the usual place.' "

Will added the phrase from the suicide note. " 'I want it over.' "

Sara sat down at the table. "Jason wrote Allison's fake suicide note."

"Or, he wrote the entire note to somebody else, and that somebody tore off the bottom half and left it in Allison's shoe as a warning to him." He saw the flaw. "But then why did Allison have it in her notebook?"

"No wonder your brain is tired." Sara's head was starting to ache just thinking about it.

Will took another plastic bag out of his briefcase. "I found this in Tommy's medicine cabinet. Charlie field-tested it, but he's not sure what's inside."

Sara rolled the pill bottle around to read the label through the plastic. "That's strange."

"I was hoping you'd know what it is."

" 'Tommy, do not take these,' " she read. "I'm not a handwriting expert, but it seems to me that Allison wrote this. Why would she tell Tommy not to take them? Why not just throw them away?"

Will didn't offer her a quick answer. He sat back in his chair, staring at her. "They could be poison, but if you had poison, why would you stab somebody in the neck?"

"What are these letters on the bottom of the label?" Sara unclipped her reading glasses from her shirt so she could see. "H-C-C. What does that mean?"

"Faith tried to run the initials through the computer, but I'm not sure how effective the search was. The picture I took wasn't very good and ..." He indicated his head as if there was something wrong with it. "Well, you know I wasn't much help."

"Have you ever had your vision checked?"

He gave her a puzzled look, as if she should know better. "Needing glasses isn't my problem. I've had this all my life."

"Do you get headaches when you read? Feel nauseated?"

He gave a half-shrug and a nod. She could tell she wasn't going to get much more time on the subject.

"You should see an ophthalmologist."

"It's not like I can read the chart."

"Oh, sweetheart, I can shine a light into your eyes and tell if your lens is focused."

Her endearment hung awkwardly between them. Will stared at her. His hands were on the table. He was nervously twisting his wedding ring.

Sara scrambled to hide her embarrassment. She grabbed the pill bottle and held it up for him. "Look at the small print for me." Will held her gaze a moment longer before looking at the bottle in her hand. "Now, stay still." She carefully slid her glasses onto his head, then held up the pill bottle again. "Is that better?"

Will obviously didn't want to, but he looked at the bottle anyway. He glanced back at Sara, surprised, before he looked at the bottle again. "It's sharper. It's still not right, but it's better."

"Because you need reading glasses." She put the bottle back on the table. "Come to the ER when you get back to Atlanta. Or we can go to my old place tomorrow. You've probably seen the children's clinic across from the police station. I used to have special eye charts for—" Sara felt her mouth drop open.

"What is it?"

She took back her glasses and read the fine print on the label again. "H-C-C. Heartsdale Children's Clinic." Sara had been considering all the illegal reasons behind the bottle of pills and none of the legal ones. "This is part of a drug trial. Elliot must be running it out of the clinic."

"A drug what?"

She explained, "Pharmaceutical companies have to do drug trials on medicines they want to bring to market. They pay for volunteers to participate in the studies. Tommy must have volunteered, but I can't see him meeting the protocols. If there's one rule that governs these studies, it's that the participants have to give informed consent. There's no way Tommy could do that."

Will sounded skeptical. "Are you sure that's what this is?"

"The number at the top of the label." She pointed to the bottle. "It's a double-blind study. Each enrollee gets assigned a random number by the computer that says whether they get the real drug or the placebo."

"Have you done a trial before?"

"I've done a few at Grady, but they were surgical or trauma related. We used IVs and injections. We didn't have placebos. We didn't give out pills."

"Did it work the same way as a regular drug trial?"

"I suppose the procedures and reporting would be the same, but we were working in trauma situations. The intake protocols were different."

"How does it work if it's not in a hospital?"

Sara put the bottle back down on the table. "The pharmaceutical companies pay doctors to run studies so that we can have yet another cholesterol-lowering drug that works about as well as the twenty other cholesterol-lowering drugs that are already on the market.” She realized her voice was raised. “I’m sorry I’m so angry. Elliot knows Tommy. He knows he’s disabled.”

“Who’s Elliot?”

“He’s the man I sold my practice to.” Sara kept shaking her head, disbelieving. She had sold her practice to Elliot so that the children in town would be helped, not experimented on like rats. “This doesn’t make sense. Most studies don’t even involve children. It’s too dangerous. Their hormones aren’t fully developed. They process medications differently than adults. And it’s almost impossible to get parents to consent to their children being tested with experimental drugs unless they’re deathly ill and it’s a last-ditch effort to save them.”

Will asked, “What about your cousin?”

“Hare? What does he have to do with this?”

“He’s an adult doctor, right? I mean, his patients are adults?”

“Yes, but—”

“Lena told me he rents space at the clinic.”

Sara felt sucker-punched. Her first instinct was to defend Hare, but then she remembered that stupid car he’d forced her to look at in the pouring rain. She had seen a BMW 750 in an Atlanta showroom that retailed for over a hundred thousand dollars.

“Sara?”

She pressed her lips tightly together to keep herself from talking. Hare at her clinic pushing pills on her kids. The betrayal cut like glass.

Will asked, “How much money can a doctor make from running a drug trial?”

Sara had trouble forming words. “Hundreds of thousands? Millions if you go around and speak at conferences.”

“What do the patients get?”

“Participants. I don’t know. It depends on what stage the trial is in and how long you have to participate.”

“There are different phases?”

“It’s based on risk. The lower the phase, the higher the safety risk.” She explained, “Phase one is limited to around ten or fifteen people. Participants could make ten to fifteen thousand dollars depending on the trial, whether it’s in-patient or not. Phase two expands to around two or three hundred people who get four or five grand each. Phase three is less dangerous, so the money is lower. They enroll thousands of people for hundreds of dollars.” She shrugged. “The amount of money they make depends on how long the trial lasts, whether they need you for a few days or a few months.”

“How long do the big trials last?”

Sara put her hand on Allison’s notebook. No wonder the girl had been obsessed with recording her moods. “Three to six months. And you have to submit journals on your progress. It’s part of the supporting documentation to track side effects. They want to know your moods, your stress level, whether you’re sleeping and how much. You know all those warnings you hear at the end of the drug commercials? That’s straight out of the journals. If one person reports headaches or irritability, it has to be included.”

“So, if Allison and Tommy were both involved in a drug trial, their records would be at the clinic?”

She nodded.

Will took a moment to think it through. He picked up the bottle again. “I don’t think this is going to be enough to get a search warrant.”

“You don’t need one.”

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Lena heard the steady sound of dripping water. She opened her mouth around the gag as if she could catch the drops. Her tongue was so swollen that she was afraid she'd choke on it. Dehydration kept her body from sweating. The only thing she had to fight the cold were her shivers, and her muscles were so weak they were refusing to comply. When she pressed the button for the light on her watch, the blue glow captured the red streaks in her wrist like a burning brand in her flesh.

She shifted, trying to take some of the weight off her shoulder. Sitting up was not an option. The room spun too much. Either her arms ached or her legs shot through with pain every time she tried. Because her hands and feet were tied together, every movement required a coordination that she no longer possessed. She stared into the darkness, thinking about the last time she had gone for a run outside. It had been unseasonably warm. The sun had been high on the horizon, and when she jogged around the track at the college, she could feel the heat beating down on her face, then her back. Sweat dripped off her. Her skin was hot. Her muscles were primed. If she thought about it long enough, she could almost hear her shoes on the track.

Not shoes on a rubber track. Shoes on wooden steps.

Lena strained to hear the footsteps making their way down into the basement. There was a sliver of light underneath the door in front of her. Scraping sounds indicated something heavy was being moved—metal across concrete. Probably storage shelves. The sliver of light glowed brighter under the door. Lena closed her eyes as she listened to a key scraping in the deadbolt lock. The door opened, and Lena slowly opened her eyes, letting them adjust to the blinding fluorescents.

At first, there was a halo behind the woman's head, but then Darla Jackson's features came into view. Lena saw the streaked hair, the fake fingernails. Oddly, Lena's first thought was to wonder how the woman had managed to viciously murder two people without breaking her nails. She must redo them every night.

Darla walked down the stacked cinder blocks that served as stairs to the lower part of the basement. She knelt on the floor in front of Lena, checking to make sure the rope was still tightly tied. Incongruously, she put her hand to Lena's forehead. "Still with us?"

Lena could only stare. Even if her mouth wasn't gagged, she doubted she could say anything to the nurse. Her throat was too dry. Her brain was having difficulty holding on to one thought at a time. She couldn't form the words to articulate her questions. Why had Darla done this? Why had she killed Jason? Why had she killed Allison? It didn't make any sense.

"You're in the basement of the clinic." Darla pressed her fingers to Lena's wrist, for all intents and purposes acting like a caring nurse instead of a savage murderer. Hours ago, Lena had interrupted Darla cleaning blood off the bat that had slammed into the back of Jason Howell's head. She was bleaching the gloves she had used, trying to hide evidence. And now she was checking Lena's pulse and trying to see if she had a fever.

Darla told her, "This is some kind of bomb shelter or tornado shelter or something." She looked at her watch a few seconds longer. "I doubt Sara remembers it's even down here. I found it a while ago when I was looking for a place to stash some files."

Lena glanced around the room. With the light on, she could see the concrete walls, the small metal door. Darla was right. They were in a bunker.

"I never liked Tolliver much," the nurse said. "I know a lot of people blamed you for what happened, but he could be a prick, let me tell you."

Lena kept staring, wondering why the woman was picking now to open her soul.

"And Sara's no better. Thinks she walks on water because she got that medical degree. I used to babysit her when she was little. Nothing but a little know-it-all."

Lena didn't bother to try to disagree.

"I never wanted to kill you," Darla said. Lena felt a laughing sound in her throat that came out more like a groan. "I just gotta get out of town, and I know you won't let me do that if I let you go."

She had that right.

"Daddy had a heart attack." She sat back on her heels. "You know Frank's my daddy, right?"

Lena felt her eyebrows go up. A flood of adrenaline let her brain think for the first time in hours. Frank had mentioned his daughter when they were driving away from Allison Spooner's homicide scene. Did he know then that Darla had committed the crime? He sure as hell was covering up for her. Lena couldn't even remember all the things he had hidden from Will. The photograph. Tommy's phone. The 911 call. Was this what Frank meant when he said that Lena couldn't see what was right in front of her? Christ, he was right. She didn't know the truth when it was staring her in the face. How many other clues had she missed? How many other people were going to be hurt because Lena was so blind?

"Do you carry a purse?"

The question was so strange Lena thought she was hearing things.

"A pocketbook?" Darla asked. "Where do you keep your keys?"

Lena didn't answer.

"I can't take that piece-of-shit Accord out of town. The engine light's been on for weeks. I thought I'd get a new one once the checks cleared, but ..." She checked Lena's pockets and found her key ring. Her house key was on there, in addition to the keys for Frank's Town Car and Lena's Celica. "You got any money on you?"

Lena nodded because there was no use lying.

Darla checked Lena's back pocket and pulled out two twenties. "Well, I guess that'll pay for gas." She tucked the cash into the front pocket of her uniform. "I'm gonna have to ask Daddy for some money. I really hate that." She smoothed down the pink material of her uniform. "I guess I should feel some remorse about what's happened, but the truth is that I just don't want to get caught. I can't go to prison. I can't be trapped like that."

Lena kept staring at her.

"If they'd'a just left me alone and kept quiet, none of this would've happened."

Lena tried to swallow. She could hear her heart doing that weird, flopping beat in her chest. She must be more dehydrated than she thought. Her hands and feet were numb. Her legs tingled. Her body was shutting down blood flow to the extremities in order to keep the core functioning.

"Daddy and me don't get along too good." Darla tucked her hand into the front pocket of her smock. "I get the feeling most days he'd prefer you was his daughter, but we don't get to choose our family, do we?" She pulled out a syringe. "This is Versed. It'll take some of the anxiety off and put you to sleep. I'm sorry I don't have enough to put you to sleep for good, but this should make it easier. You're not gonna live much longer—maybe five or six hours. That infection in your hand's spreading pretty quick. You're probably already feeling your heart slowing down."

Lena felt her throat try to swallow.

"What happens is, your body starts to shut down. Your nerves go crazy. Usually there's a lot of pain. Sometimes you're awake for it, sometimes you're not. Do you want the shot?"

Lena looked at the capped syringe. What kind of choice was that?

"Nobody's gonna come save you. The clinic's not gonna open again until next Monday, and by then the smell's the only thing that's gonna let them know you're here." She glanced over her shoulder. "I guess I should leave the door exposed so they don't have to look much. Some of the people here ain't been too bad."

Lena tried to speak, to form the only word that mattered in all of this: why?

"What's that?"

Lena groaned the word again. Her lips couldn't meet because of the gag, but the question was clear enough to her ears. "Why?"

Darla smiled. She understood what Lena was asking, but she wasn't about to give an answer. Instead, she repeated her offer, waving the syringe in the air. "You want it or not?"

Lena shook her head, vehement. She couldn't black out. She couldn't let go. Her consciousness was the only thing she had any power over.

Darla took the cap off the syringe and jabbed the needle into Lena's arm anyway.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Sara waited in her car for Will to come down from the apartment over the garage. He had asked for a few minutes to change into clothes that were less dirty than the ones he'd worn all day. Sara had welcomed the time to regain her composure. Her anger had settled to a low simmer, but she would've thrown the car in gear and driven to Hare's house right now if not for Will. Why was she surprised that her cousin was mixed up in something so seedy? Hare had never hidden the fact that he liked having money. Sara liked it, too, but she wasn't willing to sell her soul in the process.

The car door opened. Will climbed behind the wheel. He was wearing a white button-down shirt and a fresh pair of jeans. He gave her an odd look. "Did you wash my clothes?"

Sara laughed at the suggestion. "No."

"All my clothes are washed. And ironed." He picked at the crease on his jeans. "And starched."

She knew only one person who ironed jeans. "I'm sorry. My mother enjoys doing laundry. I can't explain it."

"It's fine," he said, but she could tell by his strained tone that he was slightly put out.

"Did she mess anything up?"

"No." He adjusted the seat so his head wasn't pressed into the ceiling. "I've just never had anybody wash my clothes for me before." The gearshift had a learning curve, but he figured it out quickly, putting the engine into drive. He turned off the windshield wipers as he pulled into the street. The rain had slackened off. Sara could actually see the moon peeking out between the clouds.

He said, "I was thinking about the suicide note."

"What about it?"

"How about if Jason wrote it, and Allison was supposed to deliver it to a drop?"

"You think they were blackmailing somebody?"

"It's possible," Will said. "Allison may have changed her mind about the blackmail without telling Jason."

"So, she tears off the bottom part of the note, the bit that says, 'I want it over,' to leave at the drop for the killer?"

"But the killer has already made up his mind to kill her. He's followed her into the woods. We know he's opportunistic. He used the blanket when he killed Jason. Maybe he saw the note as another opportunity." Will glanced at Sara. "The fake suicide note was in Jason's handwriting at the scene of Allison's death. Except for Tommy getting mixed up in all of this, the first person who would've been interviewed is the boyfriend."

She finally put it together. "The killer wanted to frame Jason for Allison's murder. If they were trying to blackmail him, that certainly would've gotten Jason off his back.”

“Tell me about these drug trials. How do they work?”

“They’re complicated, and they’re not all bad.” She felt the need to tell him, “We need drug trials. We need new medicine and new breakthroughs, but pharmaceutical companies are corporations with shareholders and CEOs who like to get paid. There’s more money in finding the next Viagra than curing cancer.” She added ruefully, “And it’s a hell of a lot more profitable to treat diseases like breast cancer rather than prevent them from happening in the first place.”

Will slowed the car. Even without the rain, the street was still flooded. “Don’t they need Viagra to fund the cancer stuff?”

“Last year, the top ten pharmaceutical companies spent seventy-three billion dollars on advertising and less than twenty-nine billion on research. Tell me where their focus is.”

“Sounds like you know a lot about this.”

“It’s a pet peeve of mine,” she admitted. “I never wanted free pens and notepads with drug logos on them. I wanted medication that worked and that my patients could afford.”

Will stopped the car. “You know, I think I’m going the wrong way.”

“It’s a circle.”

He put the car in reverse, then made a wide U-turn. Sara knew exactly where they were. If they had gone a few yards farther down the street, they would’ve passed her old address.

“So,” Will said. “How does it work? The drug company gets a new drug it wants to test, and then what?”

She couldn’t think how to acknowledge his kindness, so she answered his question instead. “There are two types: drugs of affluence, or lifestyle, and drugs of need.” He gave her a look. “I’m not making that up. It’s Big Pharma’s designation. The need drugs are what we tested at Grady. They’re for serious or life-threatening illnesses, chronic diseases. Usually, universities and research hospitals handle need drugs.”

He slowed the car again to navigate the deep water. “And affluence?”

“Generally, that’s handled by your average everyday doctor or lab. There are all kinds of announcements in medical journals. What you’d do is petition to run a study. If you’re approved, the drug company sets you up and pays for everything. TV, radio, and print ads. File clerks and office furniture. Pens and paper. And then, when it’s over, they pay the doctor to fly around the world talking about how fabulous their new drug is, all the while insisting that he’s incorruptible because he doesn’t own stock in the company.” She thought about Elliot and his Thanksgiving vacation. “That’s where the real money is. Not the stock, but the expertise. If you’re involved in an early phase of a study, you can make hundreds of thousands of dollars just by opening your mouth.”

“So, why wouldn’t a doctor want to do this if it’s so much money?”

“Because if you do it right, there’s not a lot of money in it. I mean, yes, you make money, but you’re doing paperwork, not medicine. We all know it’s a necessary evil, but it can be a really bad side of the business. Some doctors set up research mills. The drug reps call them ‘high-end rollers,’ just like in Vegas. Their clinics can have fifty different studies going on at the same time. There are a handful in downtown Atlanta, conveniently near the homeless shelter.”

“I bet there are a lot of students at the college who are looking to make some fast money.”

“Some of my indigent patients enroll in study after study. It’s the only thing that keeps them from starving. But it’s big business if you work it right. There are websites for professional guinea pigs. They fly around the country raking in sixty, eighty grand a year.”

“The doctors don’t track the patients to make sure they’re not gaming the system?”

“All you have to show is your license, sometimes not even that. They stick your name in a file. From then on, you’re a number. Everything they collect on you is self-reported. You can tell them you’re a stockbroker with insomnia and acid reflux when you’re really a homeless wino looking for pocket money. They’re not running background checks. There’s no central database of names.”

“So, Tommy answers an ad and tries to enroll in one of these trials. Then what?”

“They would screen him both medically and psychologically. There’s different criteria for each study, and each participant has to meet the guidelines, or protocols. If you’re really smart, you can fudge your way onto a study.”

“Tommy wasn’t really smart.”

“No, and he wouldn’t have passed the psych evaluation if it was properly administered.”

“Wouldn’t the doctor be in charge of that?”

“Maybe, maybe not. There are good doctors out there who do it right, but the bad doctors never see the trial participants. They’re just paperwork that has to be signed off on. They usually go in on a Sunday and ‘review’ all three hundred cases before the enforcement rep gets there Monday morning.”

“Who takes care of everything then, nurses?”

“Sometimes, but it’s not required that they have any medical training. There are CROs, Clinical Research Organizations, that offer temp staffing for doctors running studies. At least they have some training. There was a doctor in Texas who had his wife doing everything. She accidentally switched the trial drug with medication for her dog. One doctor had his mistress in charge. She told the participants to double up on missed doses and half of them ended up with permanent liver damage.”

“Okay, so Tommy makes it through the psych evaluation. Then what?”

“He goes through the medical workup. He was healthy; I’m sure he passed that. Next, he gets the pills. He has to keep his journal. He goes in to give blood and urine or just to check in, probably once a week. The person who talks to him takes his journal and her report, what’s called source notes, then enters them into the case report. The doctor only sees the case report.”

“Where would the system break down?”

“Exactly where you said. Tommy obviously had a reaction to the medication. He was getting into arguments with people, which we know from the police incident reports. His altered mood would have shown up in his journal. Whoever interviewed him during his office visits would immediately know something was wrong.”

“And if this person wanted to hide the fact that Tommy was in trouble?”

"They could lie on the case report form. It's entered into the computer and transmitted directly to the drug company. No one would know anything was wrong unless they compared it to the source material, which gets boxed and put into storage as soon as the study ends."

"Would it ruin the study if Tommy was wiggling out?"

"Not necessarily. The doctor could classify him as a protocol violation. That means he doesn't meet the guidelines for being enrolled in the study. Which, with his disability, he didn't belong in anyway."

"What about Allison?"

"Her suicide attempt should've exempted her, but if she didn't self-report, they wouldn't know."

"Who gets in trouble for Tommy being enrolled in the study?"

"No one, really. You can always plead ignorance to the ethics committee. By law, every study has to have an internal review board that's in charge of maintaining ethical standards. They're comprised of people from the community. Doctors, lawyers, local businessmen. And always a priest or a minister, for some reason."

"The ethics committee gets paid by the drug company, too?"

"Everybody gets paid by the drug company."

"What about Tommy? When does he get his money?"

"At the end of the study. If they paid them ahead of time, most of them wouldn't come back."

"So, if the trial was nearing the end, then Tommy had a payday coming. And Allison, too. Maybe Jason Howell."

Sara didn't want to think about who had the biggest money motivation in this sordid mess. "For a three-month trial, it wouldn't be out of the question that they would each be looking at around two to five thousand dollars for their participation."

Will pulled into the parking lot of the clinic. He put the gear in park. "So, where's the problem? We've got doctors making lots of money. Participants getting paid. Tommy shouldn't have been in the study but it's not like he was going to bring the whole thing down. Why would anyone kill two people over this?"

"The key is going to be finding out how many more participants were experiencing mood alterations like Tommy. Allison was depressed. You can read that in her journal. Tommy was acting out lately, getting into arguments when he never had before. He killed himself in jail. I don't want to let Lena off the hook, but he could've been suicidal from the medication. In a study, if you get clusters of adverse events, it's immediately shut down."

"So, it would be in the doctor's best interest not to have one of these adverse clusters. Not if he stood to make a lot of money on the trial."

Sara pursed her lips, thinking of Hare. "Right."

She stared out the window at the clinic. The front door was illuminated by the headlights. She could see the familiar layout of the lobby.

Will got out of the car and walked around to get the door for her. "I probably shouldn't go inside with you. I know you're the rightful owner and I've got your permission and all that, but the law is very strict about me looking through medical records. You're going to have to play the concerned citizen and tell me what you find.”

“It’s a deal,” she agreed, though it occurred to her that he wouldn’t be much help reading the records anyway.

Sara walked to the front door with her keys in her hand. She couldn’t remember the last time she had been inside the building, but she didn’t have time to reflect. Just as she slid the key into the lock, she turned toward the police station. The movement was natural, something she had done every morning because Jeffrey usually waited across the street to make sure she got safely inside.

The streetlights were bright, the night air crisp, finally clear of rain. She saw a shadow standing by the window to Jeffrey’s office. The man turned. Sara gasped. Her knees started to give.

Will got out of the car. “Sara?”

She ran without thinking, pushing past Will, going down the hill toward the station. “Jeffrey!” she screamed, knowing it was him. His broad shoulders. His dark hair. The way he walked like a lion ready to pounce. “Jeffrey!” She stumbled as she reached the parking lot. The asphalt ripped her jeans. Her palms were scraped.

“Aunt Sara?” Jared jogged toward her with his father’s easy gait. He knelt in front of her, hands on her shoulders. “Are you okay?”

“I thought you were—” She put her hand to Jared’s face. “You look—” She threw her arms around his shoulders and pulled him as close as she could. Sara couldn’t help herself. She wept like a child. All the memories she had kept at bay for so long came flooding back. It was almost too much to bear.

Jared rubbed her back, soothing her. “It’s all right,” he whispered. “It’s just me.”

His father’s voice. Sara wanted to close her eyes and pretend. To lose herself completely. How many times had she stood in this parking lot with Jeffrey? How many mornings had they driven to work together, kissed each other goodbye in this very parking lot? And then he would stand at the door to the station, watching her make her way up the hill, checking to see that she got inside safely. Sometimes, she could feel his eyes following her, and it took everything Sara had not to run back across the street for another kiss.

Jared asked, “Are you all right?” There was a tremor in his tone. She was scaring him. “Aunt Sara?”

“I’m sorry.” She dropped her hands into her lap. She didn’t know why she was apologizing, but she kept repeating the words. “I’m so sorry.”

“It’s all right.”

“I thought you were—” She couldn’t finish the sentence. Couldn’t say his father’s name.

Jared helped her stand up. “Mama says I look just like him.”

Sara couldn’t stop the tears streaming down her face. “When did you find out?”

“It’s kind of hard to hide.”

She laughed, the sound high-pitched and desperate in her ears. “What are you doing here?”

He glanced at Will. Sara hadn’t noticed him walk up. He stood a few feet away, obviously trying not to intrude. She told him, “This is ...” She forced herself to say the name. "This is Jeffrey's son, Jared Long. Jared, this is Will."

Will's hands were shoved deep in his pockets. He nodded at the boy. "Jared."

"Why are you here?" Sara asked. "Is it because of Frank?"

Jared scratched his eyebrow with his thumb and forefinger. Sara had seen Jeffrey make the same gesture countless times. It meant he was upset, but didn't quite know how to talk about it. Jared looked at Will again. There was something going on between them that Sara couldn't follow.

She repeated her question. "Why are you here?"

Jared's voice cracked. "Her car is here. I don't know where she is."

"Who?" Sara asked, but she already knew the answer. Lena's Celica was still in the lot.

"She was supposed to be home six hours ago." He directed his words to Will. "I've been to the hospital. I tried to get in touch with Frank. I can't find anybody who knows where she is."

"No," Sara breathed.

"Aunt Sara—" Jared reached for her but she put her hand flat to his chest, holding him back.

"You can't be seeing her."

"It's not what you think."

"I don't care. It's wrong."

He reached for her again. "Aunt Sara—"

She stepped back, stumbling into Will. "You can't do this."

"It's not what you think."

"Not what I think?" she demanded, her voice rising in anger. "What am I thinking, Jared? That you're sleeping with the woman who murdered your father?"

"It's not like—"

Will grabbed Sara by her waist as she lunged at Jared. "She killed him!" Sara screamed, pushing Will away. "She killed your father!"

"He killed himself!"

She raised her hand to slap his face. Jared stood absolutely still, facing her, waiting for the blow. For her part, Sara felt frozen. She couldn't strike him, but she couldn't drop her hand, either. It divided the air between them like a knife waiting to fall.

"He was a cop," Jared said. "He knew what the dangers were."

She dropped her hand, because now she really wanted to hurt him. "Is that what she told you?"

"It's what I know, Aunt Sara. My father loved being a cop. He was doing his job, and it got him killed."

"You don't know who she really is. You're too young to understand what she's capable of."

"I'm not too young to know I love her."

His words were like a punch to her chest. "She killed him," Sara whispered. "You don't know what she took from me. From you."

"I know more than you think."

"No, you don't."

Jared's voice turned sharp. "He was doing his job, and he pissed off the wrong people, and nobody could've stopped him. Not you, not Lena, not me, not anybody. He made his own decisions. He was his own man. And he was stubborn as hell. Once he made up his mind, there was no talking him out of doing exactly what he wanted to do."

Sara didn't realize she was backing up until she felt Will behind her. She gripped his arm, forcing herself not to falter. "She's twisted the story to fool you into feeling sorry for her."

"That's not how it is."

"She's a master at manipulating people. You can't see that now, but it's true."

"Stop saying that." Jared tried to take her hand. "I love her. And Jeffrey loved her, too."

Sara couldn't speak to him anymore. She couldn't be here. She turned into Will, burying her head in his chest. "Get me out of here. Please, just take me home."

Jared said, "You can't leave. I need your help."

Will kept his arm around Sara as he guided her across the street.

Jared jogged to keep up. "You've gotta help me find her. I don't know where she is."

Will's voice was hard. "You need to move on, son."

"Somebody sliced her tires. She's not answering her cell phone."

Will kept his arm around Sara, helping her up the hill. She looked down at the grass on the front lawn. The roots had been washed out. Clumps of mud slipped beneath her shoes.

Jared said, "She called me on her cell at six o'clock. She said she'd be home in an hour." He tried to block their path, but Will swept him away with one hand. "She quit her job!" he screamed. "She told me she quit!"

They had reached the clinic parking lot. Will opened the car door and helped Sara inside.

Jared slammed his hand on the hood. "Come on! She's missing! Something's wrong!" He rushed around the car and got on his knees in front of the open door. His hands pressed together as if in prayer. "Please, Aunt Sara. Please. You've got to help me find her. Something's wrong. I know something's wrong."

There was so much anguish in his face that Sara felt herself falter. She looked at Will, saw the concern in his expression.

His voice was low, steady, when he told her, "She hasn't checked in with me."

Jared was crying. "Please, just check the clinic for me. I know her hand was hurting her this morning. Maybe she went for help. Maybe she fell down or she's sick or—"

Sara closed her eyes for a moment, trying to separate her emotions. She wanted so badly to leave, to never hear the name Lena Adams again as long as she lived.

Will said, "Sara." Not a question, more like an admission of guilt.

"Go," she told him. There was no use fighting it.

Will cupped his hand to her face so she would look at him. "I'll be right back, okay? I'm just going to check the clinic for him."

Sara didn't respond. He closed the car door and she leaned back in the seat. The engine was off now, but the moon was so bright in the sky that she didn't need the headlights to see the two men at the front door of the clinic. Lena didn't even have to be present to control the men in her life. She was like a succubus, her siren song clouding their logic.

Will glanced at Sara as he turned the key in the lock. She studied Jared with some detachment. He was thinner than his father. His shoulders hadn't filled out. His hair was longer than Jeffrey had kept it, more the length he'd worn in high school. An image flashed in her head: Lena's hand gripping Jared's hair. She had taken everything now. Her path of destruction had ripped through every part of Jeffrey's legacy.

Sara turned her head as the two men went inside the clinic. She couldn't look at Jared anymore. It hurt too much. It hurt too much to even be here. She slid over the console and got behind the steering wheel. She pressed the button to start the engine. Nothing happened. Will had taken the key with him.

Sara got out of the car, leaving the door open. She looked up at the full moon. The glow was remarkably bright, illuminating the ground in front of her. She remembered a Civil War letter Jeffrey had read to her a long time ago. It was written by a lonely wife to her soldier husband. She was wondering whether or not the same moon was shining down on her lover.

Sara walked to the back of the clinic. There was a sign with Hare's name on it, but her anger about the drug study had long dissipated. She couldn't dredge up any sympathy for Allison Spooner or Jason Howell or even poor Tommy Braham, who had somehow gotten caught in the middle of it. All of her emotions had dwindled to a dull ache. Even her hatred for Lena was gone. Trying to stop her was tilting at windmills. There was nothing Sara could do to stop her. If the world fell down, Lena would still be standing. She would outlive them all.

The yard behind the clinic was a mud pit. Elliot hadn't bothered to keep up anything. The picnic tables were gone, the swing set dismantled. The wildflowers Sara had planted with her mother were long dead. She stood on the bank of the stream. It was a river now, the shush of churning waters drowning out all sound. The big maple that had given so much shade over the years had fallen into the current. Its canopy barely touched the opposite side of the shore. As Sara watched, chunks of earth fell into the water and were quickly whisked away. Her father had taken her fishing on these shores. There was a field of large rocks a half mile down where catfish swam in and out of the eddies. Tessa had loved climbing on top of the granite to lie in the sun. Some of the boulders were as high as ten feet tall. Sara guessed they were underwater now. Everything in this town, no matter how strong, eventually got washed away.

Sara heard a branch snap behind her. She turned around. A woman in a pink nurse's uniform stood a few feet away. She was out of breath. Her makeup was smeared, mascara ringed dark circles under her eyes. The plastic red nails on her fingers were chipped and broken.

"Darla," Sara realized. She hadn't seen Frank's oldest daughter in years. "Are you all right?"

Darla seemed reticent. She glanced over her shoulder. "You heard about Daddy, I guess."

"Is he still refusing to go to the hospital?"

She nodded, again looking behind her. "Maybe you could help me work on him, get him to let them run some tests."

"I'm probably not the best person for that job right now."

"He piss you off?"

"No, I just—" Sara felt logic start to intrude. It was almost three in the morning. There was no conceivable reason for Darla to be here. "What's going on?"

"My car broke down." Darla glanced over her shoulder for a third time. She wasn't looking at the clinic. She was looking at the police station. "Can you give me a lift to Daddy's?"

Sara felt her body reacting to a danger she couldn't quite put her finger on. Her heart was pounding. Her mouth was spitless. This wasn't right. None of this was right.

Darla indicated Sara should walk ahead of her to the parking lot. Her tone turned hard. "Let's go."

Sara put her hand to the back of her neck, thinking about Allison Spooner at the lake, the way her head had been held down while the knife sliced into her throat. "What have you done?"

"I just need to get out of here, all right?"

"Why?"

Darla's tone turned even harsher. "Just give me the key to your car, Sara. I don't have time for this."

"What did you do to those kids?"

"The same thing I'm going to do to you if you don't give me that fucking key." There was a glint of light at Darla's waist, then a knife was in her hand. The blade was about three and a half inches long. The tip was sharpened to a menacing point. "I don't want to hurt you. Just give me the key."

Sara took another step back. Her foot sank into the sandy shore. Panic gripped her throat like a hand. She had seen what Darla could do with the knife. She knew the woman had no qualms about killing.

"Give me the key."

Sara heard the roar of the river swelling behind her. Where was Will? What was taking so long? She looked left and right, trying to decide whether to run.

"Don't," the woman said, guessing her thoughts. "I'm not going to hurt you. I just want the key."

Sara could barely speak. "I don't have it."

"Don't lie to me." Darla checked the station again. She hadn't once looked at the clinic. Either she had already taken care of Will and Jared or she didn't know they were still inside. "Don't be stupid, honey. You've seen what I can do."

Sara's voice shook as she asked, "What happens if I give it to you?"

Darla stepped forward, closing the space between them. The blade was steady in her hand. She was less than three feet away now. Within striking distance. "Then you can walk home to your mama and daddy and I'll be gone."

Sara felt a momentary sense of relief before the truth hit her. It couldn't work that way. They both knew Sara wouldn't go home. She'd cross the street to the police station and tell them everything that had happened. Darla wouldn't make it to the city limits before every squad car in the county surrounded her.

The woman repeated, "Give me the key." Without warning, she slashed the blade through the air. The metal made a whistling sound as it passed in front of Sara's face. "Now, dammit."

"Okay! Okay!" Sara put her trembling hand in her pocket, but her eyes were on the knife. "I'll give you the key if you tell me why you killed them."

Darla stared at her in cold appraisal. "They were blackmailing me."

Sara took a small step back. "The study?"

Her arm relaxed, but the blade was still close. "Students kept dropping out, not showing up when they were supposed to. I got Jason to double up his blood work and do an extra journal. He pulled Allison into it, then they got Tommy involved. We were gonna split the money fifty-fifty. Then they got greedy and decided they wanted all of it."

Sara could not take her eyes off the knife. "You were trying to frame Jason for killing Allison."

"You always were smart."

"Did Hare know?"

"Why do you think I'm leaving town? He found Tommy's paperwork. Said he was going to report it to the ethics panel." For the first time, she showed remorse. "I didn't mean for Tommy to get hurt. He didn't know anything about it. I couldn't have them looking too hard at the case reports."

"Tommy doubled up on his pills," Sara guessed. "He was enrolled twice, so he took twice the dose. That's why his moods were altered. That's why he killed himself, isn't it?"

"I'm done fucking around with you." She straightened her arm. The knife was a few inches from Sara's throat. "Give me the key."

Sara allowed herself a glance back at the clinic. The door was still closed. "I don't have it."

"Don't lie to me, bitch. I saw you in the car."

"I don't—"

Darla lunged. Sara stepped back, holding up her arm in defense. She felt the blade slice open her skin, but no pain followed. All she could feel was heart-stopping panic as the ground under her feet suddenly gave way, sending them both tumbling backward.

Sara's back slammed into the ground. Darla reared up, the knife raised above her head. Sara tried to scramble, instinctively rolling onto her stomach before she realized this was exactly the position Allison Spooner had been in when the blade plunged into her neck. Sara tried to roll back over, but Darla's weight was too much. She gripped the back of Sara's neck. Sara pushed with her hands, kicked with her feet, did whatever she could to get out from under the woman.

Instead of feeling the blade sink into her flesh, Sara felt the earth tremble, the ground again give way beneath her. There was another feeling of free fall. The roar of the river got louder as she fell face-first into the icy water. Sara gasped as the cold enveloped her. Water poured into her mouth and lungs. She couldn't tell which direction was up. Her feet and hands found no purchase. She flailed, trying to find air, but something was holding her down.

Darla. She could feel the woman's hands gripping her waist, fingers digging into her skin. Sara struggled, pounding her hands into the woman's back. Her lungs were screaming in her chest. She brought up her knee as hard as she could. Darla's hold loosened. Sara pushed herself up to the surface, gulping air.

"Help!" she yelled. "Help!" Sara screamed the word so loud that her throat was raw from the effort.

Darla shot into the air beside her, mouth gaping open, eyes wide with panic.

Her hand clamped around Sara's arm. The riverbank was a blur as the current shot them downstream. Sara dug her nails into the back of Darla's hand. Debris slapped against her head. Leaves. Twigs. Limbs. Darla held tight. She had never been a good swimmer. She wasn't trying to pull Sara down. She was holding on for her life.

The water changed from a low roar to a deafening scream. The rock field. The jutting granite stones Tessa and Sara had climbed as children. She saw them up ahead, scattered like teeth waiting to rip them in two. Water split around sharp edges. The current turned violent as it hurtled them forward. Thirty feet. Twenty feet. Sara grabbed Darla under her arm and pulled as hard as she could, thrusting her forward. The crack of the woman's skull against the granite reverberated like a ringing bell. Sara slammed into her. Her shoulder crunched. Her head exploded.

Sara fought the dizziness that wanted to take over. She tasted blood in her mouth. She wasn't moving downstream anymore. Her back was pinned to a large crevice in the rock. White water pounded against her chest, making it impossible for her to move. Darla's hand was trapped between Sara's back and the granite. Her lifeless body waved like a tattered flag. Her skull was open, river water flooding into the gash. Sara could feel the woman's hand slipping. There was a violent jerk, then the current whisked her downstream.

Sara coughed. Water poured into her open mouth, flooded up her nose. She reached above her head, feeling flat stone. She had to turn around. She had to find a way to climb on top of the rock. Sara bent her knees and braced the soles of her feet against the granite. She tried to push up. Nothing happened. She screamed, trying again and again with the same result. The water was peeling her off the rock. She was sliding, losing her grip. Her head dipped beneath the surface. She struggled to stay up. Every muscle in her body shook from the effort. It was too much. Her shoulder screamed with pain. Her thighs were aching. Her fingers were losing their grip. There was no fighting it. The water was too strong. Her body continued sliding down the rock. Sara took a deep breath, gulping in air just before her head dipped below the surface. The constant sound of the rushing water turned to complete and total silence.

Sara pressed her lips tightly together. Her hair floated out in front of her. She could see the moon above her, the bright light somehow managing to pierce the water's edge. The rays were like fingers reaching toward her. She heard something underneath the quiet in her ears. The river had a voice, a gurgling, soothing voice that held a promise that things would be better on the other side. The current was speaking to her, telling her it was okay to let go. Sara realized with some shock that she wanted to. She wanted to just give in, to go to that place where Jeffrey was waiting for her. Not heaven. Not some earthly ideal, but a place of quiet and comfort where the thought of him, the memory of him, did not open like a fresh wound every time she breathed. Every time she walked in the places they walked. Every time she thought of his beautiful eyes, his mouth, his hands.

Sara reached through the water, touching the fingers of moonlight shining down. The cold had turned into a shroud of warmth. She opened her mouth. Air bubbles traced up her face. Her heartbeat was slow, lethargic. She let her emotions wash over her. She let herself feel the luxury of surrender just one more second before she forced herself back to the surface, twisting her body around so that she could find hold on the rock.

“No!” she screamed, raging at the river. Her arms shook as she clawed her way up the rough surface of the stone. The water gripped her like a million hands trying to drag her back in, but Sara fought with every fiber of her being to drag her way to the top of the granite.

She rolled over onto her back, staring up at the sky. The moon was still gloriously shining down, the light reflecting off the trees, the rocks, the river. Sara laughed, because she was sick of the alternative. She laughed so hard that she started coughing. She pushed herself up to sitting, and coughed until there was nothing left inside.

She breathed deeply, drawing life back into her body. Her heart pounded wildly in her chest. The cuts and bruises riddling her skin started to make themselves known. Pain woke every nerve ending, telling her she was still alive. Sara took another deep breath. The air was so crisp she could feel it touching every part of her lungs. She put her hand to her neck. The necklace was gone. Her fingers did not find the familiar shape of Jeffrey’s ring.

“Oh, Jeffrey,” she whispered. “Thank you.”

Thank you for letting me go.

But go where? Sara looked around. The moon was so bright it might as well have been daytime. She was in the middle of the river, at least ten feet from either bank. Water churned white around the smaller rocks that surrounded her. She knew some of them went at least eight feet down. She tested her shoulder. The tendon clicked, but she could still move it.

Sara stood up. There was a weeping willow on the bank, its waving tendrils beckoning her to the clearing underneath its branches. If she could get to one of the smaller rocks without being swept away, she could stand on top and jump to shore.

She heard a branch snap. Leaves rustled. Will came into the clearing. His chest heaved up and down from running. He had a rope coiled in his hands. She could read every emotion on his face. Fear. Confusion. Relief.

Sara raised her voice to be heard over the rushing water. “What took you so long?”

His mouth opened in surprise. “Errands,” he managed, still breathless. “There was a line at the bank.”

She laughed so hard she started coughing again.

“Are you all right?”

She nodded, struggling against another coughing fit. “What about Lena?”

“She was in the basement. Jared called an ambulance, but ...” His voice trailed off. “She’s in bad shape.”

Sara leaned her hands on her knees. Yet again, Lena needed help. Yet again, it fell to Sara to pick up the pieces. Oddly, she didn’t feel the usual reluctance or even the anger that had been her constant companion since that awful day she had watched her husband die. Sara felt at peace for the first time in four years. Tessa was right—you couldn’t fall off the floor. Eventually, you had to get up, dust yourself off, and get back to the business of living.

“Sara?”

She held out her hand toward Will. “Throw me some rope.”

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Will slowed the Porsche to turn onto Caplan Road, trying to follow the directions Sara had given him. She had drawn arrows by the street names, and as long as Will held the sheet of paper in the right direction, he should be able to make it to Frank Wallace's house without losing his way. Sara had even given him her reading glasses, which were so small on his face that he looked like Poindexter's idiot cousin. Still, she was right. The glasses worked. The words on the page in front of him still did their tricks, but at least they were sharper.

His phone rang, and Will fished around in his pocket, steering with his knees for fear of dropping the directions. He saw Faith's number in the caller ID.

"Where have you been?" she demanded. "I've left two messages on your cell. I even called Amanda."

"Aren't you supposed to be on maternity leave?"

"Emma's asleep and I'm sick of being in this stupid hospital." She began a litany of complaints that started with the bad Jell-O and quickly segued into breast tenderness.

Will stopped her there. "I got my bad guy."

"What?" Faith's voice went up in surprise, and he realized that she'd had no great hope that he would solve the case so quickly.

"Thanks for the vote of confidence."

"Oh, shut up. You know I'm just annoyed because you did it without me."

Faith wasn't given to sudden fits of emotional honesty. Will knew better than to pursue the point. Instead, he told her about the drug trial and the lengths that Darla Jackson had gone to in order to take out her blackmailers and get rid of Lena Adams.

Faith asked, "How much money are we talking about?"

"We don't know how many records she was falsifying. Maybe tens of thousands of dollars."

"Holy crap. Where do I sign up?"

"No kidding," Will agreed. The money would've come in handy. He wasn't looking forward to going back to Atlanta and digging up his front yard again. "Lena's still at the hospital. I think they're going to keep her for a while."

"I'm surprised Sara helped her."

Will had been surprised as well, but he guessed being a doctor meant you couldn't pick and choose who you saved. Still, there hadn't been much talking while Sara hooked up the IV and ordered Jared to get Lena water, then more blankets, then more water. Will wasn't sure how much of this was meant to help Lena and how much of it was designed to keep Jared from having a nervous breakdown. Either way, it had worked to bring a much-needed level of calm to the situation.

Jared had been frantic from the moment they entered the children's clinic to search for Lena. His erratic behavior had cost them several valuable minutes.

He'd kicked down doors that weren't locked. He'd overturned desks and toppled filing cabinets. By the time Will had found the locked basement door, the young man was so spent that he'd barely had the strength to help Will break it down.

And then Jared's second wind had kicked in. He'd rushed downstairs, heedless of anyone hiding in the shadows. They had found another locked door at the back of the basement. Deep ruts were cut in the concrete where metal shelving had once covered the entrance to what had to be a bomb shelter. An old but sturdy deadbolt held the door firmly in place. Jared had pounded away, popping off the steel like a pinball, nearly dislocating his shoulder, before Will came back with a crowbar from the workbench.

Will had to admit that he didn't think of Sara until after the door was pried open. Lena was barely awake, shaking with fever. Her body was drenched in sweat. Jared cried as he untied the rope from her hands and feet, begging Will to get help. That was when Will had gone upstairs to find Sara. He was staring at her empty BMW when he heard her screams from the river. It was sheer luck that she'd managed to call for help before Darla pulled her back down into the water. It was even better luck that the rope that was used to tie up Lena was long enough to help Sara get back to safer ground.

Not that she had needed it. Will was pretty sure she was capable of taking care of herself. He wouldn't have been surprised to see her walk on water after the hell she had survived.

On the phone, Will heard a baby gurgle and another woman talking.

Faith's voice was muffled as she said something to the nurse. She told Will, "I need to go. They brought Emma for her feeding. Didn't they, baby?"

Will waited through several seconds of baby talk before her voice returned to normal. "I'm glad you're okay. I was worried about you down there on your own." There was a strain to her voice, as if she was about to cry. Faith had been pretty emotional these last few months. Will had hoped the baby's birth would send the crazy train back to the station, but maybe it would take a while for her hormones to get back to normal.

"I should probably go," he told her. "I'm almost at Frank's."

She gave a loud sniff. "Let me know what happens."

"I will."

He heard the phone rattle around in the cradle and assumed that was Faith's way of ending the call. Will tucked his cell phone back into his pocket. He checked a street sign against the directions and took a turn. There was an arrow pointing over to the other side of the paper. His lips tugged up into a smile. Sara had drawn a smiley face for him.

He slowed the Porsche again, looking for street numbers. Will checked each mailbox, comparing the addresses to the directions. Halfway down the street, he found what he was looking for. Frank's house was a one-story cottage, but there was nothing quaint or cottagey about it. An air of sadness hung over the place like a dark cloud. The gutters sagged. The windows were dirty. The garden gnome was surprising, but the empty bottles of Dewar's by the trashcan were not.

The screen door opened as Will got out of his car. Lionel Harris laughed at him, obviously enjoying the surprise.

"Good morning," he said. "I heard y'all went for a swim last night."

Will smiled, though he felt the cold sweat come back like a sudden rain. He couldn't get the image out of his mind of Sara standing on top of that rock. "I'm a little surprised to see you here, Mr. Harris."

"Just dropping off a casserole."

Will's confusion must have been obvious. The old man patted him on the back. "Never underestimate the power of a shared history."

Will nodded, though he still didn't understand.

"I'll leave you to it." Lionel gripped his cane as he walked down the porch steps. Will watched him walk into the street. A neighbor waved him over and he stopped for a chat.

"Frank's waiting for you."

Will turned around. There was a woman standing at the door. She was older, with stooped shoulders and unnaturally red hair. Her makeup was caked on in the same style that her daughter preferred. Will saw the finger of a bruise under the woman's eye. The bridge of her nose was swollen. Someone had punched her recently, and very hard.

"I'm Maxine." She pushed open the screen door for him. "He's waiting for you."

As depressing as Frank's house was on the outside, the inside was far worse. The walls and ceiling had yellowed from years of cigarette smoke. The wall-to-wall carpet was clean but worn. The furniture looked like it had come from a 1950s model home.

"Back here." Maxine gestured for him to follow her down the hall. Opposite the kitchen was a small bedroom that had been turned into a cluttered office. At the back of the house was a dingy bath with avocado green tile. Frank was lying in a hospital bed in the last room. The shades were all drawn but the sunlight glowed behind them. The room was dank and sweaty. Oxygen tubes were clipped to Frank's nose but his breathing was still labored. His skin was yellow. His eyes were clouded.

There was a chair by the bed. Will sat down without having to be told.

"I'll be in the kitchen," Maxine told them. "You'uns let me know if you need anything."

Will turned in surprise, but she'd already left the room. He turned his attention back to Frank. "Julie Smith?"

The older man's deep baritone had been reduced to a low tremble. "I had her call Sara."

Will had assumed something like this had happened. "You already knew Tommy had killed himself before Sara got there."

"I thought ..." Frank closed his eyes. His chest slowly rose and fell. "I thought it would be better if Sara found him. That there would be fewer questions."

It could have easily worked out that way. Sara knew Nick Shelton. She could have unwittingly smoothed things over. "Why did you have Maxine say that Allison had a boyfriend?"

One shoulder went up. "It's always the boyfriend."

Will guessed that was true enough, but Frank had lied so many times over the last few days that Will didn't know whether the man was capable of being honest. Lionel Harris had a point about change. Not many people could pull it off. There had to be something awfully bad or awfully good to compel a person to turn their lives around. It was obvious to Will that Frank was past any life-changing revelations. Even without the oxygen tank, he smelled sick, like his body was already rotting. Will knew that there came a point in every person's life when it was too late to change anything. All you could do was wait for death to make you inconsequential.

Frank winced as he tried to get more comfortable in the bed.

"Can I get you anything?"

He shook his head, though he was obviously in pain. "How's Lena?"

"The infection's bad, but they think she'll pull through."

"Tell her I'm sorry," Frank said. "Tell her I'm sorry about everything."

"All right," Will promised, though if he had his way he would never talk to the woman again. He didn't think Lena Adams was all bad, but there was just enough of her that was tainted that left a bad taste in Will's mouth. "Why don't you tell me what happened?"

Frank stared openly at Will. His eyes watered. "You got kids?"

Will shook his head.

"Darla was always rebellious, pushing me, pushing Maxine." He stopped to catch his breath. "She disappeared on us when she was seventeen. I didn't even know she was back in town until I saw her outside the clinic." He coughed. Fine specks of blood dotted the bedsheet. "She was taking a cigarette break."

"Why did she call the police on Tommy?" The act seemed risky considering her criminal enterprises.

"I don't know if she was trying to scare Tommy or punish me." Frank reached for the glass of water on his bedside table. Will helped him, holding the straw so he could drink. Frank swallowed, the noise painfully loud in the tiny room. He sat back with a slow groan.

Will asked, "What did you do when you read the incident report about Tommy's dog?"

"I went to the clinic and asked her what the hell she was doing."

"Darla's name wasn't in the report."

Frank didn't answer.

Will was sick of pulling teeth. "You've done thousands of interviews, Chief Wallace. You know what questions I'm going to ask. You've probably already got a list in your head." He paused, waiting for Frank to make this easy. After a full minute, Will realized nothing was ever going to be easy with this man. He asked, "What did Darla say when you confronted her?"

"She told me she was being blackmailed."

"About the drug trial?"

"It wasn't just the two kids she was lying about. It was a lot of them. She had a system going—getting them to double up on the rolls so it looked like more kids were in the study, then they'd split the checks when they came in."

"Were they all blackmailing her?"

"Just Jason and Allison."

"She told you their names?"

"No."

Will studied him, trying again to figure out if he was lying. It was an exercise in futility. "What did Darla tell you about the blackmailers?"

"She thought she could pay them off, get them off her back. One of them was graduating soon. She thought if she gave them enough money they'd go away."

"How much did she ask you for?"

"Ten thousand dollars. I didn't have it. Even if I did, I wouldn't'a given it to her. I spent so much money bailing her out so many times. I couldn't throw away more."

Will noticed the man had not considered a second option, which was arresting his daughter and sending her to prison for her crimes.

Frank continued, "She worked so hard to get her nursing degree. I never thought she'd ..." His voice trailed off. "I didn't know."

"She's been in trouble before."

Frank would only nod.

"Bad checks," Will supplied. Darla's fingerprints were on file. They matched the print on the Windex bottle Will and Charlie had found in the dorm bathroom closet. Will made an educated guess. "She was in trouble before that."

Frank gave a tight nod. "I'd get calls every now and then. Professional courtesy, one cop to another. Austin. Little Rock. West Memphis. She was taking care of old people, skimming their money. She was good. She never got caught, but they knew it was her."

Will had found many times that there was a fine line between knowing someone was guilty and proving it. Being a cop's daughter had probably given Darla an extra layer of protection.

"I was sure Tommy killed that girl. I just didn't want anything to come back on Darla."

"You did everything you could do to make sure Lena's case was solid."

He stared at Will with rheumy eyes, obviously trying to guess what he knew.

The truth was that Will didn't know anything for certain. He guessed that Frank had hidden evidence. He guessed that Frank had delayed the call center in Eaton sending the audio of Maxine's voice on the 911 call. He guessed that the man had impeded an investigation, acted with reckless endangerment, and blindly if not willfully contributed to the deaths of three people.

As Frank had said, there was knowing and then there was proving.

"I never wanted to get Lena involved in any of this," Frank said. "She didn't know nothing about any of it. It was all down to me."

Will imagined Lena would say the same thing about Frank. As long as he lived, he would never understand the bond that held them together. "When did you figure out that Darla was involved?"

"When Lena—" He started coughing again. This time, there was so much blood that he had to spit into a tissue. "Jesus," Frank groaned, wiping his mouth. "I'm sorry."

Will fought to keep his stomach under control. "When did you figure it out?"

"When Lena told me there was another kid got killed the same way ..." His voice trailed off again. "I couldn't see Darla doing this. You'll understand when you have kids. She was my baby. I used to walk the floor with her at night. I watched her grow from a little girl into ..." Frank didn't finish his words, though it was obvious what Darla had grown into.

"When's the last time you saw her?"

"Last night," he admitted. Then, instead of making Will ask the right questions, he volunteered, "We got into a fight. She said she had to leave town."

She wanted more money.”

“Did you give it to her?”

He shook his head. “Maxine had a couple hundred bucks in her purse. They got into a fight. Pretty bad.” He indicated the oxygen tank, the rails on his bed. “By the time I got up, she had Maxie on the ground, beating her.” Frank pressed his thin lips together. “I never thought I’d live to see anything like that—a child wailing off on her own mother. My child. That wasn’t who I raised her to be. That wasn’t my kid.”

“What happened?”

“She stole the money. Took some out of my wallet, too. Maybe fifty bucks.”

“We found almost three hundred dollars on the body.”

He nodded, as if that’s what he expected. “I got a call from Brock this morning. Said she was pulled out downriver from the granite field.” He looked at Will as if he didn’t quite believe the information.

“That’s right. She was near the college.”

“He said I didn’t need to see her right now. Give him time to clean her up.” Frank’s breath caught. “How many times have you said that to a parent who wants to see their kid, only you know the kid’s been beaten, cut, fucked up six ways to Sunday?”

“A lot of times,” Will admitted. “But Brock’s right. You don’t want to remember her like this.”

Frank stared at the ceiling. “I don’t know if I want to remember her at all.”

Will let his words hang between them for a few seconds. “Is there anything else you want to tell me?”

Frank shook his head, and again, Will wasn’t sure whether or not to trust him. The man had been a detective for over thirty years. There was no way he hadn’t at least suspected his daughter was involved in these crimes. Even if Frank didn’t want to say it out loud, surely he knew deep down that his inaction had at the very least cost Tommy Braham and Jason Howell their lives.

Or maybe he didn’t know. Maybe Frank was so good at deceiving himself that he was certain he had done everything right.

“I should let you get some rest,” Will offered.

Frank’s eyes were closed, but he wasn’t asleep. “I used to take her hunting.” His voice was a raspy whisper. “It was the only time we got along.” He opened his eyes and stared at the ceiling. The only sound in the room was the quiet hiss of the oxygen tank beside his bed. “I taught her to never aim for the heart. There’s ribs and bone all around it. Bullet ricochets. You end up chasing the deer for miles waiting for him to die.” He put his hand to the side of his neck. “You go for the neck. Cut off the stuff that supplies the heart.” He rubbed the sagging skin. “That’s the clean kill. The most humane.”

Will had seen the crime scenes. There was nothing humane about the murders of Allison Spooner and Jason Howell. They had been terrified. They had been butchered.

“I’m dying,” Frank said. His words were no surprise. “I was diagnosed with cancer a few months ago.” He licked his chapped lips. “Maxine said she’d take care of me as long as I gave her my pension.” His breath caught in his chest. He gave a strained laugh. “I always thought I’d die alone.”

Will felt an overwhelming sadness at the man’s words. Frank Wallace was going to die alone. There might be people in the same room with him—his bitter ex-wife, a few blindly loyal colleagues—but men like Frank were destined to die the same way they had lived, with everyone at arm's length.

Will knew this because he often viewed his own life and death through a similar lens. He didn't have any childhood friends he'd kept in touch with. There were no relatives he could reach out to. Faith had the baby now. Eventually, she would find a man whose company she could tolerate. There might be another baby. She would probably find a desk job to take some of the stress out of her life. Will would recede from her life like a tide rolling back from the shore.

That left Angie, and Will had no great hope that she would be a comfort to him in his old age. She lived fast and hard, showing the same reckless disregard that had landed her mother in the coma ward at the state hospital for the last twenty-seven years. Marriage, if anything, had pushed them further apart. Will had always assumed that he would outlive Angie, that he would find himself alone at her graveside one day. This image always brought him great sadness tinged with a modicum of relief. Part of Will loved Angie more than life itself. Another part of him thought of her as a Pandora's box that held his darkest secrets. If she were to die, she would take some of that darkness with her.

But she would also take part of his life.

Will asked Frank, "Do you need me to get you anything?"

He coughed again, a dry, hacking sound. "No," he answered. "I'm fine on my own."

"Take care of yourself." Will made himself reach out and touch Frank's shoulder before he left the room.

Sara was in the front yard with her greyhounds when Will pulled into the Linton driveway. The side of her face was bruised. The cut on her arm had needed stitches. Her hair was down, brushing across her shoulders.

She looked beautiful.

The dogs ran to greet him as he got out of the car. Sara had dressed them both in black fleece jackets to fight the cold. Will petted the excited animals as much as he could without falling over backward.

Sara clicked her tongue and they stopped accosting him. She asked, "I take it Frank wasn't much help?"

Will shook his head, feeling a lump come into his throat. He used to be good at hiding his thoughts, but somehow Sara had cracked the code. "I don't think he has long."

"I heard." She was obviously conflicted about the impending death of her longtime family friend. "I'm sorry that he's sick, but I don't know how I feel about him as a person after all of this."

"Maybe he could've stopped it—for Jason, at least." Will added, "Then again, people don't see what they don't want to see."

"Denial doesn't hold up as a good excuse. Darla could've killed me. She would've killed me if the bank hadn't given out."

Will didn't look up because he didn't want Sara to know what he was thinking. Instead, he leaned down to scratch Bob's ear. "Frank's ex-wife is with him. At least he's not going to die alone."

"Small comfort."

"I think it is," he countered. "Some people don't get that. Some people just—" Will stopped himself before he started to sound like a blubbing child. "Anyway, I don't think I'm ever going to find out what really happened this week."

"Do you need to?"

"I don't guess so. Nothing will bring Tommy back, but at least his name is clear. Darla's not going to hurt anyone else. Frank's in his own prison."

"And Lena gets away clean yet again."

She didn't sound as bitter as she had before. "We'll see."

Sara laughed. "You want to make a bet?"

Will tried to think of a clever wager, something that involved him taking her to dinner when they got back to Atlanta, but he was too slow.

She said, "Brock called this morning. He found Lena's Toyota key in Darla's front pocket. I guess she was planning on taking Lena's car and leaving town."

He remembered the Celica's sliced tires. Someone at the station had given Lena a parting gift. "Darla must've seen you get out of your car and decided to upgrade her ride." Will had always known that the killer was good at improvising. "Did Hare say what made him check the files for Tommy's name?"

"He'd seen Tommy in the clinic a couple of times. It's not unusual for kids that age to still go to their pediatrician, but Tommy was there a lot, at least once a week. Hare got curious after the suicide and checked the paperwork for Tommy's name." Sara pulled the leash as Billy tried to pee on the side of Will's car. "He confirmed what Darla said. He was going to the ethics committee to report the protocol breach."

"That's good, right? He was doing the right thing."

"I suppose, but he's not going to stop running trials." She gave a rueful laugh. "Let me correct that: he's going to stop running trials out of my building, but he's still going to keep running them."

"Did you find out what he was testing?"

"An antidepressant. They're going to try again next spring with a different dosage."

"You're kidding me."

"It's a billion-dollar business. One in every ten Americans is on antidepressants, even though placebo studies show a lot of them get absolutely no benefits whatsoever." She nodded back at the house. "Hare's inside, which is why I took the dogs for a two-hour walk in the freezing cold."

"Your folks aren't mad at him?"

She sighed heavily. "Oh, my mother will forgive him anything."

"I guess that's what families do."

She seemed to think about what he said. "Yeah, they do."

"I talked to Faith this morning." She'd sent so many baby pictures to Will's phone that the memory was almost full. "I've never heard her happy before. It's weird."

"Having a baby changes you," Sara told him. "Obviously, that's not something I've learned from personal experience, but I can see it with my sister."

Bob leaned against his leg. Will reached down and scratched him. "I guess I —"

"I was raped."

Will kept his mouth closed because he didn't know what to say.

"In college," she continued. "That's why I can't have children." He'd never noticed how green her eyes were, almost emerald. "It took years for me to tell my husband. I was ashamed. I wanted to think it was behind me. That I was strong enough to get past it."

"I don't think anyone could ever say you're not strong."

"Well. I've had my bad days." She let out Billy's leash as he sniffed around the mailbox. They both stared at the dog as if he was far more fascinating than reality dictated.

Will cleared his throat. The moment was too awkward. It was also cold outside, and he guessed Sara didn't want to stand in front of her parents' house all day watching him struggle to come up with something meaningful to say. "I should start packing my stuff."

"Why?"

"Well ..." Will was tongue-tied, and painfully stupid. "The holiday. Your family. I'm sure you want to be with them."

"My mother's cooked enough for fifty. She'd be crushed if you didn't stay."

He couldn't tell if the offer was genuine or if she was just being polite. "My front yard's kind of a mess."

"I'll help you when we get back to Atlanta." She smiled mischievously. "I'll even show you how to use a backhoe."

"I don't want to impose."

"Will, it's not imposing." She took his hand. He looked down, tracing his thumb along her fingers. Her skin was soft. He caught the scent of her soap. Just being close to her like this made him feel warm, like that empty place in his soul might have the chance of being filled one day. He opened his mouth to tell her that he wanted to stay, that he wanted nothing more than to get two thousand more questions from her mother and watch her sister's sly smile as she glanced back and forth between them.

And then his cell phone chirped in his pocket.

She wrinkled her nose. "What's that?"

"Probably another baby picture from Faith."

She gave him that same flirty smile. "Let me see."

Will felt incapable of denying Sara any request. He used his free hand to find his phone. He'd seen Emma Lee Mitchell from every conceivable angle, and he was sure she was a sweet baby, but at the moment she looked like an angry red raisin in a pink knit hat.

Sara flipped open the phone. Her smile quickly faded. "It's a text." She showed him the phone, then seemed to realize herself. She turned it back and read aloud, " 'Diedre finally died. Come home.' "

Will felt a sudden pang of grief. "Angie's mother." He looked down at her hand. She was still holding his hand.

"I'm sorry."

Will hadn't cried since he was sixteen, but he felt tears threatening to come. He struggled to speak. "She's been on life support since I was a kid. I guess she finally ..." His throat was so tight he could barely swallow. Angie claimed to hate her mother, but she had visited her at least once a month for the last twenty years. Will had gone with her many times. The experience was awful, heart wrenching. He had held Angie so many times while she sobbed. It was the only time she let her guard down. The only time she surrendered herself to Will.

He suddenly understood Lionel Harris's words about the power of a shared history.

"Sara—"

She squeezed his hand. "You should go home."

Will struggled to find the right words. He was torn between wanting to be with Sara and needing to be with Angie.

Sara leaned in close, pressing her lips to his cheek. The wind draped her hair across his face. She put her mouth to his ear and told him, "Go home to your wife."

So he did.

THREE WEEKS LATER

EPILOGUE

Lena stood in the cemetery looking down at Jeffrey Tolliver's headstone. It seemed stupid to put flowers on an empty grave, but the things inside that coffin were more tangible than a jar of ashes. Brad had contributed a paper target from his first qualifying round at the police academy. Frank had put in his citation book because Jeffrey was always yelling at him for being late with the reports. Lena had donated her gold shield. The one she carried up until three weeks ago was a duplicate. Dan Brock had slipped it in with the other items because they both knew there was no way she could do it herself.

All the businesses on Main Street were closed the day Jeffrey's coffin was lowered into the ground. Jared hadn't attended the funeral either. His resemblance to his father had been brought to his attention years before. He didn't want to distract the mourners. He didn't want to bring Sara that sort of pain.

He wanted to be in town, though. He wanted to feel close to his father, to see the place where Jeffrey had lived and loved. He'd met Lena outside the diner. She was sitting on the curb, thinking about all the things she had lost. At first, she'd thought Jared was Jeffrey. Of course she'd thought he was Jeffrey. He was more than a spitting image. He was a walking ghost.

Maybe part of Lena was drawn to him because of the resemblance. She had worshipped Jeffrey too much to ever consider anything romantic. He was her mentor. He was her hero. She had wanted to be the same kind of cop he was. The same kind of person. She hadn't realized until he was gone that he was just a man.

"Why aren't you at the funeral?" Jared had asked her.

And Lena had told him, "Because I'm the person who killed your father."

Jared had spent two hours listening to Lena pour her heart out, then another two hours arguing about how it wasn't really her fault. His youth made him passionate, a staunch defender of his quickly formed opinions. He had just signed up for the police academy. He hadn't yet seen the horrors of the world. Hadn't yet figured out that there was such a thing as a truly irredeemable person.

Was she irredeemable? Lena didn't want to think so. She had a fresh start ahead of her. A clean slate on which to write the rest of her life. The police review board had returned a verdict of no fault in Tommy Braham's suicide. Will Trent's report was long on supposition and short on evidence, especially since Lena had never gotten around to taping that confession. Gordon Braham was moving to Florida to be closer to his wife's people. He had filed a class-action lawsuit along with Jason Howell's mother against Hareton Earnshaw and the drug company that had sponsored the trials. He'd signed a paper indemnifying the Grant County force in exchange for an undisclosed sum.

Lena had gone through two operations and a week in the hospital, but the damage to her hand was surprisingly limited considering the hell she'd gone through fighting off a nasty staph infection. Therapy was bringing movement back to her fingers. She was right-handed anyway. All her left hand needed to do was hold up her badge when she was making an arrest. And she would be making a lot of them soon. Gavin Wayne had called two days ago to let her know the job on the Macon force was still available. Lena had told him yes without a second thought.

She was a cop. It was in her blood. Her nerve had been tested. Her resolve had faltered. But she knew without any doubt that there was nothing else in the world that she wanted to do.

She leaned down and placed the flowers on Jeffrey's grave. He was a cop, too. Not the same kind of cop as Lena, but different paths could still lead to the same destination. Jeffrey would understand that. He had always given her the benefit of the doubt.

Lena looked across the row of headstones lining the cemetery. She'd already put flowers on her sister's headstone. Frank Wallace didn't have a marker yet, but she had brought him some daisies because she knew he liked them. He'd left her some money in his will. Not a lot, but enough for Lena to sell her house at a loss and still pay off her mortgage. She had donated the rest to a nonprofit legal fund established to help cops who got on the wrong side of the law. Something told her Frank would've approved.

Not that she needed his approval anymore. Lena was sick of worrying what other people thought about her. Part of looking ahead to her new life required her never to look back. The only things she was taking with her from Grant County were her clothes and her fiancé, neither of which she thought she could live without.

"Ready?" Jared was sitting in his truck. He leaned over and pushed open the door.

Lena slid across the seat so he could put his arm around her. "Are things going to be okay with you and Sara?" He'd had coffee with her this morning. Lena gathered things hadn't gone well.

"Don't worry about it." Jared's jaw tightened as he put the car in gear and pulled out onto the road. He didn't like giving bad news. "Aunt Sara will come around."

"I wouldn't hold my breath."

He kissed the top of her head. "She just doesn't know who you are."

"No, she doesn't."

He reached down and turned on the radio. Joan Jett started singing about her bad reputation. Lena stared into the rearview mirror. She could see the road disappearing behind her, Grant County getting smaller with every mile. She wanted to feel something for the place—a sense of loss, a sense of nostalgia. All she felt was relief to have it finally behind her.

Did Sara Linton know Lena? Probably better than anybody else alive. But Jared didn't need to know that. He didn't need to know about the mistakes Lena had made, or the people whose lives she had ruined. Things were going to be different in Macon. This was her clean slate. Her new beginning.

Besides, Lena had never told a man the truth in her life. She wasn't about to start now.

For Victoria

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My appreciation to the usual suspects: Victoria Sanders, Kate Elton, and Kate Miciak. I'd also like to add Gail Rebuck, Susan Sandon, Richard Cable, Margie Seale, Robbert Ammerlaan, Pieter Swinkels, Silvie Kuttiny-Walster, Berit Boehm, Per Nasholm, Alysha Farry, Chandler Crawford, and Markus Dohle. And I guess Angela Cheng-Caplan, if she can handle the love.

Isabel Glusman, thank you for your letters, and Emily Bestler, thank you for raising such a great kid. Dr. David Harper helped me figure out how to kill people. Dr. David Worth helped me figure out eyeballs. Any mistakes are my own. Trish Hawkins was instrumental in giving me insight into the complexities of dyslexia. Debbie Teague, you are such a trouper for sharing your experiences; every time I write about Will, I think of your amazing strength of spirit. Mo Hayder: thanks for all the free research on scuba diving, suckah! To Andrew Johnston I offer my apologies for you know what, and no, there's no compensation. Same goes for you, Miss Kitty.

Thanks to Beth Tindall of Cincinnati Media for all the usual web crap. Jamey Locastro can arrest me anytime. Fiona Farrelly and Ollie Malcolm were very gracious helping me figure my way around the thing that involves the plot of this story, which I won't mention here in case people read this before they read the actual book, which they shouldn't be doing anyway. Thanks also to the folks who helped by discussing this subject matter but didn't want to be named for obvious reasons. To Speaker David Ralston: I thank you very much for introducing me to some great people. GBI Director Vernon Keenan and John Bankhead, thanks for your time. I will never fire a shotgun again without thinking of our lovely day outside the women's prison. I hope I've honored the work y'all and all the agents and support staff at the GBI do for the great state of Georgia.

My daddy made me soup and cornbread during critical times, which I may have conflated because of the cornbread and soup, which—did I mention?—I will probably need more of. D.A. showed amazing perseverance through this whole process. As always, you are my heart.

To my readers: y'all are the best. For further reading, try the GPZ anthology, check out issue 15.05 of Wired magazine, or, if you really want to get upset, investigoogle Jessie Gelsing. For those of you with a wild hair, GPGP.net is an interesting site as well. Hey, folks, while you're online, check me out on Facebook or my website, karinslaughter.com. I love getting letters, but please remember this is a work of fiction.

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR OF CRIMINAL

KARIN SLAUGHTER

FALLEN

A NOVEL

"A complex, gripping and deadly serious novel that reflects anew Slaughter's abundant talent."

—The Washington Post

A black and white photograph of a room. A window on the left side allows bright light to enter, creating a strong, diagonal beam of light that illuminates a portion of the floor. The floor appears to be made of wood or a similar textured material. The walls are dark and shadowed, with a door or panel visible on the right. The overall mood is somber and dramatic.

FALLEN

A NOVEL

KARIN
SLAUGHTER

DELACORTE PRESS

NEW YORK

Fallen is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Copyright © 2011 by Karin Slaughter

All rights reserved.

Published in the United States by Delacorte Press, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., New York.

DELACORTE PRESS is a registered trademark of Random House, Inc., and the colophon is a trademark of Random House, Inc.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Slaughter, Karin

Fallen : a novel / Karin Slaughter.

p. cm.

eISBN: 978-0-345-52822-3

1. Policewomen—Fiction. 2. Georgia—Fiction. I. Title.

PS3569.L275F37 2011

813'.54—dc22 2011004941

www.bantamdell.com

Cover design: Carlos Beltrán

Cover photograph: Michael Trevillion

v3.1

Contents

Master - Table of Contents

Fallen

Title Page

Copyright

Saturday

Chapter 1

Chapter 2

Chapter 3

Chapter 4

Chapter 5

Chapter 6

Sunday

Chapter 7

Chapter 8

Chapter 9

Chapter 10

Chapter 11

Chapter 12

Chapter 13

Chapter 14

Chapter 15

Monday

Chapter 16

Chapter 17

Chapter 18

Chapter 19

Chapter 20

Thursday

Chapter 21

Chapter 22

Dedication

Acknowledgments

SATURDAY

CHAPTER ONE

Faith Mitchell dumped the contents of her purse onto the passenger seat of her Mini, trying to find something to eat. Except for a furry piece of gum and a peanut of dubious origin, there was nothing remotely edible. She thought about the box of nutrition bars in her kitchen pantry, and her stomach made a noise that sounded like a rusty hinge groaning open.

The computer seminar she'd attended this morning was supposed to last three hours, but that had stretched into four and a half thanks to the jackass in the front row who kept asking pointless questions. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation trained its agents more often than any other agency in the region. Statistics and data on criminal activities were constantly being drummed into their heads. They had to be up to date on all of the latest technology. They had to qualify at the range twice a year. They ran mock raids and active shooter simulations that were so intense that for weeks after, Faith couldn't go to the bathroom in the middle of the night without checking shadows in doorways. Usually, she appreciated the agency's thoroughness. Today, all she could think about was her four-month-old baby, and the promise Faith had made to her mother that she would be back no later than noon.

The clock on the dash read ten after one o'clock when she started the car. Faith mumbled a curse as she pulled out of the parking lot in front of the Panthersville Road headquarters. She used Bluetooth to dial her mother's number. The car speakers gave back a static-y silence. Faith hung up and dialed again. This time, she got a busy signal.

Faith tapped her finger on the steering wheel as she listened to the bleating. Her mother had voicemail. Everybody had voicemail. Faith couldn't remember the last time she'd heard a busy signal on the telephone. She had almost forgotten the sound. There was probably a crossed wire somewhere at the phone company. She hung up and tried the number a third time.

Still busy.

Faith steered with one hand as she checked her BlackBerry for an email from her mother. Before Evelyn Mitchell retired, she had been a cop for just shy of four decades. You could say a lot about the Atlanta force, but you couldn't claim they were behind the times. Evelyn had carried a cell phone back when they were more like purses you strapped around your shoulder. She'd learned how to use email before her daughter had. She'd carried a BlackBerry for almost twelve years.

But she hadn't sent a message today.

Faith checked her cell phone voicemail. She had a saved message from her dentist's office about making an appointment to get her teeth cleaned, but there was nothing new. She tried her phone at home, thinking maybe her mother had gone there to pick up something for the baby. Faith's house was just down the road from Evelyn's. Maybe Emma had run out of diapers. Maybe she'd needed another bottle. Faith listened to the phone ring at her house, then heard her own voice answer, telling callers to leave a message.

She ended the call. Without thinking, she glanced into the back seat. Emma's empty car seat was there. She could see the pink liner sticking out over the top of the plastic.

"Idiot," Faith whispered to herself. She dialed her mother's cell phone number. She held her breath as she counted through three rings. Evelyn's voicemail picked up.

Faith had to clear her throat before she could speak. She was aware of a tremor in her tone. "Mom, I'm on my way home. I guess you took Em for a walk ..." Faith looked up at the sky as she merged onto the interstate. She was about twenty minutes outside of Atlanta and could see fluffy white clouds draped like scarves around the skinny necks of skyscrapers. "Just call me," Faith said, worry needling the edge of her brain.

Grocery store. Gas station. Pharmacy. Her mother had a car seat identical to the one in the back of Faith's Mini. She was probably out running errands. Faith was over an hour late. Evelyn would've taken the baby and ... Left Faith a message that she was going to be out. The woman had been on call for the majority of her adult life. She didn't go to the toilet without letting someone know. Faith and her older brother, Zeke, had joked about it when they were kids. They always knew where their mother was, even when they didn't want to. Especially when they didn't want to.

Faith stared at the phone in her hand as if it could tell her what was going on. She was aware that she might be letting herself get worked up over nothing. The landline could be out. Her mother wouldn't know this unless she tried to make a call. Her cell phone could be switched off, or charging, or both. Her BlackBerry could be in her car or her purse or somewhere she couldn't hear the telltale vibration. Faith glanced back and forth between the road and her BlackBerry as she typed an email to her mother. She spoke the words aloud as she typed—

"On-my-way. Sorry-I'm-late. Call-me."

She sent the email, then tossed the phone onto the seat along with the spilled items from her purse. After a moment's hesitation, Faith popped the gum into her mouth. She chewed as she drove, ignoring the purse lint clinging to her tongue. She turned on the radio, then snapped it back off. The traffic thinned as she got closer to the city. The clouds moved apart, sending down bright rays of sunshine. The inside of the car began to bake.

Ten minutes out, Faith's nerves were still on edge, and she was sweating from the heat in the car. She cracked the sunroof to let in some air. This was probably a simple case of separation anxiety. She'd been back at work for a little over two months, but still, every morning when Faith left Emma at her mother's, she felt something akin to a seizure take hold. Her vision blurred. Her heart shook in her chest. Her head buzzed as if a million bees had flown into her ears. She was more irritable than usual at work, especially with her partner, Will Trent, who either had the patience of Job or was setting up a believable alibi for when he finally snapped and strangled her.

Faith couldn't recall if she had felt this same anxiety with Jeremy, her son, who was now a freshman in college. Faith had been eighteen when she entered the police academy. Jeremy was three years old by then. She had grabbed onto the idea of joining the force as if it was the only life preserver left on the Titanic.

Thanks to two minutes of poor judgment in the back of a movie theater and what foreshadowed a lifetime of breathtakingly bad taste in men, Faith had gone straight from puberty to motherhood without any of the usual stops in between. At eighteen, she had relished the idea of earning a steady paycheck so that she could move out of her parents' house and raise Jeremy the way that she wanted. Going to work every day had been a step toward independence. Leaving him in day care had seemed like a small price to pay.

Now that Faith was thirty-four, with a mortgage, a car payment, and another baby to raise on her own, she wanted nothing more than to move back into her mother's house so that Evelyn could take care of everything. She wanted to open the refrigerator and see food that she didn't have to buy. She wanted to turn on the air conditioner in the summer without worrying about having to pay the bill. She wanted to sleep until noon, then watch TV all day. Hell, while she was at it, she might as well resurrect her father, who'd died eleven years ago, so that he could make her pancakes at breakfast and tell her how pretty she was.

No chance of that now. Evelyn seemed happy to play the role of nanny in her retirement, but Faith was under no illusion that her life was going to get any easier. Her own retirement was almost twenty years away. The Mini had another three years of payments and would be out of warranty well before that. Emma would expect food and clothing for at least the next eighteen years, if not more. And it wasn't like when Jeremy was a baby and Faith could dress him in mismatched socks and yard sale hand-me-downs. Babies today had to coordinate. They needed BPA-free bottles and certified organic applesauce from kindly Amish farmers. If Jeremy got into the architectural program at Georgia Tech, Faith was looking at six more years of buying books and doing his laundry. Most worryingly, her son had found a serious girlfriend. An older girlfriend with curvy hips and a ticking biological clock. Faith could be a grandmother before she turned thirty-five.

An unwelcome heat rushed through her body as she tried to push this last thought from her mind. She checked the contents of her purse again as she drove. The gum hadn't made a dent. Her stomach was still growling. She reached over and felt around inside the glovebox. Nothing. She should stop at a fast-food place and at least get a Coke, but she was wearing her regs—tan khakis and a blue shirt with the letters GBI emblazoned in bright yellow on the back. This wasn't the best part of town to be in if you were law enforcement. People tended to run, and then you had to chase them, which wasn't conducive to getting home at a reasonable hour. Besides, something was telling her—urging her—to see her mother.

Faith picked up her phone and dialed Evelyn's numbers again. Home, cell, even her BlackBerry, which she only used for email. All three brought the same negative response. Faith could feel her stomach flip as the worst scenarios ran through her mind. As a beat cop, she'd been called out onto a lot of scenes where a crying child had alerted the neighbors to a serious problem. Mothers had slipped in the tub. Fathers had accidentally injured themselves or gone into coronary arrest. The babies had lain there, wailing helplessly, until someone had figured out that something was wrong. There was nothing more heart wrenching than a crying baby who could not be soothed.

Faith chided herself for bringing these horrible images to mind. She had always been good at assuming the worst, even before she became a cop. Evelyn was probably fine. Emma's naptime was at one-thirty. Her mother had probably turned off the phone so the ringing wouldn't wake the baby. Maybe she'd run into a neighbor while checking the mailbox, or gone next door to help old Mrs. Levy take out the trash.

Still, Faith's hands slipped on the wheel as she exited onto Boulevard. She was sweating despite the mild March weather. This couldn't just be about the baby or her mother or even Jeremy's unconscionably fertile girlfriend. Faith had been diagnosed with diabetes less than a year ago. She was religious about measuring her blood sugar, eating the right things, making sure she had snacks on hand. Except for today. That probably explained why her thinking had gone sideways. She just needed to eat something. Preferably in view of her mother and child.

Faith checked the glovebox again to make sure it was really empty. She had a distant memory of giving Will her last nutrition bar yesterday while they were waiting outside the courthouse. It was that or watch him inhale a sticky bun from the vending machine. He had complained about the taste but eaten the whole bar anyway. And now she was paying for it.

She blew through a yellow light, speeding as much as she dared down a semi-residential street. The road narrowed at Ponce de Leon. Faith passed a row of fast-food restaurants and an organic grocery store. She edged up the speedometer, accelerating into the twists and turns bordering Piedmont Park. The flash of a traffic camera bounced off her rearview mirror as she sailed through another yellow light. She tapped on the brakes for a straggling jaywalker. Two more grocery stores blurred by, then came the final red light, which was mercifully green.

Evelyn still lived in the same house Faith and her older brother had grown up in. The single-story ranch was located in an area of Atlanta called Sherwood Forest, which was nestled between Ansley Park, one of the wealthiest neighborhoods in the city, and Interstate 85, which offered the constant roar of traffic, depending on which way the wind was blowing. The wind was blowing just fine today, and when Faith rolled down her window to let in more fresh air, she heard the familiar drone that had marked most every day of her childhood.

As a lifelong resident of Sherwood Forest, Faith had a deep-seated hatred for the men who had planned the neighborhood. The subdivision had been developed after World War II, the brick ranch houses filled by returning soldiers who took advantage of low VA loans. The street planners had unabashedly embraced the Sherwood concept. After taking a hard left onto Lionel, Faith crossed Friar Tuck, took a right on Robin Hood Road, coasted through the fork at Lady Marian Lane, and checked the driveway of her own house on the corner of Doncaster and Barnesdale before finally pulling into her mother's driveway off Little John Trail.

Evelyn's beige Chevy Malibu was backed into the carport. That, at least, was normal. Faith had never seen her mother pull nose-first into a parking space. It came from her days in uniform. You always made sure your car was ready to leave as soon as a call came in.

Faith didn't have time to reflect on her mother's routines. She rolled into the driveway and parked the Mini nose-to-nose with the Malibu. Her legs ached as she stood; every muscle in her body had been tensed for the last twenty minutes.

She could hear loud music blaring from the house. Heavy metal, not her mother's usual Beatles. Faith put her hand on the hood of the Malibu as she walked toward the kitchen door. The engine was cold. Maybe Evelyn had been in the shower when Faith called. Maybe she hadn't checked her email or cell phone. Maybe she had cut herself. There was a bloody handprint on the door.

Faith felt herself do a double take.

The bloody print showed a left hand. It was about eighteen inches above the knob. The door had been pulled closed but hadn't latched. A streak of sunlight cut through the jamb, probably from the window over the kitchen sink.

Faith still couldn't process what she was seeing. She held up her own hand to the print, a child pressing her fingers to her mother's. Evelyn's hand was smaller. Slender fingers. The tip of her ring finger hadn't touched the door. There was a clot of blood where it should have been.

Suddenly, the music stopped mid-thump. In the silence, Faith heard a familiar gurgling noise, a revving up that announced the coming of a full-on wail. The sound echoed in the carport, so that for a moment, Faith thought it was coming from her own mouth. Then it came again, and she turned around, knowing that it was Emma.

Almost every other house in Sherwood Forest had been razed or remodeled, but the Mitchell home was much the same as when it had first been built. The layout was simple: three bedrooms, a family room, a dining room, and a kitchen with a door leading to the open carport. Bill Mitchell, Faith's father, had built a toolshed on the opposite side of the carport. It was a sturdy building—her father had never done anything halfway—with a metal door that bolted shut and safety glass in its one window. Faith was ten before she realized that the building was too fortified for something as simple as tool storage. With the tenderness that only an older brother can muster, Zeke had filled her in on the shed's true purpose. "It's where Mom keeps her gun, you dumbass."

Faith ran past the car and tried to open the shed door. It was locked. She looked through the window. The metal wires in the safety glass formed a spider web in front of her eyes. She could see the potting table and bags of soil stacked neatly underneath. Tools hung on their proper hooks. Lawn equipment was stowed neatly in place. A black metal safe with a combination lock was bolted to the floor under the table. The door was open. Evelyn's cherry-handled Smith and Wesson revolver was missing. So was the carton of ammunition that was usually beside it.

The gurgling noise came again, louder this time. A pile of blankets on the floor pulsed up and down like a heartbeat. Evelyn used them to cover her plants during unexpected freezes. They were usually folded on the top shelf but now were wadded up in the corner beside the safe. Faith saw a tuft of pink sticking up behind the gray blankets, then the bend of a plastic headrest that could only be Emma's car seat. The blanket moved again. A tiny foot kicked out; a soft yellow cotton sock with white lace trim around the ankle. Then a little pink fist punched through. Then she saw Emma's face.

Emma smiled at Faith, her top lip forming a soft triangle. She gurgled again, this time with delight.

"Oh, God." Faith uselessly pulled at the locked door. Her hands shook as she felt around the top edge of the jamb, trying to find the key. Dust rained down.

The sharp point of a splinter dug into her finger. Faith looked in the window again. Emma clapped her hands together, soothed by the sight of her mother, despite the fact that Faith was as close to a full-on panic as she had ever been in her life. The shed was hot. It was too warm outside. Emma could overheat. She could become dehydrated. She could die.

Terrified, Faith got down on her hands and knees, thinking the key had fallen, possibly slid back under the door. She saw that the bottom of Emma's car seat was bent where it had been wedged between the safe and the wall. Hidden behind the blankets. Blocked by the safe.

Protected by the safe.

Faith stopped. Her lungs tightened mid-breath. Her jaw tensed as if it had been wired shut. Slowly, she sat up. There were drops of blood on the concrete in front of her. Her eyes followed the trail going to the kitchen door. To the bloody handprint.

Emma was locked in the shed. Evelyn's gun was missing. There was a blood trail to the house.

Faith stood, facing the unlatched kitchen door. There was no sound but her own labored breath.

Who had turned off the music?

Faith jogged back to her car. She took her Glock from under the driver's seat. She checked the magazine and clipped the holster to her side. Her phone was still on the front seat. Faith grabbed it before popping open the trunk. She had been a detective with the Atlanta homicide squad before becoming a special agent with the state. Her fingers dialed the unlisted emergency line from memory. She didn't give the dispatcher time to speak. She rattled off her old badge number, her unit, and her mother's street address.

Faith paused before saying, "Code thirty." The words nearly choked her. Code 30. She had never used the phrase in her life. It meant that an officer needed emergency assistance. It meant that a fellow cop was in serious danger, possibly dead. "My child is locked in the shed outside. There's blood on the concrete and a bloody handprint on the kitchen door. I think my mother is inside the house. I heard music, but it was turned off. She's retired Blue. I think she's—" Faith's throat tightened like a fist. "Help. Please. Send help."

"Acknowledge code thirty," the dispatcher answered, her tone sharp and tense. "Stay outside and wait for backup. Do not—repeat—do not go into the house."

"Acknowledged." Faith ended the call and tossed the phone into the back seat. She twisted her key into the lock that kept her shotgun bolted to the trunk of her car.

The GBI issued every agent at least two weapons. The Glock model 23 was a .40-caliber semiautomatic that held thirteen rounds in the magazine and one in the chamber. The Remington 870 held four rounds of double-ought buckshot in the tube. Faith's shotgun carried six extra rounds in the side-saddle attached in front of the stock. Each round contained eight pellets. Each pellet was about the size of a .38-caliber bullet.

Every pull of the trigger on the Glock shot one bullet. Every pull on the Remington shot eight.

Agency policy dictated that all agents keep a round chambered in their Glocks, giving them fourteen rounds total. There was no conventional external safety on the weapon. Agents were authorized by law to use deadly force if they felt their lives or the lives of others were in danger. You only pulled back on the trigger when you meant to shoot, and you only shot when you meant to kill.

The shotgun was a different story with the same ending. The safety was to the rear of the trigger guard, a cross-bolt slide that took lithe muscle to move. You didn't keep a round in the chamber. You wanted everybody around you to hear that round racking, setting up to blast. Faith had seen grown men drop to their knees at the sound.

She looked back at the house as she disengaged the safety. The curtain on the front window twitched. A shadow ran down the hallway.

Faith pumped the shotgun with one hand as she walked toward the carport. The action made a satisfying tha-thunk that echoed against the concrete. In a single fluid motion, the stock was against her shoulder, the barrel straight in front of her. She kicked open the door, holding the weapon steady as she yelled "Police!"

The word boomed through the house like a clash of thunder. It came from a deep, dark place in Faith's gut that she ignored most of the time for fear of switching something on that could never be shut off.

"Come out with your hands in the air!"

No one came out. She heard a noise from somewhere in the back of the house. Her vision sharpened as she entered the kitchen. Blood on the counter. A bread knife. More blood on the floor. Drawers and cabinets gaping open. The phone on the wall hung like a twisted noose. Evelyn's BlackBerry and cell phone were smashed to pieces on the floor. Faith kept the shotgun in front of her, finger resting just to the side of the trigger so that she didn't make any mistakes.

She should've been thinking about her mother, or Emma, but there was only one phrase that kept going through her mind: people and doorways. When you cleared a house, these were the biggest threats to your safety. You had to know where the people were—whether they were good guys or not—and you had to know what was coming at you from every door.

Faith pivoted to the side, pointing the shotgun into the laundry room. She saw a man lying face-down on the floor. Black hair. Skin a yellow wax. His arms wrapped around his body like a child playing a spinning game. No gun on or near him. The back of his head was a bloody pulp. Brain matter speckled the washing machine. She could see the hole the bullet dug into the wall when it exited his skull.

Faith pivoted back to the kitchen. There was a pass-through to the dining room. She crouched and swung around.

Empty.

The layout of the house came to her like a diagram in her head. Family room on her left. Large, open foyer on the right. Hall straight ahead. Bathroom at the end. Two bedrooms on the right. One bedroom on the left—her mother's room. Inside was a tiny bathroom, a door that led to the back patio. Evelyn's bedroom door was the only one in the hall that was closed.

Faith started to go toward the closed door, but stopped.

People and doorways.

Her mind saw the words engraved in stone: Do not proceed toward your downward threat until you are sure everything behind you is clear.

Faith crouched as she turned left, entering the family room. She scanned along the walls, checked the sliding glass door that led into the backyard. The glass was shattered. A breeze rustled the curtains. The room had been ransacked. Someone was looking for something. Drawers were broken. Cushions gutted. From her vantage point, Faith could see behind the couch, that the wingback chair was clear of extra feet. She kept her head swiveling back and forth between the room and the hall until she was sure she could move on.

The first door was to her old bedroom. Someone had searched here, too. The drawers in Faith's old bureau stuck out like tongues. The mattress was ripped open. Emma's crib had been busted to pieces. Her blanket was ripped in two. The mobile that had hung above her head every month of her life had been ground into the carpet like a pile of dirt. Faith swallowed the burning rage this ignited inside of her. She forced herself to keep moving.

Quickly, she cleared the closets, under the bed. She did the same in Zeke's room, which had been turned into her mother's office. Papers were scattered on the floor. The desk drawers had been thrown against the wall. She glanced into the bathroom. The shower curtain was pulled back. The linen closet gaped open. Towels and sheets spilled onto the floor.

Faith was standing to the left of her mother's bedroom door when she heard the first siren. It was distant, but clear. She should wait for it, wait for backup.

Faith kicked open the door and swung around in a crouch. Her finger went to the trigger. Two men were at the foot of the bed. One was on his knees. He was Hispanic, dressed only in a pair of jeans. The skin across his chest was shredded as if he'd been whipped with barbed wire. Sweat glistened on every part of his body. Black and red bruises punched along his ribs. He had tattoos all over his arms and torso, the largest of which was on his chest: a green and red Texas star with a rattlesnake wrapped around it. He was a member of Los Texicanos, a Mexican gang that had controlled the Atlanta drug trade for twenty years.

The second man was Asian. No tattoos. Bright red Hawaiian shirt and tan chinos. He stood with the Texicano in front of him, holding a gun to the man's head. A cherry-handled Smith and Wesson five-shot. Her mother's revolver.

Faith kept the shotgun trained on the Asian's chest. The cold, hard metal felt like an extension of her body. Adrenaline had pumped her heart into a frenzy. Every muscle inside of her wanted to pull the trigger.

Her words were clipped. "Where's my mother?"

He spoke in a twangy southern drawl. "You shoot me, you're gonna hit him."

He was right. Faith was standing in the hallway, less than six feet away. The men were too close together. Even a headshot carried the risk that a pellet would stray, hitting—possibly killing—the hostage. Still, she kept her finger on the trigger, the shotgun steady. "Tell me where she is."

He pressed the muzzle harder against the man's head. "Drop the gun."

The sirens were getting louder. They were coming from Zone 5, on the Peachtree side of the neighborhood. Faith said, "You hear that sound?" She mapped their path down Nottingham, calculating the cruisers would be here in less than a minute. "Tell me where my mother is or I swear to God I'll kill you before they hit the door."

He smiled again, his hand tightening around the gun. "You know what we're here for. Hand it over and we'll let her go."

Faith didn't know what the hell he was talking about. Her mother was a sixty-three-year-old widow. The most valuable thing in the house was the land they were standing on.

He took her silence for equivocation. "You really wanna lose your mommy over Chico here?"

Faith pretended to understand. "It's that simple? You'll trade?"

He shrugged. "Only way we'll both walk outta here."

"Bullshit."

"No bullshit. Even trade." The sirens got louder. Tires screeched in the street. "Come on, bitch. Tick-tock. Deal or no deal?"

He was lying. He'd already killed one person. He was threatening another. As soon as he figured out Faith was bluffing, the only thing he'd give her was a bullet in the chest.

"Deal," she agreed, using her left hand to toss the shotgun out in front of her.

The firearms instructor at the shooting range carried a stopwatch that counted every tenth of a second, which was why Faith knew that it took her right hand exactly eight-tenths of a second to draw her Glock from her side holster. While the Asian was distracted by her shotgun dropping at his feet, she did just this, pulling the Glock, snaking her finger around the trigger, and shooting the man in the head.

His arms flew up. The gun dropped. He was dead before he hit the floor.

The front door splintered open. Faith turned toward the foyer as an entry team in full raid gear flooded into the house. And then she turned back toward the bedroom and realized the Mexican was gone.

The patio door was open. Faith ran outside as the Mexican vaulted over the chain link fence. The S&W was in his hand. Mrs. Johnson's grandchildren were playing in her backyard. They screamed when they saw the armed man heading toward them. He was twenty feet away. Fifteen. He raised the gun toward the girls and fired a shot over their heads. Brick siding sprayed onto the ground. They were too scared to scream anymore, to move, to save themselves. Faith stopped at the fence, lined up her Glock, and squeezed the trigger.

The man jerked as if a string had been pulled through his chest. He stayed up for at least a full second, then his knees buckled and he fell backward onto the ground. Faith jumped over the fence and sprinted toward him. She slammed her heel into his wrist until he let go of her mother's gun. The girls started screaming again. Mrs. Johnson came out onto the porch and scooped them up like baby ducklings. She glanced back at Faith as she shut the door. The look in her eyes was shocked, horrified. She used to chase Zeke and Faith with the garden hose when they were little. She used to feel safe here.

Faith holstered her Glock and tucked Evelyn's revolver into the back of her pants. She grabbed the Mexican by the shoulders. "Where's my mother?" she demanded. "What did they do to her?"

He opened his mouth, blood oozing beneath the silver caps in his teeth. He was smiling. The asshole was smiling.

"Where is she?" Faith pressed her hand to his battered chest, feeling his broken ribs move beneath her fingers. He screamed in pain, and she pushed harder, grinding the bones together. "Where is she?"

"Agent!" A young cop steadied himself with one hand as he jumped over the fence. He drew down on her, his gun angled toward the ground. "Back away from the prisoner."

Faith got closer to the Mexican. She could feel the heat radiating from his skin. "Tell me where she is."

His throat worked. He wasn't feeling the pain anymore. His pupils were the size of dimes. His eyelids fluttered. The corner of his lip twitched.

"Tell me where she is." Her voice got more desperate with each word. "Oh, God, just—please—tell me where she is!"

His breath had a sticky sound, as if his lungs were taped together. His lips moved. He whispered something she couldn't make out.

"What?" Faith put her ear so close to his lips that she could feel spit coming out of his mouth. "Tell me," she whispered. "Please tell me."

"Almeja."

"What?" Faith repeated. "What did you say?" His mouth opened. Instead of words, blood pooled out. "What did you say?" she screamed. "Tell me what you said!"

"Agent!" the cop yelled again.

"No!" She pressed her palms into the Mexican's chest, trying to force his heart to pump again. Faith made a fist and slammed it down as hard as she could, beating the man, willing him to come back to life. "Tell me!" she yelled. "Just tell me!"

"Agent!" She felt hands around her waist. The cop practically lifted her into the air.

"Let me go!" Faith jammed her elbow back so hard that he dropped her like a stone. She scrambled across the grass, crawling to the witness. The hostage. The murderer. The only person left who could tell her what the hell had happened to her mother.

She put her hands to the Mexican's face, stared into his lifeless eyes. "Please tell me," she pleaded, even though she knew it was too late. "Please."

"Faith?" Detective Leo Donnelly, her old partner on the Atlanta force, stood on the other side of the fence. He was out of breath. His hands gripped the top of the chain link. The wind whipped open the jacket of his cheap brown suit. "Emma's fine. We got a locksmith on the way." His words came thick and slow, like molasses poured through a sieve. "Come on, kid. Emma needs her mom."

Faith looked behind him. Cops were everywhere. Dark blue uniforms blurred as they swept the house, checked the yard. Through the windows, she followed Tactical's progress from room to room, guns raised, voices calling "Clear" as they found nothing. Competing sirens filled the air. Police cruisers. Ambulances. A fire truck.

The call had gone out. Code 30. Officer needs emergency assistance.

Three men shot to death. Her baby locked in a shed. Her mother missing.

Faith sat back on her heels. She put her head in her shaking hands and willed herself not to cry.

CHAPTER TWO

So, he tells me he was changing the oil in his car, and it was hot in the garage, so he took off his pants ...”

“Uh-huh,” Sara Linton managed, trying to feign interest as she picked at her salad.

“And I say, ‘Lookit, bud, I’m a doctor. I’m not here to judge. You can be honest about ...’ ”

Sara watched Dale Dugan’s mouth move, his voice mercifully blending in with the lunchtime noise of the pizza parlor. Soft music playing. People laughing. Plates sliding around the kitchen. His story was not particularly riveting, or even new. Sara was a pediatric attending doctor in the emergency department at Atlanta’s Grady Hospital. She’d had her own practice for twelve years before that, all the while working part-time as the county coroner for a small but active college town. There was not an implement, tool, household product, or glass figurine she had not at some point or another seen lodged inside a human body.

Still, Dale continued, “Then the nurse comes in with the X-ray.”

“Uh-oh,” she said, trying to inject some curiosity into her tone.

Dale smiled at her. There was some cheese lodged between his central and lateral incisors. Sara tried not to judge. Dale Dugan was a nice man. He wasn’t handsome, but he was okay-looking, with the sort of features many women found attractive once they learned he’d graduated from medical school. Sara was not as easily swayed. And she was starving, because she’d been told by the friend who’d set her up on this ridiculous blind date that she should order a salad instead of a pizza because it looked better.

“So, I hold up the X-ray and what do I see ...”

Socket wrench, she thought, just before he finally reached the punch line.

“A socket wrench! Can you believe it?”

“No!” She forced a laugh that sounded like the sort of thing that came out of a windup toy.

“And he still kept saying he slipped.”

She tsked her tongue. “Quite a fall.”

“I know, right?” He smiled at her again before taking a healthy bite of pizza.

Sara chewed some lettuce. The digital clock over Dale’s head showed 2:12 and a handful of seconds. The red LED numbers were a painful reminder that she could be at home right now watching basketball and folding the mountain of laundry on her couch. Sara had made a game of not looking at the clock, seeing how long she could go before her self-control crumbled and she watched the blurring seconds tick by. Three minutes twenty-two seconds was her record. She took another bite of salad, vowing to beat it.

“So,” Dale said. “You went to Emory.”

She nodded. “You were at Duke?”

Predictably, he began what turned into a lengthy description of his academic achievements, including published journal articles and keynote speeches at various conferences. Again, Sara feigned attention, willing herself not to look at the clock, chewing lettuce as slowly as a cow in a pasture so that Dale would not feel compelled to ask her a question.

This was not Sara's first blind date, nor, unfortunately, was it her least tedious. The problem today had started within the first six minutes, which Sara had marked by the clock. They had rushed through the preliminaries before their order had been called. Dale was divorced, no children, on good terms with his ex-wife, and played pickup basketball games at the hospital in his free time. Sara was from a small town in south Georgia. She had two greyhounds, and a cat who chose to live with her parents. Her husband had been killed four and a half years ago.

Usually, this last bit was a conversation stopper, but Dale had breezed over it as a minor detail. At first, Sara had given him points for not asking for details, and then she had decided that he was too self-absorbed to ask, and then she had chided herself for being so hard on the man.

"What did your husband do?"

He'd caught her with a mouthful of lettuce. She chewed, swallowed, then told him, "He was a police officer. The chief of police for the county."

"That's unusual." Her expression must have been off, because he said, "I mean, unusual because he's not a doctor. Wasn't a doctor. Not white collar, I guess."

"White collar?" She heard the accusatory tone in her voice but couldn't stop herself. "My father's a plumber. My sister and I worked with him for—"

"Whoa, whoa." He held up his hands in surrender. "That came out wrong. I mean, there's something noble about working with your hands, right?"

Sara didn't know what kind of medicine Dr. Dale was practicing, but she tended to use her hands every day.

Oblivious, his voice took on a solemn tone. "I have a lot of respect for cops. And servicepeople. Soldiers, I mean." He nervously wiped his mouth with his napkin. "Dangerous job. Is that how he died?"

She nodded, glancing at the clock. Three minutes nineteen seconds. She'd just missed her record.

He took his phone out of his pocket and looked at the display. "Sorry. I'm on call. I wanted to make sure there's service."

At least he hadn't pretended the phone was on silent ring, though Sara was sure that was coming. "I'm sorry for being so defensive. It's difficult to talk about."

"I'm sorry for your loss." His tone had a practiced cadence Sara recognized from the ER. "I'm sure it was hard."

She bit at the tip of her tongue. Sara couldn't think of a polite way to respond, and by the time she thought to change the subject to the weather, so much time had passed that the conversation felt even more awkward. Finally, she said, "Well, anyway. Why don't we—"

"Excuse me," he interrupted. "I need to go to the bathroom."

He got up so quickly that his chair nearly fell over. Sara watched him scamper toward the back. Maybe it was her imagination, but she thought he hesitated in front of the fire exit.

"Idiot." She dropped her fork onto her salad plate.

She checked the clock again for the time. It was two-fifteen. She could wrap this up by two-thirty if Dale ever came back from the toilet. Sara had walked here from her apartment, so there wouldn't be that protracted, awful silence as Dale drove her home. The bill had been paid when they ordered the food at the cash register. It would take her fifteen minutes to walk home, giving her time to change out of her dress and into her sweat pants before the basketball game started. Sara felt her stomach rumble. Maybe she could pretend to leave, then backtrack and order a pizza.

Another minute ticked by on the clock. Sara scanned the parking lot. Dale's car was still there, assuming the green Lexus with the DRDALE license plate belonged to him. She didn't know if she felt disappointed or relieved.

The clock marked another thirty seconds. The hallway leading to the bathrooms stayed empty for another twenty-three seconds. An older woman with a walker inched her way down the hall. No one was behind her.

Sara dropped her head into her hand. Dale was not a bad man. He was stable, relatively healthy, gainfully employed, had most of his hair, and except for the cheese between his teeth, had the appearance of good hygiene. And yet, all of this wasn't enough. Sara was beginning to think she was the problem. She was turning into the Mr. Darcy of Atlanta. Once her good opinion was lost, it was gone forever. Changing the direction of a steamship was easier than changing Sara's mind.

She should try harder at this. She wasn't twenty-five anymore, and forty was breathing heavy down the back of her neck. At five feet eleven inches, her dating pool was already limited. Her auburn red hair and fair skin were not to every man's taste. She worked long hours. She couldn't cook to save her life. She had apparently lost her ability to conduct any small talk whatsoever, and the mere mention of her dead husband could send her into a hissy fit.

Maybe her standards were too high. Her marriage hadn't been perfect, but it was pretty damn good. She had loved her husband more than life itself. Losing him had almost killed her. But Jeffrey had been gone for almost five years now, and if Sara was being honest, she was lonely. She missed a man's company. She missed the way their minds worked and the surprisingly sweet things they could say. She missed the rough feel of their skin. She missed the other things, too. Unfortunately, the last time a man had made her eyes roll back in her head, she'd been fighting boredom, not writhing in ecstasy.

Sara had to face the fact that she was extremely, awfully, horribly bad at dating. There hadn't been much time to practice. From puberty on, Sara had been serially monogamous. Her first boyfriend was a high school crush that had lasted until college, then she'd dated a fellow student all through medical school, then she'd met Jeffrey and never given another man a second thought. Except for a disastrous one-night stand three years ago, there had been no one since. She could only think of one man who had even remotely given her a spark, but he was married. Worse, he was a married cop.

Even worse, he was standing at the cash register less than ten feet away from her.

Will Trent was wearing black running shorts and a long-sleeved black T-shirt that showed his broad shoulders to good advantage. His sandy blond hair was longer than it had been a few months ago, when Sara had last seen him. He'd been working a case that involved one of her old patients at the children's clinic back home. She'd stuck her nose so far into Will's business that he'd had no choice but to let her help with the investigation. They had shared what felt like a flirtation, and then when the case was over, he had gone back home to his wife.

Will was extremely observant. He must have noticed Sara sitting at the table when he walked in. Still, he kept his back to her as he stared at a flyer pinned to the bulletin board on the wall. She didn't need the clock to count off the seconds as she waited for him to acknowledge her.

He turned his attention to another flyer.

Sara pulled out the clip holding up her hair, letting the curls fall past her shoulders. She stood up and walked over to him.

There were a few things she knew about Will Trent. He was tall, at least six-three, with a runner's lean body and the most beautiful legs she had ever seen on a man. His mother had been killed when he was less than a year old. He'd grown up in a children's home and never been adopted. He was a special agent with the GBI. He was one of the smartest men she had ever met, and he was so dyslexic that, as far as she could tell, he read no higher than a second-grade level.

She stood shoulder to shoulder with him, staring at the flyer that had caught his attention. "That looks interesting."

He made a very bad show of acting surprised to see her. "Dr. Linton. I was just ..." He tore one of the info tags off the flyer. "I've been thinking about getting a bike."

She glanced at the ad, which had a detailed drawing of a Harley Davidson underneath a headline asking for members to join. "I don't think Dykes on Bikes is your kind of ride."

His smile was crooked. He'd spent a lifetime covering up his disability, and even though Sara had found out, he was still loath to acknowledge there was a problem. "It's a great way to meet women."

"Are you looking to meet women?"

Sara was reminded of yet another one of Will's traits, which was that he had an uncanny knack for keeping his mouth shut when he didn't know what to say. This resulted in the sort of awkward moments that made Sara's dating life look downright ebullient.

Thankfully, Will's order was up. Sara stood back as he took the box of pizza from the tattooed and multipierced waitress. The young woman gave Will what could only be called an appreciative glance. He seemed oblivious as he checked his pizza to make sure they'd gotten the order right.

"Well." He used his thumb to twist the wedding ring on his finger. "I guess I should go."

"All right."

He didn't move. Neither did Sara. A dog started barking outside, the high-pitched yips traveling through the open windows. Sara knew there was a post and water bowl by the front door for people who brought their pets to the restaurant. She also knew that Will's wife had a little dog named Betty, and that the care and feeding fell mostly to him.

The yipping intensified. Will still made no move to leave.

She said, "That sounds a lot like a Chihuahua."

He listened intently, then nodded. "I think you might be right."

"There you are." Dale was finally back from the restroom. "Listen, I got a call from the hospital ..." He looked up at Will. "Hi."

Sara made the introductions. "Dale Dugan, this is Will Trent."

Will gave a tight nod. Dale returned it.

The dog kept barking, a piercing, panicked yelp. Sara could tell from Will's expression that he was prepared to die rather than acknowledge ownership.

She found some mercy in her heart. "Dale, I know you need to get to the hospital. Thanks so much for lunch."

"Sure." He leaned in and kissed her squarely on the lips. "I'll call you."

"Great," she managed, resisting the urge to wipe her mouth. She watched the two men exchange another tight nod that made Sara feel like the only fire hydrant at the dog park.

Betty's yips intensified as Dale walked across the parking lot. Will mumbled something under his breath before pushing open the door. He untied the leash and scooped up the dog with one hand, keeping the pizza box steady in the other. The barking stopped immediately. Betty tucked her head into his chest. Her tongue lolled out.

Sara petted the dog's head. There were fresh sutures crisscrossing her narrow back. "What happened?"

Will's jaw was still clenched. "She got into it with a Jack Russell."

"Really?" Unless the Jack Russell had a pair of scissors for paws, there was no way another dog had made the marks.

He indicated Betty. "I should get her home."

Sara had never been to Will's house, but she knew the street that he lived on. "Aren't you going right?" She clarified, "This way?"

Will didn't answer. He seemed to be gauging whether or not he could lie to her and get away with it.

She pressed, "Don't you live off Linwood?"

"You're the opposite direction."

"I can cut through the park." She started walking, giving him no choice. They were silent as they headed down Ponce de Leon. The traffic noise was loud enough to fill the void, but even the exhaust from the cars couldn't overshadow the fact that they were in the middle of a brilliant spring day. Couples walked down the street hand in hand. Mothers pushed baby carriages. Runners darted across four lanes of traffic. The cloud cover from this morning had rolled eastward, exposing a sky of denim blue. There was a steady breeze in the air. Sara clasped her hands behind her back and looked down at the broken sidewalk. Tree roots pushed against the concrete like gnarled old toes.

She glanced at Will. The sun picked out the sweat on his brow. There were two scars on his face, though Sara had no idea what had caused them. His upper lip had been split open at some point, then badly stitched together, giving a raffish quality to his mouth. The other scar followed the line of his left jaw and dipped into his collar. When she'd first met him, she'd taken the scars for signs of boyhood mischief, but knowing his history, knowing that he had grown up in state care, Sara now assumed the damage had a darker story.

Will glanced at her and she looked away. He said, "Dale seems like a nice guy.”

“Yes, he does.”

“Doctor, I guess.”

“That’s right.”

“Looked like a good kisser.”

She smiled.

Will shifted Betty in his hand to get a better grip. “I guess you’re dating him.”

“Today was our first date.”

“You seemed friendlier than that.”

Sara stopped walking. “How’s your wife, Will?”

His answer didn’t come quickly. His gaze fell somewhere over her shoulder. “I haven’t seen her in four months.”

Sara felt an odd sense of betrayal. His wife was gone and Will had not called her. “You’re separated?”

He stepped aside so that a runner could pass. “No.”

“Is she missing?”

“Not exactly.”

A MARTA bus lurched up to the curb, its engine filling the air with a protracted grumble. Sara had met Angie Trent almost a year ago. Her Mediterranean looks and curvaceous figure were exactly the sort of things mothers were thinking of when they warned their sons about loose women.

The bus pulled away. Sara asked, “Where is she?”

Will let out a long breath. “She leaves me a lot. That’s what she does. She leaves, and then she comes back. And then she stays some and then she leaves again.”

“Where does she go?”

“I have no idea.”

“You’ve never asked her?”

“No.”

Sara didn’t pretend to understand. “Why not?”

He glanced out into the street, watching the traffic zoom by. “It’s complicated.”

She reached out and put her hand on his arm. “Explain it to me.”

He stared at her, looking ridiculous with the tiny dog in one hand and a pizza box in the other.

Sara narrowed the space between them, moving her hand to his shoulder. She could feel hard muscle beneath his shirt, the heat from his skin. In the bright light of the sun, his eyes looked impossibly blue. He had delicate eyelashes, blond and soft. There was a stubbly spot along his jaw that he’d missed shaving. She was a few inches shorter than him. She stood on her tiptoes to look him straight in the eye.

She said, “Talk to me.”

He was silent, his eyes tracing back and forth across her face, lingering on her mouth, before meeting her gaze again.

Finally, he said, “I like your hair down.”

Sara was robbed of a response by a black SUV slamming on its brakes in the middle of the street. It skidded to a halt about twenty yards away, then jerked into reverse. The wheels squealed against the asphalt. The smell of burned rubber filled the air. The SUV stopped directly in front of them. The window rolled down.

Will's boss, Amanda Wagner, yelled, "Get in!"

They were both too stunned to move. Car horns blared. Fists were waving. Sara felt like she was caught in the middle of an action movie.

"Now!" Amanda ordered.

"Can you—" Will began, but Sara was already taking Betty, the box of pizza. He fished into his sock and handed her a house key. "She needs to be locked in the spare room so she doesn't—"

"Will!" Amanda's tone didn't leave room for equivocation.

Sara took the key. The metal was warm from his body. "Go."

Will didn't have to be told twice. He jumped into the car, his foot skipping along the road as Amanda pulled away from the curb. More horns blared. A four-door sedan fishtailed. Sara could see a teenager in the back seat. The girl's hands pressed against the window. Her mouth gaped open in terror. Another car was coming from behind, speeding, but swerved at the last moment. Sara locked eyes with the young girl, then the sedan straightened and drove away.

Betty was shaking, and Sara wasn't much better off. She tried to soothe the dog as she walked toward Will's street, holding it close, pressing her lips to its head. Both of their hearts were pounding wildly. Sara wasn't sure what was making it worse—thinking about what might have happened between her and Will or the bad accident Amanda Wagner had nearly caused.

She'd have to watch the news when she got home to find out what was going on. Surely, wherever Will was going, the news vans would follow. Amanda was a deputy director with the GBI. She didn't ride around looking for her agents on a whim. Sara imagined Faith, Will's partner, was probably doing her own mad rush to the crime scene right now.

She had forgotten to ask for his house number, but thankfully, Betty's collar had a tag with the details. Even without that, she easily spotted Will's black Porsche parked in a driveway toward the end of the street. The car was an older model that had been fully restored. Will must have washed it today. The tires were gleaming and her reflection bounced off the long nose of the hood as she walked past.

She smiled at his house, which she'd never seen before. He lived in a red brick bungalow with an attached garage. The front door was painted black. The trim was a buttery yellow. The lawn was well tended with sharp edges and sculpted shrubs. A colorful flower bed circled the mimosa tree in the front yard. Sara wondered if Angie Trent had a green thumb. Pansies were hardy plants, but they had to be watered. From the sound of it, Mrs. Trent wasn't the type to stick around for that kind of thing. Sara wasn't sure how she felt about that, or even if she understood it. Still, she heard her mother's nagging voice in the back of her head: An absent wife is still a wife.

Betty started to squirm as Sara walked up the front path. She tightened her grip. That was all she needed to make the day worse—lose the dog that belonged to the wife of the man she'd just been longing to kiss in the middle of the street.

Sara shook her head as she climbed the front steps. She had no business thinking about Will this way. She should be glad Amanda Wagner had interrupted them. Early on in their marriage, Jeffrey had cheated on Sara. It had nearly ripped them in two, and putting their relationship back together had taken years of hard work. For better or worse, Will had made his choice. And this wasn't a fly-by-night romance, either. He had grown up with Angie. They had met in the children's home when they were kids. They had almost twenty-five years of history together. Sara didn't belong between them. She wasn't going to make another woman feel the same pain she had, no matter how dismal her other options.

The key easily slid into the front lock. A cool breeze met her as she walked through the doorway. She set Betty on the floor and took off her leash. Freed, the dog made a beeline for the back of the house.

Sara couldn't control her curiosity as she looked around the front rooms. Will's taste definitely ran toward the masculine. If his wife had contributed to the decorating, it certainly didn't show. A pinball machine was given pride of place in the center of the dining room, just under a glass chandelier. Will was obviously working on the machine—the electronic guts were neatly laid out by an open toolbox on the floor. The smell of machine oil filled the air.

The couch in the living room was a dark brown ultra-suede with a large matching ottoman. The walls were muted beige. A sleek black recliner was turned toward a fifty-inch plasma television with various electronic boxes stacked neatly underneath. Everything seemed to be in its proper place. There was no dust or clutter, no laundry piled into an Everest-like mountain on the couch. Obviously, Will was a better housekeeper than Sara. But then, most people were.

His desk was in the corner of the main room, just outside the hallway. Chrome and metal. She traced her finger along the arm of his reading glasses. Papers were neatly stacked around a laptop computer and printer. A pack of Magic Markers rested on a pile of colored folders. There were small metal bins with rubber bands and paper clips that were separated by color and size.

Sara had seen this setup before. Will could read, but not easily and certainly not quickly. He used the colored markers and clips as cues to help him find what he was looking for without having to actually scan what was on a page or in a folder. It was a neat trick that he'd probably taught himself early on. Sara had no doubt that he'd been one of those kids who sat in the back of the classroom and memorized everything the teacher said, only to be unable—or unwilling—to write down any of it come test day.

She took the pizza box into the kitchen, which had been remodeled in the same rich browns as the rest of the house. Unlike Sara's kitchen, the granite counters were neat and tidy, a coffeemaker and television the only items on display. Similarly, the fridge was empty but for a carton of milk and a pack of Jell-O pudding cups. Sara slid the box onto the top shelf and walked to the back of the house to check on Betty. She found the spare bedroom first. The overhead lights were off, but Will had left on the floor lamp behind another leather recliner. Beside the chair was a dog bed shaped like a chaise longue. A bowl of water and some kibble were in the corner. There was another television mounted on the wall, with a fold-up treadmill underneath.

The room was dark, the walls painted a rich brown that complemented the living room. She turned on the overhead light. Surprisingly, there were bookcases along the walls. Sara ran her finger down the titles, recognizing classics mixed in with a handful of feminist texts that were usually assigned to earnest young women their first year in college. All of the spines were cracked, well read. It had never occurred to her that Will would have a library in his house. With his dyslexia, reading a thick novel would have been a Sisyphean task. The audiobooks made more sense. Sara knelt down and looked at the CD cases stacked beside an expensive-looking Bose player. Will's tastes were certainly more highbrow than hers—lots of nonfiction and historical works that Sara would normally suggest for insomniacs. She pressed down a peeling sticker and read the words "Property of the Fulton County Library System."

The tip-tap of toenails announced Betty in the hallway. Sara blushed, feeling caught. She stood to fetch the dog, but Betty ran off with surprising speed. Sara followed her past the bathroom and into the second room. Will's bedroom.

The bed was made, a dark blue blanket covering matching sheets. There was just one pillow leaning against the wall where the headboard should have been. One bedside table. One lamp.

Unlike the rest of the house, there was a utilitarian feel to the room. Sara didn't want to dwell on why the lack of romantic setting gave her relief. The walls were white. No art hung on the walls. Will's watch and wallet were on top of the chest of drawers beside yet another television. A pair of jeans and a T-shirt were laid out on the bench at the foot of the bed. There was a pair of folded black socks. His boots were under the bench. Sara picked up the shirt. Cotton. Long-sleeved. Black, like the one Will had been wearing.

The dog jumped on the bed, pushed down the pillow and settled like a bird in a nest.

Sara folded the shirt and put it back by the jeans. This was bordering on stalker behavior. At least she hadn't smelled the shirt or rummaged through his drawers. She scooped up Betty, thinking she should shut the dog in the spare room and get out of here. She was doing just that when the phone started to ring. The answering machine picked up. She heard Will's voice back in the bedroom.

"Sara? If you're there, please pick up."

She went back to his room and picked up the phone. "I was just about to leave."

His voice sounded tense. She could hear a baby crying in the background, people shouting. "I need you to come here right now. To Faith's. Her mother's house. It's important."

Sara felt a rush of adrenaline sharpen her senses. "Is she all right?"

"No," he answered bluntly. "May I give you the address?"

Without thinking, she opened the bedside drawer, assuming she'd find a piece of paper and pen. Instead, she saw a magazine like her father used to keep in the back of his toolbox in the garage.

"Sara?"

The drawer wouldn't close. "Let me get something to write on. Hold on."

Will seemed to be the only person in America who didn't have a cordless phone. Sara left the receiver on the bed, found some pen and paper on his desk, and came back. "All right."

Will waited for someone to stop shouting. He kept his voice low as he gave

Sara the address. "It's in Sherwood Forest, on the back side of Ansley. Do you know it?"

Ansley was only five minutes away. "I can figure it out."

"Take my car. The keys are on a hook by the back door in the kitchen. Can you drive a stick?"

"Yes."

"The news people are already here. Find the first cop you see, tell them you're there at my request, and they'll let you back. Don't talk to anyone else. Okay?"

"Okay." She hung up the phone and pushed the bedside drawer shut with both hands. Betty was back on the pillow. Sara picked her up again. She started to leave, then thought better of it. Will was in shorts the last time she'd seen him. He'd probably want his jeans. She put his watch and wallet in the back pocket. There was no telling where he kept his gun, but Sara wasn't going to go looking through his things any more than she already had.

"Can I help you?"

Sara felt a rush of horror burn through her body. Angie Trent was leaning against the bedroom door, palm resting casually against the jamb. Her dark, curly hair cascaded around her shoulders. Her makeup was perfect. Her nails were perfect. Her tight skirt and revealing top would've easily won her the cover shot on the magazine in Will's drawer.

"I-I—" Sara hadn't stuttered since she was twelve.

"We've met before, right? You work at the hospital."

"Yes." Sara stood away from the bed. "Will got called out on an emergency. He asked me to bring your dog—"

"My dog?"

Sara felt the vibrations of a growl building in Betty's chest.

Angie's mouth twisted in distaste. "What happened to it?"

"She was ..." Sara felt like a fool just standing there. She tucked Will's jeans under her arm. "I'll put her in the spare room and go."

"Sure." Angie was blocking the door. She took her time letting Sara pass, then followed Sara to the spare room, watched her put Betty on the dog bed and pull the door to.

Sara started to leave out the front door, but then she remembered she needed Will's keys. She fought to keep her voice from shaking. "He told me to bring his car."

Angie crossed her arms. Her ring finger was bare, but she had a silver band around her thumb. "Of course he did."

Sara went back into the kitchen. Her face was so red she was sweating. There was a duffel bag by the table that hadn't been there before. Will's car keys were hanging on a hook by the back door, just as he'd said. She grabbed them and went back into the den, aware that Angie stood in the hallway watching her every move. Sara walked as quickly as she could toward the front door, her heart in her throat, but Angie Trent wasn't going to make it that easy for her.

"How long have you been fucking him?"

Sara shook her head. This couldn't be happening.

"I asked you how long you've been fucking my husband."

Sara stared at the back of the door, too ashamed to look at her. "This is a misunderstanding. I promise you."

"I found you in my house in my bedroom that I share with my husband. What's your explanation? I'm dying to hear it."

"I told you I—"

"You got a thing for cops? Is that it?"

Sara felt her heart stop mid-beat.

"Your dead husband was a cop, right? You get some kind of thrill out of that?" Angie gave a derisive laugh. "He'll never leave me, honey. You'd better find yourself another dick to play with."

Sara couldn't answer. The situation was too awful for words. She fumbled for the doorknob.

"He cut himself for me. Did he tell you that?"

She willed her hand to steady so she could open the door. "I have to go now. I'm sorry."

"I watched him slice the razor blade into his arm."

Sara's hand wouldn't move. Her mind tried in vain to process what she was hearing.

"I've never seen so much blood in my life." Angie paused. "You could at least look at me when I'm talking to you."

She didn't want to, but Sara made herself turn around.

Angie's tone was passive, but the hatred in her eyes made her hard to look at. "I held him the whole time. Did he tell you about it? Did he tell you how I held him?"

Sara still could not find her voice.

Angie held up her left arm, showing the bare flesh. With excruciating slowness, she traced her right index finger from her wrist down to her elbow. "They said the razor cut so deep that he scraped the bone." She smiled, as if this was a happy memory. "He did that for me, bitch. You think he'd do that for you?"

Now that Sara was looking at her, she couldn't stop. Moments slipped by. She thought of the clock back at the restaurant, the seconds blurring. Finally, she cleared her throat, not sure she could speak. "It's the other arm."

"What?"

"The scar," she said, relishing the surprised look on Angie Trent's face. "It's on his other arm."

Sara's hands were sweating so badly she could barely turn the doorknob. She cringed as she rushed outside, thinking Angie would come running after her or worse, call her out on the lie.

The truth was that Sara had never seen a scar on Will's arm, because she'd never seen his bare arm. He always wore long-sleeved shirts. He never rolled up the sleeves or unbuttoned the cuffs. She had made an educated guess. Will was left-handed. If he'd tried to kill himself while his hateful wife was cheering him on, he'd sliced open his right arm, not his left.

CHAPTER THREE

Will picked at the collar of his shirt. The mobile command vehicle was scorching hot, filled with so many uniforms and suits that there was hardly room to breathe. The noise was equally unbearable. Phones were ringing. BlackBerries chirped. Computer monitors played live feeds from all three of the local news stations. Adding to the cacophony was Amanda Wagner, who had been yelling at the three zone commanders on scene for the last fifteen minutes. The Atlanta chief of police was on his way. So was the director of the GBI. The jurisdictional pissing contest was only going to intensify.

Meanwhile, no one was really working the case.

Will pushed open the door. Sunlight sliced through the dark interior. Amanda stopped yelling for a few seconds, then revved back up as Will closed the door. He took a deep breath of fresh air, scanning the scene from the top of the metal steps. Instead of the usual rapid activity that followed a shocking crime, everyone was milling around waiting for orders. Detectives sat in their unmarked cars checking their email. Six cruisers blocked each end of the street. Neighbors gawked from their front porches. The Atlanta PD crime scene unit van was here. The GBI crime scene unit van was here. The fire truck was still angled in front of the Mitchell house. The EMTs were smoking on the back bumper of their ambulance. Various uniformed officers leaned against emergency vehicles, shooting the breeze, pretending not to care about what was going on in the command center.

Still, they all managed to glare at Will as he stepped down onto the street. Scowls went around. Arms were crossed. A curse was muttered. Someone spat on the sidewalk.

Will didn't have many friends in the Atlanta Police Department.

The sound of chopping blades filled the air. Will looked up. Two news copters hovered just above the crime scene. They wouldn't be alone for long. Every ten minutes, a black SWAT MD 500 swept by. An infrared camera was mounted on the nose of the mosquito-like helicopter. The camera could see through dense forests and rooftops, picking out warm-blooded bodies, directing searchers to the bad guys. It was an amazing device, but completely useless in the residential area, where at any given moment there were thousands of people milling around not committing crimes. At best, they were probably picking up the glowing red forms of people sitting on their couches watching their televisions, which in turn showed the SWAT copter hovering overhead.

Will checked the crowd for Sara, wishing she would show up. If he'd been thinking at all when Amanda pulled up on the street, he would've told Sara to come with them. He should have anticipated Faith would need help. She was his partner. Will was supposed to take care of her, to have her back. Now, it might be too late.

He wasn't sure how Amanda had heard about the shootings so quickly, but they were on scene within fifteen minutes of the last shot being fired. The locksmith was just opening the shed door when they rolled up. Faith had been pacing back and forth like a caged animal while she waited for her child to be freed, and she kept pacing long after Emma was in her arms. As soon as she saw Will, Faith started babbling, talking about her backyard neighbor, Mrs. Johnson, her brother Zeke, the shed her father had built when she was little, and a million other things that made absolutely no sense the way she was stringing them together.

At first, Will thought that Faith was in shock, but shocked people don't pace around squawking like lunatics. Their blood pressure drops so quickly they generally can't stand. They pant like dogs. They stare blankly at the space in front of them. They talk slowly, not so fast you can barely understand them. Something else was at play, but Will didn't know if it was some kind of mental break or Faith's diabetes or what.

Making it worse, by that point, there were twenty cops standing around who knew exactly what a person was supposed to look like when an awful thing happened. Faith didn't fit the profile. She wasn't crying. She wasn't shaking. She wasn't angry. She was just crazy, totally out of her mind. Nothing she said had a bit of reason. She couldn't tell them what had happened. She couldn't walk them through the scene and explain the bloodshed. She was worse than useless, because the answers to all their questions were locked up inside of her head.

And that was when one of the cops had mumbled something about her being under the influence. And then someone else volunteered to get the Breathalyzer out of his car.

Quickly, Amanda had intervened. She dragged Faith across the front lawn, banged on the neighbor's door—not Mrs. Johnson, who had a dead man in her backyard, but an old woman named Mrs. Levy—and practically ordered her to give Faith a place to collect herself.

By then, the mobile command center had pulled up. Amanda had gone straight into the back of the vehicle and started demanding this case be turned over to the GBI immediately. She knew that she wouldn't win the territorial fight with the zone commanders. By law, the GBI could not simply waltz in and take over a case. The local medical examiner, district attorney, or police chief generally asked the state for assistance, and usually that only happened when they'd failed to make a case on their own or didn't want to spend the money or manpower tracking down leads. The only person who could yank this case from Atlanta was the governor, and any politician in the state could tell you that crossing the capital city was a very bad idea. Amanda's screaming tactics were for show. She didn't yell when she was angry. Her voice got low, more like a rumble, and you had to strain your ears to hear the insults flying out of her mouth. She was trying to buy them time. Trying to buy Faith time.

In the eyes of the Atlanta PD brass, Faith wasn't a cop anymore. She was a witness. She was a suspect. She was a person of interest, and they wanted to talk to her about the men she had killed and why her mother had been kidnapped. The Atlanta police weren't a bunch of yokels. They were one of the best forces in the country. But for Amanda yelling at them, they would've had Faith at the station by now, drilling her like they were working a terrorist at Gitmo.

Will couldn't blame them. Sherwood Forest was not the kind of neighborhood where you'd expect to find a shootout in the middle of a beautiful Saturday afternoon. Ansley Park was a stone's throw away. Cast the net a bit farther and you'd encompass about eighty percent of the city's real estate tax revenue—multimillion-dollar homes with tennis courts and au pair suites. Rich people weren't the type of folks who let bad things happen without assigning blame. Someone would have to pay for this. If Amanda couldn't find a way to prevent it, that person would probably end up being Faith. And Will was at a loss as to what to do.

Detective Leo Donnelly walked up, his feet shuffling along the asphalt. He had a cigarette dangling out of his mouth. Smoke twined into his eye. He winked to keep it out. "I'd hate to hear that bitch in bed."

He meant Amanda. She was still screaming, though her words were hard to make out through the closed doors.

Leo continued, "I dunno. Might be worth it. The old ones are tigers when you get 'em in the sack."

Will suppressed a shudder, not because Amanda was in her mid-sixties, but because Leo was clearly considering the possibilities.

"She knows she's not going to win this, right?"

Will leaned against one of the police cruisers. Leo had been Faith's partner for six years, but she had done most of the heavy lifting. At forty-eight, Leo wasn't an old man by any stretch, but he had aged in cop years. His skin was yellow from an overburdened liver. He'd beaten prostate cancer but the treatment had taken its toll. He was an okay guy but he was lazy, which was perfectly fine if you were a used-car salesman but incredibly dangerous if you were a cop. Faith counted herself lucky that she'd gotten away from the man.

Leo said, "Haven't seen a clusterfuck like this since the last time I worked a case with you."

Will took in the scene: the hum of the command center's generator mixing with the metallic whir coming from the television vans. The cops standing around with their hands resting on their belts. The firemen shooting the breeze with each other. The complete and total lack of activity. He decided he should talk to Leo. "That so?"

"What's your CSU guy's name—Charlie?" Leo nodded to himself. "He managed to talk his way into the house."

Special Agent Charlie Reed was head of the GBI's crime scene unit and would do anything to get onto a crime scene. "He's good at his job."

"Lots of us are." Leo leaned against the cruiser a couple of feet down from Will. He made a puffing noise with his mouth. "Never known Faith to be a drinker."

"She's not."

"Pills?"

Will gave him the nastiest look he could muster.

"You know I gotta talk to her."

Will couldn't keep the derision out of his tone. "You're in charge of this case?"

"Try not to sound so confident."

Will didn't waste his breath. Leo's time in the sun would be shortlived. As soon as the Atlanta chief of police came onto the scene, he'd kick Leo to the curb and put together his own team. Leo would be lucky if they let him fetch coffee.

"Seriously," Leo said. "Faith doin' all right?"

"She's fine."

He took a last drag on his cigarette and dropped it to the ground. "Neighbor's freaked out. Almost watched her granddaughters get shot down."

Will tried to keep his expression blank. He knew a little bit about what had happened here, but not much. The guys from the tactical team had gotten bored after standing around for five minutes with nothing to break. The details of the crime scene had leaked like a rusty pipe. Two bodies in the house. One in the neighbor's backyard. Two guns on Faith—her Glock and a Smith and Wesson. Her shotgun on the floor of the bedroom. Will had stopped listening when he'd overheard a cop who'd just arrived on scene saying that he'd seen Faith with his own two eyes and she was as high as a kite.

For his part, Will only knew two things to be true: he had no idea what had happened in that house, and Faith had done the right thing.

Leo cleared his throat and spit a chunk of phlegm onto the asphalt. "So, Granny Johnson said she heard some screaming in the backyard. She looks out the kitchen window and sees the shooter—Mexican guy—aiming down on her grandkids. He squeezes off a shot, takes out some bricks on the house. Faith runs up to the fence and shoots him dead. Saves the little girls."

Will felt some of the weight lift off his chest. "Lucky for them Faith was there."

"Lucky for Faith the neighbor's a good witness."

Will started to stick his hands in his pockets, too late remembering he was still in his running shorts.

Leo chuckled. "I like these new uniforms. You supposed to be the cop in the Village People?"

Will crossed his arms over his chest.

"Los Mexicanos," Leo said. "The guy in the backyard. He's affiliated, got tats all over his chest and arms."

"What about the other two?"

"Asian. Both of 'em. No idea if they're ganged up. Don't look like it. Don't dress like it. Bodies are clean—no tats." Leo took his time lighting another cigarette. He blew out a steady stream of smoke before continuing. "Scott Shepherd over there—" He nodded toward a beefy-looking young man in tactical gear. "Says he had his team suited up outside the house waiting for backup. They heard a gun go off. It's a possible hostage situation, right? One officer inside, two if you count Evelyn. Imminent danger. So, they breach the door." Leo took another hit off his cigarette. "Scott sees Faith standing there in the hall, feet spread, Glock out in front of her. She sees Scott, doesn't say a word, just takes off into the bedroom. They go in after her and find a dead guy laid out on the carpet." Leo touched his finger to his forehead. "She nailed him right between the eyes."

"Must've had a good reason."

"Wish I knew that reason. He didn't have a gun in his hand."

"The other guy did. The one who ran into the backyard and shot at the kids."

"You're right. He did."

"Fingerprints?"

"We're working on it."

Will would've bet his house that they would find two sets of prints—one from the Asian and one from the Mexican. "Where'd you find the third guy?"

"Laundry room. Bullet to the head. Nasty shot, took off half his skull. We dug a thirty-eight out of the wall."

Faith's Glock was a .40-caliber. "Does the S&W take a thirty-eight?"

"Yep." Leo pushed away from the car. "Nothing on the mother yet. We got teams out looking for her. She ran the drug squad, but I think you already know that, Ratatouille."

Will forced his jaw not to clench. About the only thing Leo was really good at was pushing buttons. This was the reason for the nasty stares and hostile stances from Will's brothers in blue. Every cop out here knew that Will Trent was the reason Evelyn Mitchell had been forced into retirement. One of the most loathsome jobs he had at the GBI was investigating corrupt cops. Four years ago, he'd made a solid case against Evelyn's narcotics squad. Six detectives had gone to prison for skimming money off drug busts and taking cash to look the other way, but Captain Mitchell had walked away scot-free, her pension and most of her good reputation intact.

Leo said, "Tell the kid I can give her ten more minutes, tops, but then she's gotta get her shit together and start talking to me." He leaned in closer. "I heard the dispatch call. She was told to stay outta the house. She needs to be real clear on why she went in anyway."

Leo started to leave, but Will asked him, "How did she sound?"

He turned around.

"The phone call to dispatch. How did she sound?"

Unsurprisingly, Leo hadn't considered the question. He did now, and quickly started nodding his head. "Maybe a little scared, but clearheaded. Calm. In control."

Will nodded, too. "That sounds exactly like Faith."

Leo flashed a grin, but Will couldn't tell if he was relieved or just playing his usual role of smartass. "I meant that about the shorts, man." Leo slapped him on the arm. "You should try to get those pretty legs of yours on TV."

Leo waved to the reporters standing at the yellow tape line. They pressed forward as one, thinking he was going to give them a statement. There was a collective groan as he walked away. The cops holding the line pushed them back just because they could. Will knew they couldn't care less about crowd control. Their eyes kept going to the command center like they expected an announcement from on high. The cops were just as eager as the reporters to find out what had happened. Maybe more so.

Captain Evelyn Mitchell had served with the Atlanta force for thirty-nine years. She had come up the hard way, clawing her way out of the secretarial pool, advancing to meter reader, then traffic cop, and finally being given a twenty-two and a badge that wasn't made of plastic. She was part of a group known for being first: first women driving solo, first women detectives. Evelyn was the first female lieutenant on the Atlanta force, then the first female captain. No matter the reasons for her retirement, she had more medals and commendations than all of the cops on scene combined.

Will had learned a long time ago that police officers were blindly loyal. He'd also learned that there was a distinct pecking order to that loyalty. It was like a pyramid, with every cop in the world at the bottom and your partner at the top.

Faith had been with the Atlanta Police Department since she joined up, but she'd moved to the GBI two years ago, partnering with Will, who wasn't exactly the most popular guy in class. Leo might still be halfway on Faith's side, but as far as the general members of the APD were concerned, she had lost her spot on their pyramid. Especially since the first cop on scene, an eager young rookie, had been rushed into emergency surgery after Faith elbowed his testicles up into his brain stem.

Will saw a flash of yellow as the tape line was lifted. Sara had put up her hair, pinning it tightly behind her head. The linen dress she was wearing looked worse for wear. She had a folded pair of jeans under her arm. At first Will thought she looked confused, but the closer she got, the more he thought she looked annoyed, maybe even angry. Her eyes were red rimmed. Her cheeks were flushed.

She handed him the jeans. "Why do you need me here?"

He put his hand at her elbow and led her away from the reporters. "It's Faith."

She crossed her arms, keeping some distance between them. "If she needs medical attention, you should take her to the hospital."

"We can't do that." Will tried not to focus on the coldness in her voice. "She's at the neighbor's house. We don't have much time."

"I heard what happened on the radio."

"We think there's a drug connection. Keep that to yourself." Will stopped walking. He waited for her to look at him. "Faith's not acting right. She's confused, not making sense. They want to talk to her, but—" He didn't know what to say. Amanda had told Will to make the call to Sara. She knew the woman had been married to a cop, and assumed that her allegiance hadn't died with the man. "This could be really bad for Faith. She killed two men. Her mother's been kidnapped. They're going to be eyeballing her for a lot of reasons."

"Did she overreact?"

"There was a hostage situation. The kids next door were in the line of fire." Will skated over the missing details. "She shot one guy in the head and one in the back."

"Are the children okay?"

"Yes, but—"

The back doors of the command center banged opened. Chief Mike Geary, the zone commander for Ansley and Sherwood Forest, jumped down from the steps. He was in full uniform, a scratchy, dark blue polyester that was too tight across the pouch of his stomach. He blinked up at the sun, a deep line creasing his well-tanned forehead. Like most of the old guard, he kept his gray hair clipped in a militarystyle crew cut. Geary put on his hat and turned back around to hold out his hand to Amanda. Something stopped him just shy of touching her, though, and he dropped his hand before she could take it.

"Trent," he barked. "I want to talk to your partner right now. Go get her. We're taking her to the station."

Will shot Amanda a look as she navigated the rickety stairs in her high heels. She shook her head once. There was nothing more she could do.

To his surprise, it was Sara who saved them. "I have to examine her first."

Geary wasn't pleased to be met with resistance. "Who the hell are you?"

"I'm a trauma doc from the Grady ER." Sara deftly left out her name. "I'm here to evaluate Agent Mitchell so that any testimony she gives will be admissible." She tilted her head to the side. "I'm sure it's not your policy to take statements under duress."

Geary snorted. "She's not under duress."

Sara raised an eyebrow. "Is that your official position? Because I would hate to have to testify that you conducted a coercive interrogation against medical advice."

Confusion clouded in on Geary's anger. Doctors were usually more than willing to help the police, but they had the power to shut down any interview if they thought it would jeopardize their patient. Still, Geary tried. "What kind of medical treatment does she need?"

Sara didn't back down. "I can't tell you that until I evaluate her. She could be in shock. She could be injured. She could need hospitalization. Maybe I should just transfer her to the hospital right now and start running tests." Sara turned around to call to the EMTs.

"Wait." Geary hissed out a curse, telling Amanda, "Your bullshit stalling tactics are being noted, Deputy Director."

Her smile was fake sweetness and light. "It's always nice to be recognized for something."

Geary announced, "I want her blood drawn and taken to an independent lab for a full tox screen. You think you can do that, Doctor?"

Sara nodded. "Of course."

Will put his hand back under Sara's arm and led her toward the neighbor's house. As soon as they were out of earshot, he said, "Thank you."

Again, she pulled away from him as they walked up the driveway. By the time they reached the front porch, she was several feet ahead, though the distance between them felt more like a chasm. This wasn't the Sara from half an hour ago. Maybe it was the crime scene, though Will had seen her on a crime scene before. Sara had been a coroner at one time. She was far from out of her element. Will didn't know what to do about the change. He had spent a lifetime gauging the moods of other people, but getting a read on this particular woman was beyond his abilities.

The door opened and Mrs. Levy peered at them from behind her thick glasses. She was wearing a yellow housedress that was frayed at the collar. A white apron with baby geese waddling around the hem was wrapped around her thin waist. Her heels hung out of the back of her matching yellow bedroom slippers. She was somewhere north of eighty, but her mind was sharp and she clearly cared for Faith. "Is this the doctor? I was told to only let a doctor in."

Sara answered, "Yes, ma'am. I'm the doctor."

"Well, aren't you pretty? Come on in. What a crazy day this has been." Mrs. Levy stepped aside, throwing wide the door so they could come into the foyer. Her breath whistled through her false teeth. "I've had more visitors this afternoon than I've had all year."

The living room was sunken a few steps and furnished much as it probably had been when Mrs. Levy first bought the house. Harvest gold wall-to-wall shag carpet was flattened to the floor. The couch was a tightly cushioned, mustard-colored sectional. The only update to the décor was a recliner that looked like the kind that had a mechanical lift to make it easier to get in and out of. The only light in the room came from the flickering console television set. Faith was slumped on the couch with Emma held to her shoulder. All of the talk had drained out of her. Her spirit seemed to have gone with it. This was more what Will had been expecting when he'd heard that Faith was involved in a shooting. She tended to go quiet when she was really upset. But this wasn't quite right, either.

She was too quiet.

"Faith?" he said. "Dr. Linton is here."

She stared at the muted television, not answering. In some ways, Faith looked worse than she had before. Her lips were as white as her skin. Sweat gave her face a luminescence. Her blonde hair was matted to her head. Her breathing was shallow. Emma made a cooing sound, but Faith didn't seem to notice.

Sara turned on the overhead light before kneeling in front of her. "Faith? Can you look at me?"

Faith's eyes were still on the set. Will took the moment to slip on his jeans over his shorts. He felt a lump in his back pocket and pulled out his watch and wallet.

"Faith?" Sara's voice became louder, firmer. "Look at me."

Slowly, she looked at Sara.

"Why don't you give me Emma?"

Her words slurred. "Sh'sleeping."

Sara wrapped her hands around Emma's waist. Gently, she lifted the baby from Faith's shoulder. "Look at her. She's gotten so big." Sara did a cursory exam, looking into Emma's eyes, checking her fingers and toes, then her gums. "I think she's a little dehydrated."

Mrs. Levy offered, "I've got a bottle ready, but she wouldn't let me give it to her."

"Why don't you go get it now?" Sara motioned for Will to come over. He took Emma. She was surprisingly heavy. He put her on his shoulder. Her head fell against his neck like a moist sack of flour.

"Faith?" Sara spoke succinctly, as if she was trying to get an old person's attention. "How are you feeling?"

"Took her to the doctor."

"You took Emma?" Sara cupped Faith's face in her hand. "What did the doctor say?"

"Dunno."

"Can you look at me?"

Faith's mouth moved like she was chewing gum.

"What's today, sweetie? Can you tell me what day of the week it is?"

She pulled away her head. "No."

"That's all right." Sara pressed open Faith's eyelid. "When's the last time you had something to eat?"

She didn't answer. Mrs. Levy came back with the bottle. She handed it to Will, and he cradled Emma in his arm so that she could drink.

"Faith? When is the last time you had something to eat?"

Faith tried to push Sara away. When that didn't work, she pushed harder.

Sara kept talking, holding down Faith's hands. "Was it this morning? Did you eat breakfast this morning?”

“Go ’way.”

Sara turned to Mrs. Levy. “You’re not diabetic, are you?”

“No, dear, but my husband was. Passed away almost twenty years ago, bless his soul.”

Sara told Will, “She’s having an insulin reaction. Where’s her purse?”

Mrs. Levy supplied, “She didn’t have it when they brought her here. Maybe she left it in the car.”

Again, Sara directed her words to Will. “She should have an emergency kit in her purse. It’s plastic. It says ‘Glucagon’ on the side.” She seemed to remember herself. “It’s oblong, about the size of a pen case. Bright red or orange. Get it for me now, please.”

Will took the baby with him, jogging toward the front door and out into the yard. The lots in Sherwood Forest were larger than most, but some of them were long and narrow rather than wide. Will could see directly into Evelyn Mitchell’s bathroom from Mrs. Levy’s carport. He could see a man standing in the long hallway. Will wondered not for the first time how the old woman hadn’t heard the gun-fight next door. She wouldn’t be the first witness who didn’t want to get involved, but Will was surprised by her reticence.

It didn’t occur to him until he was a few feet from the Mini that Faith’s car was part of the crime scene. There were two cops standing on the other side of the car, four more in the carport. Will scanned the interior. He saw the plastic case Sara had told him about mixed in with various lady items on the passenger’s seat.

He told the cops, “I need to get something out of the car.”

“Tough shit,” one of them shot back.

Will indicated Emma, who was sucking on the bottle like she’d been on a ten-mile hike. “She needs her teething thing. She’s teething.”

The cops stared at him. Will wondered if he’d screwed up. He’d changed his share of diapers at the children’s home, but he had no idea when babies got their teeth. Emma was four months old. All her food came from Faith or a bottle. As far as he could tell, she didn’t need to chew anything.

“Come on.” Will held up Emma so they could see her little pink face. “She’s just a tiny baby.”

“All right,” one of them relented. He walked around the car and opened the door. “Where is it?”

“It’s that red plastic thing. Looks like a pen case.”

The cop didn’t appear to find this odd. He picked up the kit and handed it to Will. “She all right?”

“She was just thirsty.”

“I meant Faith, dipshit.”

Will tried to take the kit, but the man wouldn’t let go.

He repeated his question. “Is Faith going to be okay?”

Will realized there was more going on here. “Yes. She’s going to be fine.”

“Tell her Brad says we’re gonna find her mom.” He let go of the kit and slammed the door.

Will didn’t give the man time to change his mind. He jogged back to the house, trying not to jostle the baby. Mrs. Levy still stood sentry at the door. She opened it before Will could knock.

The scene inside had changed. Faith was lying on the couch. Sara was cupping the back of her head, making her drink from a can of Coke.

Sara immediately started in on Will. "You should've called in the medics first thing," she admonished. "Her blood sugar is too low. She's stuporous and diaphoretic. Her heart is racing. This isn't something you play around with." She took the kit from him and popped it open. Inside was a syringe filled with a clear liquid and a vial of white powder that looked a lot like cocaine. Sara cleaned the needle with a cotton ball and some rubbing alcohol that she had obviously gotten from Mrs. Levy. She talked as she pressed the syringe into the vial and squirted in the liquid. "I'm assuming she hasn't eaten since breakfast. The adrenaline from the confrontation in the house would've giving her an enormous sugar kick, but it made the crash harder, too. Considering what happened, I'm surprised she didn't slip into a coma."

Will took her words as hard as they were meant to be. No matter what Amanda said, he should've pulled an EMT in here half an hour ago. He had been worried about Faith's career when he should've been worried about her life. "Is she going to be okay?"

Sara shook the vial, mixing the contents before drawing them back into the syringe. "We'll know soon enough." She lifted Faith's shirt and swabbed a patch of skin on her belly. Will watched the needle go in, the rubber stopper sliding down the plastic cylinder as the liquid was injected.

Sara asked, "Are you worried they'll think she was impaired when she shot those two men?"

He didn't answer.

"Her comedown was probably hard and immediate. She would've been slurring her words. She probably appeared intoxicated." Sara cleaned up the kit, putting everything back in its place. "Tell them to look at the facts. She shot one man in the head and one in the back, probably from a distance, with two innocent bystanders downrange. If she'd been impaired, there's no way she would've been able to make those shots."

Will glanced at Mrs. Levy, who probably didn't need to be hearing this conversation. She waved off his concerns. "Oh, don't worry about me, dear. I don't remember much of nothin' these days." She held out her arms for Emma. "Why don't you let me take care of the little lamb?" Carefully, he transferred the baby to Mrs. Levy. The old woman walked off toward the back of the house. Her bedroom slippers made a slapping sound on her dry heels.

Will asked Sara, "What about the diabetes? Can they say it was that?"

Her tone was businesslike. "How was she acting when you got here?"

"She looked ..." He shook his head, thinking he never wanted to see Faith that bad off again. "She looked like she'd lost her mind."

"Do you think a mentally or chemically altered person could've killed two men with a single shot to each?" Sara put her hand on Faith's shoulder. Her tone softened. "Faith, can you sit up for me, please?"

Slowly, Faith moved to right herself. She looked groggy, as if she had just woken from a long nap, but her color was coming back. She put her hands to her head, wincing.

Sara told her, "You'll have a headache for a while. Drink as much water as you can tolerate. We need your tester to see where you are.”

“It’s in my purse.”

“I’ll try to get another one from one of the ambulances.” She took a bottle of water off the coffee table and twisted off the cap. “Switch to water. No more Coke.”

Sara left without looking at Will. Her back felt like a wall of ice. He didn’t know what to do with that, so he ignored it, sitting on the coffee table in front of Faith.

She took a long drink of water before she spoke to him. “My head is killing me.” The shock of what happened came back to her like a bolt of lightning. “Where’s my mother?” She tried to stand, but Will kept her down. “Where is she?”

“They’re looking for her.”

“The little girls—”

“They’re fine. Please, just stay here for a second, okay?”

She looked around, some of her wildness returning. “Where’s Emma?”

“She’s with Mrs. Levy. She’s asleep. I called Jeremy at the school—”

Her mouth opened. He could see her life coming back to her in spurts. “How did you tell him?”

“I talked to Victor. He’s still the dean of students. I knew you wouldn’t want me to send a cop to Jeremy’s classroom.”

“Victor.” Faith pressed her lips together. She had dated Victor Martinez for a while, but they had broken up almost a year ago. “Please tell me you didn’t mention Emma.”

Will couldn’t remember exactly what he’d told Victor, but he guessed Faith hadn’t gotten around to telling the man that he had a daughter. “I’m sorry.”

“It doesn’t matter.” She put down the bottle of water, her shaking hands spilling some onto the carpet. “What else?”

“We’re trying to track down your brother.” Dr. Zeke Mitchell was a surgeon in the Air Force, stationed somewhere in Germany. “Amanda reached out to a friend at Dobbins Air Reserve. They’re cutting through some of the red tape.”

“My phone ...” She seemed to realize where she’d left it. “Mama has his number by the phone in the kitchen.”

“I’ll get it as soon as we’re finished,” Will promised. “Tell me what happened.”

She took a stuttered breath. He could see her struggle with the knowledge of what she had done. “I killed two people.”

Will held both her hands. Her skin was still cold and clammy. She had a slight tremor, but he didn’t think it was from her blood sugar issues. “You saved two little girls, Faith.”

“The man in the bedroom—” She stopped. “I don’t understand what happened.”

“Are you confused again? Do you need me to get Dr. Linton?”

“No.” She shook her head for so long he thought maybe he should get Sara anyway. “She’s not bad, Will. My mom is not a dirty cop.”

“We don’t need to talk about—”

“Yes, we do,” Faith insisted. “Even if she was, which she’s not, she’s been retired for five years. She’s not on the job anymore. She doesn’t go to the fundraisers or the events. She doesn’t talk to anybody from that old life. She plays cards on Fridays with some of the ladies in the neighborhood. She goes to church every Wednesday and Sunday. She watches Emma while I'm at work. Her car is five years old. She just made the last mortgage payment on the house. She's not mixed up in anything. There's no reason for anybody to think ..." Her lip started to tremble. Tears threatened to fall.

Will told her the concrete things he could point to. "There's a mobile command center outside. All the highways are being watched. Evelyn's photo is on all the news stations. Every cruiser policing the metro area has her picture. We're lighting up all the snitches to see if they've heard anything. They've trapped and traced all your phones in case any ransom demands are made. Amanda pitched a fit, but they put one of their detectives in your house to monitor all mail and calls. Jeremy's at your house. They've got a plainclothes assigned to him. You'll get somebody, too."

Faith had worked kidnapping cases before. "Do you really think there's going to be a ransom demand?"

"It could happen."

"They were Mexicanos. They were looking for something. That's why they took her."

Will asked, "What were they looking for?"

"I don't know. The house was turned upside down. The Asian said he'd trade my mother for whatever they were looking for."

"The Asian said he'd trade?"

"Yes, he had a gun on the Mexicano—the one in the backyard."

"Hold on." They were doing this the wrong way. "Work with me, Faith. Treat your memory like a crime scene. Start from the beginning. You had that in-service this morning, right? Computer training?"

She started to nod. "I was late getting home by almost two hours." She laid out every detail from her morning until now, how she had tried to call her mother, how she'd heard music playing in the house when she got out of her car. Faith hadn't realized that something was wrong until well after the music stopped. Will let her run through the story—the torn-up house, the dead man she'd found and the two that she had killed herself.

When she was finished, he played it all back in his head, seeing Faith standing in the carport by the shed, going back to her car. Despite her recent medical issues, her memory seemed crystal clear now. She had called dispatch, and then she had gotten her gun. Will felt this detail picking at a spot in his brain. Faith knew that Will was home today. They had talked about it yesterday afternoon. She was complaining about having to go do computer training, and he told her he was going to wash his car and take care of the yard. Will lived 2.3 miles away from where they were sitting. He could've gotten here in under five minutes.

But Faith hadn't called him.

"What is it?" she asked. "Did I miss something?"

He cleared his throat. "What was the song that was playing when you pulled up?"

"AC/DC," she said. " 'Back in Black.' "

The detail seemed strange. "Is that what your mom usually listens to?"

She shook her head. She was obviously still in shock, her mind reeling from what had happened.

He wrapped his hands around her arms, trying to get her to concentrate. "Think this through, all right?" He waited for her to look at him. "There are two dead men in the house. Both are Asian. The guy in the backyard is Mexican. Los Texicanos."

She focused herself. "The Asian in the bedroom—he was wearing this loud Hawaiian shirt. He sounded southside." She meant his accent. "He had a gun on the Texicano. He was threatening to kill him."

"Did he say anything else?"

"I shot him." Her lip started to tremble again.

Will had never seen Faith cry and he didn't want to now. "The guy in the shirt had a gun pointed at someone's head," he reminded her. "The Texicano was already beaten up, possibly tortured. You feared for his life. That's why you pulled the trigger."

She nodded, though he could see self-doubt brimming in her eyes.

He said, "After Hawaiian Shirt went down, the Texicano ran out into the yard, right?"

"Right."

"And you chased after him, and he raised his gun toward those little girls and fired, so you shot him, too, right?"

"Yes."

"You were protecting the hostage in the bedroom and you were protecting those two girls in your neighbor's backyard. Right?"

"Yes," she said, her voice stronger. "I was."

She was getting back to her old self. Will allowed himself to feel a little bit of relief. He dropped her hands. "You remember the directive, Faith. Deadly force is authorized when your life or the lives of others are at stake. You did your job today. You just have to articulate what you were thinking. People were in danger. You shoot to immediately stop the threat. You don't shoot to wound."

"I know."

"Why didn't you wait for backup?"

She didn't answer.

"The dispatcher told you to wait outside. You didn't wait outside."

Faith still didn't answer.

Will sat back on the table, hands between his knees. Maybe she didn't trust him. They had never talked openly about the case he'd built against her mother, but he knew Faith assumed that it was the detectives on the squad, not the captain in charge, who had messed up. As smart as she was, she was still naïve about the politics of the job. Will had noticed in every corruption case he'd worked that the heads that tended to roll in this business were the ones that didn't have gold stars on their collars. Faith was too low on the food chain to have that kind of protection.

He said, "You must've heard something inside. A yell? A gunshot?"

"No."

"Did you see something?"

"I saw the curtain move, but that was after—"

"Good, that's good." He leaned forward again. "You saw someone inside. You thought your mother might be in there. You sensed an immediate danger to her life and went in to secure the scene."

“Will—”

“Listen to me, Faith. I’ve asked a lot of cops these same questions, and I know what the answer is supposed to be. Are you listening to me?”

She nodded.

“You saw someone inside the house. You thought your mother might be in serious danger—”

“I saw blood on the carport. On the door. A bloody handprint on the door.”

“Exactly. That’s good. That gives you cause to go in. Someone was badly injured. Their life was at stake. The rest of it happened because you were provoked into a situation where deadly force was justified.”

She shook her head. “Why are you coaching me? You hate when cops lie for each other.”

“I’m not lying for you. I’m trying to make sure you keep your job.”

“I don’t give a shit about my job. I just want to get my mother back.”

“Then stick to what we just talked about. You won’t do anybody any good sitting in a jail cell.”

He could read the shock in her eyes. As bad as things were right now, it had never occurred to her that they could get worse.

There was a loud knock at the door. Will started to get up, but Mrs. Levy beat him to it. She sashayed down the hall with her arms swinging. He guessed she’d put Emma in one of the beds and hoped she’d thought to stack some pillows around her.

Geary was the first to come in, then Amanda, then a couple of older-looking men, one black, one white. Both had bushy eyebrows, clean-shaven faces, and the kind of brass and ribbons on their chests that came from a glorious career of riding a desk. They were window dressing, here to make Geary look important. If he were a rap star, they would’ve been called a posse. Because he was a zone commander, they were called support staff.

“Ma’am,” Geary mumbled to Mrs. Levy as he took off his hat. His boys followed suit, tucking their hats under their arms, just like the boss. Geary walked toward Faith, but the old woman stopped him.

“Can I get y’all some tea or perhaps some cookies?”

Geary snapped, “We’re conducting an investigation, not a tea party.”

Mrs. Levy seemed unfazed. “Well, then. Please, make yourself at home.” She winked at Will before turning on her heel and heading back down the hallway.

Geary said, “Stand up, Agent Mitchell.”

Will felt his stomach tense as Faith stood. None of her earlier shakiness was on display, though her shirt was untucked and her hair was still a mess. She said, “I’m ready to make a statement if—”

Amanda interrupted, “Your lawyer and a union rep are waiting at the station.”

Geary scowled. He obviously didn’t care about Faith’s legal representation. “Agent Mitchell, you were told to wait for backup. I don’t know how they do it in the GBI, but the men on my force follow orders.”

Faith glanced at Amanda, but told Geary evenly, “There was blood on the kitchen door. I saw a person inside the house. My mother’s S&W was missing. I feared there was an immediate threat to her life, so I went into the house to secure her safety.” She couldn’t have said it better if Will had supplied a script.

Geary asked, “The man in the kitchen?”

"He was dead when I entered the house."

"The one in the bedroom?"

"He had my mother's revolver pointed at another man's head. I was protecting the life of the hostage."

"And the man in the yard?"

"The hostage. He took the revolver after I shot the first man. The front door was breached and my attention was diverted. He ran into the backyard with the gun, which he fired at two young girls. I had my shot and I took it to save their lives."

Geary glanced at his brass window dressing as he decided what to do. The two men seemed unsure themselves, but ready to back up the boss without question. Will felt himself tense, because this was the part where things either went down hard or easy. Perhaps an overriding loyalty to Evelyn Mitchell persuaded the man to take a softer approach. He told Faith, "One of my officers will drive you to the station. Take a moment to collect yourself if you need to."

He started to put his hat back on, but Amanda stopped him.

"Mike, I feel the need to remind you of something." She gave him that same sweet smile as before. "The GBI has original jurisdiction over all drug cases in the state."

"Are you telling me you've found evidence that narcotics are a factor in these shootings?"

"I'm not telling you much of anything, am I?"

He glared at her as he put his hat back on. "Don't think I'm not going to find out why you've been wasting my time."

"That sounds like a wonderful use of your resources."

Geary stomped toward the door, his minions scrambling after him. Outside, Sara was coming up the front porch steps. She quickly put her hands behind her back, hiding the blood sugar monitor she had borrowed.

"Dr. Linton." Geary took off his hat again. His men followed suit. "I'm sorry I didn't recognize your name earlier." Will assumed this was because Sara hadn't offered it. Obviously, someone else had filled him in. "I knew your husband. He was a good cop. A good man."

Sara kept her hands behind her back, twisting the plastic monitor. Will recognized the look she gave the men—she didn't want to talk. For Geary, she managed a dry "Thank you."

"Please let me know if I can ever be of assistance."

She nodded. Geary put on his hat, and the gesture was mimicked like a wave at a football game.

Faith spoke as soon as the door was closed. "The Texicano in the yard said something to me before he died." Her mouth moved as she tried to remember what she'd heard. " 'Alma' or 'al-may.' "

"Almeja?" Amanda asked, giving the word an exotic sound.

Faith nodded. "That's right. Do you know what it means?"

Sara opened her mouth to speak, but before she could get a word out, Amanda provided, "It's Spanish slang for 'money.' It means 'clams.' Do you think they were looking for cash?"

Faith shook her head and shrugged at the same time. "I don't know. They never really said. I mean, it makes sense. Los Texicanos means drugs. Drugs mean money. Mom worked in narcotics. Maybe they think she ...” Faith glanced at Will. He could practically read her mind. After his investigation, a lot of people thought that Evelyn Mitchell was just the kind of cop who had stacks of cash lying around her house.

Sara took advantage of their silence. “I should go.” She handed Faith the blood sugar monitor. “You need to follow your schedule religiously. Stress is going to make it harder. Call your doctor and talk about your dosage, whatever adjustments you need to make, what signs you need to look for. Are you still seeing Dr. Wallace?” Faith nodded. “I’ll call her service on my way home and tell her what happened, but you need to be on the phone with her as soon as possible. This is a stressful time, but you have to stay on your routine. Understood?”

“Thank you.” Faith had never been easy with gratitude, but her words were more heartfelt than anything Will had ever heard come from her mouth.

Will asked Sara, “Are you going to do a tox screen for Geary?”

She directed her words to Amanda. “Faith works for you, not APD. They need a warrant to draw her blood and I’m guessing you don’t want to go to the trouble.”

Amanda asked, “Hypothetically, what would a tox screen find?”

“That she wasn’t intoxicated or impaired by any of the substances they test for. Do you want me to do a blood draw?”

“No, Dr. Linton. But I appreciate your help.”

She left without another word, or even a glance Will’s way.

Amanda suggested, “Why don’t you go check on the merry widow?”

Will thought she meant Sara, then logic intervened. He walked to the back of the house to find Mrs. Levy, but not before seeing Amanda pull Faith into a tight hug. The gesture was shocking coming from a woman whose maternal instincts were more closely related to those of a dingo.

Will knew that Faith and Amanda shared a past that neither woman ever talked about or even acknowledged. While Evelyn Mitchell was blazing a trail for women in the Atlanta Police Department, Amanda Wagner was doing the same in the GBI. They were contemporaries, about the same age, with the same ball-breaking attitudes. They had also been lifelong friends—Amanda had even dated Evelyn’s brother-in-law, Faith’s uncle—a detail Amanda had failed to mention to Will when she assigned him to investigate the narcotics squad that was headed by her old friend.

He found Mrs. Levy in the back bedroom, which seemed to have been turned into a catchall for whatever struck the old woman’s fancy. There was a scrapbooking station, something Will only recognized because he had worked a shooting in the suburbs where a young mother had been murdered while she was pasting crinkle-cut photographs of a beach vacation onto colored construction paper. There was a pair of roller skates with four wheels. A tennis racket leaned against the corner. Various types of cameras were laid out on the daybed. Some were digital, but most were the old-fashioned kind that used film. He guessed from the red light over the closet door that she developed her own photographs.

Mrs. Levy was sitting in a wooden rocking chair by the window. She had Emma in her lap. Her apron was wrapped around the baby like a blanket. The little geese were reversed across the hem. Emma's eyes were closed as she sucked fiercely on the bottle in her mouth. The noise reminded Will of the baby in The Simpsons.

"Why don't you have a seat?" the old woman offered. "Emma seems to be perking up just fine."

Will sat on the bed, careful not to jostle the cameras. "It's a good thing that you just happened to have a bottle for her."

"It is, isn't it?" She smiled down at the baby. "Poor lamb missed her nap with all this excitement."

"Do you have a crib for her, too?"

She gave a raspy chuckle. "I assume you've already looked in my bedroom."

He hadn't been that bold, but Will took this as an opening. "How often do you watch her?"

"Usually just a few times a week."

"But lately?"

She winked at him. "You're a smart one."

He was more lucky than smart. It had struck him as odd that Mrs. Levy just happened to have a baby bottle lying around when Emma needed it. He asked, "What's Evelyn been up to?"

"Do I look rude enough to pry into someone's business?"

"How can I answer that without insulting you?"

She laughed, but relented easily enough. "Evelyn never said, but I'm assuming she had a gentleman friend."

"For how long?"

"Three or four months?" She seemed to be asking herself a question. She nodded her answer. "It was just after Emma was born. They started out slowly, maybe once a week or every two, but I'd say in the last ten days it's been more frequent. I stopped keeping a calendar when I retired, but Ev asked me to watch Emma three mornings in a row last week."

"It was always in the morning?"

"Usually from around eleven to about two in the afternoon."

Three hours seemed like a long enough time for an assignation. "Did Faith know about him?"

Mrs. Levy shook her head. "I'm certain Ev didn't want the kids to find out. They loved their father so much. As did she, mind you, but it's been ten years, at least. That's a long time to go without companionship."

Will guessed she was speaking from experience. "You said your husband's been dead for twenty years."

"Yes, but I didn't like Mr. Levy very much and he didn't care for me at all." She used her thumb to stroke Emma's cheek. "Evelyn loved Bill. They had some bumps along the way, but it's different when you love them. They're gone and your life splinters in two. It takes an awful long time to put it back together."

Will let himself think about Sara for just a second. The truth was that he never stopped thinking about her. She was like the news crawl that ran at the bottom of the television while his life, the main story, played on the screen. "Do you know the gentleman's name?"

"Oh, no, dear. I never asked. But he drove a very nice Cadillac CTS-V. That's the sedan, not the coupe. Black on black and the stainless steel grill on the front.

A very throaty V8. You could hear it blocks away.”

Will was momentarily too surprised to respond. “Are you a car person?”

“Oh, not at all, but I looked it up on the Internet because I wanted to know how much he paid for it.”

Will waited her out.

“I’m guessing around seventy-five thousand dollars,” the old woman confided.

“Mr. Levy and I bought this house for less than half that.”

“Did Evelyn ever tell you his name?”

“She never acknowledged it. Despite what you men want to think, we ladies don’t sit around talking about y’all all the time.”

Will allowed a smile. “What did he look like?”

“Well, bald,” she said, as if this was to be expected. “A bit paunchy around the middle. He wore jeans most of the time. His shirts were often wrinkled and he kept the sleeves rolled up, which I found rather perplexing because Evelyn always liked a sharply dressed man.”

“What age do you think he is?”

“Without the hair, it’s hard to tell. I’d put him around Evelyn’s age.”

“Early sixties.”

“Oh.” She seemed surprised. “I thought Evelyn was in her forties, but I suppose that doesn’t make sense with Faith being in her thirties. And the baby’s not a baby anymore, is he?” She lowered her voice as if she was afraid someone would hear. “I guess it’s coming up on twenty years now, but that’s not the kind of pregnancy you forget. There was that bit of a scandal when she started to show. Such a pity how folks behaved. We’ve all had our bit of fun now and then, but as I told Evelyn at the time, a woman can run faster with her skirt up than a man can with his pants down.”

Will hadn’t considered Faith’s teenage predicament beyond thinking it unusual she had kept the child, but it had probably rocked the neighborhood to have a pregnant fourteen-year-old in their refined midst. It was almost commonplace now, but back then, a girl in Faith’s predicament was generally suddenly called away to tend a never-before-mentioned frail aunt or given what was euphemistically called an appendectomy. A handful of less fortunate ones ended up in the children’s home with kids like Will.

He asked, “So, the man in the expensive car is in his early sixties?” She nodded. “Did you ever see them being affectionate?”

“No, but Evelyn wasn’t the showy type. She would get in the car with him and he would drive off.”

“No kiss on the cheek?”

“Not that I ever saw. Mind you, I never even met him. Evelyn would drop Emma off here, then go back to her house and wait.”

Will let that sink in. “Did he ever go into her house?”

“Not that I could tell. I guess people do things differently now. In my day, a man would knock on your door and escort you to his car. There was none of this pulling up and beeping the horn.”

“Is that what he did—beep the horn?”

“No, son, that was just a figure of speech. I suppose Ev must’ve been looking out the window, because she always came out as soon as he pulled up.”

“Do you know where they went?”

"No, but like I said, they were usually gone for a couple'a-three hours, so I assumed they were seeing a movie or having lunch."

That was a lot of movies. "Did the man show up today?"

"No, and I didn't see anyone in the street, either. No cars, no nothing. The first I heard there was trouble was when the sirens came. Then I heard the gunshots, of course, one and then about a minute later one more. I know what gunfire sounds like. Mr. Levy was a hunter. Back then, all the policemen were. He used to make me go so I could cook for them." She rolled her eyes. "What a boring gasbag he was. Rest his soul."

"Lucky man to have you."

"Lucky for me he's not around anymore." She stood with difficulty from the rocker, keeping the baby steady in her arms. The bottle was empty. She put it on the table and offered Emma to Will. "Take her for a second, will you?"

He put Emma on his shoulder and patted her back. She gave an unusually rewarding burp.

Mrs. Levy narrowed her eyes. "You've been around babies before."

Will wasn't about to get into his life story. "They're easy to talk to."

She rested her hand on his arm before going to the closet. Will had been right. There was a darkroom set up in the small space. He stood in the doorway, careful not to block her light as she thumbed through a stack of five-by-seven photographs. Her hands had a slight tremor, but she seemed steady on her feet.

She explained, "Mr. Levy never set much store by my hobbies, but he was called onto a crime scene one day and they asked if anyone knew a photographer. Twenty-five dollars they paid—just for taking pictures! The old bastard wasn't going to say no to that. So he called me and told me to bring my camera. When I didn't faint over the mess—this was a shotgun incident—they said I could do it again." She nodded toward the bed. "That Brownie Six-16 helped keep this roof over our heads."

He knew she meant the box camera. It looked worn but well loved.

"I moved into surveillance work later on. Mr. Levy had drunk himself off the job by then, and of course I'm a woman, so it took some time for them to understand I wasn't there for flirting and screwing."

Will felt his face start to redden. "Was this with the Atlanta Police Department?"

"Fifty-eight years!" She seemed as surprised as Will that she'd lasted that long. "I may be a bag of bones now, but there was a time Geary and his ass-kissers would've snapped to instead of brushing me off like a speck of lint on their shiny trousers." She picked through another pile of five-by-sevens. Will saw black-and-white shots of birds and various household pets, all taken from a vantage point that implied they were being spied upon rather than admired. "This little so-and-so's been digging in my flower bed." She showed Will a picture of a gray and white cat with dirt on its nose. The lighting was harsh in the black-and-white print. The only thing missing was a board over his chest with his name and inmate number.

"Here." Finally, she found what she was looking for. "This is him. Evelyn's gentleman friend."

Will looked over her hunched shoulder. The photo was grainy, obviously taken from behind the blinds covering the front window. The lens pressed open thin, plastic slats. A tall, older man leaned against a black Cadillac. His palms rested on the hood, forearms twisted out. The car was parked in the street, its front tires turned against the curb. Will parked his car the same way. Atlanta was a city of hills, resting on the piedmont of the Appalachian Mountains. If you drove a car with a manual transmission, you always banked the wheels against the curb to keep the car from rolling.

"What is it?" Faith stood in the doorway. Will passed her the baby, but she seemed more concerned with the photograph. "Did you see something?"

"I was showing him Snippers." Mrs. Levy had somehow pulled a sleight of hand. The photo of the man was gone and in its place was the flower-garden-digging cat.

Emma shifted in Faith's arms, obviously picking up on her mother's troubled mood. Faith kissed her on the cheek with several quick smacks and made faces until the baby smiled. Will knew Faith was putting on a show. Tears filled her eyes. She hugged the infant tightly to her chest.

Mrs. Levy spoke. "Evelyn's a tough old bird. They won't break her."

Faith swayed back and forth with the baby the way mothers automatically do. "You didn't hear anything?"

"Oh, darlin', you know if I'd'a heard something, I would've been over there with my hogleg." Will recognized the slang for a large-caliber handgun. "Ev's going to come out of this just fine. She always lands on her feet. You can take that to the bank and cash it."

"I just—" Faith's voice caught. "If I'd gotten here sooner, or—" She shook her head. "Why did this happen? You know Mama's not mixed up in anything bad. Why would someone take her?"

"Sometimes there's no rhyme or reason to the stupid things people get up to." The old woman's shoulders twisted in a slight shrug. "All I know is that you're gonna eat yourself alive if you keep going down that road asking what if I did this or what if I did that." She pressed the back of her fingers to Faith's cheek. "Trust in the Lord to look over her. 'Lean not into thine own understanding.'"

Faith nodded, solemn, though Will had never known her to be religious. "Thank you."

Amanda's heels thudded down the carpeted hallway. "I can't stall them anymore," she told Faith. "There's a cruiser outside waiting to take you to the station. Try to shut up and do what your lawyer says."

"The least I can do is watch the baby," Mrs. Levy offered. "You don't need to take her down to that filthy station, and Jeremy wouldn't know which end the diaper goes on."

Faith obviously wanted to take her up on the offer, but she hedged, "I don't know how long I'll be."

"You know I'm a night owl. It's no bother."

"Thank you." Faith reluctantly handed the baby to the old woman. She smoothed down Emma's crop of fine brown hair and kissed the top of her head. Her lips stayed there for a few seconds more, then she left without another word.

As soon as the front door closed, Amanda cut to the chase. "What?"

Mrs. Levy pulled the photograph from under her apron.

"Evelyn had a frequent visitor," Will explained. Mrs. Levy had a good memory: The man was bald. His jeans were baggy. His shirt was wrinkled, the sleeves rolled up. She'd failed to mention a more important detail, which was that he was Hispanic. The tattoo on his arm was blurry, but Will easily recognized the symbol on his forearm that identified him as Los Texicanos.

Amanda folded the picture in half before sticking it into the pocket of her suit jacket. She asked Mrs. Levy, "Have the uniforms talked to you yet?"

"I'm sure they'll get around to the little old ladies eventually."

"I assume you'll be as cooperative as usual."

She smiled. "I'm not sure what I can tell them, but I'll go ahead and lay out some fresh cookies in case they come calling."

Amanda chuckled. "Careful, Roz." She motioned for Will to follow her as she left the room.

Will reached into his wallet and pulled out one of his cards for Mrs. Levy. "This has all my numbers. Call me if you remember anything or if you need help with the baby."

"Thank you, sonny." Her voice had lost some of its old lady kindness, but she tucked the card into her apron anyway.

Amanda was halfway up the hall by the time Will joined her. She didn't say anything about the photograph, or Faith's condition, or the pissing contest she'd had with Geary. Instead, she started giving him orders. "I need you to review all of your case files from the investigation." She didn't have to tell him which investigation she meant. "Comb through every witness statement, every CI report, every jail-house snitch's last hurrah. I don't care how small it is. I want to know about it." Amanda stopped. He knew she was thinking about his reading issues.

He kept his voice steady. "It's not a problem."

She wouldn't let him off that easy. "Pull up your panties, Will. If you need help, speak up now so I can deal with it."

"Do you want me to start now? The boxes are at my house."

"No. We've got an errand to run first." She stood in the foyer, her hands on her hips. She was a trim woman, and Will often forgot how short she was until he saw her straining her neck to look up at him. "I managed to pry some information loose while Geary was throwing his tantrum. The Texicano in the backyard has helpfully identified himself as Ricardo vis-à-vis the large tattoo on his back. We don't have a full ID on him yet. He's mid-twenties, approximately five-nine, and one hundred seventy pounds. The Asian in the bedroom is around forty years of age, slightly shorter and thinner than his Hispanic friend. I would guess he's not from this part of town. He might've been brought in just for this."

Will remembered, "Faith said he had a southern drawl."

"That should help narrow things down."

"He was also wearing a loud Hawaiian shirt. That's not very gangsterish."

"We'll add that to his list of crimes." She glanced down the hallway, then looked back at Will. "Now, the Asian in the laundry room is an odd story, too, which we know courtesy of the wallet he carried in his back pocket. Hironobu Kwon, age nineteen. He's a freshman at Georgia State. He's also the son of a local schoolteacher, Miriam Kwon."

"He's not affiliated?"

"Not that we can find. APD swooped up Mama Kwon before we could get to her. We'll have to find her tomorrow morning to see what she knows." She pointed her finger at Will. "Softly, softly. We're still not officially on the case. It's just you and me until I can find a way in."

He said, "Faith seems to think the Mexicanos were looking for something." Will tried to gauge Amanda's expression. Usually it hovered somewhere between amused and annoyed, but now it was completely blank. "Ricardo was beaten to a pulp. He had a gun pointed at his head. He wasn't looking for anything except to save his life. It's the Asians we should be talking to first."

"That seems entirely logical."

"It points to a larger problem," he continued. "The Mexicanos I can understand, but what would the Asians want with Evelyn? What's their play?"

"That's the million-dollar question."

He put a finer point on it. "Evelyn headed the drug squad. Los Mexicanos control the drug trade in Atlanta. They have for the last twenty years."

"They certainly have."

Will felt the familiar sting of his head hitting a brick wall. This was the same run-around Amanda always gave him when she had information that she wasn't going to share. Somehow, this time was worse, because she wasn't just screwing with his head, she was covering for her old friend.

He tried, "You said that the guy in the Hawaiian shirt was probably brought in for 'this.' What's 'this'? Kidnapping? Finding whatever Evelyn had hidden in her house?"

"I don't think anyone is finding what they're looking for today." She paused to let her meaning sink in. "Charlie's helping out the locals with the crime scene, but they're not as weak to his charms as I'd like. His access has been very limited and closely supervised. They say they'll share lab results. I'm iffy on their ME."

The Fulton County medical examiner. "Has he shown up?"

"He's still combing through that apartment fire in People's Town." Budget cuts had left the medical examiner's office devastated. If there was more than one serious crime happening within the city limits, that usually meant the detectives were in for a long wait. "I'd love to get Pete on this."

She was referring to the GBI's medical examiner. Will asked, "Can't he make some phone calls?"

"Unlikely," she admitted. "Pete's not exactly covered up in friends. You know how strange he is. He makes you look normal. What about Sara?"

"She'll keep her mouth shut."

"I'm aware of that, Will. I saw your do-si-do in the street. I meant do you think she knows anyone in the ME's office?"

Will shrugged.

"Ask her," Amanda ordered.

Will doubted Sara would welcome the call, but he nodded his agreement anyway. "What about Evelyn's credit card statements, phone records?"

"I've ordered them pulled."

"Does she have GPS in her car? On her phones?"

She didn't really answer him. "We're going through some backdoor channels. As I said, this isn't exactly aboveboard."

"But what you told Geary is right. We've got original jurisdiction over drug cases.”

“Just because Evelyn was in charge of the narcotics division doesn’t mean this is drug-related. From what I’ve gathered, they’ve found no indication of drugs in the house or on any of the dead men.”

“And Ricardo, the dead Texicano, of the drug-related Mexicanos?”

“Odd coincidence.”

“How about the living, breathing, drug-related Texicano who drives a black Cadillac that Evelyn Mitchell has no qualms about getting into and going for a ride?”

She feigned surprise. “You think he’s affiliated?”

“I saw the tattoo in the photograph. Evelyn’s been seeing a Texicano for at least four months.” Will tried to moderate his tone. “He’s older. He must be higher up in the organization. Mrs. Levy says the visits have stepped up over the last ten days. They’ve been going somewhere together in his car, usually out by eleven and back by two.”

Again, Amanda ignored his point and made her own. “You busted six detectives on Evelyn’s squad. Two of them were paroled for good behavior last year. Both transferred out of state—one to California, one to Tennessee, which is where they were this afternoon when Evelyn was taken. Two are in medium security at Valdosta State, four years away from release and no good behavior in sight. One is dead—drug overdose, which is what I call the thinking man’s karma. The last one is waiting to get his dance card punched at D&C.”

The Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison. Death row. Will reluctantly asked, “Who’d he kill?”

“A guard and an inmate. Strangled a convicted rapist with a towel—no loss there—but then he beat the guard to death with his bare hands. Claimed it was self-defense.”

“Against the guard?”

“You sound like the prosecutor on his case.”

Will tried again. “And Evelyn?”

“What about her?”

“I investigated her, too.”

“You did.”

“We’re not going to talk about the elephant in the room?”

“Elephant? For chrissakes, Will, we’ve got the entire goddamn circus in here.” She opened the front door. The sun cut through the dark house like a knife.

Amanda slipped on her sunglasses as they walked across the lawn toward the crime scene. A pair of uniformed cops were making their way toward Mrs. Levy’s house. They each glowered at Will and gave Amanda a curt nod.

She mumbled to Will, “About time they got going,” as if she hadn’t been the cause of the delay.

He waited until the men started banging on the front door. “I guess you know Mrs. Levy from your days with the APD?”

“GBI. I investigated her for murdering her husband.” Amanda seemed to enjoy Will’s horrified expression. “Never could prove it, but I’m sure she poisoned him.”

“Cookies?” he guessed.

“That was my working theory.” An appreciative smile curved her lips as she picked her way across the grass. “Roz is a wily old coot. Seen more crime scenes than all of us rolled together, and I’m sure she took notes the entire time. I wouldn’t trust half of what she told you. Remember—the Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose.”

Amanda had a point, or at least Shakespeare did. Still, Will reminded her, “Mrs. Levy’s the one who told me about the Texicano visiting Evelyn. She took the picture of him.”

“She did, didn’t she?”

Will felt the question hit him like a slap to the back of his head. Considering Mrs. Levy’s artistic talent lent itself more to unflattering mugshots of household pets, it seemed strange that she just happened to have handy a photograph of the Texicano standing beside his black Cadillac. She was a sharp old lady. She’d been spying for a reason. “We should go back and talk to her.”

“Do you really think she’s going to tell us anything useful?”

Will silently conceded the point. Mrs. Levy seemed to like her games, and with Evelyn missing, they didn’t really have time to play them. “Does Evelyn know she killed her husband?”

“Of course she does.”

“And she still let her watch Emma?”

They had reached Faith’s Mini. Amanda cupped her hands to the glass and peered inside. “She killed a sixty-four-year-old abusive alcoholic, not a four-month-old baby.”

Will guessed somewhere in the world this kind of logic made sense.

Amanda headed toward the house. Charlie Reed was in the carport talking to a bunch of other crime scene unit techs. Some were smoking. One was leaning against a tan Malibu that was parked nose-out to Faith’s Mini. They were all dressed in white Tyvek clean suits that made them look like various sizes of soiled marshmallows. Charlie’s handlebar mustache was the only thing that distinguished him from the clean-shaven men. He saw Amanda and broke away from the group.

She said, “Take me through it, Charlie.”

Charlie glanced back at a portly, dark man whose odd build made the Tyvek suit unflatteringly tight in all the critical areas. The man took a last puff on his cigarette and handed it to one of his co-workers. He introduced himself to Amanda in a clipped, British-sounding accent. “Dr. Wagner, I am Dr. Ahbidi Mittal.”

She indicated Will. “This is Dr. Trent, my associate.”

Will shook the man’s hand, trying not to cringe at the effortless way Amanda rolled out a degree they both knew he’d obtained from a dubious online school.

Mittal offered, “As a courtesy, I’m prepared to show you around the crime scene.”

Amanda gave a cutting glance to Charlie, as if he had any say in the matter.

“Thank you,” Will said, because he knew no one else would.

Mittal handed them each a pair of white booties for their shoes. Amanda grabbed Will’s arm to steady herself as she slipped off her heels and covered her stocking feet. Will was left to hop around on his own. Even without his shoes, his feet were too big, and he ended up looking like Mrs. Levy with her heels hanging off the back of her slippers.

“Shall we start in here?” Mittal didn’t wait for them to acknowledge his invitation. He led them around the back of the Malibu and into the house through the open kitchen door. Instinctively, Will ducked his head as he walked into the low-ceilinged room. Charlie bumped into him and mumbled an apology. The kitchen was small for four people, horseshoe shaped, with the open end facing the laundry room. Will caught the distinct odor of rusty iron that blood gave off when it congealed.

Faith was right—the intruders had been looking for something. The house was a mess. Silverware was scattered on the floor. Drawers had been thrown around. Holes were knocked in the walls. A cell phone and an older-looking BlackBerry were crushed on the floor. The wall phone had been smashed off the hook. Except for the black fingerprint powder and the yellow plastic markers the forensics team had used, nothing had been altered from what Faith said she’d first seen when she entered the house. Even the dead body was still in the laundry room. Faith must have been terrified, not knowing what was coming around the corner, terrified that her mother was injured—or worse.

Will should have been here. He should’ve been the kind of partner Faith knew she could call no matter what.

Mittal said, “I’ve yet to write my report, but I am prepared to share my working theory.”

Amanda rolled her hand in a circle to move things along. “Tell me what you’ve got.”

Mittal’s lips pursed at the commanding tone. “I assume that Captain Mitchell was preparing lunch when the crime commenced.” There were bags of cold cuts on the counter beside a knife and cutting board where Evelyn had obviously been slicing tomatoes. An empty Wonder bread sleeve was wadded up in the sink. The toaster had popped up long ago. Four slices of bread. Evelyn had probably known Faith would need lunch when she got home.

It was a normal enough scene, even pleasant, but for the fact that every item on the counter was spattered or smeared with blood. The toaster, the bread, the cutting board. More blood had dripped down to the floor and pooled onto the tiles. Two sets of red shoe prints crisscrossed the white porcelain, one small, one large; there had been a struggle.

Mittal continued, “Captain Mitchell was startled by a noise, possibly the sliding glass door breaking, which likely made her cut her finger with the knife she was using to slice the tomatoes.”

Amanda noted, “That’s a lot of blood for a kitchen accident.”

Mittal obviously didn’t want any editorial comments. He paused again before continuing, “The infant, Emma, would’ve been here.” He pointed to the counter space beside the fridge, opposite the area where Evelyn had been preparing lunch. “We found a small drop of blood on the counter here.” He pointed to the spot beside an older-model CD player. “There’s a blood trail to and from the shed, so Captain Mitchell was most likely bleeding when she left the kitchen. Her handprint on the door supports this.”

Amanda nodded. “She hears a noise, so she hides the baby to keep her safe, then comes back in with her S&W.”

Charlie’s words came out in a rush, as if he could no longer hold his tongue. “She must’ve wrapped a paper towel around the cut, but it bled through quickly.

There's blood on the kitchen door and the wooden handle of the S&W."

Will asked, "What about the car seat?"

"It's clean. She must've carried it with her uninjured hand. We've got a blood trail back and forth across the carport where she carried Emma to the shed. It's Evelyn's blood. Ahbidi's people already typed it, so we can kinda puzzle it out from that." He glanced up at Mittal. "Sorry, Ahbi. I hope I'm not stepping on your toes."

Mittal made an expansive gesture with his hands, indicating Charlie should continue.

Will knew that this was Charlie's favorite part of the job. There was a swagger to his walk as he went to the open doorway and clasped his hands together near his face as if he held a gun. "Evelyn comes back into the house. Pivots, sees bad guy number one waiting in the laundry room and shoots him in the head. The force spun him around like a pinwheel. That's the exit wound you see at the back of his head." Charlie turned back around, hands raised again in a classic Charlie's Angel pose, which was the best way to make sure you got shot in the chest. "Then bad guy number two comes, probably from over there." He pointed to the pass-through between the kitchen and dining room. "There's a struggle. Evelyn loses her gun. See there?"

Will followed his pointing finger to a plastic marker on the floor. Now that Charlie had put the suggestion in his head, he could see the faint, bloody outline of a handgun.

"Evelyn grabs the knife off the counter. Her blood is on the handle, but it's not on the blade."

Amanda interrupted, "It's not just her blood on the knife?"

"No. According to her personnel file, Evelyn is typed as O-positive. We've got B-negative coating the blade and here by the fridge."

They all looked down at a dozen large, round drops of blood on the floor.

Mittal provided, "It's a passive spatter. No arteries were compromised or there would be a spray pattern. All the samples were sent to the lab for DNA analysis. I imagine we're looking at a week for results."

A smile played at Amanda's lips as she stared at the blood. "Good girl, Ev." There was a sound of triumph in her voice. "Any of the dead guys B-negative?"

Charlie glanced at Mittal again. The man nodded his acquiescence. "The Asian in the ugly shirt was O-positive, which is a fairly common type across races. It's Evelyn's type. It's my type. The other, the guy we're calling Ricardo because of his tattoo, was B-negative, but here's the kicker: he doesn't have any stab wounds. I mean, he bled at some point. He was obviously tortured. But the blood we're looking at here is a larger volume than anything—"

Amanda interrupted, "So, we've got someone out there with a stab wound whose blood type is B-negative. Is that rare?"

"Less than two percent of the U.S. Caucasian population is B-negative," Charlie told them. "It's a quarter of that for Asians, and around one percent for Hispanics. Bottom line, it's a very rare blood type, which makes it probable that our dead B-negative Ricardo is genetically related to our missing and wounded B-negative."

"So, we've got a wounded man out there, blood type B-negative."

Charlie was ahead of her for once. "I already put a be-on-the-lookout at all hospitals within a hundred miles for a stab wound of any kind—male, female, white, black, orange. We’ve already had three rule-outs from domestics just in the last half hour. More people get stabbed than I’d realized.”

Mittal made sure Charlie was finished, then pointed to the blood smeared across the floor. “These shoe prints are conducive to a struggle between a small woman and a medium-sized man, probably around seventy kilos. We can tell from the variation of light to dark in the print that there is a medial roll to the foot, or supination.”

Amanda stopped the lesson. “Take me back to the stab wound. Are we talking fatal?”

Mittal shrugged. “The medical examiner’s office would have to give you their opinion. As was stated earlier, there’s no blood spray on the walls or ceiling, from which we can posit that none of the arteries were damaged. This spatter, then, could perhaps be the result of a head wound, where one would find a fair amount of blood with minimal damage.” He looked at Charlie. “Do you concur?”

Charlie nodded, but added, “A gut wound might bleed like this. I’m not sure how long you could last with that. If you trust the movies, not long. If a lung was punctured, then he’d have an hour, tops, before he suffocated. There’s absolutely no arterial spray, so it’s a seeping wound. I don’t disagree with Dr. Mittal about the possibility of a head wound....” He shrugged, then disagreed anyway. “The blade was coated tip to hilt, which might indicate that the knife plunged into the body.” He saw the frown on Mittal’s face and backpedaled. “Then again, it could be that the victim grabbed the knife, which cut his hand and coated the blade through transfer.” He showed his hand, palm up. “In which case we’d have a B-negative out there with a wounded hand as well.”

Amanda had never embraced the equivocations of crime scene science. She tried to sum it up in absolutes. “So, bad guy B-negative struggles with Evelyn. Then I suppose we bring in the second man, the Asian in the Hawaiian shirt, who later ended up dead in the bedroom. They managed to subdue Evelyn and take away her gun. And then there’s a third man, Ricardo, who was a hostage at one point, and then became a shooter, and then, thanks to Agent Mitchell’s quick action, became dead before he could injure anyone.” She turned to Will. “My money is on Ricardo being hooked up in all of this, torture or not. He pretended to be a hostage to try to leverage Faith.”

Mittal looked uncomfortable with the finality in her tone. “That is an interpretation.”

Charlie tried to smooth things over. “There’s always the chance that—”

There was a sound similar to the rush of a tropical waterfall. Mittal unzipped his clean suit and felt around in his pants pockets. He pulled out his cell phone and said, “If you will excuse me,” before heading back into the garage.

Amanda turned to Charlie. “Brass tacks?”

“They’re not giving me full access, but there’s no reason for me to disagree with what Ahbi’s said so far.”

“And?”

“I don’t want to sound racist,” Charlie began, “but you don’t often see Mexicans and Asians working together. Especially Los Texicanos.”

“Younger kids aren’t as hung up on that sort of thing,” Will offered, wondering if that could be called progress.

Amanda didn't acknowledge either comment. "What else?"

"The list by the phone." Charlie pointed to a piece of yellow paper with a bunch of numbers and names. "I took the liberty to call the number for Zeke. I left a message for him to get in touch with you."

Amanda looked at her watch. "What about the rest of the house? Did forensics find anything?"

"Not that they've told me. Ahbi's not being overtly rude, but he's not going out of his way to volunteer anything, either." Charlie paused before adding, "It seems obvious whatever the bad guys were looking for wasn't found, otherwise they would've cleared out the minute Faith pulled up."

"And we'd be planning Evelyn's funeral." Amanda didn't dwell on the fact. "Whatever they were searching for—what would you guess the size of this mysterious item to be?"

"No telling," Charlie admitted. "Obviously, they were looking everywhere—drawers, closets, cushions. I think they got angrier as they went through the house and started destroying on top of searching. They ripped open the beds, broke the baby's toys. There's a lot of fury in there."

"How many searchers?"

"I'm sorry, Dr. Wagner." Mittal was back. He tucked his phone into his pocket but left his white suit gaping open. "That was the ME. He's been delayed by the discovery of another body at the apartment fire. What was your question?"

Charlie answered for her, perhaps sensing that Amanda's tone might get them thrown out of the house. "She was asking how many searchers you thought there were."

Mittal nodded. "An educated guess would be three to four men."

Will saw the disgusted look on Amanda's face. It had to be more than three, otherwise all the suspects were dead and Evelyn Mitchell had kidnapped herself.

Mittal continued, "They did not wear gloves. Perhaps they thought Captain Mitchell would relent without a struggle." Amanda snorted a laugh and Mittal gave another one of his patented pauses. "There are fingerprints on most surfaces, which of course we will share with the GBI."

Charlie said, "I've already called the lab. We've got two techs coming in to digitize them and put them in the database. From there it's only a matter of time before we know if they're in the system."

Amanda indicated the kitchen. "Once Evelyn was neutralized, they would've started their search in here. They were looking through drawers, so it's something that would fit in a drawer." She looked up at Charlie, then Mittal. "Any tire tracks? Footprints?"

"Nothing of consequence." Mittal walked her over to the kitchen window and started pointing out things in the backyard that had been checked. Will studied the broken CDs on the floor. Beatles. Sinatra. No AC/DC. The player was white plastic, smudged with black fingerprint powder. Will used his thumbnail to press the eject button. The tray was empty.

Amanda's voice came back to him. "Where did they keep Evelyn while they were tearing up the house?"

Mittal started toward the living room. Will took up the rear as Charlie and Amanda followed the doctor through the path of debris. The setup was similar to Mrs. Levy's house, minus the sunken aspect of the living room. Opposite the couch and a wingback chair were a wall of bookshelves and a small plasma-screen television with a foot-sized crack in the center. Most of the books were strewn across the floor. The couch and chairs had been gutted, their frames broken. There was a stereo on the shelf by the TV, the old record-playing kind, but the speakers were busted and the arm had been wrenched off the turntable. A small pile of vinyl records had obviously met the hard edge of someone's heel.

There was a Thonet-style bentwood chair against the wall, the only thing in the room that seemed to have remained intact. The seat was thatched. The legs were scuffed. Mittal pointed to where chunks of veneer had been ripped off. "It appears that duct tape was used. I found adhesive where Captain Mitchell's feet would've been." He lifted up the chair and moved it away from the wall. A yellow plastic number marker had been placed beside a dark stain. "One can surmise from the blood drops on the carpet that Captain Mitchell's hands were hanging down. The cut to her finger was still bleeding, but not with any significance. Perhaps my colleague is correct in assuming that she wrapped the wound in a paper towel."

Amanda leaned down to look at the bloodstain, but Will was more interested in the chair. Evelyn's hands had been tied behind her back. He used his foot to tilt the chair forward so he could see the bottom of the thatched seat. There was a mark underneath, an arrowhead, drawn in blood.

Will looked out into the room, trying to figure out what the arrow was pointing to. The couch directly across from the chair was gutted, as was the wingback chair to the side. The hardwood floors meant nothing could be hidden under a carpet. Was Evelyn pointing to something in the backyard?

He heard a hiss of air through teeth. Will glanced up to find Amanda giving him such a searing look that he dropped the chair back into place without his brain being aware of what his foot was doing. She gave a slight shake of her head, indicating he should keep his mouth shut about the find. Will glanced at Charlie. They had all three seen the arrow under the chair while Mittal, oblivious, waxed poetic on the efficacy of fingerprinting on porous versus nonporous surfaces.

Charlie opened his mouth to speak, but Amanda talked over him. "Dr. Mittal, in your opinion, was the glass door broken with a found object, such as a rock or lawn ornament?" She glared at Charlie, and Will thought if she was capable of shooting lasers from her eyes, they would've sealed Charlie's mouth shut. "I'm just wondering how well this attack was planned. Did they bring something to break the glass? Did they surround the house? If so, did they know the layout ahead of time?"

Mittal frowned, because these were questions none of them were capable of answering. "Dr. Wagner, these are not scenarios that can be forensically evaluated."

"Well, let's just toss it around and see what sticks. Was a brick used to break the glass?"

Charlie started shaking his head. Will recognized the internal conflict. Like it or not, this was Mittal's crime scene, and there was evidence under the chair—possibly important evidence—that the man had missed. Charlie was obviously torn. As with most things that had to do with Amanda, there was the right thing to do and then there was the thing that she was ordering him to do. Each decision had its consequence.

Mittal was shaking his head, too, but only because Amanda wasn't making sense. "Dr. Wagner, we have searched every inch of this crime scene, and I am telling you we have not found any more items of substance than what I have already detailed."

Will knew for a fact they hadn't checked every inch. He asked, "Has anyone checked the Malibu?"

That took Charlie's mind off his troubles. His brow furrowed. Will had made the same mistake with Faith's Mini. All of the violence had taken place inside the house, but the cars were still part of the crime scene.

Amanda was the first to move. She had made her way out to the carport and opened the driver's side door of the Malibu before anyone thought to ask her what she was doing.

Mittal said, "Please, we've not yet processed—"

She gave him a withering look. "Did you think to check the trunk?"

His stunned silence was enough of an answer. Amanda popped the trunk. Will was standing just inside the kitchen doorway, which gave him a raised view of the scene. There were several plastic grocery bags in the trunk, their contents flattened down by the dead body on top of them. As in the kitchen, blood coated everything—soaking into the cereal box, dripping down the plastic wrap around the hamburger buns. The dead man was a big guy. His body was folded almost in two where he'd been bent to fit into the space. A deep gash in his bald head showed splintered bone and bits of brain. His jeans were wrinkled. His shirtsleeves were rolled up. There was a Los Mexicanos tattoo on his forearm.

Evelyn's gentleman friend.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison was located in Jackson, about an hour south of Atlanta. The drive was usually a quick shot down I-75, but the Atlanta Motor Speedway was having some kind of exhibition event that slowed traffic to a crawl. Undeterred, Amanda kept hopping on and off the shoulder, jerking the wheel quickly to pass groups of sluggish cars. The SUV's tires made a strumming sound as they grazed the rumble strips meant to deter drivers from leaving the roadway. Between the noise and the vibration, Will found himself fighting an unexpected wave of motion sickness.

Finally, they made it through the worst of the traffic. At the speedway exit, Amanda took one last dash onto the shoulder, then popped the SUV back onto the road. The tires skipped. The chassis shook. Will rolled down the window for some fresh air to help settle his stomach. The wind slapped his face so hard that he felt his skin ripple.

Amanda pressed the button to roll the window back up, giving him the look she reserved for stupid people and children. They were going over a hundred miles an hour. Will was lucky he hadn't been sucked out the window.

She let out a long sigh as she stared back at the road. One hand rested in her lap, while the other was firmly wrapped around the steering wheel. She was wearing her usual power suit: a bright blue skirt and matching jacket with a light-colored blouse underneath. Her high-heel shoes exactly matched the color of her suit. Her fingernails were trim but manicured. Her hair was its usual helmet of salt-and-pepper gray. Most days, Amanda seemed to have more energy than all the men on her team. Now, she looked tired, and Will could see the worry lines around her eyes were more pronounced.

She said, "Tell me about Spivey."

Will tried to click his brain back over to his old case against Captain Evelyn Mitchell's team. Boyd Spivey was the former lead detective on the narcotics squad who was currently biding his time on death row. Will had talked to the man only once before Spivey's lawyers advised him to keep his mouth shut. "I don't find it hard to believe he beat someone to death with his fists. He was a big guy, taller than me, carried about fifty more pounds, all of it muscle."

"Gym rat?"

"I'd guess steroids gave him a boost."

"How did that work for him?"

"They made him uncontrollably angry," Will recalled. "He's not as smart as he thinks, but I wasn't able to get him to confess, so maybe I'm not either."

"You still sent him to prison."

"He sent himself to prison. His house in the city was paid for. His house at the lake was paid for. All three of his kids were in private school. His wife worked ten hours a week and drove a top-of-the-line Mercedes. His mistress drove a BMW. He kept his brand new Porsche 911 parked in her driveway."

"Men and their cars," she mumbled. "He doesn't sound very smart to me."

"He didn't think anyone would ask questions."

"Generally, they don't."

"Spivey was good at keeping his mouth shut."

"As I recall, all of them were."

She was right. In a corruption case, the usual strategy was to find the weakest member and persuade him or her to turn on his or her fellow conspirators in exchange for a lighter sentence. The six detectives belonging to Evelyn Mitchell's narcotics squad had proven immune to this strategy. None of them would turn on the other, and all of them routinely insisted that Captain Mitchell had nothing to do with their alleged crimes. They went out of their way to protect their boss. It was both admirable and incredibly frustrating.

Will said, "Spivey worked on Evelyn's squad for twelve years—longer than any of them."

"She trusted him."

"Yes," Will agreed. "Two peas in a pod."

Amanda cut him a sharp look. "Careful."

Will felt his jaw tighten so hard that the bone ached. He didn't see how ignoring the most important part of this case was going to get them anywhere. Amanda knew as well as Will that her friend was guilty as hell. Evelyn hadn't lived large, but like Spivey, she'd been stupid in her own way.

Faith's father had been an insurance broker, solidly middle class with the usual kinds of debts that people had: car payments, mortgage, credit cards. Yet, during Will's investigation, he'd found an out-of-state bank account in Bill Mitchell's name. At the time, the man had been dead for six years. Though the account balance always hovered around ten thousand dollars, the activity showed monthly deposits since his death that totaled up to almost sixty thousand dollars. It was clearly a shell account, the kind of thing prosecutors called a smoking gun. With Bill dead, Evelyn was the only signatory. Money was taken out and deposited with her ATM card at an Atlanta branch of the bank. Her dead husband wasn't the one who was keeping the activities spread apart and the deposits shy of the limit that would throw up a red flag at Homeland Security.

As far as Will knew, Evelyn Mitchell had never been asked about the account. He'd figured it would come out during her trial, but her trial had never happened. There had been a press conference announcing her retirement, and that was the end of the story.

Until now.

Amanda flipped down the visor to block the sun. Clipped to the underside were a couple of yellow claim tickets that looked like they were from a dry cleaner. The sun wasn't doing her any favors. She didn't look tired anymore. She looked haggard.

She said, "Something's bothering you."

He resisted uttering the biggest "duh" ever vocalized in the history of the world.

"Not that," she said, as if she could read his mind. "Faith didn't call you for help because she knew that she was going to do the wrong thing."

Will looked out the window.

"You would've made her wait for backup."

He hated the relief her words brought.

"She's always been headstrong."

He felt the need to say, "She didn't do the wrong thing."

"That's my boy."

Will watched the trees along the highway blend into a sea of green. "Do you think there's going to be a ransom?"

"I hope so." They both knew that a ransom pointed to a living hostage, or at least the opportunity to demand proof of life.

He said, "This feels personal."

"How so?"

He shook his head. "The way the house was torn up. There's mad, and then there's furious."

"I don't imagine the old girl sat by quietly while they performed their search."

"Probably not." Evelyn Mitchell was no Amanda Wagner, but Will could easily see her taunting the men who were tearing up her house. You didn't get to be one of the first female captains on the Atlanta police force by being sweet. "They were obviously looking for money."

"Why do you say that?"

"Clams—the last word Ricardo said to Faith before he died. You said it's slang for money. Ergo, they were looking for money."

"In the silverware drawer?"

Another good point. Cash was nice, but it was cumbersome. A pile worth kidnapping an ex-Atlanta police captain for would fill several silverware drawers.

He said, "The arrow was pointing into the backyard."

"What arrow?"

Will suppressed a groan. She wasn't usually this obvious. "The arrow drawn in Evelyn's blood underneath the chair she was duct-taped to. I know you saw it. You hissed at me like an air compressor."

"You really should work on your metaphors." She was silent for a beat, probably considering the most circuitous route to take him to nowhere. "You think Evelyn has buried treasure in her backyard?"

He had to admit this was unlikely, especially considering the Mitchell backyard was on full display to the rest of the neighbors, most of whom were retired and seemed to have ample time to spy. Besides, Will couldn't picture Faith's mother out with a shovel and a flashlight in the middle of the night. Then again, it wasn't like she could put it in the bank.

"Safe deposit box," Will tried. "Maybe they were looking for a key."

"Evelyn would have to go to the bank and sign in to get access. They'd compare her signature, ask for her ID. Our kidnapper had to know her picture would be on every television station the minute he took her."

Will silently conceded the point. Besides, the same rule applied. A large amount of cash took up space. Diamonds and gold were more for Hollywood movies. In real life, stolen jewels fetched pennies on the dollar.

She asked, "What about the crime scene? Do you think Charlie got it right?"

Will went on the defense. "Mittal did most of the talking."

"Okay, you've covered Charlie's ass. Now answer my question."

"The Los Texicanos in the trunk of the Malibu, Evelyn's gentleman friend. He throws it all out.”

She nodded. “He wasn’t stabbed. He died from a shot to the head, plus, he’s B-positive. That still leaves us with our B-negative out there with a nasty wound.”

“That’s not what I’m talking about.” Will resisted the urge to add, “and you know it.” Amanda wasn’t just tying his hands behind his back. She was blindfolding him and sending him toward the edge of a cliff. Her refusal to talk about or even acknowledge Evelyn Mitchell’s sordid past wasn’t going to help Faith and it sure as hell wasn’t going to get her mother back in one piece. Evelyn had worked in narcotics. She was obviously in contact, almost daily, with a higher-up in Los Texicanos, the gang that ran the drug trade in and out of Atlanta. They should be back in the city talking to the gang units and putting together the last few weeks of Evelyn’s life, not making a fool’s errand to visit a guy who had nothing to lose and a history of stubborn silence.

“Come on, Dr. Trent,” Amanda chided. “Don’t make me pull teeth.”

Will let his ego get in the way for a few more seconds before saying, “Evelyn’s gentleman friend. His wallet was missing. He didn’t have any ID or money on him. The only thing in his pockets was the key to Evelyn’s Malibu. She must’ve given it to him.”

“Keep going.”

“She was making lunch for two people. There were four slices of bread in the toaster. Faith was late. Evelyn didn’t know what time she’d be home, but she would assume Faith would call when she was on her way. There were groceries in the trunk of the Malibu. The receipt says Evelyn used her debit card at the Kroger at 12:02. The gentleman was bringing in the groceries while she fixed lunch.”

Amanda smiled. “I often forget how smart you are, but then something like this happens and it makes me realize why I hired you.”

Will ignored the backhanded compliment. “So, Evelyn’s making lunch. She starts to wonder where her gentleman friend is. She goes outside and finds his body in the trunk. She grabs Emma and hides her in the shed. If she’d grabbed Emma after cutting her hand, like Dr. Mittal said, there would’ve been blood somewhere on the car seat. Evelyn’s strong, but she’s not Hercules. The car seat, even without a baby in it, is pretty heavy. She couldn’t dead lift one of those things off the counter with one hand—at least not safely. She’d have to cup the bottom with her free hand. Emma’s little, but she’s got some heft to her.”

Amanda supplied, “Evelyn spent time in the shed. She moved the blankets around. There’s no blood on them. She dialed the combination lock on the safe. There’s no blood on the dial. The floor is clean. She was bleeding after she locked the door.”

“I’m not an expert on kitchen injuries, but you don’t generally cut your ring finger when you’re slicing something. It’s usually the thumb or the index finger.”

“Another good point.” Amanda checked the rearview mirror and changed lanes. “Okay, what did she do next?”

“Like you said. Evelyn hides the baby, then gets her gun out of the safe, goes back into the house and shoots Kwon, who’s waiting to ambush her from the laundry room. Then, she’s overpowered by a second man, probably our mystery blood type B-negative. Evelyn’s gun gets knocked out of her hand during the struggle. She stabs B-negative, but there’s a third guy, Mr. Hawaiian Shirt. He gets Evelyn's gun off the floor and stops the struggle. He asks her where the thing is that they're looking for. She tells them to go to hell. She's duct-taped to the chair while they search the house."

"That sounds plausible."

It sounded confusing. There were so many bad guys that Will was having a hard time keeping track of them. Two Asians, one Hispanic, possibly two—maybe a third man, race unknown—a house being searched for God only knew what and a missing sixty-three-year-old ex-cop who had her share of secrets.

Then there was the even larger question that Will knew better than to ask: why hadn't Evelyn called for help? By Will's count, she'd had at least two opportunities to make a call or run for help: when she first heard the noise, and after she shot Hironobu Kwon in the laundry room. And yet, she had stayed.

"What are you thinking?"

Will knew better than to give an honest answer. "I'm wondering how they got her out of the house without anyone seeing."

Amanda reminded him, "You're assuming Roz Levy is being forthcoming."

"Do you think she's involved in this?"

"I think she's a wily old bitch who wouldn't piss on you if your hair was on fire."

Will supposed the venom in her tone came from experience.

Amanda said, "This wasn't spur-of-the-moment. Some planning went into it. They didn't all walk there. There was a car somewhere, maybe a van. There's a dogleg alley jutting into Little John Trail. They would've gone out the back, exiting into Evelyn's backyard. You follow the fence line between the neighbors and you're there in two minutes."

"How many men do you think were there?"

"We've got three dead on scene. There's the injured B-negative and at least one able-bodied man. There's no way Evelyn would've gone to a second location without a fight. She would've risked being shot first. There had to be someone there who was strong enough to tie her up or subdue her."

Will didn't add that they could've just as easily injured or killed her and removed the body. "We'll know for sure when we get the fingerprints. They all must've touched something."

Abruptly, Amanda changed the subject. "Have you and Faith ever talked about your case against her mother?"

"Not really. I've never told her about the bank account, because there's no reason. She assumes I was wrong. A lot of people do. My case was never made in court. Evelyn retired with full benefits. It's not a hard conclusion to jump to."

She nodded as if she was giving her approval. "The man in the trunk, the one you call Evelyn's gentleman friend. Let's talk about him."

"If he was bringing in groceries, that implies they had a personal relationship."

"That's certainly possible."

Will thought about the guy. He'd been shot in the back of the head. His wallet and ID were not the only things missing from his person. He didn't have a cell phone. He didn't have the thick gold watch he'd been wearing in the picture Mrs. Levy had taken. His clothes were nondescript—Nikes with Dr. Scholl's orthopedic inserts, J. Crew jeans, and a Banana Republic shirt that had cost a lot of money considering he hadn't bothered to iron it. There was a smattering of gray in the black goatee on his chin. The stubble on his shiny head indicated he was hiding male pattern baldness rather than making a bold statement in style. Except for the Los Mexicanos star on his forearm, he could've been a stockbroker having a midlife crisis.

Amanda said, "I've checked with Narcotics. There've been some grumblings about the Asians making a play for the powder cocaine trade. It's been up for grabs since the BMF went down."

The Black Mafia Family. They had controlled coke sales from Atlanta to LA, with Detroit in between. "That's a lot of money. The Family was pulling down hundreds of millions of dollars a year."

"Los Mexicanos was calling the shots. They've always been suppliers, not distributors. It's a smart way to play it. That's why they've survived all these years. Despite what Charlie thinks about race, they don't care if the dealer is black or brown or purple, so long as the money's green."

Will had never worked a major drug case. "I don't know much about the organization."

"Los Mexicanos started back in the mid-sixties at the Atlanta Pen. The population demographic back then was almost the exact reverse of what it is now—seventy percent white, thirty black. Crack cocaine changed that overnight. It worked faster than forced busing. There were still only a handful of Mexicans in the joint, and they ganged up to keep from getting their throats cut. You know how it goes."

Will nodded. Just about every gang in America had started as a group of minorities, be they Irish, Jewish, Italian, or other, banding together for survival. It generally took a couple of years before they started doing worse than was done to them. "What's the structure?"

"Pretty loose. No one's going to chart like MS-13." She was referring to what was often called the most dangerous gang in the world. Their organizational structure rivaled the military's, and their loyalty was so fierce that they'd never been successfully infiltrated.

Amanda explained, "In the early years, Los Mexicanos was on the front page of the paper every single day, sometimes in both editions. Shootouts in the street, heroin, pot, numbers, prostitution, robbery. Their calling card was branding children. They didn't just go after the person who crossed them. They'd go after a daughter, son, niece, nephew. They'd cut open their faces, once across the forehead, then a vertical line down the nose to the chin."

Without thinking, Will put his hand to the scar along his jaw.

"There was one point during the Atlanta Child Murders investigation when Los Mexicanos was at the top of our list. This was early on, the fall of '79. I was the glorified assistant of the senior liaison for Fulton, Cobb, and Clayton. Evelyn was on the Atlanta task force, mostly fetching coffee until it was time to talk to the parents, then it all fell to her. The general consensus was that the Mexicanos were trying to send a broader message to the clientele. It seems ludicrous now, but at the time, we were hoping it was them." She switched on the blinker and changed lanes. "You were around four then, so you won't remember, but it was a very tense time. The entire metro area was terrified."

"Sounds like it," he said, surprised she knew his age.

"It wasn't long after the Child Murders that one of the top Mexicanos was taken down during an internal struggle. They're tight-knit. We never found out what happened or who took over, but we know the new guy was much more business-oriented. No more violence for the sake of violence. He prioritized the business, taking out the riskier component. His motto was to keep the coke flowing and the blood off the streets. Once they went underground, we were glad to ignore them."

"Who's in charge now?"

"Ignatio Ortiz is the only name we have. He's the face of the gang. There are two others, but they keep an incredibly low profile and you'll never find all three of them together in the same place. Before you ask, Ortiz is in Phillips State Prison serving his third year of seven without parole for attempted manslaughter."

"Attempted?" That didn't sound very gangbanger.

"Came home and found his wife tossing the sheets with his brother. Story goes he missed on purpose."

Will assumed Ortiz had no trouble running his business from prison. "Is he worth talking to?"

"Even if we had cause, he wouldn't sit with us in a room without his lawyer, who would insist that his client is just an average businessman who let his passion get the best of him."

"Has he ever been arrested before?"

"A few times in his younger days, but nothing major."

"So, the gang's still under the radar."

"They come out every now and then to school the younger kids. Do you remember the Father's Day murder in Buckhead last year?"

"The guy who had his throat slit open in front of his kids?"

She nodded. "Thirty years ago, they would've killed the children, too. One might say they've gotten softer in their old age."

"I'd hardly call that soft."

"Inside the joint, the Mexicanos are known as throat slitters."

"The gentleman in the trunk is high up on the food chain."

"Why do you think that?"

"He's only got one tattoo." Young gang members generally used their bodies as a canvas to illustrate their lives, etching tattoos of teardrops under their eyes for every murder, wrapping their elbows and shoulders in cobwebs to show that they'd done time. The tattoos were always rendered in blue ink culled from ballpoint pens, what was called "joint ink," and they always told a story. Unless their story was so bad that it didn't need to be told.

Will said, "A clean body means money, power, control. The gentleman is older, probably early sixties. That puts him in on the ground floor of Mexicanos. His age is his badge of honor. This isn't the kind of lifestyle that ensures longevity."

"You don't get old by being stupid."

"You don't get old by being in a gang."

"We can only hope the APD shares the gentleman's identity with us when they manage to track it down."

Will glanced at her. She stared ahead at the road. He had a niggling suspicion that Amanda already knew who this man was, and exactly what part he played in the Mexicanos hierarchy. There was something about the way she'd folded Mrs. Levy's photograph in her pocket, and he was pretty sure that she had given the old woman some kind of coded message to keep her story to herself.

He asked, "Do you ever listen to AC/DC?"

"Do I look like I listen to AC/DC?"

"It's a metal band." He didn't tell her they'd created one of the bestselling albums in the history of music. "They've got a song called 'Back in Black.' It was playing when Faith pulled up. I checked the CDs at the house. Evelyn didn't have it in her collection, and the player was empty when I ejected the tray."

"What's it about?"

"Well, the obvious. Being back. Wearing black. It was recorded after the original lead singer of the group died from a drug and alcohol bender."

"It's always sad when someone dies of a cliché."

Will thought about the lyrics, which he happened to know by heart. "It's about resurrection. Transformation. Coming back from a bad place and telling people who might've underestimated you, or made fun of you, that you're not taking it anymore. Like, you're cool now. You're wearing black. You're a bad guy. Ready to fight back." He suddenly realized why he'd worn out the record when he was a teenager. "Or something like that." He swallowed. "It could mean other things."

"Hm" was all she would give him.

He drummed his fingers on the armrest. "How did you meet Evelyn?"

"We went to Negro school together."

Will nearly choked on his tongue.

She chuckled at his reaction to what must have been a well-used line. "That's what they called it back in the stone ages—the Negro Women's Traffic School. Women were trained separately from men. Our job was to check meters and issue citations for illegally parked cars. Sometimes, we were allowed to talk to prostitutes, but only if the boys allowed us, and usually there was some crude joke about it. Evelyn and I were the only two whites in a group of thirty that graduated that year." There was a fond smile on her lips. "We were ready to change the world."

Will knew better than to say what he was thinking, which was that Amanda was a hell of a lot older than she looked.

She obviously guessed his thoughts. "Give me a break, Will. I joined in '73. The Atlanta you know today was fought for by the women in those classes. Black officers weren't even authorized to arrest whites until '62. They didn't have a precinct building. They had to hang out at the Butler Street YMCA until someone thought to call them. And it was even worse if you were a woman—two strikes, with the third hanging over your head." Her voice took on a solemn tone. "Every single day was a struggle to do right when everything around you was wrong."

"Sounds like you and Evelyn went through a trial by fire."

"You have no idea."

"Then tell me about it."

She laughed again, but this time at his fumble. "Are you trying to interrogate me, Dr. Trent?"

"I'm wondering why you're not talking about the fact that Evelyn obviously had a close, personal relationship with an old-school Texicano who ended up murdered in the trunk of her car.”

She stared ahead at the road. “It does seem odd, doesn’t it?”

“How can we work this case if we’re not going to at least admit what really happened?” She didn’t respond. “We’ll keep it between us, all right? No one else has to know. She’s your friend. I understand that. I spent a lot of time with her myself. She seems like a very agreeable person, and she obviously loves Faith.”

“There’s a ‘but’ in there somewhere.”

“She was taking money like the rest of her team. She must’ve known the Mexicanos from—”

Amanda cut him off. “Speaking of Mexicanos, let’s go back to Ricardo.”

Will clenched his fist, wanting to punch something.

Amanda let him stew in silence for a while. “I’ve known you an awful long time, Will. I need you to trust me on a few things.”

“Do I have a choice?”

“Not really, but I’m giving you an opportunity here to give me a return on all that benefit of the doubt I’ve deposited into your account over the years.”

His inclination was to tell her exactly where she could put her benefit, but Will had never been the type of man to say the first thing that came into his head. “You’re treating me like a dog on a leash.”

“That’s one interpretation.” She paused for a moment. “Did it ever occur to you that I might be protecting you?”

He scratched the side of his jaw again, feeling the scar that had been ripped into his skin years ago. Will generally shied away from introspection, but a blind man could see that he had strangely dysfunctional relationships with all of the women in his life. Faith was like a bossy older sister. Amanda was the worst mother he’d never had. Angie was a combination of both, which was unsettling for obvious reasons. They could be mean and controlling and Angie especially could be cruel, but Will had never once thought that any of them truly wished him harm. And Amanda was right about at least one thing: she had always protected Will, even on the rare occasion when it put her job at risk.

He said, “We need to call all the Cadillac dealerships in the metro area. The gentleman wasn’t driving a Honda. That’s an expensive ride. There are probably only a handful of those Cadillacs on the road. I think it has a manual transmission. That’s rare in a four-door.”

To his surprise, she said, “Good idea. Set it up.”

Will reached into his pocket, remembering too late that he didn’t have his phone. Or his gun and badge. Or his car for that matter.

Amanda tossed him her phone as she took the exit without so much as tapping the brake. “What’s going on with you and Sara Linton?”

He flipped open her phone. “We’re friends.”

“I worked a case with her husband a few years ago.”

“That’s nice.”

“Those are some mighty big shoes to fill, friend.”

Will dialed information and asked for the number of the closest Cadillac dealership to Atlanta.

As he followed Amanda past the corridor that led to the death chamber, Will had to admit, if only to himself, that he hated visiting prisons—not just the D&C, but any prison. He could handle the constant threat of violence that made every inmate facility feel like a simmering pot that had been left too long on the stove. He could handle the noise and the filth and the dead-eyed stares. What he couldn't take was the feeling of helplessness that came from confinement.

The inmates ran their drug trade and other rackets, but at the end of the day, they had no power over the basic things that made them human beings. They couldn't take a shower when they wanted. They couldn't go to the bathroom without an audience. They could be strip-searched or cavity-searched at any time. They couldn't go for a walk or take a book from the library without permission. Their cells were constantly checked for contraband, which could be anything from a car magazine to a roll of dental floss. They ate on someone else's schedule. The lights were turned off and on by someone else's clock. By far the worst part was the constant handling they received. Guards were always touching them—wrenching their arms behind their backs, tapping their heads during count, pushing them forward or yanking them back. Nothing belonged to them, not even their own bodies.

It was like the worst foster home on earth, only with more bars.

The D&C was the largest prison in Georgia and, among other things, served as one of the main processing centers for all inmates entering the state penal system. There were eight cellblocks with single and double bunk beds in addition to eight more dormitories that warehoused the overflow. As part of their intake, all state prisoners were subjected to a general medical exam, psych evaluation, behavioral testing, and a threat assessment to assign a security rating that determined whether they belonged in a minimum, medium, or maximum facility.

If they were lucky, this diagnosing and classification process took around six weeks before they were assigned to another prison or moved to the permanent facilities at D&C. Until then, the inmates were on twenty-three-hour lockdown, which meant that but for one hour a day, they were confined to their cells. No cigarettes, coffee, or soda were allowed. They could buy only one newspaper a week. No books were allowed, not even the Bible. There were no TVs. No radios. No phones. There was a yard, but inmates were allowed out only three days a week, and that was weather permitting and only for whatever time was left on their one hour a day. Only long-term residents were allowed visitors, and then it was in a room that was halved by a metal mesh that required you to yell to be heard over the voices of the other visitors. No touching. No hugging. No contact whatsoever.

Maximum security.

There was a reason suicide rates in prisons were three times higher than on the outside. It was heartbreaking to think about their living conditions, until you read some of their files. Rape of a minor. Aggravated sodomy with a baseball bat. Domestic violence. Kidnapping. Assault. Shooting. Beating. Mutilating. Stabbing. Slashing. Scalding.

But the really bad guys were sitting on death row. They'd been convicted of killings so heinous that the only way the state knew how to deal with them was to put them to death. They were segregated from the rest of the population. Their lives were even more limited than the intake prisoners'. Total lockdown.

Total isolation. No hour a day in the sunshine. No shared meals. No stepping past the iron bars that held them in their cells except once a week for a shower. Days could pass without hearing another man's voice. Years could pass without feeling another person's touch.

This was where Boyd Spivey was housed. This was where the former highly decorated detective was living while he waited to die.

Will felt his shoulders hunch as the gate leading to the death row cells swung closed behind him. Prison design lent itself to wide, open corridors where a running man could easily be taken out with a rifle from a hundred yards away. The corners were sharp ninety-degree angles that deliberately discouraged loitering. The ceilings were high to trap the constant heat from so many sweating bodies. Everything was meshed or barred—windows, doors, overhead lights, switches.

Despite the spring climate, the temperature inside hovered somewhere around eighty. Will instantly regretted the wicking nature of his running shorts under his heavy jeans, which clearly were not meant to be worn in tandem. Amanda, as always, seemed right at home, no matter the greasy-looking bars or the panic buttons that lined the walls every ten feet. D&C's permanent inmates were classified as violent offenders. A lot of them had nothing to lose and everything to gain by engaging in willful acts of violence. Taking the life of a deputy director of the GBI would be a big feather in any man's cap. Will didn't know how they felt about cops who took down other cops, but he didn't imagine that was much of a distinction for inmates looking to raise their status.

For this reason, they were escorted by two guards who were approximately the size of commercial refrigerators. One walked in front of Amanda and the other loomed behind Will, making him feel practically dainty. No one was allowed to carry guns into the prison, but each guard had a full array of weaponry on their belts: pepper spray, steel batons, and worst of all a set of jangling keys that seemed to announce with every footstep that the only way out of this place was through thirty locked doors.

They turned a corner and found a man in a gray suit standing outside yet another locked door. As with every other door in the place, there was a large, red panic button beside the jamb.

Amanda extended her hand. "Warden Peck, thank you for arranging this visit on such short notice."

"Always glad to help, Deputy Director." He had a gravelly old man's voice that fit perfectly with his weathered, mahogany face and slicked-back gray mane. "You know you need only pick up the phone."

"Would it be a bother to ask if you could print out a list of all the visitors Spivey's had since he entered the system?"

Peck obviously thought it was a bother, but he covered for it well. "Spivey's been in four different facilities. I'll have to make some calls."

"Thank you so much for going through the trouble." She indicated Will. "This is Agent Trent. He'll need to be in the observation room. He's got a somewhat checkered past with the prisoner."

"That's fine. I should warn you that we got Mr. Spivey's death notice last week. He's to be executed on the first of September."

"Does he know?"

Peck nodded gravely, and Will could see that he didn't like this part of his job. "It's my policy to give the inmates as much information as we can as soon as we can. The news has sobered Mr. Spivey considerably. They generally become quite docile during this time, but don't be lulled into complacency. If at any point you feel a threat, stand and leave the room immediately. Don't touch him. Avoid being within reaching distance. For your safety, you'll be monitored through the cameras and one of my men will be outside the door at all times. Just keep in mind that these men are quick, and they have absolutely nothing to lose."

"I'll just have to be quicker." She winked at him as if this was some kind of frat party where the boys might get rowdy. "I'm ready when you are."

Will was led one door down to the observation room. The space was small and windowless, the sort of prison office that could've easily passed for a storage closet. There were three monitors stacked on a metal desk, each showing a different angle of Boyd Spivey in the adjacent room. He was shackled to a chair that was undoubtedly bolted to the floor.

Four years ago, Spivey hadn't exactly been handsome, but he'd carried himself with a cop's swagger that made up for his deficits. His reputation was as a practical joker, but a good cop—the guy you'd want to have your back when things went from bad to worse. His file was full of commendations. Even after he'd taken a deal to plead guilty for lesser time, there were men who worked in his station house who refused to believe that Spivey was dirty.

Now, everything about the man said "con." He was as hard looking as a piece of honed granite. His skin was pockmarked and puffy. A long, ratty ponytail draped down his back. Prison tattoos decorated his forearms and twisted around his neck. His thick wrists were bolted to a chrome bar welded to the center of the table. His legs were crossed at the ankles. The chains around his leg irons were tightened into a straight line. Will guessed Boyd passed his days working out in his cell. His bright orange uniform was busting at the seams around his overly muscled arms and wide chest.

Will wondered if the extra weight was a good or bad thing as far as the man's impending execution was concerned. After several gruesome mishaps with the electric chair, including a man whose chest had burst into flames, Georgia had finally been ordered by the state supreme court to retire Old Sparky. Now, instead of being shaved, stuffed with cotton, and fried to a crisp, the condemned were strapped to a table and given a series of drugs that stopped their breathing, their hearts, and finally their lives. Boyd Spivey would probably get a larger dose than most. It would take a powerful combination of drugs to put down such a large man.

A crackly cough came through the tiny speakers on the desk. In the next room, Will could see Boyd staring straight ahead at Amanda, who was leaning against the wall despite the chair that was opposite his at the table.

The tone of Boyd's voice was surprisingly high for a man of his size. "You too scared to sit across from me?"

Will had never known Amanda to show fear, and now was no exception. "I don't mean to be rude, Boyd, but you've got an awful smell."

He looked down at the table. "They only let me shower once a week."

Her voice had a teasing lilt. "Now, that's cruel and unusual."

Will checked the camera that was zoomed in on Boyd's face. There was a smile playing at his lips.

Amanda's high heels echoed in the concrete room as she walked over to the chair. The metal legs scraped across the floor. She sat down, primly crossing her legs, letting her hands rest in her lap.

Boyd let his eyes linger. "You look good, Mandy."

"I've been keeping myself busy."

"With what?"

"You've heard about Evelyn."

"We don't have TVs in here."

She laughed. "You probably knew I was coming here before I did. This place could put CNN out of business."

He shrugged, as if it was out of his hands. "Is Faith okay?"

"Tip-top."

"I hear she K-fived both guys."

A K-five indicated the center ring on a paper target, the kill shot. Amanda told him, "One was to the head."

"Ouch." He faked a cringe. "How's Emma?"

"A handful. I'm sorry I don't have a picture for you. I left my purse in the car."

"The pedophiles would've stolen it anyway."

"What an appalling lack of decorum."

He smiled with his teeth. They were chipped and broken, the sort of souvenirs you got from fighting dirty. "I remember the day Faith got her gold shield." He sat back in his chair, shackles dragging across the table. "Ev was beaming like a Maglite."

"I think we all were," Amanda admitted, and Will let it sink in that his boss knew Boyd Spivey a hell of a lot better than she'd let on in the car. "How've you been, Boyd? They treating you okay?"

"Okay enough." He smiled again, then stopped himself. "Sorry about my teeth. Didn't see any point in getting them fixed."

"It's no worse than the smell."

He gave her a sheepish glance. "It's been a long time since I've heard a woman's voice."

"I hate to say it, but that's the nicest thing a man has said to me all year."

He laughed. "Hard times for us both, I guess."

Amanda let the moment stretch out for a few more seconds.

He said, "I guess we should get to the reason you're here."

"We can do whatever you want." Her tone implied she could talk to him all day, but Boyd got the message.

He asked, "Who took her?"

"We think it was a group of Asians."

His brow furrowed. Despite the orange jumper and the hellhole he called home, a piece of Boyd Spivey was still a cop. "Yellow doesn't have traction in the city. Brown's been grooming black to do its bidding again."

"Brown's involved in this, but I'm not sure how."

He nodded, indicating he was taking all this in but didn't know what to make of it. "Brown don't like getting their hands dirty."

"Shit rolls downhill."

"Did they send a sign?" Proof of life. Amanda shook her head. "What do they want to trade her for?"

"You tell me."

He was silent.

She said, "We both know Evelyn was clean, but could there be blowback?"

He glanced at the camera, then looked down at his hands. "I can't see it. She was under the umbrella. No matter what happened, ain't one man from the team wouldn't still lay down his life for her. You don't turn your back on family."

Will had always thought Evelyn was protected on both sides of the law. Hearing it validated was no consolation.

Amanda told the man, "You know Chuck Finn and Demarcus Alexander are already out?"

He nodded. "Chuck stayed down South. Demarcus went out to LA where his mama's people live."

Amanda must have already known the answer, but she asked him, "Are they keeping their noses clean?"

"Chuck's got a belly habit for back-to-backs." Meaning he was shooting heroin, then smoking crack chasers. "Brother's gonna end up back in the joint if he don't die on the street first."

"Has he pissed anybody off?"

"Not that I've heard. Chuck's a cotton shooter, Mandy. He'd fuck his own mama for the swill in a spoon."

"And Demarcus?"

"I guess he's as clean as you can be with a felony rap hanging over your head."

"I hear he's working on getting his electrician's license."

"Good for him." Boyd seemed genuinely pleased. "Have you talked to Hump and Hop?" He meant Ben Humphrey and Adam Hopkins, his fellow detectives who were currently serving time at Valdosta State Prison.

Amanda gauged her words. "Should I talk to them?"

"It'd be worth a try, but I doubt they're still keyed in. They got four years left. Keeping their noses clean, and I don't guess they'd be too forthcoming with you considering your hand in their current incarceration." He shrugged. "Me, I got nothing to lose."

"I heard you got your date."

"September first." The room went quiet, as if whatever air was left had been sucked out. Boyd cleared his throat. His Adam's apple bobbed in his neck. "Gives you perspective on things."

Amanda leaned forward. "Like what?"

"Like not seeing my kids grow up. Never having the chance to hold my grandbabies." His throat worked again. "I loved being on the street, chasing down the bad guys. I had this dream the other night. We were in the raid van. Evelyn had that stupid song playing—you remember the one?"

"'Would I Lie to You?' "

"Annie Lennox. Stone cold. I could still hear it playing when I woke up. Pounding in my head, even though I ain't heard music in—what?—four years?" He shook his head sadly. "It's like a drug, ain't it? You bust down that door, you clear out all the trash, and then you wake up the next day and do it again." He opened his hands as much as he could with the shackles. "They paid us for that shit? Come on. We shoulda been paying them."

She nodded, but Will was thinking about the fact that they had managed to pay themselves in myriad other ways.

Boyd said, "I was supposed to be a good man. But, this place ..." He glanced around the room. "It darkens your soul."

"If you'd stayed clean, you'd be out by now."

He stared blankly at the wall behind her. "They got it on tape—me going after those guys." There was no humor in the smile that came to his lips, just darkness and loss. "I had it in my head that it went down different, but they played it at my trial. Tape don't lie, right?"

"Right."

He cleared his throat twice before he could speak. "There was this guy beating that guard with his fists, wrapping a towel around the brother's neck. Eyes glowing like something out of a freak show. Screaming like a goddamn animal. It got me to thinking about my time on the streets. All those bad guys I took down, all those men I thought were monsters, and then I look at that guy on the tape, that monster taking down that guard, and I realize that it's me." His voice was almost a whisper. "That was me beating that man. That was me killing two guys—over what? And that's when it hit me: I've turned into everything I fought against all those years." He sniffed. There were tears in his eyes. "You become what you hate."

"Sometimes."

Will couldn't tell if Boyd was feeling sorry for the men he'd killed or sorry for himself. Probably, it was a combination of both. Everyone knew they were going to die eventually, but Boyd Spivey had the actual date and time. He knew the method. He knew when he would eat his last meal, take his last crap, say his last prayer. And then they would come for him and he would have to stand up and walk on his own two feet toward the last place he would ever lay down his head.

Boyd had to clear his throat again before he could speak. "I hear Yellow's been encroaching down the highway. You should talk to Ling-Ling over in Chambodia." Will didn't recognize the name, but he knew that Chambodia was the term used to describe the stretch of Buford Highway inside the Chamblee city limits. It was a mecca for Asian and Latino immigrants. "You can't go straight to Yellow. Not without an invitation. Tell Ling-Ling Spivey said keep it on the DL." The down low—don't tell anyone. "Watch your back. Sounds to me like this thing is getting out of hand."

"Anything else?"

Will saw Boyd's mouth move, but he couldn't make out the words. Will asked the guard, "Did you hear what he said?"

The guard shook his head. "No idea. Looked like 'amen' or something like that."

Will checked Amanda's reaction. She was nodding.

"All right." Boyd's tone indicated they were finished. His eyes followed Amanda as she got up from the chair. He asked, "You know what I miss the most?"

"What's that?"

“Standing when a lady enters the room.”

“You always had good manners.”

He smiled, showing his busted teeth. “Take care of yourself, Mandy. Make sure Evelyn gets back home to her babies.”

She walked around the table and stood a few feet from the prisoner. Will felt his stomach clench. The guard beside him tensed. There was nothing to worry about. Amanda put her hand to Boyd’s cheek, and then she left the room.

“Christ,” the guard breathed. “Crazy bitch.”

“Watch it,” Will warned the man. Amanda may have been a crazy bitch, but she was his crazy bitch. He opened the door and met her out in the hallway. The cameras hadn’t been focused on her face, but Will could tell now that she had been sweating inside the tiny, airless room. Or maybe it had been Boyd who brought out that reaction in her.

The two guards were back on point, standing on either side of Amanda and Will. Over her shoulder, he saw Boyd being duck-walked down the hall in his hand and leg shackles. There was only one guard with him, a small man whose hand barely wrapped around the prisoner’s arm.

Amanda turned around. She watched Boyd until he disappeared around the corner. She said, “It’s guys like that who make me want to bring back Old Sparky.”

The guards gave off deep belly laughs that echoed down the hallway. Amanda had been pretty soft on Spivey and she had to let them know it was all for show. Her act in the tiny room had been pretty convincing. Will had been momentarily fooled, even though the one time he’d heard Amanda ask about the death penalty, her response had been to say that the only issue she had with it was they didn’t kill them fast enough.

“Ma’am?” one of the guards asked. He indicated the gate at the end of the hall.

“Thank you.” Amanda followed him toward the exit. She checked her watch, telling Will, “It’s coming up on four o’clock. We’ve got at least an hour and a half back to Atlanta if we’re lucky. Valdosta is two and a half hours south of here, but it’ll be closer to four with traffic. We’ll never make it in time for a visit. I can pull some strings, but I don’t know the new warden and even if I did, I doubt he’d be foolish enough to yank two men out of maximum security that late at night.” Prisons ran on routine, and anything that changed that routine brought the risk of sparking up violence.

Will asked, “You still want me to go through my case files on the investigation?”

“Of course.” She said it like there had never been any question that they would talk about the investigation that led to Evelyn Mitchell’s forced retirement. “Meet me at the office at five tomorrow morning. We’ll talk about the case on the drive down to Valdosta. That’s about three hours each way. It shouldn’t take more than half an hour each to talk to Ben and Adam—if they’ll talk at all. That’ll put us back in town by noon at the latest to talk with Miriam Kwon.”

Will had almost forgotten about the dead kid in the laundry room. What he clearly remembered was that Amanda had skated over the fact that she knew Boyd Spivey well enough for him to call her Mandy. Will had to assume that Ben Humphrey and Adam Hopkins were on the same familiar terms, which meant that yet again Amanda was working her own case within the case.

She told him, "I'll make some calls to parole in Memphis and Los Angeles to reach out to Chuck Finn and Demarcus Alexander. All we can do is send them a message that Evelyn's in trouble and we're willing to listen if they're willing to talk."

"They were all very loyal to Evelyn."

She stopped at the gate, waiting for the guard to find the key. "Yes, they were."

"Who's Ling-Ling?"

"We'll get to that."

Will opened his mouth to speak, but the air was pierced by a shrill alarm. The emergency lights flashed. One of the guards grabbed Will by the arm. Instinct took over, and Will jerked away from him. Amanda had obviously had a similar reaction, but she didn't stop there. She ran down the hall, her heels popping against the tile floor. Will jogged after her. He rounded the corner and nearly knocked into her when she came to a dead stop.

Amanda didn't speak. She didn't gasp or cry out. She just grabbed his arm, nails digging through the thin cotton of his T-shirt.

Boyd Spivey lay dead at the end of the hallway. His head was turned at an unnatural angle from his body. The guard beside him was bleeding from a large slit in his throat. Will went to the man. He dropped to his knees and pressed his hands to the wound, trying to stanch the flow. It was too late. Blood pooled onto the floor like a lopsided halo. The man's eyes locked on Will's, filling with panic, and then filling with nothing at all.

CHAPTER FIVE

Faith slowed the Mini as she neared her house. It was past eight o'clock. She had spent the last six hours going over and over what had happened at her mother's house, saying the same thing again and again, as her lawyer, her union rep, three Atlanta cops, and one special agent from the GBI asked questions, took notes, and basically made her feel like a criminal. On some level, it made sense that they believed Faith was wrapped up in whatever had gotten her mother kidnapped. Evelyn had been a cop. Faith was a cop. Evelyn had shot and killed a man. Faith had shot two men—two possible witnesses—seemingly in cold blood. Evelyn was missing. If Faith had been on the other side of the table, she might've been asking the same questions.

Did she have any enemies? Had she ever taken a bribe? Had she ever been approached to do something illegal? Had she ever taken money or gifts to look the other way?

But Faith wasn't on that side of the table, and no matter how much she racked her brain, there was no reason she could think of that anyone would want to take her mother. The worst part about being trapped in the interrogation room was that every minute that ticked by reminded Faith that five able-bodied officers were wasting time in an airless interrogation room when they could all be out looking for her mother.

Who would do this? Did Evelyn have enemies? What were they looking for?

Faith was just as clueless now as when the interrogation began. She pulled the car up to the curb in front of her house. All the lights were on, something she had never allowed in her life. The house looked like a Christmas decoration. A very expensive Christmas decoration. Four cars were parked in the driveway. She recognized Jeremy's old Impala that he'd bought from Evelyn when she'd gotten the Malibu, but the two trucks and black Corvette were new to her.

"Shhh ...," she shushed Emma, who was getting antsy now that the car had stopped. Defying all laws and basic common sense, Faith had put Emma in the front seat beside her. The drive from Mrs. Levy's was just a few minutes, but it wasn't laziness so much as neediness that made Faith want to keep her child close. She picked up Emma and held her tight. The baby's heart beat a soothing staccato against her chest. Her breathing was soft and familiar, like tissues being pulled out of a box.

Faith wanted her mother. She wanted to put her head on Evelyn's shoulder and feel her wiry, strong hands patting her back as she whispered that everything was going to be all right. She wanted to watch her mother tease Jeremy about his long hair and bounce Emma on her knee. Most of all, she wanted to talk to her mother about how awful today had been, to get her advice on whether or not to trust the union rep who was telling her she didn't need a lawyer, or to listen to the lawyer who was telling her the union rep was too tight with the Atlanta force.

"Oh, God," she breathed into Emma's neck. Faith needed her mother.

Tears flooded into her eyes, and for once she did not try to stop them. She was alone for the first time since she'd stepped foot inside her mother's house hours ago. She wanted to fall apart. She needed to fall apart. But Jeremy wanted his mother, too. He needed Faith to be strong. Her son needed to believe her when she said that she would do whatever it took to get his grandmother back in one piece.

Judging by the cars, there were at least three cops waiting inside with her son. Jeremy had been crying when she called him from the station—confused, worried, terrified for his grandmother as well as his mother. Amanda's warning came back to Faith. Standing in Mrs. Levy's living room, Faith had been surprised by Amanda's hug, but not by her words, whispered in a low warning: "You've got two minutes to pull yourself together. If these men see you cry, all you will be to them for the rest of your career is a useless woman."

Sometimes Faith thought that Amanda was fighting a battle that had been waged long ago, but sometimes she realized her boss was right. Faith used the back of her hand to wipe her eyes. She pushed open the car door and slipped her purse onto her free shoulder. Emma shifted, startled by the cold air. Faith pulled up her blanket and pressed her lips to the top of the baby's head. Her skin was warm. The fine hairs tickled Faith's lips as she walked up the driveway.

She thought of all the things she had to do before she could go to bed. The house would need to be straightened, no matter the circumstances. Emma needed to be put to bed. Jeremy would need reassurances, and probably dinner. She would have to talk to her brother Zeke at some point. If there was any grace in the world, he was somewhere over the Atlantic right now, flying home from Germany, so she wouldn't have to speak with him tonight. Their relationship had never been good. Thankfully, Amanda had handled the phone calls or Faith would've wasted most of the afternoon yelling at Zeke rather than talking to the Atlanta police. Faith felt a modicum of relief as she climbed the front stairs. Only the threat of having to talk to her brother could make the way she'd spent the last six hours look inviting. She reached for the doorknob just as the door swung open.

"Where the hell have you been?"

Faith stood with her mouth open, staring up at her brother Zeke. "How did you—"

"What happened, Faith? What did you do?"

"How—" Faith felt incapable of forming a complete sentence.

"Dude, chill." Jeremy pushed past his uncle and took Emma from Faith's arms. "You okay, Mom?"

"I'm fine," she told him, but it was Zeke who had her attention. "Did you come from Germany?"

Jeremy supplied, "He's living in Florida now." He pulled Faith into the house. "Did you eat? I can make you something."

"Yes—I mean, no. I'm fine." She stopped worrying about Zeke for a moment and concentrated on her son. "Are you okay?"

He nodded, but she saw he was putting on a brave face.

Faith tried to pull him closer, but he didn't budge, probably because Zeke was watching their every move. She told Jeremy, "I want you to stay here with me tonight."

He shrugged. No big deal. “Sure.”

“We’re going to get her back, Jaybird. I promise you.”

Jeremy looked down at Emma, jostling her in his arms. “Jaybird” had been Evelyn’s name for him until his entire elementary school heard her use it one day and teased him into tears. He said, “Aunt Mandy told me the same thing when she called. That she’ll get Grammy back.”

“Well, you know Aunt Mandy doesn’t lie.”

He tried to make a joke of it. “I’d hate to be those guys when she finds them.”

Faith put her hand to Jeremy’s cheek. There was stubble there, something she would never get used to. Her little boy was taller than her, but she knew that he wasn’t as strong. “Grandma’s tough. You know she’s a fighter. And you know she’ll do whatever it takes to get back to you. To us.”

Zeke made a disgusted sound, and Faith gave him a nasty look over Jeremy’s shoulder. He said, “Victor wants you to call him. You remember Victor, right?”

Victor Martinez was the last person on earth she wanted to talk to right now. She told Jeremy, “Go put Emma down for me, all right? And turn out some of those lights. Georgia Power doesn’t need all of my paycheck.”

“You sound like Grandpa.”

“Go.”

Jeremy glanced back at Zeke, reluctant to leave. His instinct had always been to protect Faith.

“Now,” she told him, gently pushing him toward the stairs.

Zeke at least had the decency to wait until Jeremy was out of earshot. He crossed his arms over his chest, puffing up his already sizable frame. “What the hell kind of mess did you get Mom into?”

“Glad to see you, too.” She pushed past him and walked down the hall toward the kitchen. Despite what she’d told Jeremy, Faith hadn’t eaten anything of substance since two o’clock, and she could feel that familiar throbbing headache and wave of nausea that signaled something wasn’t right.

“If anything happens to Mom—”

“What, Zeke?” Faith spun around to face him. He had always been a bully, and just like all of his kind, standing up to him was the only way to stop it. “What are you going to do to me? Throw away my dolls? Give me an Indian burn?”

“I didn’t—”

“I’ve spent the last six hours being grilled by assholes who think I got my mother kidnapped and went on a murderous rampage. I don’t need the same kind of crap from my asshole brother.”

She turned back around and walked toward the kitchen. There was a ginger-haired young man sitting at her table. His jacket was off. A Smith and Wesson M&P hung out of his tactical-style shoulder holster like a black tongue. The straps were tight around his chest, making his shirt blouse out. He was thumbing through the Lands’ End catalogue that had come in the mail yesterday, pretending he hadn’t just heard Faith screaming at the top of her lungs. He stood when she entered the room. “Agent Mitchell, I’m Derrick Connor with the APD hostage negotiation task force.”

“Thank you for being here.” She hoped her tone sounded genuine. “I take it there haven’t been any phone calls?”

"No, ma'am."

"Any updates?"

"No, ma'am, but you'll be the first to hear."

Faith doubted that very seriously. Ginger wasn't just here to catch phone calls. Until the brass said otherwise, Faith had a dark cloud hanging over her head. "There's another officer here?"

"Detective Taylor. He's checking the perimeter. I can get him for you if—"

"I'd just like some privacy, please."

"Yes, ma'am. I'll be right outside if you need me." Connor nodded to Zeke before leaving by the sliding glass door.

Faith groaned as she sat down at the table, feeling like she'd been on her feet for hours, even though she'd been sitting for most of the day. Zeke still had his arms crossed over his chest. He was blocking the doorway as if he thought she might try to bolt.

She asked, "Are you still in the Air Force?"

"I got transferred to Eglin four months ago."

Right around the time Emma was born. "In Florida?"

"Last time I checked." Her questions were obviously ratcheting up his anger. "I'm in the middle of a two-week in-service at the VA hospital on Clairmont. It's a good thing I just happened to be in town or Jeremy would've been alone all day."

Faith stared at her brother. Zeke Mitchell had always looked like he was standing at attention. Even at ten years old, he'd acted like an Air Force major, which was to say that he had been born with a giant steel rod shoved up his ass.

She asked, "Does Mom know you were stateside?"

"Of course she does. We were supposed to have dinner tomorrow night."

"You didn't think to tell me?"

"I didn't want the drama."

Faith let out a long sigh as she sat back in the chair. There it was—the defining word of their relationship. Faith had brought drama to Zeke's senior year by getting pregnant. Her drama had forced him to leave high school early and sign away ten years of his life to the military. There was more drama when she decided to keep Jeremy, and a heaping pile of drama when she'd cried uncontrollably at their father's funeral.

"I've been watching the news." He said it like an indictment.

Faith pushed herself up from the table. "Then you know I killed two men today."

"Where were you?"

Her hands shook as she opened the cabinet and took out a nutrition bar. She had said it like it was nothing—she had killed two men today. Faith had noticed during the interrogation that the more she talked about it, the more anesthetized she became to the reality of the act, so that saying it now only made her feel numb.

Zeke repeated, "I asked you a question, Faith. Where were you when Mom needed you?"

"Where were you?" She tossed the bar onto the table. Her mind was spinning out again. She should test her blood sugar before she ate anything. "I was at a training seminar."

"You were late."

She assumed he was making a lucky guess. "I wasn't late."

"I talked to Mom this morning."

Faith felt her senses sharpen. "What time? Did you tell the police?"

"Of course I told the police. I talked to her around noon."

Faith had gotten to their mother's house less than two hours later. "Did she seem okay? What did she say?"

"She said that you were late again, Faith, like you always are. That's how it is. The world bends to your schedule."

"Christ," she whispered. She couldn't take this right now. She was suspended from work for God only knew how long. Her mother could be dead. Her son was devastated and she couldn't get her brother out of her face long enough to catch her breath. Adding to the stress, her head felt like it was trapped in a vise. She fished around in her purse for her blood-testing kit. Slipping into a coma, while at the moment an attractive prospect, wasn't going to help anything.

Faith laid out the kit on the table. She hated being watched when she tested her blood, but Zeke didn't seem inclined to give her any privacy. Faith changed the needle in the pen, unwrapped a sterile wipe. Zeke watched her like a hawk. He was a doctor. She could almost hear his brain cataloguing the wrong way she was doing things.

Faith squeezed some blood onto the strip. The number flashed up. She showed Zeke the LED because she knew that he would ask.

He said, "When was your last meal?"

"I had some cheese crackers at the station."

"That's not enough."

She got up and opened the refrigerator. "I know."

"It's high. Probably from the stress."

"I know that, too."

"What's your last A1C?"

"Six point one."

He sat down at the table. "That's not bad."

"No," she agreed, getting her insulin out of the fridge door. It was actually a hair above her target, which was pretty damn good considering Faith had just had a baby.

"Do you really think what you said?" He paused, and she could tell it took a lot out of him to ask the question. "Do you think we'll get her back?"

She sat back down. "I don't know."

"Was she injured?"

Faith shook her head and shrugged at the same time. The police weren't sharing anything with her.

His chest rose and fell. "Why would someone take her? Are you ..." For a change, he tried to be sensitive. "Are you messed up in something?"

"Why are you such a jerk all the time?" She didn't expect an answer. "Mom ran a narc squad for fifteen years, Zeke. She made enemies. That was part of her job. And you know about the investigation. You know why she retired."

"That was four years ago."

"These things don't have a time limit. Maybe somebody decided they want something from her."

"Like what? Money? She doesn't have any. I'm on all her accounts. She's got her pension from the city, some of Dad's retirement, and that's it. Not even Social Security yet."

"It has to be related to a case." Faith drew the insulin into the syringe. "Her entire team went to prison. A lot of very bad people were pissed off to see their bought-and-paid-for cops taken out of the game."

"You think Mom's guys are involved in this?"

Faith shook her head. They had always called Evelyn's team "Mom's guys," mostly because it was easier to keep track of them that way. "I have no idea who's involved or why."

"Are you looking into all their old cases and interviewing perps?"

"Perps? Where the hell did you get that from?" Faith lifted up her shirt just enough to jab the needle into her belly. There was no immediate rush; the drug didn't work that way. Still, Faith closed her eyes, willing the nausea to pass. "I'm suspended, Zeke. They took my badge and my gun and told me to go home. Tell me what you want me to do."

He folded his hands on the table and stared at his thumbs. "Can you make some phone calls? Work some sources? I don't know, Faith. You've been a cop for twenty years. Call in some favors."

"Fifteen years, and there's no one to call. I killed two men today. Did you not see the way that cop was looking at me? They think I'm involved in this. No one is going to do me any favors."

His jaw worked. He was used to his orders being followed. "Mom still has friends."

"And they're all probably shitting their pants right now worried that whatever she's messed up in that got her kidnapped is going to blow back on them."

He didn't like that. His chin tucked into his chest. "All right. I guess there's nothing you can do. We're helpless. And so is Mom."

"Amanda's not going to take this lying down."

Zeke snorted in disbelief. He had never liked Amanda. It was one thing for his baby sister to try to boss him around, but he wasn't going to take it from someone who wasn't blood. It was a strange reaction considering Zeke, Faith, and Jeremy had all grown up calling her Aunt Mandy, an endearment that Faith was fairly certain would get her fired if she used it today. Still, they had always thought that Amanda was part of their family. She was so close to Evelyn that at times she'd passed for a surrogate.

But she was still Faith's boss, and she still kept her foot firmly planted on the back of Faith's neck, just like she did with everyone else who worked for her. Or came into contact with her. Or smiled at her in the street.

Faith opened the nutrition bar and took a large bite. The only sound in the kitchen was her chewing. She wanted to close her eyes, but was afraid of the images she would see. Her mother tied up, mouth gagged. Jeremy's red-rimmed eyes. The way those cops had looked at her today, like the stink of her involvement was too much to stomach.

Zeke cleared his throat. She thought that the hostilities had passed, but his posture indicated otherwise. If there was one constant in her life, it was Zeke's enduring sense of moral superiority.

She tried to get it over with. "What?"

"That Victor guy seemed surprised to hear about Emma. Wanted to know how old she was, when she was born."

She choked, trying to swallow. "Victor was here? In the house?"

"You weren't around, Faith. Someone had to stay with your son until I got here."

The string of curses that came to Faith's mind was probably worse than anything Zeke had heard while stitching up soldiers in Ramstein.

He said, "Jeremy showed him her picture."

Faith tried to swallow again. She felt like rusty nails were catching in her throat.

"Emma's got his coloring."

"Jeremy's?"

"This some kind of pattern with you? You like being an unwed mother?"

"Hey, didn't they tell you when you got back that Ronald Reagan isn't president anymore?"

"Jesus, Faith. Be serious for once. The guy has a right to know he's a father."

"Trust me, Victor's not interested in being a father." The man couldn't even pick up his dirty socks off the floor or remember to leave the toilet seat down. God only knew what he'd forget with a baby.

Zeke repeated, "He has a right to know."

"So, now he knows."

"Whatever, Faith. As long as you're happy."

Any normal human being would've trounced off after dropping that bon mot, but Zeke Mitchell never walked away from a fight. He just sat there, staring at her, willing her to crank it back up. Faith reverted to old ways. If he was going to act like he was ten, then so was she. She ignored his presence, flipping through the Lands' End catalogue, ripping out the page that showed the underwear Jeremy liked so she could order it for him later.

She flipped to the thermal shirts, and Zeke tilted back in his chair, staring out the window.

This tension was nothing new between the two of them. Faith's selfishness was Zeke's favorite one-note song. As usual, she accepted his disapproval as part of her penance. He had good reason to hate her. There was no moving past an eighteen-year-old boy finding out his fourteen-year-old sister was pregnant. Especially when Jeremy got older and Faith saw what it was like for teenage boys—not the walk in the park it had seemed when she was a teenage girl—Faith had felt guilty for what she'd done to her brother.

As hard as it was for her father, who was asked not to attend his men's Bible study, and her mother, who was ostracized by most every woman in the neighborhood, Zeke had endured a special hell because of Faith's unexpected pregnancy. He'd come home from school at least once a week with a bloody nose or black eye. When they asked him about it, he refused to talk. He sneered at Faith over the dinner table. He shot her looks of disgust if she walked by his room. He hated her for what she'd done to the family, but he would rain down hell on anyone who said a word against her.

Not that she could remember much from that time. Even now, it was one long, miserable blur of slobbering self-pity. It was hard to believe that so much had changed in twenty years, but Atlanta, or at least Faith's part of it, had been more like a small town back then. People were still riding high on the Reagan/Bush wave of conservative values. Faith was a spoiled, selfish teenager when it happened. All she could focus on was how miserable her own life was. Her pregnancy had been a result of her first—and, at the time, she vowed last—sexual encounter. The father's parents had immediately moved him out of state. There was no birthday party when she turned fifteen. Her friends abandoned her. Jeremy's father never wrote or called. She had to go to doctors who probed and prodded her. She was tired all the time, and cranky, and she had hemorrhoids and back pain and everything ached every time she moved.

Faith's father was away a lot, suddenly required to take business trips that had never before been part of his job description. The church had been the center of his life, but that center was abruptly ripped away when he was informed by the pastor that he no longer had the moral authority to be a deacon. Her mother had taken off work to be with her—whether forced or voluntary, Evelyn still would not say.

What Faith did remember was that she and her mother were both trapped at home every day, eating junk food that made them fat and watching soap operas that made them cry. For her part, Evelyn bore Faith's shame like a hermit. She wouldn't leave the house unless she had to. She woke every Monday morning at the crack of dawn to go to the grocery store across town so that she wouldn't run into anyone she knew. She refused to sit in the backyard with Faith even when the air conditioning broke and the living room turned into a kiln. The only exercise she took was a walk around the neighborhood, but that only happened late at night or early morning before the sun came up.

Mrs. Levy from next door left them cookies on the doorstep, but she never came in. Occasionally, someone would leave religious tracts in the mailbox that Evelyn burned in the fireplace. Their only visitor the entire time was Amanda, who didn't have the option of dropping off her de facto sister-in-law's social calendar. She would sit in the kitchen with Evelyn and talk in a low voice that Faith couldn't hear. After Amanda left, Evelyn would go into the bathroom and cry.

It was no wonder that one day Zeke came home from school not with a busted lip but with a copy of his enlistment papers. He had five more months to go until graduation. His ROTC service and SAT scores had already lined up a full ride to Rutgers. But he took his GED and entered the pre-med program almost a full year ahead of schedule.

Jeremy was eight years old the first time he met his uncle Zeke. They had circled each other like cats until a game of basketball had smoothed things over. Still, Faith knew her son and she recognized his reticence toward a man he felt wasn't treating his mother right. Unfortunately, he'd had a lot of opportunity over the years to hone this particular emotion.

Zeke dropped his chair back onto the floor, but still did not look at her.

Faith chewed the nutrition bar slowly, forcing herself to eat despite the nausea that gripped her stomach. She looked out the sliding door and saw the kitchen table, Zeke's posture, straight as a board, reflected back. There was a glow of red beyond the glass. One of the detectives was smoking.

The phone rang, and they both jumped. Faith scrambled to answer the cordless just as the detectives came in from the backyard.

"No news," Will told her. "I was just checking in."

Faith waved away the cops. She took the phone with her into the living room, asking Will, "Where are you?"

"I just got home. There was a jackknifed trailer on 675. It took three hours to clear."

"Why were you down there?"

"The D&C."

Faith felt her stomach lurch.

Will didn't bother with small talk. He told her about his prison visit, Boyd Spivey's murder. Faith put her hand to her chest. When she was younger, Boyd had been a frequent guest at family dinners and backyard barbecues. He'd taught Jeremy how to ride a bike. And then he'd flirted so openly with Faith that Bill Mitchell suggested the man find an alternative way to spend his weekends. "Do they know who did it?"

"The security camera happened to be out in that one section. They've got the place in lockdown. All the cells are being tossed. The warden's not hopeful they'll find much of anything."

"There was outside help." A guard must have been bribed. No inmate would have the time it took to disable a camera mounted inside a prison corridor.

"They're talking to the staff, but the lawyers are already on scene. These guys aren't your everyday suspects."

"Is Amanda all right?" Faith shook her head at her stupidity. "Of course she's all right."

"She got what she wanted. We got a back door into your mom's case because of this."

The GBI had jurisdiction over all death investigations inside state prisons. "I guess that's some kind of positive news."

Will was quiet. He didn't ask her if she was doing okay, because he obviously knew the answer. Faith thought of the way he had held her hands that afternoon, making her pay attention as he coached her on what to say. His tenderness had been unexpected, and she'd had to bite the inside of her cheek hard enough to draw blood so that she wouldn't break down and cry.

Will said, "Do you know that I've never seen Amanda go to the bathroom?" He stopped himself. "Not in person, I mean, but when we left the prison, she pulled over at the gas station and went inside. I've never seen her take a break like that. Have you?"

Faith was used to Will's odd tangents. "I can't say that I have." Amanda had been at those family dinners and barbecues with Boyd Spivey. She had joked with him the way cops do—questioning his manhood, praising his progress on the force despite his lack of mental prowess. She wasn't completely made of stone. Watching Boyd die would've taken something out of her.

Will said, "It was very disconcerting."

"I can imagine." Faith pictured Amanda at the gas station, going into the stall, shutting the door, and allowing herself two minutes to mourn a man who had once meant something to her. Then she'd probably checked her makeup, fixed her hair, and dropped the key back with the gas station attendant, asking him if they locked the bathroom door to keep someone from cleaning it.

Will said, "She probably sees urinating as a weakness."

"Most people do." Faith sat back on the couch. He had given her the best gift she could possibly receive right now: a moment of distraction. "Thank you."

"For what?"

"For being there today. For getting Sara to come. For telling me what to—" She remembered that the phone was tapped. "For telling me that everything was going to be okay."

He cleared his throat. There was a short silence. He was awful at this sort of thing, almost as bad as she was. "Have you thought about what they were looking for?"

"That's all I can think about." She heard the refrigerator door open and close. Zeke was probably making a list of foods she shouldn't stock in the house. "What's next?"

He hesitated.

"Tell me."

"Amanda and I are going down to Valdosta first thing."

Valdosta State Prison. Ben Humphrey and Adam Hopkins. They were talking to everyone from her mother's old team. Faith should've expected this, but the news of Boyd's death had thrown her off. She should've known that Will was going to reopen the case.

Faith said, "I should keep this line open in case someone calls."

"All right."

She hung up the phone because there was nothing more to say. He still thought her mother was guilty. Even after working with Faith for almost two years, seeing that she did things the right way because that was the kind of cop her mother had raised her to be, Will still thought Evelyn Mitchell was dirty.

Zeke loomed in the doorway. "Who was that?"

"Work." She stood up from the couch. "My partner."

"The asshole who tried to put Mom in prison?"

"The very same."

"I still don't know how you can work with that douche."

"I cleared it with Mom."

"You didn't clear it with me."

"Should I have sent the request to Germany or Florida?" He stared at her.

Faith wasn't going to explain herself to her brother. It was Amanda who had asked her to partner with Will, and Evelyn had told Faith to do what was best for her career. She didn't have to point out that it was not a bad idea to get out of the Atlanta Police Department, where Evelyn's forced retirement was considered either a coast or a crime depending on whom you asked. "Did Mom ever talk to you about the investigation?"

"Shouldn't you ask your partner about that?"

"I'm asking you," Faith snapped. Evelyn had refused to discuss the case against her, and not just because Faith could've been called as a potential witness. "If she said something, even something that was a little off but you didn't think about it at the time ..."

"Mom doesn't shop talk with me. That's your job."

There was the same tinge of accusation in his voice, as if Faith had the power to find their mother and was simply choosing not to exercise it. She looked at the clock on the wall. It was almost nine, too late to be doing this. "I'm going to bed. I'll send down Jeremy with some sheets. The couch is pretty comfortable."

He nodded, and Faith saluted his dismissal. She was halfway up the stairs when he spoke. "He's a good kid." Faith turned around. "Jeremy. He's a good kid."

She smiled. "Yeah, he is." She was almost to the top of the stairs when the other shoe dropped.

"Mom did a good job."

Faith continued up the stairs, refusing to take the bait. She checked on the baby. Emma smacked her lips when Faith leaned down to kiss her forehead. She was in that deep, blissful sleep that only babies know. Faith checked the monitor to make sure it was on. She stroked her hand down Emma's arm, letting the baby's tiny fingers wrap around her one, before leaving.

In the next room, Jeremy's bed was empty. Faith lingered at the door. She hadn't changed his room, though it would've been nice to have an office. His posters were still on the wall—a Mustang GT with a bikini-clad blonde leaning over the hood, another with a half-naked brunette draped across a Camaro, a third and fourth showing concept cars with the ubiquitous big-bosomed model. Faith could still remember coming home from work one day to find his "Bridges of the Southeastern United States" posters replaced with these gems. Jeremy still thought that he'd cleverly tricked her into believing that puberty had brought on a sudden interest in automobiles.

"I'm in here."

She found him in her room. Jeremy was lying on his stomach, head at the foot of her bed, feet in the air, iPhone in his hands. The sound on the TV was muted but the closed captioning was on.

She asked, "Everything okay?"

He tilted the iPhone in his hands, obviously playing a game. "Yeah."

Faith remembered the fertile girlfriend. It was strange she wasn't here. They were usually attached at the hip. "Where's Kimberly?"

"We're taking a break," he said, and she almost sobbed with relief. "I heard you and Zeke yelling."

"There's a first time for everything."

He tilted the phone the other way.

She said, "I've been wanting one of those." He got the hint and put the device in his pocket. "I know you heard the phone ring. It was Will. He's working with Aunt Amanda."

He stared at the TV. "That's good."

Faith started to untie his sneakers. In typical teenage boy logic, he'd thought keeping his feet raised off the bed would stop debris from raining down. "Tell me what happened when Zeke got here."

"Dude was being an asshole."

"Tell me like I'm your mother."

She saw him color slightly in the glow of the TV. "Victor stayed with me. I told him he didn't have to, but he said he wanted to, so ..."

Faith untied his other sneaker. "You showed him Emma's picture?"

He kept staring at the set. Jeremy had really liked Victor—probably more than Faith had, which was only part of the problem.

She told him, "It's all right."

"Zeke was kinda shitty—I mean rude—to him."

"In what way?"

"Just kinda poking his chest out and pushing him around."

"Just being Zeke. "Nothing happened, right?"

"Nah, Victor's not the type."

Faith assumed as much. Victor Martinez worked in an office, read The Wall Street Journal, wore bespoke suits, and washed his hands sixteen times a day. He was about as passionate as a box of hair. It was Faith's lot in life that she would only ever be able to fall in love with the kind of man who would wear sleeveless T-shirts and punch her brother in the face.

She slid off Jeremy's shoe, frowning at the state of his sock. "Toes go on the inside, college boy." She made a mental note to get him more socks when she ordered his underwear. His jeans were looking ratty, too. So much for the three hundred dollars left in her checking account. Thank God they had suspended her with pay. Faith was going to have to dip into savings just to keep her son from looking like a hobo.

Jeremy rolled over onto his back to face her. "I showed Victor Emma's Easter picture."

She swallowed. Victor was a smart man, but it didn't take a genius to do the math. Even without that, Faith was blonde and fair. Emma had her father's dark coloring and rich brown eyes. "The one where she's wearing the bunny ears?"

He nodded.

"That's a good one." Faith could see the guilt well up in him like water spilling out of a glass. "It's all right, Jay. He would've found out eventually."

"Then why didn't you tell him?"

Because Faith was just the right mixture of emotionally stunted and controlling, which was something Jeremy would find out when his future wife screamed it in his face. For now, Faith said, "It's not something I'm going to talk to you about."

He sat up to face her. "Grandma likes Will."

Faith guessed he'd overheard her conversation with Zeke. "She told you that?"

He nodded. "She said he was an all right guy. That he treated her fairly, and that he had a hard job to do but he wasn't mean about it."

Faith didn't know whether her mother had been assuaging Jeremy's concerns or revealing her true opinion. Knowing her mother, it was probably a mixture of both. "Did she ever talk to you about why she retired?"

He tugged at a loose thread on the bedspread. "She said she was the boss, so it was her fault for not noticing what was going on."

This was more than she'd ever told Faith. "Anything else?"

He shook his head. "I'm glad Aunt Amanda has Will helping her. She can't do everything by herself. And he's really smart."

Faith stopped his hand and held it until Jeremy looked up at her. The television offered the only light in the room. It gave his face a green cast. "I know you're worried about Grandma, and I know there's nothing I can say to make this better for you."

"Thanks." He was being sincere. Jeremy had always appreciated honesty.

She pulled him up from the bed and wrapped her arms around him. His shoulders were thin. He was gangly, not yet the man he was going to be no matter the fact that he ate his weight in macaroni and cheese every day.

He let her hug him for longer than usual. She kissed his head. "Everything's going to be all right."

"That's what Grandmamma always says."

"And she's always right." Faith squeezed him closer.

"Mom, you're suffocating me."

Reluctantly, she let him go. "Get some sheets for Uncle Zeke. He's going to sleep on the couch."

Jeremy slid his feet back into his sneakers. "Has he always been that way?"

Faith didn't pretend to miss his meaning. "When we were little, every time he had to fart, he would run into my room and tear it loose."

Jeremy started laughing.

"And then he said if I told on him, he'd gorge himself on beans and cheese and then hold me down and do it in my face the next time."

That sent him over the edge. He bent over, holding his stomach as he brayed like a donkey. "Did he do it?"

Faith nodded, which made him laugh even harder. She let him enjoy her humiliation a little longer before nudging him on the shoulder. "Time to go to bed."

He wiped tears from his eyes. "Man, I've got to do that to Horner."

Horner was his dorm mate. Faith doubted anyone would notice one more noxious odor in their shared quarters.

"Get Zeke a pillow from the closet." She pushed him out of the room. He was still laughing as he walked down the hallway. It was a small price to pay to see the worry momentarily absent from her son's face.

Faith pulled back the comforter on her bed. Dirt from Jeremy's sneakers was smeared into the sheets. She was too tired to change the bed. She was too tired to put on her nightgown or even brush her teeth. She slipped off her shoes and got into bed wearing the same GBI regs she'd put on at five o'clock that morning.

The house was quiet. Her body was so tense that she felt like she was lying on a board. Emma's soft snores came through on the baby monitor. Faith stared up at the ceiling. She'd forgotten to turn off the television. Light flashed like a strobe from the action movie Jeremy had been watching.

Boyd Spivey was dead. It seemed impossible to grasp. He was a big guy, larger than life, the sort of cop you imagined going out in a blaze of glory. He was the exact opposite of his partner. Chuck Finn was dour, full of gloomy predictions and terrified that he would be shot in the line of duty. His defense during the investigation was the only one Faith had found credible during the whole mess. Chuck had claimed he was just following orders. To those who knew him, it seemed entirely plausible. Detective Finn was the quintessential follower, which was exactly the personality type that men like Boyd Spivey knew how to exploit.

But Faith didn't want to think about Boyd or Chuck or any of her mother's team right now. The investigation had eaten up six months of her life. Six months of sleepless nights. Six months of worrying that her mother was going to have a heart attack or end up in prison or both.

Faith made herself close her eyes. She wanted to think of good times with her mother, to recall some moment of kindness or summon the pleasure of her company. What she saw instead was the man in her mother's bedroom, the black hole in the center of his forehead where Faith had shot him. His hands jerked up. The hostage stared at Faith in disbelief. His mouth gaped open. She saw the silver grill on his teeth, that his tongue was pierced with a matching silver ball.

Almeja, he had said.

Money.

Faith heard the floorboards creak in the hall. "Jeremy?" She pushed herself up on her elbow and turned on the bedside lamp.

He gave her a sheepish look. "Sorry, I know you're tired."

"Do you want me to take the sheets down to Zeke?"

"No, it's not that." He pulled his iPhone out of his pocket. "Something came up on my Facebook page."

"I thought you stopped using that when I made you friend me." Faith had never been the kind of parent to completely trust her kid. Her own parents had trusted her and look where that had gotten them. "What's going on?"

His thumbs moved across the screen as he talked. "I got bored. I mean, not bored, but there was nothing to do, so ..."

"It's okay, baby." She sat up in bed. "What is it?"

"Lots of people have been posting stuff. I guess they heard about Grandma on the news."

"That's nice," Faith said, though she found it a bit ghoulish and, to borrow a word from her brother, dramatic. "What are they saying?"

"Mostly just that they're thinking about me and stuff like that. But there's this." He turned the phone around and handed it to her.

Faith read the message aloud. "'Hey, Jaybird, hope you're okay. I'm sure the bad guys will get fingered. Just remember what your grandma used to say: keep your mouth shut and your eyes open.'" Faith checked the screen name. "GoodKnight92. Is that someone you went to Grady with?" Jeremy's high school's mascot was the knight, and he had been born in 1992.

He shrugged. "Never heard of him."

Faith noted that the post had come in at 2:32 that afternoon, less than an hour after Evelyn had been abducted. She tried not to sound concerned when she asked, "When did he friend you?"

"Today, but a lot of people did. They kind of all came out of the woodwork."

She gave him the phone. "What does his profile say?"

"Just that he lives in Atlanta and works in distribution." He thumbed through the screen and showed it to Faith.

Her eyes were so tired she had trouble focusing. Faith held the phone close to her face so she could read the words. There was nothing more, not even a picture. Jeremy was GoodKnight's only friend. Faith felt her cop's intuition telling her something was wrong, but she handed back the phone as if it was nothing. "I'm sure it's someone you went to Morningside with. You were teased so bad about Grandma calling you Jaybird that you begged me to let you switch to another school."

"It's weird, though—right?"

She wasn't going to let him worry. "Most of your friends are weird."

He wouldn't be soothed. "How does he know that about Gran always saying that?"

"It's a pretty common saying," Faith answered. "Mouth shut, eyes open. I had a drill instructor at the academy who practically tattooed it on his forehead." She forced a lightness into her tone. "Come on. It's nothing. It's probably a cop's kid. You know the rule. Something bad happens and we're all family."

That finally seemed to mollify him. Jeremy had been dragged to his share of hospitals and strangers' homes when a police officer had been wounded or killed. He put the phone back into his pocket.

She asked, "You sure you're okay?"

He nodded.

"You can sleep in here if you want."

"That'd be weird, Mom."

"Wake me if you need me." Faith lay back down, slipping her hand under the pillow. Her fingers touched something wet. Familiar.

Jeremy immediately picked up on the change. "What's wrong?"

Faith's breath was trapped in her chest. She didn't trust herself to speak.

"Mom?"

"Tired," she managed. "I'm just tired." Her lungs ached for oxygen. She felt sweat break out all over her body. "Get the sheets before Zeke comes up here."

"Are you—"

"It's been a long day, Jeremy. I need to go to sleep."

He was still reluctant. "All right."

"Can you shut my door?" She wasn't sure she could move even if she wanted to.

Jeremy gave her another worried look as he pulled the door closed. Faith heard the click of the latch, then the soft padding of his feet as he walked down the hall to the laundry room. It was only when she heard the third stair from the bottom squeak that Faith allowed herself to pull her hand out from under the pillow.

She opened her clenched fist. The sharp pain of fear receded and now all Faith could feel was blinding fury.

The message on Jeremy's iPhone. His high school. His birth year.

Keep your mouth shut and your eyes open.

Her son had lain in this bed, his feet inches from what she had found.

I'm sure the bad guys will get fingered.

The words only made sense when Faith held her mother's severed finger in her hand.

CHAPTER SIX

Sara Linton was no stranger to self-loathing. She'd felt ashamed when her father saw her steal a candy bar from the honor box at church. She'd felt humiliated when she caught her husband cheating on her. She'd felt guilty when she lied to her sister about liking her brother-in-law. She'd felt embarrassed when her mother pointed out that she was too tall to wear capri pants. What she'd never felt like was trashy, and the knowledge that she was no better than a reality TV star cut her to the core of her being.

Even now, hours later, Sara's face still burned at the thought of her confrontation with Angie Trent. There was only one other time in her life that she could recall a woman talking to her the way Angie had. Jeffrey's mother was a mean drunk, and Sara had caught her on a very bad night. The only difference in this instance was that Angie had absolutely every right to label Sara a whore.

Jezebel, Sara's mother would've said.

Not that Sara was going to tell her mother about any of this.

She muted the television, the sound grating on her nerves. She'd tried reading. She'd tried cleaning up her apartment. She'd clipped the dogs' toenails. She'd washed dishes and folded clothes that were so wrinkled from being piled on her couch for so long that she'd had to iron them before they would fit in the drawers.

Twice, she'd headed toward the elevator to take Will's car back to his house. Twice she'd turned back around. The problem was his keys. She couldn't leave them in the car and she sure as hell wasn't going to knock on the front door and hand them to Angie. Leaving them in his mailbox was not an option. Will's neighborhood wasn't bad, but he lived in the middle of a major metropolitan city. The car would be gone in the time it took Sara to walk back home.

So she just kept assigning herself busywork, all the while dreading Will's arrival like a root canal. What would she say to him when he finally came to get his car? Words failed, though Sara had silently rehearsed plenty of speeches about honor and morality. The voice in her head had taken on the cadence of a Baptist preacher. This was all so sordid. It wasn't right. Sara was not going to be some tawdry other woman. She wasn't going to steal someone's husband, even if he was ripe for the taking. Nor was she going to engage in a catfight with Angie Trent. Most of all, she wasn't going to step into the middle of their incredibly dysfunctional relationship.

What kind of monster bragged about her husband trying to kill himself? It made Sara's stomach turn. And then there was the larger issue: to what depths had Will sunk where slicing a razor up his arm seemed like the only solution? How obsessed was he with Angie that he would do such a terrible thing? And how sick was Angie that she'd held him while he did it?

These questions were best handled by a psychiatrist. Will's childhood obviously had not been a walk in the park. That fact alone could cause some damage. His dyslexia was an issue, but it didn't seem to stop his life. He had his quirks, but they were endearing, not off-putting. Had he worked through his suicidal tendencies or was he just good at hiding them? If he was past that point in his life, why was he still with that horrible woman?

And since Sara had decided nothing was going to happen between them, why was she still wasting her time thinking about these things?

He wasn't even her type. Will was nothing like Jeffrey. There was none of her husband's staggering self-confidence on display. Despite his height, Will wasn't a physically intimidating man. Jeffrey had been a football player. He knew how to lead a team. Will was a loner, content to blend into the background and do his job under the shadow of Amanda's thumb. He didn't want glory or recognition. Not that Jeffrey had been an attention seeker, but he was incredibly secure in who he was and what he wanted. Women had swooned in his presence. He knew how to do just about everything the right way, which was one of the many reasons Sara had thrown logic to the wind and married him. Twice.

Maybe she wasn't really interested in Will Trent at all. Maybe Angie Trent was partly right. Sara had liked being married to a cop, but not for the kinky reasons Angie had implied. The black-and-white nature of law enforcement appealed to Sara on a deep level. Her parents had raised her to help people, and you couldn't get much more helpful than being a police officer. There was also a part of her brain that was drawn to the puzzle-solving aspects of a criminal investigation. She had loved talking to Jeffrey about his cases. Working in the morgue as the county coroner, finding clues, giving him information that she knew would help him with his job, had made her feel useful.

Sara groaned. As if being a doctor wasn't a useful thing. Maybe Angie Trent was right about the perversion. Next, Sara would start trying to imagine Will in a uniform.

She shifted her two greyhounds off her lap so that she could stand. Billy yawned. Bob rolled onto his back to get more comfortable. She glanced around her apartment. An antsiness took over. She felt overwhelmed by the desire to change something—anything—so that she felt more in control of her life.

She started with the couches, siding them at an angle from the television while the dogs looked down at the floor passing underneath them. The coffee table was too big for the new arrangement, so she shifted everything again, only to find that that didn't work, either. By the time she finished rolling up the rug and muscling everything back into its original place, she was sweating.

There was dust on the top of the picture frame over the console table. Sara got the furniture polish out and started dusting again. There was a lot of space to cover. The building she lived in was a converted milk-processing factory. Red brick walls supported twenty-foot ceilings. All the mechanical workings were exposed. The interior doors were distressed wood with barn door hardware. It was the sort of industrial loft you expected to find in New York City, though Sara had paid considerably less than the ten million dollars such a place would fetch in Manhattan.

No one thought the space suited her, which was what had drawn Sara to the apartment in the first place. When she'd first moved to Atlanta, she'd wanted something completely different from her homey bungalow back home. She was thinking lately that she'd gone overboard. The open plan felt almost cavernous. The kitchen, with its stainless steel everything and black granite tops, had been very expensive and very useless to someone like Sara, who had been known to burn soup. All the furniture was too modern. The dining room table, carved from a single piece of wood and large enough to seat twelve, was a ridiculous luxury considering she only used it to sort mail and hold the pizza box while she paid the delivery guy.

Sara put away the furniture polish. Dust wasn't the problem. She should move. She should find a small house in one of the more settled Atlanta neighborhoods and get rid of the low-lying leather couches and glass coffee tables. She should have fluffy couches and wide chairs you could snuggle into for reading. She should have a kitchen with a farmhouse sink and a cheery view to the backyard through the wide-open windows.

She should live somewhere like Will's house.

The television caught her eye. The logo for the evening news scrolled onto the screen. A serious-looking reporter stood in front of the Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison. Most insiders referred to it as the D&C, fully mindful of the play on words for Georgia's death row. Sara had seen the story of the two murdered men earlier and thought then what she thought now: here was yet another reason not to be involved with Will Trent.

He was working on Evelyn Mitchell's case. He had probably been nowhere near that prison today, but the minute Sara saw the story about a murdered officer, her heart had jumped into her throat. Even after they'd given the man's name as well as that of the dead inmate, her heart would not calm. Thanks to Jeffrey, Sara knew how it felt when the phone unexpectedly rang in the middle of the night. She remembered how every news story, every snippet of gossip, caused something inside of her to clench in fear that he would be going out on another case, putting his life in danger. It was a form of post-traumatic stress disorder. Sara hadn't realized until her husband was gone that she'd been living in dread for all those years.

The intercom buzzed. Billy gave a halfhearted growl, but neither dog got off the couch. Sara pressed the speaker button. "Yes?"

Will said, "Hi, I'm sorry I—"

Sara buzzed him in. She grabbed his keys off the counter and propped open the front door. She wouldn't invite him in. She wouldn't let him apologize for what Angie had said, because Angie Trent had every right to speak her mind, and what's more, she'd made some very good points. Sara would just tell Will that it was nice knowing him and good luck working things out with his wife.

If he ever got here. The elevator was taking its sweet time. She watched the digital readout show the car moving from the fourth floor down to the lobby. It took another forever for the numbers to start ascending. She whispered them aloud, "Three, four, five," and then finally the bell dinged for six.

The doors slid back. Will peered out behind a pyramid of two cardboard file boxes, a white Styrofoam carton, and a Krispy Kreme doughnut bag. The greyhounds, who only seemed to notice Sara around suppertime, ran out into the hall to greet him.

Sara mumbled a curse.

"Sorry I'm so late." He turned his body so that Bob wouldn't knock him over.

Sara grabbed both dogs by their collars, holding the door open with her foot so that Will could come in. He slid the boxes onto her dining room table and immediately started petting the dogs. They licked him like a long-lost friend, their tails wagging, nails scratching against the wood floor. Sara's resolve, which had been so strong only seconds before, started to crack.

Will looked up. "Were you in bed?"

She had dressed appropriately for her mood in an old pair of sweat pants and a Grant County Rebels football jersey. Her hair was pulled back so tightly that she could feel it tugging the skin on her neck. "Here are your keys."

"Thanks." Will brushed the dog hair off his chest. He was still wearing the same black T-shirt from that afternoon. "Whoa." He pulled back Bob, who was making a play for the Krispy Kremes.

"Is that blood?" There was a dark, dried stain on the right-hand sleeve of his shirt. Instinctively, Sara reached for his arm.

Will took a step back. "It's nothing." He pulled down the cuff. "There was an incident at the prison today."

Sara got that familiar, tight feeling in her chest. "You were there."

"I couldn't do anything to help him. Maybe you ..." His words trailed off. "The staff doctor said it was a mortal wound. There was a lot of blood." He clamped his hand around his wrist. "I should've changed shirts when I got home, but I've got a lot of work to do, and my house is kind of upside down right now."

He had been home. Without reason, Sara had let herself think for just a moment that he hadn't seen his wife. "We should talk about what happened."

"Uh ..." He seemed to purposefully miss her point. "Not much to say. He's dead. He wasn't a particularly good guy, but I'm sure it'll be hard on his family."

Sara stared at him. There was no guile on his face. Maybe Angie hadn't told Will about the confrontation. Or maybe she had, and Will was doing his best to ignore it. Either way, he was hiding something. But suddenly, after spending the last few hours working herself into a frenzy, Sara didn't care. She didn't want to talk about it. She didn't want to analyze it. The only thing she was certain of was that she did not want him to leave.

She asked, "What's in the boxes?"

He seemed to note her shift in attitude, but chose not to acknowledge it. "Case files from an old investigation. It might have something to do with Evelyn's disappearance."

"Not kidnapping?"

His grin indicated he'd been caught. "I just have to know everything in these files by five tomorrow morning."

"Do you need help?"

"Nope." He turned to lift the boxes. "Thanks for getting Betty home for me."

"Being dyslexic is not a character flaw."

Will left the boxes on the table and turned around. He didn't respond immediately. He just looked at her in a way that made Sara wish that she had bothered to bathe. Finally, he said, "I think I liked it better when you were mad at me."

Sara didn't respond.

"It's Angie, right? That's what you're upset about?"

These shifting levels of subterfuge were new to her. "It seems like we were ignoring that."

"Would you like to continue along that path?"

Sara shrugged. She didn't know what she wanted. The right thing to do would be to tell him that their innocent flirtation was over. She should open the door and make him leave. She should call Dr. Dale tomorrow morning and ask him out on another date. She should forget about Will and let time erase him from her memory.

But it wasn't her memory that was the problem. It was that tightness in her chest when she thought about him being in danger. It was that feeling of relief when he walked through the door. It was the happiness she felt just from being near him.

He said, "Angie and I haven't been together—together—in over a year." Will paused, as if to let that sink in. "Not since I met you."

All Sara could say was, "Oh."

"And then when her mother died a few months ago, I saw her for maybe two hours, and she was gone. She didn't even go to the funeral." He paused again; this was obviously difficult for him. "It's hard to explain our relationship. Not without making myself look pitiful and stupid."

"You don't owe me an explanation."

He put his hands in his pockets and leaned against the table. The overhead light caught the jagged scar above his mouth. The skin was pink, a fine line tracing the ridge between his upper lip and nose. Sara couldn't begin to calculate the amount of time she'd wasted wondering how the scar would feel against her own mouth.

Too much time.

Will cleared his throat. He looked down at the floor, then back up at her. "You know where I grew up. How I grew up."

She nodded. The Atlanta Children's Home had closed many years ago, but the abandoned building was less than five miles from where they stood.

"Kids went away a lot. They were trying to get more of us into foster care. I guess it's cheaper that way." He shrugged, as if this was to be expected. "The older ones didn't usually work out. They lasted maybe a few weeks, sometimes only a couple of days. They came back different. I guess you can imagine why."

Sara shook her head. She didn't want to.

"There wasn't exactly a long line of people who wanted to foster an eight-year-old boy who couldn't pass the third grade. But Angie's a girl, and pretty, and smart, so she got sent out a lot." Again, he shrugged. "I guess I got used to waiting for her to come back, and I guess I got used to not asking what happened while she was gone." He pushed away from the table and picked up the boxes. "So, that's it. Pitiful and stupid."

"No. Will—"

He stopped in front of the door, the boxes held in front of him like a suit of armor. "Amanda wanted me to ask you if you know anyone at the Fulton ME's office."

Sara's brain took its time changing gears. "Probably. I did some of my training there when I started."

He shifted his grip. "This is from Amanda, not me. She wants you to make some calls. You don't have to, but—"

"What does she want to know?"

"Anything that comes up on the autopsies. They're not going to share with us."

They want to keep this case.”

He was turned toward the door, waiting. She looked at the back of his neck, the fine hairs at the nape. “All right.”

“You’ve got Amanda’s number. Just call her if anything comes up. Or call her if it doesn’t. She’s impatient.” He stood waiting for her to open the door.

Sara had spent most of the day wanting him out of her life, but now that he was leaving, she couldn’t take it. “Amanda was wrong.”

He turned back around to face her.

“What she said today. Amanda was wrong.”

He feigned shock. “I don’t think I’ve ever heard anyone say those words out loud before.”

“Almeja. The dying man’s last words.” She explained, “The literal translation is right—‘clams’—but it’s not slang for ‘money.’ At least not the way I’ve heard it used.”

“What’s it slang for?”

She hated the word, but she said it anyway. “ ‘Cunt.’ ”

His brow furrowed. “How do you know that?”

“I work in a large public hospital. I don’t think a week’s gone by since I started without someone calling me some variation of that word.”

Will dropped the boxes back on the table. “Who called you that?”

She shook her head. He looked ready to take on her entire patient roster. “The point is, the guy was calling Faith that name. He wasn’t talking about money.”

Will crossed his arms. He was obviously riled. “Ricardo,” he supplied. “The guy in the backyard who shot at those little girls—his name was Ricardo.” Sara held his gaze. Will kept talking. “Hironobu Kwon was the dead guy in the laundry room. We don’t know anything about the older Asian, except that he had a fondness for Hawaiian shirts and spoke with a southside southern drawl. And then there’s someone else who got injured, probably in a knife fight with Evelyn. You’ll probably see the notice at the hospital when you go back to work. Blood type B-negative, possibly Hispanic, stab wound to the gut, possibly a wound on his hand.”

“That’s quite a cast of characters.”

“Trust me, it’s not easy keeping up with them, and I’m not even sure any of them are the real reason all of this is happening.”

“What do you mean?”

“This feels personal, like there’s something else at play. You don’t wait around four years to rob somebody. It’s got to be about something more than money.”

“They say it’s the root of all evil for a reason.” Sara’s husband had always loved money motivations. In her experience, he tended to be right. “This injured guy—the one with the gut wound—is he in a gang?” Will nodded.

“They generally have their own doctors. They’re not bad—I’ve seen some of their handiwork at the ER. But a belly wound is pretty sophisticated to treat. They might need blood, and B-negative is hard to come by. They’d also need a sterile operating environment, medicines that you can’t just grab at your local drugstore. They’d only be at a hospital pharmacy.”

“Can you give me a list? I can have it added to the alert.”

“Of course.” She went to the kitchen to find a pad and paper.

He stayed by the dining room table. “How long could someone live with a stab wound in their belly? It bled a lot at the scene.”

“It depends. Hours, maybe days. Triage can buy some time, but anything close to a week would be a miracle.”

“You mind if I eat my dinner while you do that?” He opened the Styrofoam box. She saw two foot-long hot dogs soaked in chili. He sniffed, then frowned. “I guess the guy at the gas station was going to throw them out for a reason.” Still, he picked up one of the hot dogs.

“Don’t you dare.”

“It’s probably fine.”

“Sit down.” She took out a frying pan from the cabinet and found a carton of eggs in the refrigerator. Will sat at the bar across from the stainless steel cooktop. The Styrofoam box was on the counter beside him. Bob poked it with his nose, then backed away.

She asked, “Was that really your dinner—two hot dogs and a Krispy Kreme doughnut?”

“Four doughnuts.”

“What does your cholesterol look like?”

“I guess it’s white like what they show in the commercials.”

“Very funny.” She wrapped the Styrofoam container in aluminum foil and threw it into the trash. “Why do you think Faith’s mother wasn’t kidnapped?”

“I didn’t actually say that. I just think a lot of things aren’t adding up.” He watched Sara break eggs into a bowl. “I don’t think she left willingly. She wouldn’t do that to her family. But I think she might know her kidnappers. Like, they had a previous working relationship.”

“How?”

He stood and walked to the dining room table, where he took out a handful of yellow folders from one of the boxes. He grabbed the bag of doughnuts before sitting back down at the kitchen bar. “Boyd Spivey,” he said, opening the top file and showing her a mugshot.

Sara recognized the face and name from the news. “That’s the man who was killed at the prison today.”

Will nodded, opening the next file. “Ben Humphrey.”

“Another cop?”

“Yep.” He opened another file. There was a yellow star stickered on the inside. “This is Adam Hopkins. He was Humphrey’s partner.” Another file, this one with a purple star. “This is Chuck Finn, Spivey’s partner, and this guy—” He fumbled open the last file. Green star. “Is Demarcus Alexander.” He’d forgotten one. Will went back to the table and found another yellow folder. This one had a black star, which seemed prophetic when he said, “Lloyd Crittenden. Died from a drug overdose three years ago.”

“All cops?”

Will nodded as he shoved half a doughnut into his mouth.

Sara poured the eggs into the pan. “What am I missing?”

“Their boss was Evelyn Mitchell.”

Sara almost spilled the eggs. “Faith’s mother?” She went back to the photographs, studying the men’s faces. They all had that same arrogant tilt to their chins, as if their present trouble was just a blip on the radar. She skimmed Spivey’s arrest report, trying to decipher the typos. “Theft during the commission of a felony.” She flipped back the page and read the details. “Spivey issued a standing order to his team that they should remove ten percent off the top of every drug bust involving cash money exceeding two thousand dollars.”

“It added up.”

“To how much?”

“From what accounting could estimate, over the course of twelve years, they stole around six million dollars.”

She gave a low whistle.

“That’s a little less than a million each, tax free. Or at least it was. I’m sure Uncle Sam caught up with them their first day in prison.”

Even stolen money was taxable income. Most inmates got their notice from the IRS within the first week of their prison sentence.

Sara checked the front page of the arrest report, stopping on a familiar name. “You were the investigating officer.”

“It’s not my favorite part of the job.” He shoved the rest of the doughnut into his mouth.

Sara looked down at the file, pretending to read on. The typos hadn’t been much of a red flag. Every police report she’d ever read was riddled with grammar and spelling mistakes. Like most dyslexics, Will treated spell check as sacrosanct. He’d substituted words that made no contextual sense, then signed his name at the bottom. Sara studied his signature. It was little more than a squiggle running at an angle from the black line.

Will was watching her closely. She realized she needed to ask a question. “Who instigated the investigation?”

“An anonymous tip came into the GBI.”

“Why wasn’t Evelyn charged?”

“The prosecutor refused to bring a case. She was allowed to retire with her full pension. They called it early retirement, but she was way past her thirty years. She wasn’t working for the money. At least not the money she was getting from the city.”

Sara used a spatula to stir the eggs. Will ate another doughnut in two bites. The powdered sugar sprinkled onto the black granite countertop.

She said, “Can I ask you something?”

“Sure.”

“How does Faith work with you after you investigated her mother?”

“She thinks I’m wrong.” Bob was back. He propped his nose on the counter and Will started petting his head. “I know that she cleared it with her mother, but we’ve never really talked about it beyond that.”

Sara would not have believed anyone else telling her the same thing, but she could easily imagine how this worked. Faith wasn’t one to sit around talking about her feelings, and Will was just so damn decent that it was hard to assign him vengeful ulterior motives. “What’s Evelyn like?”

“She’s old school.”

“Like Amanda?”

“Not exactly.” He took another doughnut out of the bag. “I mean, she’s tough, but she’s not as intense.”

Sara understood what he meant. That generation didn’t have a lot of avenues for proving themselves to their male counterparts. Amanda had taken the ball-breaking route with obvious relish.

"They came up together," Will told her. "They went to the academy together, then worked joint task forces through APD and the GBI. They're still good friends. I think Amanda dated Evelyn's brother, or her brother-in-law."

Sara couldn't think of a more obvious conflict of interest. "And Amanda was your senior officer when you were investigating Evelyn?"

"Yep." He inhaled another doughnut.

"Did you know this at the time?"

He shook his head, keeping the doughnut in his cheek like a squirrel with a nut so that he could ask, "You know the stove isn't on, right?"

"Crap." That explained why the eggs were still liquid. She clicked the dial until the flame whooshed up.

He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "I like to let them sit for a while, too. Gives them a woodsy character."

"That's E. coli." She checked the toaster, wondering why it hadn't popped up. Probably because there was nothing in there. Will smiled as she got a loaf of bread out of the cabinet. She said, "I'm not much of a cook."

"Do you want me to take over?"

"I want you to tell me about Evelyn."

He leaned back in the chair. "I liked her when I met her. I know that seems strange under the circumstances. I guess I was supposed to hate her, but you can't look at it that way. This is government work. Sometimes investigations get started for the wrong reason, and you find yourself sitting opposite somebody who's been jammed up for saying the wrong thing or ticking off the wrong politician." He brushed the powdered sugar into a pile as he talked. "Evelyn was very polite. Respectful. Her record was spotless until then. She treated me like I was just doing my job, not like I was a pedophile, which is what you normally get."

"Maybe she knew she'd never be prosecuted."

"I think she was worried about it, but her primary concern was her daughter. She worked really hard to keep Faith out of it. I never even met her until Amanda paired us up."

"She's a good mother at least."

"She's a classy lady. But she's also smart, strong, tough. I wouldn't bet against her on this."

Sara had forgotten the eggs. She used the spatula to scrape them off the bottom of the pan.

Will told her, "Evelyn was duct-taped to a chair while they searched her house. I found an arrowhead drawn underneath the seat. She used her own blood to do it."

"Where was it pointing?"

"Into the room. At the couch. Into the backyard." He shrugged. "Who knows? We didn't find anything."

Sara thought about it. "Just the head of an arrow? That's all?"

He fanned out the powdered sugar again and drew the shape.

Sara studied the symbol, silently debating how to proceed. She finally decided the truth was her only option. "It looks like a V to me. The letter V."

He was quiet in a way that changed the air in the room. She thought he was going to change the subject, or make a joke, but he told her, "It wasn't perfect. It was smudged at the top."

"Like this?" She drew another line. "Like the letter A?"

He stared at the figure. "I guess Amanda wasn't pretending when she said she didn't know what I was talking about."

"She saw it, too?"

He brushed the powdered sugar into his hand and dropped it into the bag with the last doughnut. "Yep."

She put the plate of eggs in front of him. The toaster popped up. The bread was almost black. "Oh, no," she mumbled. "I'm so sorry. You don't have to eat this. Do you want me to get the hot dogs out of the trash?"

He took the burned toast from her and dropped it on the plate. It made a sound like a brick scraping concrete. "Some butter would be nice."

She had fake butter. Will dipped a knife out of the tub and coated the bread until it was soggy enough to fold in his hand. The eggs were closer to taupe than yellow, but he started in on them anyway.

Sara told him, "The name 'Amanda' starts with an A. Almeja starts with an A. And now Evelyn might've drawn an A on the bottom of her chair."

He put down the fork. His plate was clean.

She continued, "Almeja sort of sounds like 'Amanda.' The same number of syllables. The same first and last letter." He would've missed the alliterative. Most dyslexics couldn't rhyme two words if you put a gun to their heads.

He edged his plate away. "Amanda isn't telling me everything. She's not even admitting that the corruption case has anything to do with Evelyn's situation."

"But she told you to go over all your case files."

"Either she needs the information or she's trying to keep me busy. She knows this will take me all night."

"Not if I help you."

He picked up his plate and walked over to the sink. "Do you want me to wash this before I go?"

"I want you to tell me about the crime scene."

He rinsed his plate, then started to wash his hands.

"That's the cold," Sara said, and then because it was pointless to tell him that because she was left-handed, she'd switched the hot water valve to the right-hand side, she leaned in and adjusted the temperature for him.

Will opened his hand so that she could squirt some soap onto his palm. "Why do you smell like lemon furniture polish?"

"Why did you let me believe Betty belongs to your wife?"

He lathered the soap in his hands. "There are some mysteries that will never be solved."

She smiled. "Tell me about the crime scene."

Will told her what they had found: the upturned chairs and broken baby toys. He segued into Mrs. Levy and Evelyn's gentleman caller, Mittal's theory about the blood trail, and Will's own divergent theory about the same. By the time he got to the part where they had found the gentleman in the trunk, Sara had managed to get him to sit down at the dining room table.

She asked, "Do you think Boyd Spivey was killed because he talked to Amanda?"

"It's possible, but not likely." He explained, "Think about the timing. Amanda called the warden two hours before we got to the prison. The prison doc said a serrated knife was used. That's not something you can make out of your toothbrush. The camera was disabled the day before, which indicates this was planned at least twenty-four hours in advance."

"So, it was coordinated. Evelyn is taken. Boyd is killed a few hours later. Are the other men from her team safe?"

"That's a very good question." He pulled his cell phone out of his pocket. "Do you mind if I make some calls?"

"Of course not." She got up from the table to give him some privacy. The frying pan was still warm, so she ran cold water over it. The eggs were seared to the metal. She picked at the slime with her thumbnail before giving up and sticking it on the top rack of the dishwasher.

Sara opened Boyd Spivey's file again. Will had used a pink star to identify him, perhaps as a joke. The man looked the part of a corrupt cop. His moon-shaped face indicated steroid use. His pupils were barely discernible in his beady eyes. His height and weight were closer to a linebacker's.

She skimmed the details of Spivey's arrest while listening with half an ear as Will talked with someone at Valdosta State Prison. They discussed whether or not to move Ben Humphrey and Adam Hopkins into solitary confinement, and agreed that it would be best just to step up their monitoring.

Will's next call was more complicated. Sara assumed he was talking to someone at GBI headquarters about locating the remaining two men through their parole officers.

She opened Spivey's file and found his personnel record behind the arrest report. Sara read through the details of the man's professional life. Spivey had joined the academy fresh out of high school. He'd gone to night school at Georgia State in order to earn a BA in criminal science. He had three children and a wife who worked as a secretary at the Dutch consulate on the outskirts of the city.

Spivey's promotion onto Evelyn's team was a coup. The drug squad was one of the most elite in the country. They had all the best weapons and facilities, and enough high-profile bad guys in the Atlanta area to win them plenty of commendations and press time, which Spivey in particular seemed to enjoy. Will had collected newspaper clippings on the team's most noteworthy busts. Spivey was front and center of every news story, even though Evelyn was the leader of the team. One photo showed a clean-shaven Spivey with enough ribbons on his chest to decorate a girl's bicycle.

And it still had not been enough.

"Hey."

Sara looked up from her reading. Will had finished his phone calls.

"Sorry about that. I wanted to make sure they were safe."

"It's fine." Sara wasn't going to pretend she hadn't been listening. "You didn't call Amanda."

"No, I didn't."

"Give me some more files to read."

"You really don't have to do this."

"I want to." Sara was no longer being kind or trying to spend more time in his company. She wanted to know what had made a man like Boyd Spivey turn into such a lowlife.

Will stared at her long enough to make her think he was going to say no. Then he opened one of the boxes. There was an ancient Walkman nestled in a pile of audio cassette tapes. None of them had labels, unless you counted the colored, star-shaped stickers. Will explained, "These are recordings of all the interviews I had with each suspect. None of them said much in the beginning, but they all ended up making deals to cut time off their sentences."

"They ratted each other out?"

"Not a chance. They had some information on a couple of local councilmen to trade. It gave them some leverage with the prosecutor."

Sara couldn't pretend to be shocked over politicians with drug problems. "How much leverage?"

"Enough to get them talking, not enough to make them give up the big fish." He opened the next box and started pulling out files. As with everything else, they were color-coded. He handed her the green ones first. "Witness testimony for the prosecution." He stacked the red ones, which were fewer in number. "Witnesses for the defense." He took out the blue ones. "High-dollar busts—anything where more than two thousand dollars was seized."

Sara went right to work, carefully reading the next personnel file. Ben Humphrey had been the same kind of cop as Boyd Spivey: solidly built, good at his job, driven to get press, and, in the end, absolutely corrupt. The same proved to be true of Adam Hopkins and Demarcus Alexander, both of whom were praised for their bravery under fire during a bank robbery, both of whom paid cash for their vacation homes in Florida. Lloyd Crittenden had earned his shield after flipping his cruiser six times during the pursuit of a man who'd shot up a seedy bar with a sawed-off shotgun. He also had a mouth on him. There were two write-ups for insubordination, but Evelyn's yearly reviews had been nothing if not glowing.

The only outlier was Chuck Finn, who seemed more cerebral than his colleagues. Finn had been in the process of earning his PhD in Italian renaissance art when he was busted. His lifestyle wasn't as lavish as the others'. He'd used his ill-gotten gains to educate himself and travel the world. He must've complemented the team in more subtle ways. Evelyn Mitchell had obviously handpicked each man for a reason. Some were leaders. Some, like Chuck Finn, were obviously followers. They all fit the same general profile: overachievers with a reputation in the department for doing whatever had to be done. Three were white. Two were black. One was part Cherokee Indian. All of them had given up everything for cold, hard cash.

Will flipped over the tape in the Walkman. He sat with his eyes closed, headphones tucked into his ears. She could hear the squeak of the wheels working in the tape player.

The next stack of folders detailed all of the high-dollar busts the team had made, and presumably skimmed from, over the years. Sara had thought these files would be the hardest to get through, but they all turned out to be fairly mundane. Such was the nature of the illegal drug trade that most of the men the team had arrested were either dead or incarcerated when Evelyn's squad was busted. Only a few were still on the street, but they were obviously active. Sara recognized some of the names from the nightly news. Two looked promising for their own reasons. She set their files aside for Will.

Sara checked the time. It was well past midnight and she had an early shift in the morning. As if on cue, her mouth opened in such a wide yawn that her jaw popped. She glanced at Will to make sure he hadn't seen. There was still a large stack of folders in front of her. She was only halfway through, but she couldn't make herself stop if she wanted to. It was like trying to put together all the clues in a mystery novel. The good guys were just as corrupt as the villains. The villains seemed to take the graft as a cost of doing business. Both probably had a long list of justifications for their illegal actions.

She tackled the next pile of folders. The six men on Evelyn's team had never gone to trial, but they must have been close to starting when the deals were made. The prosecution's list of potential witnesses had been highly screened, but no more so than those representing the defendants. The names would be familiar to Will, but still, Sara carefully read through each file. After a solid hour of comparing statements, she let herself move on to the last file, which she'd held back as a reward for not giving up.

Evelyn Mitchell's booking photo showed a trim woman with an unreadable expression on her face. She must have felt humiliated to be booked and processed after spending so much time on the other side of the table. Nothing about her expression gave that away. Her mouth was set in a tight line. Her eyes stared blankly ahead. Her hair was blonde, like Faith's, with gray streaking through at the temples. Blue eyes, 138 pounds, five-nine—a little taller than her daughter.

Her career was the sort that garnered pioneer awards from the local Women's Club, which Captain Mitchell had twice received. Her promotion to detective was preceded by a hostage negotiation that had resulted in the freeing of two children and the death of a serial child molester. Her lieutenant rank came almost ten years after passing the test with the highest grade yet recorded. Her captainship was the result of a gender-bias lawsuit filed with the EEOC.

Evelyn had worked her way up the hard way, paying her dues on the street. She had two degrees, one from Georgia Tech, both with honors. She was a mother, a grandmother, a widow. Her children were in what Sara thought of as service—one to her community, the other to his country. Her husband had worked a solidly respectable job as an insurance salesman. In many ways, she reminded Sara of her own mother. Cathy Linton wasn't the sort of woman to carry a gun, but she was driven to do what she believed was right for herself and her family.

But she would've never taken a bribe. Cathy was painfully honest, the sort of person who would turn around and drive fifty miles back to a tourist trap in Florida because they had given her too much change. Maybe this explained why Faith could work with Will. If someone had told Sara that her mother had stolen almost a million dollars, she would've laughed in their face. It was the stuff of fairy tales. Faith didn't just think he was wrong about her mother. She thought he was deluded.

Will changed out another tape.

Sara motioned for him to take off his headphones. "It doesn't add up."

"What doesn't?"

"You said each team member netted just shy of a million dollars. You've accounted for sixty thousand, at best, in the out-of-state account that was opened in Bill Mitchell's name. Evelyn doesn't drive a Porsche. She doesn't have a mistress. Faith and her brother weren't in private schools, and the only vacations she took were to Jekyll Island with her grandson."

"It adds up after today," he reminded her. "Whoever took Evelyn wants that money."

"I don't buy it."

Most cops defended their cases like they would defend their children. Will just asked, "Why?"

"Gut feeling. Instinct. I just don't buy it."

"Faith doesn't know about the bank account."

"I won't tell her."

He sat up, clasping his hands together. "I've been listening to my early interviews with Evelyn. She talks about her husband, mostly."

"Bill, right? He was an insurance agent."

"He died a few years before the case was brought against Evelyn."

Sara braced herself for a widow question, but Will went in another direction.

"The year before Bill died, he was sued by the family of a policyholder for a claim denial. They said Bill filled out some paperwork incorrectly. A father of three had a rare kind of heart defect. The company denied treatment."

This wasn't a new story to Sara. "They said it was a pre-existing condition."

"Only it wasn't—at least not diagnosed. The family got a lawyer, but it was too late. The guy ended up dying because the wrong box was checked on a form. Three days later, his widow gets a letter in the mail from the insurance company saying that Bill Mitchell, the originating agent, made a mistake on the forms and her husband's treatment was approved."

"That's awful."

"Bill took it hard. He was a very careful man. His reputation was important to him, important to his work. He got an ulcer worrying about it."

That wasn't technically how ulcers worked, but she told him, "Go on."

"He was eventually cleared. They found the original forms. The insurance company had screwed up, not Bill. Some data entry person had clicked the wrong box. No malfeasance, just incompetence." Will waved this away. "Anyway, what Evelyn said was that Bill never got past it. It made her crazy because he wouldn't let it go. They argued about it. She thought he was just feeling sorry for himself. She accused him of being paranoid. He said people at work treated him differently. A lot of people thought the company took the bullet and it was really Bill's mistake."

Sara was dubious. "An insurance company took the bullet?"

"People get crazy ideas," Will said. "Anyway, Bill felt like it wiped out all the good he'd done over the years. Evelyn said that when the cancer came—Bill died of pancreatic cancer three months after his diagnosis—she thought part of the reason he couldn't fight it was that he had this guilt hanging over his head. And that she had never forgiven him for that, for not fighting the cancer. He just kind of accepted it and then waited to die."

Pancreatic cancer was not easily vanquished. The chances for long-term survival were less than five percent. "Stress like that can certainly impair your immune system.”

“Evelyn was worried that the same thing was going to happen to her.”

“That she’d get cancer?”

“No. That the investigation would ruin her life, even if she was cleared. That it would hang over her head forever. She said that in all the years since her husband had died, she had never wanted him back more than she did that day so that she could tell him that she finally understood.”

Sara considered the weight of the statement. “That sounds like something an innocent person would say.”

“It does.”

“Does that mean you’re leaning away from your original conclusion?”

“It’s very kind of you to phrase your question so diplomatically.” He grinned.

“I don’t know. My case was shut down before I could wrap it up to my satisfaction. Evelyn signed her papers and took her retirement. Amanda didn’t even tell me it was over. I heard it on the news one morning—decorated officer retiring from the force to spend more time with her family.”

“You think she got away with it.”

“I keep coming back to one thing: she was in charge of a team that stole a whole lot of money. Either she turned a blind eye or she’s not as good as she reads on paper.” Will picked at the plastic seam on one of the audiotapes. “And there’s still the bank account. It might not seem like much compared to millions, but sixty thousand is a chunk of change. And it’s in her husband’s name, not hers. Why not change it over now that he’s dead? Why still keep it a secret?”

“All good points.”

He was quiet for a moment, the only sound in the room his thumbnail picking at the plastic seam. “Faith didn’t call me when it happened. I didn’t have my cell, so it would’ve been pointless, but she didn’t call me.” He paused. “I thought maybe she didn’t trust me because it was her mother involved.”

“I doubt she was even thinking about that. You know how your brain just blanks out when something like that happens. Did you ask her about it?”

“She’s got a lot more on her mind right now than holding my hand.” He gave a self-deprecating chuckle. “Maybe I should write about it in my diary.” He started packing up the boxes. “Anyway, I’ll let you get to bed. Did you find anything I should know about?”

Sara pulled out the two files she’d set aside. “These guys might deserve a closer look. They were in the high-dollar busts. One of them was also on Spivey’s defense witness list. I flagged him because he has a history of kidnapping for leverage over rival gangs.”

Will opened the top file.

Sara supplied the name. “Ignatio Ortiz.”

Will groaned. “He’s in Phillips State Prison on a manslaughter attempt.”

“So, it won’t be hard to find him.”

“He runs Los Mexicanos.”

Sara was familiar with the gang. She had treated her share of kids who were involved in the organization. Not many of them walked out of the ER in one piece.

Will said, “If Ortiz is wrapped up in this, he’ll never talk to us. If he’s not, then he’ll never talk to us. Whichever it is, driving to the prison would be three or four hours out of our day for nothing.”

“He was going to be called as a witness for Spivey’s defense.”

“Boyd had a surprising number of thugs willing to testify that he hadn’t touched their money. There was a whole roster of criminals willing to stand up for Evelyn’s team.”

“Did you get anything from Boyd at the prison?”

Will frowned. “Amanda interviewed him. They talked in some kind of code. One thing I picked up on was that Boyd said the Asians were trying to cut the Mexicans out of the supply side.”

“Los Mexicanos,” Sara provided.

“Amanda told me their preferred method is slitting throats.”

Sara put her hand to her neck, trying not to shudder. “You think that Evelyn was still doing business with these drug dealers?”

He closed Ortiz’s file. “I can’t see how. She doesn’t have any juice without her badge. And I can’t picture her as a kingpin unless she’s some kind of sociopath. Granny-Nanny by day, drug lord by night.”

“You said Ortiz is in prison for attempted manslaughter. Who’d he try to kill?”

“His brother. He found him in bed with his wife.”

“Maybe this is the brother.” Sara opened the next file. “Hector Ortiz,” she told him. “He’s not a bad guy on paper, but he made the defense witness list. I pulled him because he has the same last name as Ignatio.”

Will unclipped the mugshot from the file to get a closer look. “Is your gut still telling you that Evelyn is innocent?”

Sara looked at her watch. She had to be at work in five hours. “My gut has turned in for the night. What is it?”

He held up Hector Ortiz’s photograph. The man was bald with a salt-and-pepper goatee. His shirt was rumpled. He held up his arm to show a tattoo to the camera: a green and red Texas star with a rattlesnake wrapped around it.

Will said, “Meet Evelyn’s gentleman friend.”

SUNDAY

CHAPTER SEVEN

The open-handed slaps had turned into punches hours ago. Days ago? Evelyn wasn't sure. She was blindfolded, sitting in total darkness. Something dripped—faucet, gutter, blood—she didn't know. Her body was so riddled with pain that even when she squeezed her eyes shut and tried to block out every screaming muscle, every broken bone, nothing felt undamaged.

She panted out a laugh. Blood sprayed from her mouth. Her missing finger. There was one bone that wasn't broken, one piece of flesh that wasn't bruised.

They had started on her feet, beating the soles with a galvanized metal pipe. It was a form of torture they had apparently seen in a movie, which Evelyn knew because one of them had helpfully coached, "The dude was swinging it back higher, like this." The sensation Evelyn had felt could not be called pain. It was a searing of the skin that her blood carried like fire through her entire body.

Like most women, it was rape that had always terrified her, but she knew now that there were far worse dangers. There was at least an animalistic logic to the crime of rape. These men were not deriving pleasure from hurting her. Their reward came from the cheers of their friends. They were trying to impress each other, pulling a game of one-upmanship to see who could make her scream the loudest. And Evelyn did scream. She screamed so loud that she was sure that her vocal cords would rupture. She screamed from pain. She screamed from terror. She screamed from anger, fury, loss. She screamed most of all because these competing emotions felt like burning hot lava rushing up her throat.

At one point, they'd had a protracted discussion about where her vagus nerve was located. Three of them took turns, punching her in the general area of her kidneys until, like children hitting a piñata, one hit pay dirt. They'd laughed uncontrollably as Evelyn seized as if electrocuted. The feeling was one of primal terror. She had never in her life felt so close to death. She had urinated herself. She had screamed into the darkness until there was no sound coming out of her mouth.

And then they had broken her leg. Not a clean break, but the result of the heavy metal pipe pounding again and again against her leg until there was the resounding crunch of a single bone splintering into two.

One of them pressed his hand over the break, his putrid breath in her ear. "This is what that stupid bitch did to Ricardo."

That stupid bitch was her baby. They had no way of knowing how the words had given Evelyn hope. She had been knocked out, dragged from the scene, shortly after Faith's car had pulled into the driveway. Evelyn had come to in the back of a van. The engine noise had been rumbling in her ears, but she'd heard two distinct gunshots, the second following the first by a good forty seconds.

But now Evelyn knew the answer to the only question that kept her from just giving up. Faith was alive. She had gotten away. After that, every horror they visited on her was inconsequential. She thought of Emma in her daughter's arms, Jeremy together with his mother. Zeke would be there. He was so full of anger, but he had always taken care of his sister. The APD would surround them like a shroud. Will Trent would lay down his life to protect Faith. Amanda would move heaven and earth to find justice.

"Almeja ..." Evelyn's voice was raspy in the close space.

All that she could ask was for her children to be safe. No one could get her out of this. There was no promise of salvation. Amanda could not talk her through this pain. Bill Mitchell would not come riding up on his white horse to save her.

She had been so stupid. One mistake so many years ago. One terrible, stupid mistake.

Evelyn spit out a broken tooth. Her last right molar. She could feel the raw nerve responding to the cold in the air. She tried to cover the spot with her tongue as she breathed through her mouth. She had to keep the airway open. Her nose was broken. If she stopped breathing, or passed out with blood in her throat, she would choke to death. She should welcome the relief, but instead the thought of death still terrified her. Evelyn had always been a fighter. It was in her nature to dig in her heels the more she was pushed. And yet, she could feel herself starting to break—not from the pain, but from exhaustion. She could feel her resolve draining away like water through a sieve. If she gave in, they might get what they wanted. Her mouth might move, her voice might work, despite her mind willing her to be silent.

And then what?

They would have to kill her. She knew who they were, even though they had worn masks and blindfolded her. She knew their voices. Their names. Their smells. She knew what they were planning, what they had already done.

Hector.

She had found him in the trunk of her car. Even with a silencer, there was no such thing as a quiet gunshot. Evelyn had heard the noise twice in her life, and she instantly recognized the snip of gas passing through a metal cylinder.

At least she had protected Emma. At least she had made certain that her daughter's child was safe.

Faith.

Mothers were not supposed to pick favorites, but Zeke was the obvious choice. Driven. Smart. Capable. Loyal. He was her firstborn, a shy little boy who had clung to Evelyn's skirt when strangers visited the house. A toddler who sat with her while she cooked dinner and loved going to the store so he could help carry the bags. His little chest out. His arms overloaded. His teeth showing in a prideful, happy grin.

But it was Faith whom Evelyn felt closest to. Faith who had made so many mistakes. Faith whom Evelyn could always forgive because every time she looked at her daughter, she caught a glimpse of herself.

Their time together. Housebound. Those months of forced confinement. Forced exile. Forced misery.

Bill had never understood it, but then, it wasn't his nature to understand mistakes. He'd been the first to notice the swell of her stomach. He'd been the first to confront her about it. For nine long months, he was stoic and self-righteous, suddenly making Evelyn understand where Zeke had gotten these tendencies. During the hardest time, he had all but disappeared from their lives. Even after it was all over, and Jeremy had brightened up their lives like the sun finally shining down after a summer storm, Bill had never been the same.

But then, Evelyn had never been the same, either. Nor had anyone. Faith was caught up in figuring out how to raise a child. Zeke, who had wanted nothing more than Evelyn's attention since he was a baby, had gone as far away as he could get from her without leaving the planet. Her little boy lost. Her heart split in two.

She couldn't bear to think about it anymore.

Evelyn straightened her spine, trying to take pressure off her diaphragm. She couldn't keep this up. She was breaking. These young men with their video games and film fantasies had an unlimited pool of ideas at their disposal. God only knew what they would resort to next. They had no problem laying their hands on drugs. Barbiturates. Ethanol. Scopolamine. Sodium Pentothal. Any one of them could act as a truth serum. Any one of them could pry the information out of her mouth.

Just the excruciatingly slow passage of time could make her talk. The unceasing agony. The relentless barrage of accusations. They were so angry, so hostile.

So barbaric.

She was going to die. Evelyn had known the minute she woke in the van that death was the only end to this. In the beginning, she thought it would be their death at her hands. She had quickly realized it was going to be the other way around. The only control she had over anything was her mouth. Through all of this, she had not once begged them to stop. She had not asked for mercy. She had not given them the power of knowing that they were so far into her head that every thought had a shadow lurking behind it.

But what if she told them the truth?

Evelyn had spent so many years hiding the secret that even thinking about unburdening herself brought her something akin to peace. These men were her torturers, not her confessors, but she was in no position to quibble. Perhaps her death would absolve her of her sins. Perhaps there would be a moment of relief when for the first time in a long while, Evelyn felt the weight of deceit finally lifting from her shoulders.

No. They would never believe her. She would have to tell them a lie. The truth was too disappointing. Too common.

It would have to be a believable lie, something so compelling that they would kill her without first waiting for verification. These men were hardened, but not experienced, criminals. They didn't have the patience to keep around an old woman who had defied them for so long. They would see killing her as the ultimate proof of their manhood.

Her only regret was that she wouldn't be there when they realized she'd tricked them. She hoped they heard her laughing at them from hell for the rest of their miserable, pathetic lives.

She laughed now, just to hear the sound, the desperation.

The door opened. A slash of light came under the blindfold. She heard men mumbling. They were talking about another TV show, another movie, that had a new technique they wanted to try out.

Evelyn inhaled deeply, even though her broken ribs stabbed into her lungs with every breath. She willed her heart to still. She prayed for strength to a God she'd stopped talking to the day her husband died.

The one with the putrid breath said, "You ready to talk, bitch?"

Evelyn braced herself. She couldn't appear to give in too easily. She would have to let them beat her, make them think that they had finally won. It wasn't the first time that she'd let a man think he had complete control over her, but it sure as hell would be the last.

He pressed his hand into her broken leg. "You ready to bring on the pain?"

This would work. This had to work. Evelyn would do her part, and her death would finish it, wash away her sins. Faith would never find out. Zeke would never know. Her children and grandchildren would be safe.

Safe but for one thing.

Evelyn closed her eyes and sent out a silent message to Roz Levy, praying that the old woman would keep her mouth shut.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Faith's eyes were closed, but she couldn't sleep. Wouldn't sleep. The night had passed in inches, dragging along like Death's sickle being scraped across the floor. For hours, she had listened to every creak and groan of the house, straining to hear any movement downstairs that indicated Zeke was finally awake.

Her mother's finger was hidden in a half-empty box of Band-Aids in Faith's medicine cabinet. It was wrapped in a Ziploc bag she'd found in an old suitcase. Faith had debated about whether or not to put it on ice, but the thought of preserving her mother's finger had made bile come to the back of her throat. Besides, she hadn't wanted to go downstairs last night and face Zeke, or the detectives who were sitting at her kitchen table, or her son who would surely join them all if he heard his mother was up. Faith knew if she saw them, she would start crying, and if she started crying they would quickly figure out why.

Keep your mouth shut and your eyes open.

She was doing exactly that, though the cop inside of her was screaming that following the kidnapper's orders was an incredibly big mistake. You never gave them the upper hand. You never ceded to a request without getting something in return. Faith had coached families on these basic strategies dozens of times. She saw now that it was a different thing altogether when the threatened loved one was your own. If Evelyn's abductors had told Faith to douse herself in gasoline and light a match, she would've done it. Logic went out the window when there existed the very real possibility that she might never see her mother again.

Still, the cop in her wanted details. There were tests that could be done to determine whether or not Evelyn was alive when the finger was removed. There were other tests that would prove definitively whether or not the digit belonged to Evelyn in the first place. It looked like a woman's finger, but Faith had never spent much time studying her mother's hands. There was no wedding ring; Evelyn had stopped wearing that a few years ago. It was one of those things Faith didn't notice at first. Or maybe her mother was just a good liar. She'd laughed when Faith asked about her naked hand, saying, "Oh, I took that off ages ago."

Was her mother a liar? That was the central question. Faith lied to Jeremy all the time, but it was about things all mothers should lie to their children about: her dating life, what was happening at work, how she was managing her health. Evelyn had lied about Zeke being transferred back to the U.S. But, that was to keep the peace, and probably to prevent Zeke's disapproval from shadowing the happy occasion of Emma's birth.

Those sorts of lies didn't count. They were protective lies, not malignant lies that festered like a splinter under your skin. Had Evelyn lied to Faith in a way that counted? There was something bigger that Evelyn was hiding, something more than the obvious. Evelyn's house told that story. The circumstances of her kidnapping delivered chapter and verse. She had something in her possession that some very bad men wanted. There was a drug connection. There was at least one gang involved. Her mother had worked narcotics. Had she been sitting on a pile of cash all this time? Was there a secret vault hidden somewhere? Would Faith and Zeke find out when Evelyn's will was read that their mother was actually wealthy?

No, that wasn't possible. Evelyn would know that her children would turn over any illicit cash, no matter how much easier it would make their lives. Mortgages. Car payments. Student loans. None of that would go away. Neither Zeke nor Faith would ever take dirty money. Evelyn had raised them better than that.

And she had raised Faith to be a better cop than to just sit around on her hands all night waiting for the sun to come up.

If Evelyn were here right now, what would she want Faith to do? The obvious answer was to call Amanda. The two women had always been close. "Thick as thieves," Bill Mitchell had often said, and not with flattery. Even after Faith's uncle Kenny had decided to make an ass of himself pursuing younger women on the beaches of South Florida, Evelyn had made it clear that she preferred to have Amanda at the family Christmas table rather than Kenny Mitchell. The two women shared a shorthand the way soldiers did when they came back from war.

But calling Amanda now was out of the question. She would come rushing in like a bull in a china shop. Faith's house would be turned upside down. A SWAT team would be in place. The kidnappers would take one look at the show of force and decide it was easier to put a bullet in their victim's head rather than negotiate with a woman who was hell-bent on revenge. Because that was exactly how Amanda would play it. She never went at anything quietly. It was always a hundred percent or nothing at all.

Will was good at going in soft. He'd perfected the technique. And he was her partner. She should call him, or at least get word to him. But what would she say? "I need your help but you can't tell Amanda and we may end up breaking the law, but please don't ask any questions." It was an untenable position. He'd bent the rules for her yesterday, but she couldn't ask him to break them. There was no one else she would trust more to have her back, but Will had a sometimes vexing sense of right and wrong. Part of her was afraid that he would tell her no. And a larger part of her was afraid that she would end up getting him into the kind of trouble that he could never get out of. It was one thing for Faith to throw her career out the window. She couldn't ask Will to do the same.

She dropped her head into her hands. Even if she wanted to reach out, the phones were tapped in case a ransom demand was made. Her email was through her GBI account, which was more than likely being monitored. They were probably listening in on her cell phone calls, too.

And that was just the good guys. Who knew what Evelyn's kidnappers had managed to do? They knew Jeremy's nickname, his birth year, his school. They had sent a warning through his Facebook account. Maybe they had bugged the house, too. You could get spy-quality devices off the Internet. Unless Faith went around removing switch plates and taking apart the phones, there was no telling whether or not someone was listening. And the minute she started acting paranoid around her family, they would know that something was wrong. Not to mention the Atlanta detectives, who were watching her every move.

Finally, she heard the downstairs toilet flush. A few seconds later, the front door opened and closed. Zeke was probably going for a run, or maybe the detectives had decided to get their fresh air in the front yard instead of the back.

Faith's hamstrings vibrated with pain as she put her feet on the floor. She'd been curled up for so long that her body was stiff. Other than checking on Emma, she hadn't dared walk around last night for fear of Zeke coming upstairs to ask her what the hell she was doing. The house was old, the floorboards were squeaky, and her brother was a light sleeper.

She started with her chest of drawers, carefully opening each one, checking through her underwear and T-shirts and nightgowns to see if anything had been disturbed. Nothing looked out of place. Next, she went to the closet. Her work wardrobe consisted mostly of black suits with stretch in the pants so that she didn't have to worry about whether or not they would button in the morning. Her maternity clothes were in a box on the lower shelf. Faith dragged over a chair and checked that the tape was still sealed. The stack of blue jeans beside it looked undisturbed. Still, she checked all the pockets, then went back to her suits and did the same.

Nothing.

Faith climbed back onto the chair and stretched on tiptoe to reach the top shelf, where she'd stored the box of Jeremy's childhood memorabilia. It nearly fell on her head. She caught it at the last minute, holding her breath for fear of making too much noise. She sat on the floor with the box between her legs. The cardboard was unsealed. The tape had been peeled off months ago. While she was pregnant with Emma, Faith had been obsessed with going through Jeremy's childhood keepsakes. It was a good thing she lived alone or someone would've seriously questioned her emotional stability. Just the sight of his bronzed shoes and little knitted booties had turned her into a weeping mess. His report cards. His school papers. Mother's Day cards he'd drawn in crayon. Valentines he'd cut with his tiny blunted scissors.

Her eyes stung as she opened the box.

A lock of Jeremy's hair rested on top of his twelfth-grade report card. The blue ribbon looked different. She held it up to the light. Time had faded the pastel-colored silk, giving the creases a dingy cast. The hair had darkened to a golden brown. Something felt different. She couldn't tell whether or not the bow had been retied or if it had come loose in the box. She also couldn't remember whether she'd stacked his report cards first grade to twelfth or the other way around. It seemed counterintuitive that the last was first, especially since the lock of hair was on top. Or maybe she was just talking herself into a frenzy when nothing was wrong.

Faith lifted up the stack of report cards and looked underneath. His papers were still there. She saw the bronze shoes, the booties, the construction paper greeting cards he'd made in school.

Everything seemed accounted for, yet she couldn't shake the feeling that the box had been tampered with. Had someone else gone through Jeremy's things? Had they seen the hearts he'd drawn on a picture of Mr. Billingham, his first dog? Had they rifled through his report cards and laughed because Mrs. Thompson, his fourth-grade teacher, had called him a little angel?

Faith closed the box. She hefted it up over her head and slid it onto the shelf.

By the time she shoved the chair back in place, she was shaking with fury at the thought of some stranger's grimy hands on her boy's things.

She went to Emma's room next. The baby didn't normally sleep through the night, but yesterday had been unusually long and tumultuous. She was still asleep when Faith checked the crib. Her throat made a clicking noise as she breathed. Faith laid a hand on her chest. Emma's heart felt like a bird trapped under Faith's hand. Quietly, she searched the closet, the small box of toys, the diapers and supplies.

Nothing.

Jeremy was still asleep, but Faith went into his room anyway. She picked up his clothes from the floor to give some pretense of belonging. Part of her just wanted to stand there and stare at him. He was in what she thought of as his John Travolta pose, sprawled on his stomach, right foot hanging off the bed, left arm sticking straight out above his head. His thin shoulder blades stuck out like chicken wings. His hair covered most of his face. There was a spot of saliva on his pillow. He still slept with his mouth open.

His room had been spotless yesterday, but his mere presence had altered everything. Papers covered the desk. His backpack spilled onto the floor. Wires from various pieces of computer equipment were draped across the carpet. His laptop, which she had saved for six months to buy, was open on its side like a discarded book. Faith used her foot to tip it right side up before leaving the room. Then, she went back in one more time, but only to pull the sheet up over his shoulders so that he wouldn't get cold.

Faith threw Jeremy's clothes on top of the washer and made her way downstairs. Detective Connor was sitting in his usual chair at the kitchen table. His shirt was different from yesterday, and his shoulder holster wasn't as tight around his chest. His red hair was tousled, probably from sleeping with his head on the table. She had started thinking of him as "Ginger" and was afraid to open her mouth for fear of the name slipping out.

He said, "Good morning, Agent Mitchell."

"My brother's out running?"

He nodded. "Detective Taylor went to get breakfast. I hope you like McDonald's."

The thought of food was enough to make Faith feel sick again, but she said, "Thank you."

Half the refrigerator's contents were gone, though that was probably down to Jeremy and Zeke, both of whom ate like eighteen-year-old boys. She took out the orange juice. The carton was empty. Neither her son nor her brother liked orange juice.

She asked Ginger, "Did you guys have some juice?"

"No, ma'am."

Faith shook the carton. It was still empty. She didn't think Ginger would lie about something like that. She had offered both detectives anything in the kitchen. Judging by her depleted stash of Diet Rite sodas, they had taken her up on the offer.

The phone rang. Faith checked the clock on the stove. It was exactly seven in the morning. "This will probably be my boss," she told Ginger. Still, he waited until she had answered the phone.

Amanda said, "No news."

Faith waved away the detective. "Where are you?"

She didn't answer the question. "How's Jeremy holding up?"

"As well as can be expected." Faith didn't offer more. She checked to make sure Ginger was in the living room, then opened the silverware drawer. The spoons were turned in the wrong direction, the flat handles to the right rather than the left. The forks were upside down. The tines pointed toward the front of the drawer instead of the back. Faith blinked, not sure about what she was seeing.

Amanda said, "You know about Boyd?"

"Will told me last night. I'm sorry. I know he did some bad things, but he was ..."

Amanda didn't make her finish the sentence. "Yes, he was."

Faith opened the junk drawer. All the pens were gone. She kept them bundled together with a red rubber band, tucked in the bottom right-hand corner. They were always in this drawer. She rifled through the coupons, scissors, and unidentified spare keys. No pens. "Did you know that Zeke was stateside?"

"Your mother was trying to protect you."

Faith opened the other junk drawer. "Apparently, she tried to protect me from a lot of things." She reached into the back and found the pens. The rubber band was yellow. Had she changed it out? Faith had a vague recollection of the band breaking a while back, but she would've sworn on a stack of Bibles that she'd used the red rubber band from the broccoli she'd bought at the store that same day.

"Faith?" Amanda's tone was terse. "What's going on with you? Has something happened?"

"I'm fine. It's just ..." She tried to think of an excuse. She was really doing this—she was locked into not telling Amanda that the kidnappers had been in touch. That they had left something of Evelyn's under Faith's pillow. That they knew far too much about Jeremy. That they had messed with her silverware. "It's early. I didn't sleep well last night."

"You need to take care of yourself. Eat the right foods. Sleep as much as you can. Drink lots of water. I know it's hard, but you have to keep up your strength right now."

Faith felt her temper flare. She didn't know if she was talking to her boss or to Aunt Mandy right now, but either one of them could kiss her ass. "I know how to take care of myself."

"I'm very glad to hear you think that, but from where I'm standing, it's not the case."

"Did she do something, Mandy? Is Mom in trouble because—"

"Do you need me to come by the house?"

"Aren't you in Valdosta?"

Amanda went silent. Faith had obviously crossed a line. Or maybe it was a simple case of her boss being smart enough to remember that their conversation was being recorded. Right now, Faith didn't care. She stared at the yellow rubber band, wondering if she was losing her mind. Her blood sugar was probably low. Faith's vision was slightly blurry. Her mouth was dry. She opened the fridge again and reached for the orange juice carton. Still empty.

Amanda said, "Think of your mother. She would want you to be strong."

If she only knew that Faith was about to lose her shit over a yellow rubber band. She mumbled, "I'm fine."

"We'll get her back, and we'll make sure that whoever did this pays for what they've put us through. You can take that to the bank."

Faith opened her mouth to say she didn't give a damn about retribution, but Amanda had already ended the call.

She tossed the orange juice carton into the trash. There was a bag of emergency candy in the cabinet. Faith pulled it out, and Jolly Ranchers scattered onto the floor. She looked at the bag. The bottom had been ripped open.

Ginger was back. He leaned down to help her pick up the candy. "Everything all right?"

"Yes." Faith tossed a handful of candy onto the counter and left the kitchen. She hit the light switch in the living room but nothing happened. Faith flipped the toggle down, then up again. Still nothing. She checked the bulb in the lamp. One turn made the light come on. She did the same to the bulb in the other lamp. She felt the heat singe her fingers as the light came on.

Faith fell heavily into the chair. Her temper kept revving up and down like scales on a piano. She knew that she needed to eat something, to test her blood and make the proper adjustments. Her brain wouldn't work properly until she was leveled out. But now that she was sitting down, she didn't have the strength to move.

The couch was across from her. Zeke had folded his sheets into a perfect square and placed them on top of his pillow. She could see the red stain on the beige cushion where Jeremy had spilled Kool-Aid fifteen years ago. She knew that if she flipped the cushion over, she would find a blue stain from a Maui punch Popsicle he had dropped two years later. If she turned over the cushion she was sitting on, there would be a tear where his soccer cleat had cut the material. The rug on the floor was worn from both their tracks back and forth to the kitchen. The walls were an eggshell they had painted during Jeremy's spring break last year.

Faith considered the very real possibility that she was losing her mind. Jeremy was too old for these kinds of games, and Zeke had never been one for psychological warfare. He would rather beat her to death than unscrew a couple of light bulbs. Regardless, neither one of them was in the mood for pranks. This couldn't just be Faith's blood sugar. The pens, the silverware, the lamps—it was little things that only Faith would notice. The sort of stuff that would make someone else think you were crazy if you told them about it.

She looked up at the ceiling, then let her eyes travel down to the shelves mounted on the wall behind the couch. Bill Mitchell had been a collector of kitsch. He had hula girl salt and pepper shakers from Hawaii. He had Mount Rushmore sunglasses, a foam Lady Liberty crown, and an enameled silver spoon set depicting some of the more notable scenery of the Grand Canyon. His most prized collection had been his snow globes. Every road trip, every flight, every time he left the house, Bill Mitchell looked for a snow globe to mark the occasion.

When her father died, there was no question in the family that these would go to Faith. As a child, she had loved shaking the globes and watching the snow fall. Order into chaos. It was something Faith had shared with her father. In a rare splurge, she'd had custom shelves built for the globes and made Jeremy so scared of breaking one that for an entire month he took the long way to the kitchen just so he didn't accidentally brush against the shelves.

As she sat in the living room that morning, Faith looked up at the shelves to find that all of thirty-six globes had been turned around to face the wall.

CHAPTER NINE

Sara wondered if it was a southern peculiarity for little children to get sick in the half hour between Sunday school and church services. Most of her early patients that morning had fallen into that golden time period. Tummy aches, earaches, general malaise—nothing that could be pinned down by a blood test or an X-ray, but was easily cured by a set of coloring books or a cartoon on the television.

Around ten o'clock, the problems had turned more serious. The cases came in rapid succession, and were the kind Sara hated because they were largely preventable. One child had eaten rat poison he'd found under the kitchen cabinet. Another had gotten third-degree burns from touching a pan on the stove. There was a teenager she'd had to forcibly commit to the lockdown ward because his first hit of marijuana had pushed him into a psychotic break. Then a seventeen-year-old girl had come in with her skull split open. Apparently, she was still drunk when she drove home this morning. The girl had ended up wrapping her car around a parked Greyhound bus. She was still in surgery, but Sara guessed that even if they managed to control the swelling in her brain, she would never be the same person again.

By eleven, Sara wanted to go back to bed and start the day over.

Working at a hospital was a constant negotiation. The job could suck away as much of your life as you permitted. Sara had agreed to work at Grady knowing this truth, embracing it, because she didn't want a life after her husband had died. Over the last year, she'd been cutting back on her time in the ER. Keeping regular hours was a struggle, but Sara fought the uphill battle every day.

It was really a form of self-preservation. Every doctor carried around a cemetery inside them. The patients she could help—the little girl whose stomach she'd pumped, the burned toddler whose fingers she'd saved—were momentary blips. It was the lost ones that Sara remembered most. The kid who'd slowly, painfully succumbed to leukemia. The nine-year-old who'd taken sixteen hours to die from antifreeze poisoning. The eleven-year-old who'd broken his neck diving headfirst into a shallow swimming pool. They were all inside of her, constant reminders that no matter how hard she worked, sometimes—oftentimes—it was never enough.

Sara sat down on the couch in the doctors' lounge. She had charts to catch up on, but she needed a minute to herself. She'd gotten less than four hours of sleep last night. Will wasn't the direct reason her brain would not turn off. She'd kept thinking about Evelyn Mitchell and her corrupt band of brothers. The question of the woman's guilt weighed heavily on her mind. Will's words kept coming back to Sara: either Evelyn Mitchell was a bad boss or a dirty cop. There was no in-between.

Which was probably why Sara hadn't found the time this morning to call Faith Mitchell and check on her. Technically, Faith was Delia Wallace's patient, but Sara felt an odd sort of responsibility for Will's partner. It tugged at her the same way Will seemed to tug at her every waking thought these days.

All of the tedium. None of the pleasure.

Nan, one of the student nurses, plopped down on the couch beside Sara. She scrolled through her BlackBerry as she talked. "I want to hear all about your hot date."

Sara forced a smile onto her face. That morning when she got to the hospital, there'd been a large bouquet of flowers waiting for her in the doctors' lounge. It seemed Dale Dugan had bought out the entire city's supply of baby's breath and pink carnations. Everyone in the ER had made a comment to Sara before she'd even managed to change into her lab coat. They all seemed caught up in the romance of the widow being swept off her feet.

Sara told the girl, "He's very nice."

"He thinks you're nice, too." Nan gave a sly grin as she typed an email. "I ran into him at the lab. He's super cool."

Sara watched the girl's thumbs move, feeling three hundred years old. She couldn't remember if she'd ever been that young. Neither could she imagine Dale Dugan sitting down and having a nice gossip with this giddy young nurse.

Nan finally looked up from the device. "He said you're fascinating, and that you had a great time, and that you shared a very nice kiss."

"You're emailing him?"

"No." She rolled her eyes. "He said that in the lab."

"Great," Sara managed. She didn't know how to deal with Dale, who was either deluded or a pathological liar. Eventually, she would have to talk with him. The flowers alone were a very bad sign. She would have to rip off the Band-Aid quickly. Still, she couldn't help wondering why the man she wanted was unavailable and the available man was unwanted. Thus continued her quest to turn her life into a television soap opera.

Nan started typing again. "What do you want me to tell him that you said?"

"I haven't said anything."

"But you could."

"Uh ..." Sara stood up from the couch. This was much easier when you could just slip a note into somebody's locker. "I should go get lunch while things are quiet."

Instead of heading toward the cafeteria, Sara took a left toward the elevators. She almost got mowed down by a gurney flying down the corridor. Stab wound. The knife was still sticking out of the patient's chest. EMTs screamed vitals. Doctors snapped orders. Sara pressed the elevator down button and waited for the doors to open.

The hospital had been founded in the 1890s, and was housed in four different locations before finding its final home on Jesse Hill Jr. Drive. Constant mismanagement, corruption, and plain incompetence meant that at any given time in its storied history, the hospital was about to go under. The U-shaped building had been added onto, remodeled, torn down, and renovated so many times that Sara was certain no one could keep count anymore. The land around the facility was sloped toward Georgia State University, which shared its parking decks with the hospital. The ambulance bays for the emergency department backed onto the interstate, at what was called the Grady Curve, and were a full story above the main front entrance on the street side. During Jim Crow, the hospital was called the Grady's, because the white wings were on one side, looking onto the city, and the African American wings were on the other, looking onto nothing.

Margaret Mitchell had been rushed here, and died five days later, after being hit by a drunk driver on Peachtree Street. Victims from the Centennial Olympic Park bombing had been treated here. Grady was still the only Level 1 trauma center in the area. Victims with the most serious, life-threatening injuries were all flown here for treatment, which meant the Fulton County medical examiner's office had a satellite location to process intakes down in the morgue. At any given time, there were two or three bodies waiting for transport. When Sara had first taken the job as Grant County coroner, she had trained at the Pryor Street medical examiner's office downtown. They were constantly shorthanded. She'd spent many a lunch hour making body runs to Grady.

The elevator doors opened. George, one of the security guards, got off. His girth filled the hall. He had been a football player until a dislocated ankle had convinced him to pursue an alternative career path.

"Dr. Linton." He held the doors back for her.

"George."

He winked at her and she smiled.

A young couple was already in the car. They huddled together as the elevator moved down one floor. That was the other thing about working at a hospital. Everywhere you turned, you ran into someone who was having one of the worst days of their life. Maybe this was the change Sara needed in her life—not to sell her apartment and move into a cozy bungalow, but to return to private practice, where the only emergency during the day was deciding which pharmaceutical rep was going to buy lunch.

The temperature was colder two stories down in the sub-basement. Sara pulled her lab coat closed as she walked past the records department. Unlike the old days when she'd interned at Grady, there was no need to stand in line for charts. Everything was automated, a patient's information only as far away as the computerized tablets that worked on the hospital's intranet. X-rays were on the larger computer monitors in the rooms, and all medications were coded to patient armbands. As the only publicly funded hospital left in Atlanta, Grady was constantly teetering on bankruptcy, but at least it was trying to go out in style.

Sara stopped in front of the thick double doors that separated the morgue from the rest of the hospital. She waved her badge in front of the reader. There was a sudden whoosh of changing air pressure as the insulated steel doors swung open.

The attendant seemed surprised to find Sara in his space. He was as close to goth as you could get while wearing blue hospital scrubs. Everything about him announced that he was too cool for his job. His dyed black hair was pulled into a ponytail. His glasses looked like they had belonged to John Lennon. His eyeliner was something out of a Cleopatra movie. To Sara, the paunch at his stomach and the Fu Manchu made him look more like Spike, Snoopy's brother. "You lost?"

"Junior," she read off his nametag. He was young, probably Nan's age. "I was wondering if someone from the Fulton ME's office was here."

"Larry. He's loading up in the back. Is there a problem?"

"No, I just want to pick his brain."

"Good luck finding it."

A skinny Hispanic man came out of the back room. His scrubs hung on him like a bathrobe. He was around Junior's age, which was to say that he had probably been in diapers a few weeks ago. "Very funny, jefe." He punched Junior in the arm. "Whatchu need, Doc?"

This wasn't going as planned. "Nothing. Sorry to bother you guys." She started to turn away, but Junior stopped her.

"You're Dale's new lady, right? He said you were a tall redhead."

Sara bit her lip. What was Dale doing hanging around all these ten-year-olds?

Junior's face broke out into a grin. "Dr. Linton, I presume."

She would've lied but for her badge hanging off her jacket. And her name embroidered over the breast pocket. And the fact that she was the only doctor with red hair working in the hospital.

Larry offered, "I'd be pleased to help Dale's new squeeze."

"Hells yeah," Junior chimed in.

Sara plastered a smile onto her face. "How do you two know Dale?"

"B-ball, baby." Larry feigned a hoop shot. "What is the nature of your emergency?"

"No emergency—" she said, before realizing he was just being funny. "I had a question about the shooting yesterday."

"Which one?"

This time he wasn't joking. Asking about a shooting in Atlanta was like asking about the drunk at a football game. "Sherwood Forest. The officer-involved shooting."

Larry nodded. "Damn, that was freaky. Guy had a belly full of H."

"Heroin?" Sara asked.

"Packed into balloons. The gunshot split 'em open like ..." He asked Junior, "Shit, man, what're them things with sugar in 'em?"

"Dip Stick?"

"No."

"Is it chocolate?"

"No, man, like in the paper straw."

Sara suggested, "Pixie Stix?"

"Yeah, that's right. Dude went out on an epic high."

Sara waited through some fist bumping between the two. "This was the Asian man?"

"No, the Puerto Rican. Ricardo." He put an exotic spin on the r's.

"I thought he was Mexican."

"Yo, 'cause we all look alike?"

Sara didn't know how to answer him.

Larry laughed. "That's cool. I'm just playin' ya. Sure, he's Puerto Rican, like my moms."

"Did they get a last name on him?"

"No. But, he got the Neta tattooed on his hand." He pointed to the webbing between his thumb and index finger. "It's a heart with an N in the middle."

"Neta?" Sara had never heard the name before.

"Puerto Rican gang. Crazy dudes want to break off from the U.S. My moms was all up in that shit when we left. All ‘we gotta get out from the rule of the colonial oppressors.’ Then she gets here and she’s all, ‘I gotta get me one’a them big-screen plasma TVs like your aunt Frieda.’ Word.” Another fist bump with Junior.

“You’re sure that’s a gang symbol—the N inside a heart?”

“One of ‘em. Everybody who joins up has to bring in more people.”

“Like Wiccans,” Junior provided.

“Exactly. Lots of ‘em drop out or move on. Ricardo there can’t be big-time. He don’t got the fingers.” Larry held up his hand again, this time with his index finger crossed in front of his middle finger. “Usually looks like this, with the Puerto Rican flag around the wrist. They’re all about independence. At least that’s what they say.”

Sara remembered what Will had told her. “I thought Ricardo had the Los Mexicanos tattoo on his chest?”

“Yeah, like I said, a lot of ‘em drop out or move on. Brother must’ve moved on and up. Neta ain’t got pull here like Mexicanos.” He hissed air through his teeth. “Scary stuff, man. Them Mexicanos don’t screw around.”

“Does the ME’s office know all of this?”

“They sent the pictures to the gang unit. Neta’s the top organization in PR. They’ll be in the Bible.”

The Gang Bible was the book used by police officers to track gang signs and movements. “Was there anything on the Asian men? The other victims?”

“One was a student. Some kind of math whiz. Won all kinds of prizes or some shit.”

Sara remembered Hironobu Kwon’s photo from the news. “I thought he was at Georgia State?” State wasn’t a bad school, but a math prodigy would end up at Georgia Tech.

“That’s all I know. They’re doing the other guy right now. That apartment fire got us backed up big-time. Six bodies.” He shook his head. “Two dogs. Man, I hate when it’s dogs.”

Junior said, “I feel ya, bro.”

“Thank you,” Sara said. “Thank you both.”

Junior pounded the side of his fist against his chest. “Be good to my man Dale.”

Sara left before more fists were bumped. She dug her hand into her pocket, trying to find her cell phone as she walked down the hallway. Most of the staff carried so many electronic devices that they were all likely going to die of radiation poisoning. She had a BlackBerry she received lab reports and hospital communiqués on as well as an iPhone for personal use. Her hospital cell phone was a flip-style that had previously belonged to someone with very sticky hands. Two pagers were clipped to her coat pocket, one for the emergency department and one for the pediatrics ward. Her personal phone was slim and usually the last thing she found, which was the case this time.

She scrolled through the numbers, pausing on Amanda Wagner’s name, then scrolling back up to Will Trent. His phone rang twice before he picked up.

“Trent.”

Sara was inexplicably tongue-tied by the sound of his voice. In the silence, she could hear wind blowing, the sound of children playing.

He said, "Hello?"

"Hi, Will—sorry." She cleared her throat. "I was calling because I talked to someone at the ME's office. Like you asked." She felt her face turning red. "Like Amanda asked."

He mumbled something, probably to Amanda. "What'd you find out?"

"The Mexicanos victim, Ricardo. No last name as of yet, but he was probably Puerto Rican." She waited while he relayed this information to Amanda. She asked the same question Sara had. Sara answered, "He had a tattoo on his hand for a gang, the Neta, which is in Puerto Rico. The man I talked with said Ricardo probably switched affiliations when he came to Atlanta." Again, she waited for him to tell Amanda. "He also had a belly full of heroin."

"Heroin?" His voice went up in surprise. "How much?"

"I'm not sure. The man I spoke with said the powder was packed in balloons. When Faith shot him, the heroin was released. That alone would've killed him."

Will told Amanda as much, then came back on the line. "Amanda says thank you for checking into this."

"I'm sorry there's not more."

"That's great what you came up with." He clarified, "I mean, thank you, Dr. Linton. This is all very useful information to have."

She knew he couldn't talk in front of Amanda, but she didn't want to let him go. "How's it going on your end?"

"The prison was a bust. We're standing outside Hironobu Kwon's house right now. He lived with his mother in Grant Park." He was less than fifteen minutes away from Grady. "The neighbor says his mother should be home soon. I guess she's probably making arrangements. She lives across the street from the zoo. We had to park about a mile away. Or, I did. Amanda made me drop her off." He finally paused for breath. "How are you doing?"

Sara smiled. He seemed to want to stay on the phone as much as she did. "Did you get any sleep last night?"

"Not much. How about you?"

She tried to think of something flirty to say, but settled on, "Not much."

Amanda's voice was too muffled to understand, but Sara got the tone. Will said, "So, I'll talk to you later. Thank you again, Dr. Linton."

Sara felt foolish as she ended the call. Maybe she should go back up to the lounge and gossip with Nan.

Or maybe she should talk to Dale Dugan and nip this in the bud before they both got any more embarrassed. Sara took out her hospital BlackBerry and looked up Dale's email address, then started to enter it into her iPhone. She would ask him to meet her in the cafeteria so they could talk this through. Or maybe she should suggest the parking lot. She didn't want to cause more gossip than was already circulating.

Up ahead, the elevator bell dinged and she caught sight of Dale. He was laughing with one of the nurses. Junior must've told him she was down here. Sara chickened out. She opened the first door she came to, which happened to be the records department. Two older women with matching, tightly groomed perms sat behind desks piled with charts. They were typing furiously on their computer keyboards and barely looked up at Sara.

One of them asked, "Help you?" turning the page on the chart opened beside her.

Sara stood there, momentarily unsure of herself. She realized that somewhere in the back of her mind, she had been thinking about the records office since she got on the elevator. She dropped her iPhone back into her coat pocket.

“What is it, darlin’?” the woman asked. They were both staring at Sara now.

She held up her hospital ID. “I need an old chart from nineteen ...” She did the math quickly in her head. “Seventy-six, maybe?”

The woman handed her a pad and paper. “Give me the name. That’ll make it easier.”

Sara knew even as she wrote down Will’s name that what she was doing was wrong, and not just because she was breaking federal privacy laws and risking immediate termination. Will had been at the Atlanta Children’s Home from infancy. There wouldn’t have been a family physician managing his care. All of his medical needs would have been handled through Grady. His entire childhood was stored here, and Sara was using her hospital ID to gain access to it.

“No middle name?” the woman asked.

Sara shook her head. She didn’t trust herself to speak.

“Gimme a minute. These won’t be in the computer yet or you’d be able to pull them up on your tablet. We’ve barely dipped our toe into 1970.” She was out of her chair and through the door marked “File Room” before Sara could tell her to stop.

The other woman went back to her typing, her long red fingernails making a sound like a cat running across a tile floor. Sara looked down at her shoes, which were stained with God knows what from this morning’s cases. In her mind, she went over the possible culprits, but as hard as she tried, she could not shake the feeling that what she was doing was absolutely and without a doubt the most unethical thing she had ever done in her life. What’s more, it was a complete betrayal of Will’s trust.

And she couldn’t do it. She wouldn’t do it.

This wasn’t the way Sara operated. She was normally a forthright person. If she wanted to know about Will’s suicide attempt, or any details about his childhood, then she should ask him, not sneak around his back and look at his medical chart.

The woman was back. “No William, but I found a Wilbur.” She had a file tucked under her arm. “Nineteen seventy-five.”

Sara had used paper charts the majority of her career. Most healthy kids had a chart with twenty or so pages by the time they reached eighteen years of age. An unhealthy kid’s file could run around fifty. Will’s chart was over an inch thick. A decaying rubber band held together faded sheets of yellow and white paper.

“No middle name,” the woman said. “I’m sure he had one at some point, but a lot of these kids fell through the cracks back then.”

Her partner supplied, “Ellis Island and Tuskegee rolled up into one.”

Sara reached for the file, then stopped herself. Her hand hovered in the air.

“You all right, darlin’?” The woman glanced back at her office mate, then to Sara. “You need to sit down?”

Sara dropped her hand. “I don’t think I need that after all. I’m sorry to waste your time.”

“Are you sure?”

Sara nodded. She could not remember the last time she had felt this awful. Even her run-in with Angie Trent hadn't produced this amount of guilt. "I'm so sorry."

"No need to apologize. Felt good to get up." She started to tuck the file under her arm but the rubber band broke, sending papers flying onto the floor.

Automatically, Sara bent down to help. She gathered the pages together, willing herself not to read the words. There were lab reports printed in dot matrix, reams of chart notations, and what looked like an ancient Atlanta police report. She blurred her vision, praying she wouldn't pick up a word or a sentence.

"Look at this."

Sara looked up. It was a natural thing to do. The woman held a faded Polaroid picture in her hand. The shot was a close-up of a child's mouth. A small silver ruler was beside a laceration running the width of the philtrum, the midline groove between the top of the lip and nose. The injury wasn't from a tumble or bump. The impact had been significant enough to rend the flesh in two, revealing the teeth. Thick black sutures pulled together the wound. The skin was puffy and irritated. Sara was more accustomed to seeing this kind of baseball stitching in a morgue, not on a child's face.

"I bet he was in that poly-what's-it study," the woman said. She showed the photo to her friend.

"Polyglycolic acid." She explained to Sara, "Grady piloted a study on different types of absorbable sutures they were working on at Tech. Looks like he's one of the kids that had an allergic reaction. Poor little thing." She went back to her typing. "I guess it was better than sticking a bunch of leeches on him."

The other woman asked Sara, "You all right, hon?"

Sara felt as if she was going to be sick. She straightened up and left the room. She didn't stop walking until she had bolted up two flights of stairs and was outside, breathing fresh air.

She paced in front of the closed door. Her emotions pinballed back and forth between anger and shame. He was just a child. He'd been admitted for treatment and they had experimented on him like an animal. To this day, he probably had no idea what they had done. Sara wished to God she didn't know herself, though it served her right for prying. She should've never asked for his chart. But she had, and now Sara couldn't get that picture out of her head—his beautiful mouth crudely pulled together with a suture that couldn't meet the basic standards for government approval.

The faded Polaroid would be burned into her memory until she died. She had gotten exactly what she deserved.

"Hey, you."

She spun around. A young woman was standing behind her. She was painfully thin. Her greasy blonde hair hung to her waist. She scratched at the fresh needle tracks on her arms. "Are you a doctor?"

Sara felt her guard go up. Junkies lurked around the hospital. Some of them could be violent. "You should go inside if you need treatment."

"It's not me. There's a guy over there." She pointed to the Dumpster in a corner behind the hospital. Even in full daylight, the area was shadowed by the looming façade of the building. "He's been there all night. I think he's dead."

Sara moderated her tone. "Let's go inside and talk about this."

Anger flashed in the girl's eyes. "Lookit, I'm just trying to do the right thing. You don't gotta go all high and mighty on me."

"I'm not—"

"I hope he gives you AIDS, bitch." She limped off, mumbling more insults.

"Christ," Sara breathed, wondering how her day could get any worse. How she missed the manners of good country people, when even the junkies called her "ma'am." She started back toward the hospital, then stopped. The girl could've been telling the truth.

Sara walked back toward the Dumpster, not getting too close in case the girl's accomplice was hiding inside. The trash wasn't collected over the weekend. Boxes and plastic bags spilled out of the metal container and littered the ground. Sara took a step closer. There was someone lying underneath a blue plastic bag. She saw a hand. A deep gash splayed open the palm. Sara took another step closer, then stopped. Working at Grady had made her hyper-cautious. This could still be a trap. Instead of going to the body, she turned around and jogged toward the ambulance bay so that she could get help.

Three EMTs were standing around talking. She directed them toward the back and they followed her with a gurney. Sara pulled away the trash. The man was breathing but unconscious. His eyes were closed. His brown skin had a yellow, waxy look. His T-shirt was soaked in blood, obviously from a penetrating wound in his lower abdomen. Sara pressed her fingers to his carotid and saw a familiar tattoo on his neck: a Texas star with a rattlesnake wrapped around it.

Will's missing Type B-negative.

"Let's move it," one of the EMTs said.

Sara ran beside the gurney as they rolled the man into the hospital. She listened to the medics run down vitals as she pulled back the gauze over his belly. The entrance to the wound was thin, probably from a kitchen knife. The edge was rough from the serration. There was very little fresh blood, indicating a closed bleed. The gut was distended, and the telltale odor of rotting flesh told her that there was not much that she would be able to do for him in the ER.

A tall man in a dark suit jogged alongside her. He asked, "Is he going to make it?"

Sara looked for George. The security guard was nowhere to be found. "You need to stay out of the way."

"Doctor—" He held up his wallet. She saw the flash of gold shield. "I'm a cop. Is he going to make it?"

"I don't know," she said, pressing the gauze back in place. Then, because the patient might hear, she said, "Maybe."

The cop dropped back. She glanced up the hall, but he was gone.

The trauma team set up immediately, cutting off the man's clothes, drawing blood, connecting lines to hook him up to various machines. A cut-down tray was laid out. Surgical packs were opened. The crash cart appeared.

Sara called for two large-bore IVs to force fluids. She checked the ABCs: airway clear, breathing okay, circulation as good as could be expected. She noticed the pace slow considerably as people began to realize what they were dealing with. The team thinned. Eventually, she was down to just one nurse.

"No wallet," the nurse said. "Nothing in his pockets but lint."

"Sir?" Sara tried, opening the man's eyes. His pupils were fixed and dilated. She checked for a head injury, gently pressing her fingers in a clockwise pattern around his skull. At the occipital bone, she felt a fracture that splintered into the brainpan. She looked at her gloved hand. There was no fresh blood from the wound.

The nurse pulled the curtain closed to give the man some privacy. "X-ray? CT the belly?"

Sara was technically doing the regular attending's job. She asked, "Can you get Krakauer?"

The nurse left, and Sara did a more thorough exam, though she was sure Krakauer would take one look at the man's vitals and agree with her. There was no emergency here. The patient could not survive general anesthesia and he likely would not survive his injuries. They could only load him up with antibiotics and wait for time to decide the patient's fate.

The privacy curtain pulled back. A young man peered in. He was clean-shaven, wearing a black warm-up jacket and a black baseball hat pulled down low on his head.

"You can't be back here," she told him. "If you're looking for—"

He punched Sara in the chest so hard that she fell back onto the floor. Her shoulder slammed against one of the trays. Metal instruments clattered around her—scalpels, hemostats, scissors. The young man pointed a gun at the patient's head and shot him twice at pointblank range.

Sara heard screaming. It was her. The sound was coming out of her own mouth. The man pointed the gun at her head and she stopped. He moved toward her. She groped blindly for something to protect herself. Her hand wrapped around one of the scalpels.

He was closer, almost on top of her. Was he going to shoot her or was he going to leave? Sara didn't give him time to decide. She slashed out, cutting the inside of his thigh. The man groaned, dropping the gun. The wound was deep. Blood sprayed from the femoral artery. He fell to one knee. They both saw the gun at the same time. She kicked it away. He reached for Sara instead, grabbing the hand that held the scalpel. She tried to pull back but his grip tightened around her wrists. Panic took hold as she realized what he was doing. The blade was moving toward her neck. She used both her hands, trying to push him away as he inched the blade closer and closer.

"Please ... no ..."

He was on top of her, pressing her into the ground with the weight of his body. She stared into his green eyes. The whites were crisscrossed with a road map of red. His mouth was a straight line. His body shook so hard that she felt it in her spine.

"Drop it!" George, the security guard, stood with his gun locked out in front of him. "Now, asshole!"

Sara felt the man's grip tighten. Both their hands were shaking from pushing in opposite directions.

"Drop it now!"

"Please," Sara begged. Her muscles couldn't take much more. Her hands were starting to weaken.

Without warning, the pressure stopped. Sara watched the scalpel swing up, the blade slice into the man's flesh. He kept his hand wrapped tightly around hers as over and over again he plunged the scalpel into his own throat.

CHAPTER TEN

Will had been trapped in the car so long with Amanda that he was worried he was going to develop Stockholm syndrome. He was already feeling himself weaken, especially after Miriam Kwon, mother of Hironobu Kwon, had spit in Amanda's face.

In Ms. Kwon's defense, Amanda hadn't exactly been tender toward the woman. They had practically ambushed her on her front lawn. She'd obviously just come from arranging her son's funeral. Pamphlets with crosses on them were clutched in her hand as she approached the house. Her street was lined with cars. She'd had to park some distance away. She looked exhausted and limp, the way any mother would look after choosing the coffin in which her only son would be buried.

After mumbling the perfunctory condolences on behalf of the GBI, Amanda had gone straight for the jugular. From Ms. Kwon's reaction, Will gathered the woman hadn't been expecting her dead son's name to be sullied in such a manner, despite the nefarious circumstances surrounding his death. It was the nature of Atlanta news stations that every dead young man under the age of twenty-five was celebrated as an honor student until proven otherwise. According to his criminal record, this particular honor student had been a fan of Oxycontin. Hironobu Kwon had been arrested twice for selling the drug. Only his academic promise had saved him from serious jail time. The judge had ordered him to rehab three months ago. Apparently, that hadn't worked out too well.

Will checked the time on his cell phone. The recent change to daylight savings time had switched the phone into military hours. He couldn't for the life of him figure out how to change it back to normal. Thankfully, it was half past noon, which meant he didn't have to count on his fingers like a monkey.

Not that he didn't have ample time to perform mathematical equations. Despite traveling almost five hundred miles this morning, they had nothing to show for it. Evelyn Mitchell was still missing. They were about to hit the twenty-four-hour mark since her abduction. The dead bodies were stacking up, and the only clue Will and Amanda had been given thus far had come from the mouth of a death row inmate who had been murdered before the state could kill him.

Their trip to Valdosta State Prison may as well have never happened. Former drug squad detectives Adam Hopkins and Ben Humphrey had stared at Amanda as if gazing through a piece of glass. Will had expected as much. Years ago, they had each refused to talk to Will when he'd shown up on their respective doorsteps. Lloyd Crittenden was dead. Demarcus Alexander and Chuck Finn were probably just as unreachable. Both ex-detectives had left Atlanta as soon as they were released from prison. Will had talked to their parole officers last night. Alexander was on the West Coast trying to rebuild his life. Finn was in Tennessee, wallowing in the misery of drug addiction.

"Heroin," Will said.

Amanda turned to him, looking as if she'd forgotten that he was in the car. They were heading north on Interstate 85, toward another bad guy who was more than likely going to refuse to talk to them.

He told her, "Boyd Spivey said that Chuck Finn had a belly habit for heroin. According to Sara, Ricardo was packed full of heroin."

"That's a very tenuous connection."

"Here's another one: Oxy usually leads to heroin addiction."

"These straws are mighty thin. You can't throw a brick without hitting a heroin addict these days." She sighed. "If only we had more bricks."

Will tapped his fingers against his leg. He'd been holding back something all morning, hoping he'd catch Amanda off guard and get the truth. Now seemed as good a time as any. "Hector Ortiz was Evelyn's gentleman friend."

The corner of her mouth turned up. "Is that so?"

"He's Ignacio Ortiz's brother, though I gather from your expression that this isn't a news flash."

"Ortiz's cousin," she corrected. "Are these observations courtesy of Dr. Linton?"

Will felt his teeth start to grind. "You already knew who he was."

"Would you like to waste the next ten minutes discussing your feelings or do you want to do your job?"

He wanted to spend the next ten minutes throttling her, but Will decided to keep that to himself. "What was Evelyn doing mixed up with the cousin of the guy who runs all the coke in and out of the southeastern United States?"

"Hector was a car salesman, actually." She glanced at him. There was something like humor in her eyes. "He sold Cadillacs."

That explained why the man's name hadn't come up on Will's vehicle search. He was driving a dealer car. "Hector had a Mexicanos tattoo on his arm."

"We all make mistakes when we're young."

Will tried, "What about the letter A that Evelyn drew under the chair?"

"I thought we were calling that an arrowhead?"

"Almeja rhymes with 'Amanda.' "

"It kind of does, doesn't it?"

"It's slang for 'cunt.' "

She laughed. "Why, Will, are you calling me a cunt?"

If she only knew how many times he'd been tempted.

"I suppose I should reward your good police work." Amanda pulled a folded sheet of paper from the sun visor. She handed it to Will. "Evelyn's phone calls from the last four weeks."

He scanned the two pages. "She's been calling Chattanooga a lot."

Amanda gave him a curious look. Will glared back at her. He could read, just not quickly and certainly not under scrutiny. The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation's eastern field office was in Chattanooga. He'd called them constantly to coordinate meth cases while he was working in North Georgia. The 423 area code appeared at least a dozen times in Evelyn's phone records.

He asked, "Is there something you want to say to me?"

For once, she was silent.

Will pulled out his cell phone to call the number.

"Don't be stupid. It's Healing Winds, a rehab facility."

"Why was she calling there?"

"I had the same question." She signaled, pulling into the next lane. "They're not allowed to give out patient information."

Will checked the dates against the numbers. Evelyn had only started calling the facility in the last ten days, the same time period in which Mrs. Levy said that Hector Ortiz's visits with Evelyn had picked up.

Will said, "Chuck Finn lives in Tennessee."

"He lives in Memphis. That's a five-hour drive from Healing Winds in Chattanooga."

"He has a serious drug addiction." Will waited for her to respond. When she didn't, he said, "Guys get clean, sometimes they want to unburden themselves. Maybe Evelyn was afraid he would start talking."

"What an interesting theory."

"Or maybe it took clearing his mind for Chuck to realize that Evelyn was still sitting on her share of the cash." He pushed on. "It's hard to find work with a rap sheet like Chuck's. He was kicked off the force. He spent serious time in prison. He's got his habit to battle. Even if he's clean, no one would go out of their way to hire him. Not in this economy."

Amanda dropped another dollop of information. "There were eight sets of prints in Evelyn's house, excluding hers and Hector's. They've identified three. One set belonged to Hironobu Kwon, another belonged to Ricardo the heroin mule, and another set belonged to our Hawaiian shirt aficionado. His name is Benny Choo. He's a forty-two-year-old enforcer for the Yellow Rebels."

"Yellow Rebels?"

"It's an Asian gang. Don't ask me where they got the name. I suppose they're very proud to be hillbillies. Most of them are."

"Ling-Ling," Will guessed. That was who they were going to see. "Spivey said you should talk to Ling-Ling."

"Julia Ling."

Will was surprised. "A woman?"

"Yes, a woman. My laws, how the world has changed." Amanda glanced in the rearview mirror and darted into the next lane. "The nickname comes from the now-disproven perception that she's not very smart. Her brother likes to rhyme things. 'Ding-a-ling' turned into 'Ling-a-Ling,' shortened to 'Ling-Ling.'"

Will had no idea what she was talking about. "That makes sense."

"Madam Ling is the outside boss of the Yellow Rebels. Her brother Roger still pulls the strings from inside, but she runs the day-to-day. If Yellow is making a play for Brown, then it's being made by Roger via Ling-Ling."

"What's he in for?"

"He's serving life for the rape and murder of two teenage girls. Sixteen and fourteen. They were tricking for him. He didn't think they were pulling their weight, so he strangled them to death with a dog leash. But not before raping both of them and ripping off their breasts with his teeth."

Will felt a shudder working its way up his spine. "Why isn't he on death row?"

"He took a deal. The State was worried about him making an insanity plea—which, between you and me, wouldn't be much of a stretch, because the man is absolutely nuts. This wasn't the first time Roger was caught with human flesh between his teeth."

The shudder made his shoulders flex. "What about the victims?"

"They were both runaways who fell into drugs and prostitution. Their families were more about divine retribution than an eye for an eye."

Will was familiar with the concept. "They probably ran away for a reason."

"Young girls usually do."

"Roger's sister still supports him?"

She gave him a meaningful look. "Don't be fooled, Will. Julia talks a very good game, but she could slit your throat and not lose a wink of sleep. These people are not to be messed with. There are procedures that have to be followed. You must show them the utmost respect."

Will repeated Boyd's words. "You can't go to Yellow without an invitation."

"You have such a remarkable memory."

Will checked out the number for the next exit. They were heading toward Buford Highway. Chambodia. "Maybe Boyd was only half right. Heroin is a lot more addictive than coke. If the Yellow Rebels flood the market with cheap heroin, then Los Mexicanos will lose its cocaine customer base. That points to a power struggle, but it doesn't explain why two Asian men and a Texicano were in Evelyn Mitchell's house looking for something." Will stopped. She'd sidetracked him again. "Hironobu Kwon and Benny Choo. What's Ricardo's last name?"

She smiled. "Very good." She offered the information like another reward. "Ricardo Ortiz. He's Ignatio Ortiz's youngest son."

Will had interviewed ax murderers who were more forthcoming. "And he was muling heroin."

"Yes, he was."

"Are you going to tell me if any of these guys are connected or do I have to find that out on my own?"

"Ricardo Ortiz was thrown into juvie twice, but he never crossed paths inside with Hironobu Kwon. Neither of them have visible connections to Benny Choo, and as I said, Hector Ortiz was just a simple car salesman." She zipped in front of a delivery truck, cutting off a Hyundai in the process. "Believe me, if I saw a connection between any of these men, we'd be working it."

"Except for Choo, they're all young guys, early twenties." Will tried to think of where they might've met. AA meetings. Nightclubs. Basketball courts. Church, maybe. Miriam Kwon wore a gold cross around her neck. Ricardo Ortiz had a cross tattooed on his arm. Stranger things had happened.

Amanda said, "Check the number Evelyn called the day before she was taken. 3:02 p.m."

Will traced his finger under the first column, finding the time. He moved across. The number had an Atlanta area code. "Am I supposed to recognize this?"

"I'd be surprised if you did. It's the precinct number for Hartsfield." Hartsfield-Jackson, Atlanta's airport. "Vanessa Livingston is the commander. I've known the old gal a long time. She partnered with Evelyn after I left APD."

Will waited, then asked, "And?"

"Evelyn asked her to check for a name on the flight manifests."

"Ricardo Ortiz," Will guessed.

"You must've gotten your sleep last night."

He'd stayed up until three listening to the rest of the recordings, apparently for no reason but to find out things that Amanda already knew. "Where did Ricardo fly in from?"

"Sweden."

Will frowned. He hadn't been expecting that.

Amanda merged onto the exit ramp for I-285. "Ninety percent of all heroin in the world comes from Afghanistan. Your tax dollars at work." She slowed for the curve as they went through Spaghetti Junction. "The bulk of the European supply runs through Iran, up into Turkey and farther points north."

"Like Sweden."

"Like Sweden." She accelerated again as they merged into fast-moving traffic. "Ricardo was there for three days. Then he took a flight from Gothenburg to Amsterdam, then straight into Atlanta."

"Filled with heroin."

"Filled with heroin."

Will rubbed his jaw, thinking about what had happened to the young man.

"Someone beat the hell out of him. He was full of balloons. Maybe he couldn't pass them."

"That would be a question for the ME."

Will had assumed that she'd gotten all of this information from the medical examiner's office. "You didn't ask him?"

"They've kindly promised me their full report by end of business this evening. Why do you think I asked you to have Sara reach out?" She added, "How's that going, by the way? I'm assuming from your good night's sleep that there's not a lot of progress."

They were coming up on the Buford Highway exit. U.S. Route 23 ran from Jacksonville, Florida, to Mackinaw City, Michigan. The Georgia stretch was around four hundred miles, and the part that went through Chamblee, Norcross, and Doraville was one of the most racially diverse in the area, if not the country. It wasn't exactly a neighborhood—more like a series of desolate strip malls, flimsy apartment buildings, and gas stations that offered expensive rims and quick title loans. What it lacked in community it made up for in raw commerce.

Will was fairly certain Chambodia was a pejorative term, but the name for the area had stuck, despite DeKalb County's push to call it the International Corridor. There were all kinds of ethnic subsets, from Portuguese to Hmong. Unlike most urban areas, there didn't seem to be a clear line of segregation between any of the communities. Subsequently, you could find a Mexican restaurant beside a sushi place, and the farmer's market was the sort of melting pot that people thought of when they pictured the United States.

The strip was much closer to the land of opportunity than the amber waves of grain in the heartland. People could come here with little more than a work ethic and build a solidly middle-class life. For as long as Will could remember, the demographics were in constant flux. The whites complained when the blacks moved in. The blacks complained when the Hispanics moved in. The Hispanics complained when the Asians moved in. One day they would all be grumbling about the influx of whites. The gerbil wheel of the American dream.

Amanda pulled into the middle strip that served as the turning lane for both sides of the highway. Will saw a bunch of signs stacked one on top of the other like a Jenga game. Some of the characters were unrecognizable, more like pieces of art than letters.

"I've had a car sitting on Ling-Ling's shop all morning. She hasn't had any visitors." Amanda floored the gas, narrowly missing a minivan as she made the turn. Horns blared, but she talked over them. "I made some phone calls last night. Roger was transferred to Coastal three months ago. They had him at Augusta for six months prior, but he evened out on his meds, so they sent him back into the cattle shoot." Augusta Medical Hospital provided Level 4 mental health services to inmates on a transient basis. "Roger's first day at Coastal ended with a nasty incident involving a bar of soap wrapped in a tube sock. Apparently, he's not happy with his new accommodations."

"You're going to offer to transfer him?"

"If it comes to that."

"Are you going to use Boyd's name?"

"That might not be a wise idea."

"What do you think Roger's going to give us?" Will did a mental head slap. "You think he's behind Evelyn's kidnapping."

"He may be clinically insane, but he'd never be stupid enough to do something like that." She gave Will a meaningful look. "Roger's extremely intelligent. Think chess, not checkers. There's no gain for him in taking Evelyn. His whole organization would be disrupted."

"Okay, so, you think Roger knows who's involved?"

"If you want to know about a crime, ask a criminal." Her cell phone started to ring. She checked the number. Will felt the car slow. Amanda pulled to the side of the road. She answered the phone, listened, then hit the unlock button on the door. "A little privacy, please?"

Will got out of the SUV. The weather had been spectacular the day before, but now it was cloudy and warm. He walked toward the edge of the strip mall. There was a shack of a restaurant near the street entrance. He guessed from the rocking chair painted on the sign that it was some kind of country-cooking establishment. Strangely, Will didn't feel his stomach rumble at the thought of food. The last thing he'd had to eat was a bowl of instant grits that he'd forced down this morning. His appetite was gone, which was something he'd only experienced once before in his life—the last time he'd been around Sara Linton.

Will sat down on the curb. Cars whirled by behind him. Fragments of beats bounced from their radios. A glance toward Amanda told him she was going to be a while. She was gesturing with her hands, never a good thing.

He took out his phone and scrolled through the numbers. He should call Faith, but he didn't have anything he could report and their conversation last night hadn't ended well. Whatever happened with Evelyn wasn't going to make things better. No matter what tricky verbal maneuvering Amanda was doing, there were still some hard facts she couldn't talk around. If the Asians were really making a play for the Mexicanos drug market, then Evelyn Mitchell had to be at the center of it. Hector might've called himself a car salesman, but he still had the tattoo that connected him to the gang. He still had a cousin in prison running that same gang. His nephew had been shot dead at Evelyn's house, and Hector himself was dead in Evelyn's trunk. There was no reason for a cop, especially a retired one, to be mixed up with these kind of bad guys unless there was something dirty going on.

Will looked down at his phone. Thirteen hundred hours. He should go into the setup menu and try to figure out how to switch it back to the normal time display, but Will didn't have the patience right now. Instead, he scrolled to Sara's cell phone number, which had three eights in it. He had stared at it so many times over the last few months that he was surprised the numbers weren't burned into his retinas.

Unless you counted the unfortunate misunderstanding with the lesbian who lived across the street, Will had never been on a real date before. He'd been with Angie since he was eight years old. There had been passion at one time, and for a short while, something that felt close to love, but he could not ever recall a point in his life when he felt happy to be with her. He lived in dread of her showing up on his doorstep. He felt enormous relief when she was gone. Where she got him was the in-between, those rare moments of peace when he got a glimpse of what a settled life could be. They would have meals together and go to the grocery store and work in the yard—or Will would work and Angie would watch—and then at night they'd go to bed and he would find himself lying there with a smile on his face because this was what life was like for the rest of the world.

And then he would wake up in the morning and she'd be gone.

They were too close. That was the problem. They had lived through too much, seen too many horrors, shared too much fear and loathing and pity, to look at each other as something other than victims. Will's body was like a monument to that misery: the burn marks, the scars, the various slings and arrows he had suffered. For years, he had wanted more from Angie, but Will had recently come to the hard realization that there was nothing more that she could give.

She wasn't going to change. He knew that truth even when they finally got married, which had come about not through careful planning but because Will had bet Angie that she wouldn't go through with it. Gambling aside, she was never going to see being with Will as anything other than a safe haven at best and a sacrifice at worst. There was a reason she never touched him unless she wanted something. There was a reason he didn't try to call her when she disappeared.

He slid his thumb inside his sleeve and felt the beginnings of the long scar that traced up his arm. It was thicker than he remembered. The skin was still tender to the touch.

Will pulled away his hand. Angie had flinched the last time her fingers had accidentally brushed against his bare arm. Her reactions to him were always intense, never half measures. She liked to see how far she could push him. It was her favorite sport: how bad did she have to be before Will finally had enough and abandoned her just like everyone else had in her life?

They had teetered on that line many times, but somehow, she always managed to yank him back at the last second. Even now, Will felt the pull. He hadn't seen Angie since her mother had died. Deidre Polaski was a junkie and a prostitute who'd overdosed herself into a vegetative coma when Angie was eleven. Her body had held on for twenty-seven years before finally giving up. Four months had passed since the funeral. Not much in the scheme of things—Angie had disappeared for a whole year once—but Will felt a warning in his spine that told him something was wrong. She was in trouble or she was hurt or she was upset. His body knew it just like it knew that it needed to breathe.

They had always been connected like this, even back when they were kids. Especially when they were kids. And if there was one thing Will knew about his wife, it was that she always came to him when things were bad. He didn't know when she would show up, whether it would be tomorrow or next week, but he knew one day soon he'd come home from work and find Angie sitting on his couch, eating his pudding cups and making derogatory comments about his dog.

That was why Will had gone to Sara's house last night. He was hiding from Angie. He was fighting the inevitable. And, if he was being honest, he had been aching to see Sara again. That she had bought his excuse about his house being upside down made him think that maybe she had wanted him there, too. As a kid, Will had trained himself to not want things he couldn't have—the latest toys, shoes that actually fit, home-cooked meals that didn't come out of a can. His power to deny himself disappeared where Sara Linton was concerned. He could not stop thinking about how her hand had felt on his shoulder when they'd stood in the street yesterday. Her thumb had stroked the side of his neck. She had lifted her heels off the ground so that they were the same height, and for just a second, he'd thought that she was going to kiss him.

"Christ," Will groaned. He visualized the carnage at Evelyn Mitchell's house, the blood and brain matter spattered across her kitchen and laundry room. And then he tried to blank his mind completely, because he was pretty sure thinking about sex and then picturing scenes of violence was how serial killers got their start.

The SUV jerked into reverse. Amanda rolled down the window. Will stood.

She told him, "That was a source at APD. Looks like our Type B-negative showed up by the Dumpster at Grady. Unconscious, barely breathing. They found his wallet in one of the trash bags. Marcellus Benedict Estevez. Unemployed. Lives with his grandmother."

Will wondered why Sara hadn't called him about this. Maybe she had already left work. Or maybe it wasn't her job to keep him in the loop. "Did Estevez say anything?"

"He died half an hour ago. We'll swing by the hospital after this."

Will thought that was a pointless trip considering the guy was dead. "Did he have something on him?"

"No. Get in."

"Why are we—"

"I don't have all day, Will. Wipe the dirt out of your vagina and let's get going."

Will got into the SUV. "Did they confirm Estevez is blood type B-negative?"

She punched the gas. "Yes. And his fingerprints have been positively identified as one of the eight sets found in Evelyn's house."

He was missing something again. "That was a long conversation for just that little bit of information."

For once, she was forthcoming. "We got a call-back on Chuck Finn. Why didn't you tell me that you talked to his parole officer last night?"

"I suppose I was being petty."

"Well, you certainly showed me. The parole officer did a spot check on Chuck this morning. He's been gone for two days."

"Wait a minute." Will turned toward her. "Chuck's PO told me last night that he was accounted for. He said that Chuck never missed a sign-in."

"I'm sure the Tennessee parole office is as overburdened and understaffed as ours is. At least he had the balls to come clean this morning." She gave him a meaningful look. "Chuck Finn signed himself out of treatment two days ago."

"Treatment?"

"He was at Healing Winds. He's on his third month of sobriety."

Will felt a slight vindication.

"Healing Winds is also where Hironobu Kwon got treatment. They were there at the same time."

Will had to be silent for a moment. "When did you find all of this out?"

"Just now, Will. Don't pout. I know an old gal who works in records down at the drug court." Apparently, Amanda knew an old gal everywhere. "Kwon was sent to Hope Hall for his first offense." The drug court's inpatient treatment facility. "The judge wasn't inclined to give him a second chance on the state's dime, so the mother stepped in and said she'd secured him a place at Healing Winds."

"Where he met Chuck Finn."

"It's a large facility, but you're right. It would be quite a stretch to say that these two particular men just happened to be there at the same time."

Will was shocked to hear her concede the point, but he kept going. "If Chuck told Hironobu Kwon that Evelyn had money sitting around..." He smiled. Finally, something was making sense. "What about the other guy? The Type B-negative who showed up at Grady? Does he have any connection to Chuck or Hironobu?"

"Marcellus Estevez has never been arrested. He was born and raised in Miami, Florida. Two years ago, he moved to Carrollton to attend West Georgia College. He dropped out last quarter. He hasn't had contact with his family since."

Another kid in his mid-twenties who had gotten mixed up with some very bad people. "You seem to know an awful lot about Estevez."

"APD has already spoken with his parents. They filed a missing persons report as soon as the school informed them that their son wasn't attending class."

"Since when is Atlanta sharing information with us?"

"Let's just say I reached out to some old friends."

Will was beginning to form an image of a network of steely old ballbusters who either owed Amanda a favor or had worked with Evelyn at some point in their long careers.

She said, "The point is that we don't know how Type B, Marcellus Estevez, ties into this. Except for Hironobu Kwon and Chuck Finn, there's no hint of a connection between anyone else in the house. They all went to different high schools. Not all of them were in college, but the ones who were didn't go together. They didn't meet in prison. None of them share a gang affiliation or a social club. They all have different backgrounds, different ethnicities."

Will felt like she was being honest at least about this. In any investigation involving multiple perpetrators, the key was always to find out how they knew each other. Human beings were largely predictable in their habits. If you found out where they met, how they knew each other, or what had brought them together, then you could generally find someone outside the group, just hovering around the periphery, who wanted to talk.

He told her what he'd been thinking since he first saw Evelyn's upturned house. "This feels like a personal vendetta."

"Most vendettas are."

"No, I mean it feels like it's about something more than money."

"That will be one of the many questions we ask these imbeciles once we have the cuffs on them." Amanda twisted the steering wheel, taking a sudden turn that jerked Will to the side. "I'm sorry."

He couldn't remember a time Amanda had ever apologized for anything. He stared at her profile. Her jaw was more prominent than usual. Her skin was sallow. She was looking downright beaten. And she had given him more information in the last ten minutes than she had in the last twenty-four hours. "Is something else going on?"

"No." She stopped in front of a large commercial warehouse with six loading docks. There were no cargo trucks, but several vehicles were parked in front of the large bay doors. Any one of the vehicles would've cost more than Will's pension—BMW's, Mercedes, even a Bentley.

Amanda circled the lot, making sure there would be no surprises. The space was large enough for an eighteen-wheeler to turn around, and sloped toward the docks to facilitate loading and unloading. She made a lazy U-turn, going back the way they had come. The tires squealed as she cut the wheel hard, taking a space as far from the building as she could get without parking on the grass. Amanda cut the engine. The SUV was directly across from what appeared to be the front office. About fifty yards of wide-open space separated them from the building. A set of crumbling concrete steps led to a glass door. The railing had rusted so badly it keeled to the side. The sign over the entrance had a set of kitchen cabinets bolted to the front. A Confederate flag waved in the breeze. Will read the first word on the sign, then guessed at the rest, "Southern Cabinets? That's an unusual drug front."

She narrowed her eyes at him. "It's like watching a dog walk on its hind legs."

Will got out of the car. He met Amanda behind the SUV. She used the key-fob remote to pop open the trunk. In Valdosta this morning, they had locked up their weapons before going into the prison. The black SUV was regulation GBI, which meant the entire back end was taken up by a large steel cabinet with six drawers. Amanda pressed the combination into the pushbutton lock and pulled open the middle drawer. Her Glock rested in a dark purple velvet bag that had the Crown Royal logo stitched into the hem. She dropped it into her purse while Will clipped his paddle holster onto his belt.

"Hold on." She reached into the back of the drawer and pulled out a five-shot revolver. This particular type of Smith and Wesson was called an "old-timer," because mostly old-timers carried them. The gun was lightweight, with an internal hammer that made it easy to conceal. Despite the "Lady Smith" logo etched above the trigger, the recoil could leave a nasty bruise the entire length of your hand. Evelyn Mitchell's S&W was a similar model, with a cherry handle instead of Amanda's custom walnut. Will wondered if the two women had bought their guns together on a shopping trip.

Amanda said, "Stand straight. Try not to react. We're just in view of the camera.”

Will fought to follow her orders as she reached under the back of his jacket and shoved the revolver down his pants. He stared ahead at the warehouse. It was metal, wider than it was deep, about half the length of a football field. The whole building was on a concrete foundation that raised the height of the ground floor by at least four feet, the standard height of a loading dock. Except for the steep flight of concrete steps leading up to the front door, there was no way in and out. At least not unless you were willing to pull yourself up onto the loading dock and muscle open one of the large metal doors.

He asked, “Where are the guys you had sitting on this place?”

“Doraville needed an assist. We’re on our own.”

He watched the camera over the door track back and forth. “This doesn’t seem like a bad idea at all.”

“Stand up straight.” She slapped him on the back, making sure the gun was snug. “And for God’s sake, don’t hold in your stomach or it’ll fall straight through to the ground.” She had to go up on the tips of her toes to pull the trunk closed. “I don’t know why you wear your belt so loose. It’s pointless to even have one if you’re not going to use it right.”

Will walked behind her as she headed toward the entrance. The walk was a brisk one, fifty yards of exposed space. The camera had stopped its sweep to track their progress. They might as well have targets on their chests. He concentrated on the top of Amanda’s head, the way her hair swirled at the crown like a spiral ham.

The glass door opened when they reached the concrete steps to the entrance. Amanda shielded her eyes from the sun, staring up at an angry-looking Asian man. He was huge, his body seemingly comprising equal parts fat and muscle. The guy stood wordlessly, holding open the front door as he watched them make their way up the steps. Will followed Amanda inside. His eyes took their time adjusting in the tiny, airless front office. The fake paneling on the wall had buckled from humidity. The carpet was brown in ways that would repulse a more fastidious man. The whole place smelled of sawdust and oil. Will could hear machines running in the warehouse: finish nailers, compressors, lathes. Guns N’ Roses played on the radio.

Amanda told the man, “Mrs. Ling should be expecting me.” She smiled at the camera mounted above the doorway.

The man didn’t move. Amanda dug into her purse like she was looking for her lipstick. Will didn’t know if she was reaching for her gun or if she just needed lipstick. His answer came when the door was opened by a tall, lithe woman with a grin on her face.

“Mandy Wagner, it’s been ages.” The woman seemed almost pleased. She was Asian, roughly Amanda’s age with short salt-and-pepper hair. She was as thin as a teenager. Her sleeveless shirt showed well-toned arms. She spoke in a distinctive, slow southern drawl. There was something catlike in the languid way she moved, or maybe the smell of pot clinging to her body had something to do with that. She was wearing moccasins with beads on the top, the sort of souvenir you’d find at a tourist trap outside an Indian reservation.

“Julia.” Amanda gave a convincing smile. “It’s so good to see you.” They hugged, and Will saw the woman’s hand linger at Amanda’s waist.

"This is Will Trent, my associate." She put her hand over Julia's as she turned to Will. "I hope you don't mind his tagging along. He's in training."

"How fortunate to learn from the best," Julia cooed. "Tell him to leave his gun on the counter. You too, Mandy. You still using that old Crown Royal bag?"

"Keeps the lint out of the firing pin." The gun made a thud as she dropped the bag on the counter. The dour man checked the contents, then nodded at his boss. Will wasn't as quickly compliant. Giving up his gun was not something he was comfortable with.

"Will," Amanda said. "Don't embarrass me in front of my friends."

He unclipped the paddle holster from his belt and put his Glock on the counter.

Julia Ling laughed as she waved them through the door. The warehouse was even bigger than it looked from the outside, but the operation was small, the sort of thing that would've fit into a two-car garage. There were at least a dozen men putting together cabinets. Will couldn't tell whether they were Asian, Hispanic, or anything else, because their hats were pulled down and their faces were turned away. Whoever they were, they were obviously working. The smell of glue was pungent. Sawdust littered the floor. A gigantic Confederate flag served as a divider between the work area and the vacant-looking rear of the building. The stars were yellow instead of white.

Julia led them through another door and they found themselves in a small but well-furnished back office. The carpet underfoot was plush. There were two couches with overstuffed pillows. A plump Chihuahua sat in a recliner by the window, its eyes closed to what little sun came through the panes. Heavy metal bars framed the view to the service alley behind the building.

"Will has a Chihuahua," Amanda said, because Will hadn't been emasculated enough today. "What's its name again?"

Will felt barbed wire sticking in his throat. "Betty."

"Really?" Julia picked up the dog and sat on the couch with it. She patted the cushion beside her, and Amanda sat down. "This is Arnoldo. He's a chunky little thing. Is yours long-haired or short?"

Will didn't know what else to do. He reached around to pull out his wallet, too late remembering Amanda's revolver. It shifted dangerously, and he sat on the couch across from the women, opening his wallet to show Betty's picture.

Julia Ling made a tsk-ing sound with her tongue. "Isn't she adorable?"

"Thank you." Will took back the picture and dropped his wallet into his coat pocket. "Yours is nice, too."

Julia had already tuned Will out. She ran her hand along Amanda's leg. "What brings you here, buttercup?"

Amanda did a good job of blocking out Will, too. "I trust you've heard about Evelyn?"

"Yes," Julia said, drawing out the word. "Poor Almeja. I hope they are kind to her."

Will fought to keep his mouth from dropping open. Evelyn Mitchell was Almeja.

Amanda laid her hand over Julia's. Instead of taking it off her knee, she left it there. "I don't suppose you've heard anything on her whereabouts?"

"Not a peep, but you know I'd come straight to you if I did."

"Obviously, we're doing everything we can to make sure she's returned home safely. I would pull some considerable strings to make this come out right."

"Yes," Julia repeated. "She's a grandmother now, right? Again, I mean. Such a fertile family." She laughed as if there was a joke between them. "How is that dear, sweet child doing?"

"This is a difficult time for everyone in the family."

"Yes." It seemed this was her favorite word.

"I'm sure you've heard about Hector."

"Bless his heart. I was thinking of trading down for a Cadillac."

"I thought business was going well?"

"It's not really the time to drive something so flashy." She lowered her voice. "Carjackings."

"Awful." Amanda shook her head.

"These young boys are such a problem." She tsked her tongue. Will thought he understood at least this part of the conversation. Julia Ling was referring to the young men who had broken into Evelyn's house. "They see all the gangsters on TV and think it's so easy. Scarface. The Godfather. Tony Soprano. You can see their little brains spinning. Before long, they get these notions into their heads and they pop off without considering the consequences." She tsked her tongue again. "I just lost one of my workers through this kind of careless action."

She meant Benny Choo, the man in the Hawaiian shirt. Will had been right. Julia Ling had sent her strongarm in to clean up the mess Ricardo and his friends had made. And then Faith had killed him.

Amanda must have known this, too, but she treaded carefully. "Your line of business isn't without its risks. Mr. Choo understood this as well as anyone."

Julia Ling hesitated long enough to make Will worry for Faith, then finally let out a slow, "Yes. The cost of doing business. I think we'll let Benny rest in peace."

Amanda appeared as relieved as Will felt. "I hear your brother's coping with his new surroundings."

"Yes," she said. "'Coping' is a good word for it. Roger's never liked the heat. Savannah is practically tropical."

"You know, there's a vacancy at the D&C. Perhaps I could see if they'll take Roger? Might be nice to give him a change of scenery."

She pretended to think about it. "Still a little too warm." She smiled. "How about Phillips?"

"Well, that is a nice facility." It was also where Ignatio Ortiz was serving his manslaughter rap. Amanda shook her head like she was very sorry to say that that particular holiday had already been booked by another family. "Doesn't seem like the right fit."

"Baldwin is a better drive for me."

"Baldwin isn't really suited to Roger's temperament." Most likely because the prison only handled minimum to medium security inmates. "Augusta? It's close but not too close."

She wrinkled her nose. "With the sex offender release site?"

"Good point." Amanda seemed to think on it, though she must've already cleared the deal with the state attorney's office. "You know, Arrendale has started taking in some maximum security prisoners. Only with good behavior, of course, but I'm sure that Roger could swing that."

She gave a chuckle. "Oh, Mandy. You know Roger. He's always getting into trouble."

Amanda's offer was firm. "Still, I'd think about Arrendale. We could certainly make sure his transition was a pleasant one. Evelyn has a lot of friends who want nothing more than to see that she's returned home safely. Roger might as well get something for himself in the process."

Julia stroked the dog. "I'll see what he says the next time I go visit him."

"A phone call might be better." Amanda added, "I'm sure he'll want to hear about Benny from you rather than a stranger."

"God rest his soul." She squeezed Amanda's leg. "It's horrible to lose people you care about."

"It is."

"I know that you and Evelyn were close."

"We still are."

"Why don't you get rid of Tonto here and we can comfort each other?"

Amanda's laughter sounded genuinely delighted. She patted Julia's knee, then stood up from the couch. "Oh, Jules. It's been nice seeing you again. I wish we could do this more."

Will started to stand, but then remembered the revolver. He put his hands in his pockets to keep his pants tight enough to hold it in place. All he needed was to break up whatever game Amanda was playing by dropping a gun through the leg of his pants.

Amanda said, "Let me know about Arrendale. It really is a lovely place. The windows are four inches wider in the close-security wing. Lots of sunshine and fresh air. I think Roger will love it."

"I'll let you know his decision. I think we can all agree that uncertainty is bad for business."

"Tell Roger I am at his beck and call."

Will opened the door for Amanda. They walked back through the shop together. The crew had obviously taken a break. The machines were idle, the stations vacant. The radio had been turned down to a low hum. He mumbled to Amanda, "That was interesting."

"We'll see if she does her part." He could tell she was hopeful. The bounce was back in her walk. "I'd bet my left one Roger knows exactly what happened at Ev's house yesterday. Julia probably told him herself. She would've never let us step foot in here if she wasn't willing to deal. We'll know something within the hour. Mark my word."

"Ms. Ling seems eager to please you."

She stopped and looked up at him. "Do you really think so? I can never tell if she's just being affectionate or ..." Amanda shrugged in lieu of finishing the sentence.

He thought she was joking, then realized she wasn't. "I guess. I mean—" He felt himself start to sweat. "You've never—"

"Grow up, Will. I did go to college."

He could still hear her chuckling as they walked toward the front office. Will guessed that he was doomed to have this woman play him like a banjo for the rest of his life. She was almost as bad as Angie.

He was reaching for the doorknob when he heard the first pop, almost like a champagne bottle being uncorked. Then he felt his ear sting, saw the door splinter in front of him, and knew that it was a bullet. And another. And another.

Amanda was faster than Will. She had pulled the gun from the back of his pants, swung around, and fired off two shots, before he hit the floor.

The sound of a machine gun ripped the air. Bullets sprayed inches from his head. There was no telling where the threat was coming from. The back of the warehouse was dark. It could be Ling-Ling, the men who had been working on the cabinets, or both.

“Go!” Amanda yelled. Will shouldered open the door to the front office. Of course their guns were gone from the counter. The disapproving Asian who’d let them in was dead on the floor. Will felt something hard hit him in the back of the head. He was stunned for a few seconds before he realized that Amanda had thrown her purse at him.

Will tucked the bag under his arm and slammed open the front door. The sudden, sharp sunlight blinded him so badly that he tripped down the concrete stairs. The old railing bent under his weight, softening what could’ve been a catastrophic fall. Quickly, he righted himself and headed straight across the parking lot toward the parked SUV. The contents of Amanda’s purse scattered behind him as he searched for the key fob. He thumbed the button and the trunk was open by the time he got to the back of the vehicle. Will pressed the numbers on the combination lock. The drawer rolled open.

In Will’s experience, you were either a shotgun person or a rifle person. Faith preferred the shotgun, which was counterintuitive considering her diminutive stature and the fact that the kick from a shotgun could tear your rotator cuff. Will liked the rifle. It was clean, precise, and extremely accurate, even at a hundred fifty feet—a good thing, considering this was the approximate distance between the SUV and the entrance to the building. The GBI provided agents with the Colt AR-15A2, which Will rolled up to his shoulder as the front door shattered open.

Will put his eye to the scope. Amanda handled the sunlight better than he had. Without missing a beat, she bolted down the concrete stairs, firing backward, her shots missing the stocky-looking man who was chasing her. He had on dark sunglasses. A machine gun was in his hands. Instead of taking the easy shot at Amanda’s retreating back, he held up the gun in the air as he jumped down the flight of stairs. It was a cowboy move, which gave Will equal opportunity to pull one of his own. He pressed back on the trigger. The man jerked midair and dropped to the ground.

Will lowered the rifle. He looked for Amanda. She was walking back toward the man on the ground. She held her gun down at her side. She must’ve been out of ammunition. Will pressed his eye to the scope again to give Amanda cover in case anyone else came out of the building. She kicked away the machine gun. He could see her mouth moving.

Without warning, Amanda dove behind the concrete steps. Will took his eye away from the scope so he could locate the new threat. It was the man on the ground. Impossibly, he was still alive. He had Will’s Glock in his hand. It was pointed toward the SUV. He fired off three shots in rapid succession. Will knew the heavy-gauge steel cabinet would shield him, but he still ducked as metal pinged against metal.

The shooting stopped. Will's heart was pumping so hard that he could feel his pulse throbbing in his stomach. He chanced a look back at the building. The shooter must've been hiding behind the Mercedes, probably on the other side of the gas tank. Will lined up the rifle, hoping the guy would do something stupid like poke up his head. The Glock came up instead. Will shot, and the gun quickly receded.

"Police!" Will yelled, because it had to be done. "Show me your hands!"

The guy shot blindly toward the SUV, missing by several yards.

Will mumbled some choice words. He looked at Amanda as if to ask what the plan was. She shook her head, not to tell him no, but in exasperation. If Will had made the first shot, they wouldn't be having this conversation.

He couldn't think of a way to gesture to her that he had made the shot—without getting fired—so he pointed to the magazine jutting out from his rifle to pose the question. Was she out of bullets? Her revolver held five rounds. Unless she'd gotten her speed loader out of her purse, there was not much she could do.

Even from this distance, he saw her annoyed expression. Of course she had gotten her speed loader out of her purse. She had probably stopped to put on some lipstick and make some phone calls, too. He checked the Mercedes again, scanning the sights along the contour of the big sedan. When he looked back at Amanda, she had already spun open the S&W, dropped the empty shells on the ground, and reloaded. She waved her hand at him to get on with it.

"Sir!" Will yelled. "I am giving you one more warning to surrender."

"Fuck you!" The man shot at Will again, hitting the side door panel of the SUV.

Amanda did a crouched walk to the edge of the concrete stairs, then bent her head to the ground to try to see where the man was hiding. She sat back up. She didn't look at Will. She didn't pause to line up the shot. She simply rested her hand on the third step from the bottom and squeezed the trigger.

Television had done a great disservice to bad guys. They didn't show that bullets could go through Sheetrock walls and metal car doors. They also didn't explain that a ricochet was nothing like a rubber ball. Bullets came out at a very high velocity, and they wanted to go forward. Shooting a bullet into the ground does not mean it will pop back up in the air. Shooting one into the ground underneath a car means it skips across the pavement, pierces the tire, and, if you are sitting the right way, lodges into your groin.

Which is exactly what happened.

"Jesus Christ!" the man screamed.

Will ordered, "Show me your hands!"

Two hands shot up. "I give! I give!"

This time, Amanda kept her gun trained on the man as she walked over to the car. She kicked away the Glock, then jammed her knee into the man's back, all the while keeping her eye on the office door.

She was watching the wrong door. One of the cargo bays flew open. A black van screeched out, sailing through the air. Sparks flew as it skipped across the asphalt. Rubber burned. The wheels slid in place before they got purchase. Will saw two young men in the cab. They were wearing black warm-up jackets and matching black baseball caps. The van momentarily blocked his view of Amanda. Will raised the rifle, but he couldn't shoot—not without risking the bullet cutting through the van and hitting Amanda. Two more quick pops sounded. Gunfire. The van screeched away.

Will ran into the parking lot to line up a shot. He stopped. Amanda was on the ground.

"Amanda?" He felt his chest tighten. His throat didn't want to work. "Amanda? Are you—"

"Dammit!" she screamed, rolling over so that she could sit up. Her face and chest were covered in blood. "Goddamn it."

Will dropped to one knee. He put his hand on her shoulder. "Are you shot?"

"I'm fine, you idiot." She slapped away his hand. "This one's dead. They tapped him twice in the head while they were driving off."

Will could see as much. The man's face was gone.

"That's a damn good shot out of a moving car." She glared at him as he helped her up. "Much better than yours. When was the last time you were on the range? This is unacceptable. Absolutely unacceptable."

Will knew better than to argue with her, but if he was the arguing type, he might've mentioned what a bad idea it'd been to leave their guns on the counter, or how stupid it was to go into this place without backup.

"I swear to God, Will, when this is over—" She didn't finish her sentence. She paced off, stepping on the plastic compact from her purse. "Goddamn it!"

Will knelt down in front of the dead man. Out of habit, he checked for a pulse. There was a hole in the black warm-up jacket, about two inches from his heart. It was big enough for Will's finger to poke through. He tugged down the zip, revealing the top of a military-grade tactical assault vest. The bullet's full metal jacket had expanded on impact, smashing into the shock plate, flattening out like a dog trying to crawl underneath a couch.

K-5, right in the center of the chest.

Amanda was back. She stared down at the dead man without saying a word. She must have been standing downblast when he was shot. Bits of gray matter stuck to her face. There was a piece of bone in the collar of her blouse.

Will stood up. He couldn't think of anything to do but offer his handkerchief.

"Thank you." She wiped her face with a steady hand. The blood smeared like clown makeup. "Thank God I have a change of clothes in the car." She looked up at him. "Your jacket is ripped."

He looked at his sleeve. There was a small tear where his shoulder had met asphalt.

"You should always keep a change of clothes in your car. You never know what's going to happen."

"Yes, ma'am." Will rested his hand on the butt of his rifle.

"Ling-Ling's gone." Amanda wiped her forehead. "She came out of her office with that stupid dog under her arm. Guns blazing. I'm under no impression that she was trying to save me, but it seemed rather obvious that they were trying to kill her, too."

Will tried to process this new piece of information. "I assumed the shooters were working for Ling-Ling."

"If Julia wanted us dead, she would've taken both of us out in her office. Didn't you see the sawed-off shotgun under the couch cushion?"

Will nodded, though he hadn't seen the gun and the thought of it now brought out a cold sweat. "The shooters worked in her shop. I recognized them from when we first went in. They were putting together cabinets. Why would they try to kill Julia? Or us, for that matter?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Amanda finally realized it wasn't. "They didn't want her talking to me. They certainly don't want her talking to Roger. She must know something."

Will tried to put the pieces together. "Julia said that the young boys were getting ahead of themselves. Trying to be gangsters. I don't imagine a bunch of twenty-something-year-old, testosterone-filled guys want to be ordered around by a middle-aged woman."

"And here I was thinking that men loved that." Amanda looked down at the dead man. "He's sweating like a pig. No doubt he was on something."

Something that had made him capable of taking the impact of a .223-caliber 55-grain full metal jacket to the chest and popping up seconds later like a Toaster Strudel.

Amanda prodded the man with the toe of her shoe, pushing him over so she could check for his wallet. "These youngsters certainly don't like to leave witnesses." She slid out the driver's license. "Juan Armand Castillo. Aged twenty-four. Lives on Leather Stocking Lane in Stone Mountain." She showed Will the license. Castillo looked like a schoolteacher, not the kind of guy who would chase a GBI agent into a parking lot with a machine gun.

She unzipped Castillo's jacket the rest of the way. Her Glock was tucked into his pants. She took it out, saying, "Well, at least he didn't shoot at me with my own gun."

Will helped her unloop the side clasps on the Kevlar vest.

"He smells, too." Amanda lifted up the shirt, checking his chest. "No tattoos." She checked his arms. "Nothing."

"Try the hands."

Castillo's fists were clenched. She uncurled the fingers with her bare hand, which was technically against every procedure in the book, but Will was an accomplice already, so it didn't really matter.

She said, "Nothing."

Will scanned the parking lot. There were only two cars now, the Bentley and the Mercedes. "Do you think someone else is inside?"

"The Bentley is Ling-Ling's. I imagine she keeps another car close by that she's using right now to go as far underground as possible. The Merc belongs to Perry." She explained, "The dead man in the front office."

"You certainly seem to know a lot about these people. Mandy."

"I'm in no mood for that, Will."

"Julia Ling is high up in the pecking order. She's practically the beak."

"Is there a reason you're talking like Foghorn Leghorn?"

"I'm just saying that it takes either a large set of balls or an extreme amount of stupidity to try to take out someone with Julia Ling's kind of juice. Her brother's not going to just roll over. You told me yourself that he's practically insane. Shooting at his sister is an open act of war."

"Finally, a salient point." She handed back his handkerchief. "Did you get a good look at the men in the van?"

He shook his head. "Young, I guess. Sunglasses. Hats. Jackets. Nothing else I could swear to."

"I'm not asking you to swear. I'm asking you to—" The air was pierced by the sound of sirens. "Took them long enough."

Will guessed the first gunshot had been fired less than five minutes ago. By his calculations, that was pretty good response time.

He asked, "Did you get a look at them?"

She shook her head. "I suppose we should be looking for someone with drive-by experience."

She was right about the shots. Nailing someone in the head, twice, from a moving vehicle, even at a short distance, was not something you got lucky at. It took practice, and obviously Castillo's killer hadn't worried about missing.

Will asked, "Why didn't they shoot you?"

"Are you complaining or asking a question?" Amanda rubbed something off her arm. She looked down at Castillo. "I guess we're down to two now. At least our odds are getting better."

She was talking about the fingerprints found at Evelyn's house. "It's three."

She shook her head, still looking down at the corpse.

He counted it out on his fingers. "Evelyn killed Hironobu Kwon. Faith took care of Ricardo Ortiz and Benny Choo. Marcellus Estevez died at Grady, and Juan Castillo here makes five." She didn't say anything. He worried about his math. "Eight sets of prints at Evelyn's house minus five dead guys equals three."

She watched the squad cars speeding down the road. "Two," she told him. "One tried to kill Sara Linton an hour ago."

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Dale Dugan rushed into the doctors' lounge. "I came as soon as they let me."

Sara closed her eyes as she shut her locker. She had spent nearly two hours going over her statement with the Atlanta police. Then the hospital administration had swarmed around her for another hour, ostensibly to help, but Sara had quickly realized that they were more concerned that they would be sued. Once she'd signed a paper absolving them of all responsibility, they left as quickly as they had arrived.

Dale asked, "Can I get you anything?"

"Thank you, but I'm fine."

"Can I drive you home?"

"Dale, I—" The door slammed open. Will stood there, a panicked look on his face.

For a few suspended seconds, nothing mattered anymore. Sara was blind to everything else in the room. Her peripheral vision was gone. Everything tunneled to Will. She didn't see Dale leave. She didn't hear the constant throng of ambulance sirens and ringing phones and screaming patients.

She just saw Will.

He let the door close, but didn't move toward her. There was sweat on his brow. His breath was labored. She didn't know what to say to him, what to do. She just stood there staring at him as if this was another ordinary day.

He asked, "Is that a new outfit?"

She laughed, the sound getting caught in her throat. She'd changed into scrubs. Her clothes were in police evidence.

The corner of his mouth went up in a forced smile. "It brings out the green in your eyes."

Sara bit her lip to keep tears from falling. She had wanted to call him as soon as it happened. Her cell phone had been in her hands, his number up on the screen, but she had tucked the phone into her purse because Sara knew if she saw Will before she was ready, she would shatter like a delicate piece of china.

Amanda Wagner knocked as she entered the room. "I hate to interrupt, Dr. Linton, but could we have a word with you?"

Anger flashed across Will's face. "She doesn't—"

"It's all right," Sara interrupted. "There's not much that I can tell you."

Amanda smiled as if this was some sort of social gathering. "Anything at all would be appreciated."

Sara had talked about it so much over the last few hours that she recited the events as if by rote. She gave them the abbreviated version of her statement, not going into a detailed description of the female junkie, which, on paper, had sounded like every junkie Sara had ever seen. Nor did she describe the trash around the Dumpster or the EMTs, or list the procedures she followed. She cut to what mattered: the young man who'd peered at her from behind the curtain. He had punched her in the chest. He had shot her patient twice in the head. He was thin, Caucasian, mid-to-late twenties and wearing a black warm-up jacket and baseball cap. In the short time that elapsed between her first sight of him and his death, he had not uttered one word. The only sound she'd heard was a grunt, and then the air whistling from his neck as his breath seeped out.

She finished, "His hand was gripped around my hand. I couldn't stop it. He's dead. They're both dead."

Will seemed to have trouble speaking. "He hurt you."

Sara could only nod, but her mind conjured the image she had seen in the bathroom mirror: an oblong, ugly bruise over her right breast where the man had punched her.

Will cleared his throat. "All right. Thank you for your cooperation, Dr. Linton. I know you probably want to get home." He turned to leave, but Amanda made no move to follow.

"Dr. Linton, I noticed a soda machine in the waiting room. Would you like something to drink?"

Sara was taken off guard. "I'm—"

"Will, could you get a Diet Sprite for me and—I'm sorry, Dr. Linton. What did you want?"

Will's jaw tightened like a ratchet. He wasn't stupid. He knew that Amanda was trying to get her alone, just like Sara knew that Amanda wouldn't give up until she got what she wanted. She tried to make this easier for Will, saying, "A Coke would be nice."

He didn't give in that easy. "Are you sure?"

"Yes. I'm sure."

He wasn't happy, but he left the room.

Amanda checked the hallway, making sure Will was gone. She turned back to Sara. "I'm rooting for you, you know."

Sara didn't have a clue what she was talking about.

"Will," she explained. "He's got one too many bitches in his life, and I'm not going anywhere."

Sara was in no mood to joke. "What do you want, Amanda?"

She got to the point. "The bodies are still downstairs in the morgue. I need you to examine them and give me your professional opinion." She added, "A coroner's opinion."

Sara felt a cold chill at the thought of seeing the man again. Every time she blinked, she could see his expressionless face hovering over her. She couldn't grip her hand without feeling his fingers wrapped around her own. "I can't cut them open."

"No, but you can answer some questions for me."

"Such as?"

"Drug use, gang affiliations, and whether or not one of them has a stomach full of heroin."

"Like Ricardo."

"Yes, like Ricardo."

Sara didn't give herself time to think about the request. "All right. I'll do it."

"Do what?" Will was back. He must've run the entire way. He was out of breath again. He held two sodas in one hand.

"There you are," Amanda said, as if she was surprised to see him. "We were about to go down to the morgue.”

Will looked at Sara. “No.”

“I want to do this,” Sara insisted, though she was not sure why. For the last three hours, all she could think about was going home. Now that Will was here, the thought of returning to her empty apartment was unimaginable.

“We don’t need these.” Amanda took the soda cans and dropped them into the trash. “Dr. Linton?”

Sara led them down the corridor toward the elevators, feeling like a lifetime had passed since she’d made the same walk this morning. A loaded gurney rolled by, EMTs shouting stats, doctors giving orders. Sara held out her arm, guiding Will back against the wall so that the patient could get past. Her hand hovered just in front of his tie. She could feel the silk material sway against her fingertips. He was wearing a suit, his normal work attire, but without the usual vest. His jacket was dark blue, the shirt a lighter shade of the same color.

The cop. Sara had forgotten the cop. “I didn’t—”

“Hold that thought,” Amanda said, as if she was afraid the walls had ears.

Sara fumed at herself as they waited for the elevator. How had she forgotten about the cop? What was wrong with her?

The doors opened. The elevator was packed. It took an interminable amount of time for the old pulleys and lifts to groan into action. They went down a floor and most of the people exited. Two young orderlies rode with them to the sub-basement. They got off and headed toward the stairwell, probably for an illicit tryst.

Amanda waited until they were well beyond earshot. “What is it?”

“There was a man when we came in from the Dumpster. I nearly ran him over. I told him to get out of the way, and he flashed a badge. It looked like a badge. I’m not sure anymore. He acted like a cop.”

“In what way?”

“He acted like he had every right to question me, and he was irritated when I didn’t answer immediately.” Sara gave her a meaningful look.

“Sounds like a cop to me,” Amanda wryly admitted. “What did he want?”

“To know whether or not the patient was going to make it. I told him maybe, even though it was obvious ...” Sara let her voice trail off, willing herself to remember. “He was wearing a dark suit, charcoal. White shirt. He was very thin, almost gaunt. He reeked of cigarette smoke. I could smell it even after he left.”

“Did you see which way he went?”

She shook her head.

“White? Black?”

“White. Gray hair. He was older. He looked older.” She put her hand to her face. “His cheeks were sunken. His eyes were heavily lidded.” She remembered something else. “He was wearing a hat. A baseball hat.”

“Black?” Will asked.

“Blue,” she said. “Atlanta Braves.”

“We’ll probably get some nice images of the top of it from the security cameras,” Amanda commented. “We’ll have to share this information with the APD. They may want to see if you can work with a sketch artist.”

Sara would do whatever it took. “I’m sorry I didn’t remember earlier. I don’t know what—”

"You were in shock." Will seemed ready to say more. He glanced at Amanda, then indicated the double doors at the other end of the hallway. He said, "I think it's this way."

In the morgue, Junior and Larry were nowhere to be seen. Instead, there were two gurneys, each with a body, each with a white sheet covering the dead. Sara assumed one was the man she had found outside by the Dumpster and the other was the man who had shot the first, then tried to kill her.

There was an older woman leaning against the door to the walk-in freezer. She looked up from her BlackBerry as they walked into the room. Her hospital badge was tucked into her pants pocket. No white lab coat, just a well-tailored black pantsuit. She was clearly on the administration side of the hospital. She was older, more gray than black in her hair. She pushed away from the freezer and walked over. Her posture was ramrod straight, her sizable chest out in front of her like the prow of a ship.

She didn't stop for introductions. She pulled a small spiral-bound notebook out of her jacket pocket and read, "The shooter's name is Franklin Warren Heeney. APD found his wallet on him. Local boy, lives in Tucker with his parents. Dropped out of Perimeter College his sophomore year. No employment records. No adult arrest history, but at thirteen, he spent six months in juvie for breaking windows. He has one child, a daughter, six years old, who lives with an aunt out in Snellville. The baby mama is in county lockup for shoplifting and a Baggie of meth they found in her purse. That's all I could get on him." She indicated the other body. "Marcellus Benedict Estevez. As I said on the phone, his wallet was found in the trash by the Dumpster. I assume you've already looked into him?" Amanda nodded, and the woman closed her notebook. "That's all I have for now. Nothing else has come down on the wire."

Amanda nodded again. "Thank you."

"I bought you an hour before the body boys come. Dr. Linton, the films you ordered for Estevez are in the transport packet. I've gathered together some tools that might be useful. I'm sorry it can't be more."

She had done plenty. Sara looked over the four Mayo trays laid out beside the bodies. Whoever the woman was, she had some medical knowledge and was high enough up the Grady food chain to raid the supply closet without setting off alarms. "Thank you."

The woman nodded her goodbyes, then left the room.

Will's tone was sharp when he asked Amanda, "Let me guess, one of your old gals?"

Amanda ignored him. "Dr. Linton, if we could get started?"

Sara had to force herself to move or she would've just stood rooted to the floor until the building fell down around her. There was a pack of sterile gloves hanging from a cleat on the wall. She took out a pair and forced them over her sweating hands. The powder rolled into tiny balls that stuck to her palm like dough.

Without preamble, she pulled back the sheet covering the first body, revealing Marcellus Estevez, the man she had found by the Dumpster. He had two closely spaced bullet holes in his forehead. Powder burns tattooed the skin. She smelled cordite, which was impossible considering the man had been shot hours ago.

Amanda said, "Two rounds to the center of the forehead, just like our drive-by at the warehouse.”

Will's voice was low. “You don't have to do this.”

“I'm fine.” Sara forced herself to get on with it, starting with the easy stuff. “He's approximately twenty-five years of age,” she mumbled. “Five-eight or nine. Around one hundred eighty pounds.” She pressed open his eyes, feeling herself fall into the routine of examination. “Brown. Jaundiced. His wound was septic. Necropsy will probably show infiltration into the larger organs. He was in systemic shutdown when we found him.” She rolled down the sheet so she could look at the belly again, this time with an eye toward forensic evaluation rather than treatment.

The man was nude; his clothes had been cut off when they'd brought him into the ER. Sara could clearly see the penetrating stab wound in the lower left quadrant of his abdomen. She pressed on either side of the cut to see if she could discern the path of the blade. “The small intestines were pierced. It looks like the knife went in at an upward angle. Right-handed thrust from a supine position.”

Amanda asked, “He was on top of her?”

“I would assume. We're talking about Evelyn here, right?” Will was still being stoic, but Amanda nodded. “The blade entered at an oblique angle to the abdominal Langer's lines, or the natural direction of the skin. If I reorient the edges like this”—she twisted the skin into the position it had been in when the man was stabbed—“you can see the point of penetration suggests Evelyn was on her back, most likely on the floor, with her attacker on top of her. He was slightly bent at the waist. The knife went in like this.” Sara reached for a scalpel on the tray, but changed her mind and grabbed a pair of scissors instead. She illustrated the action, holding her hand down at her hip with the scissors angled upward. “It was more defensive than deliberate. Maybe they struggled and fell at the same time. The knife went in. The man rolled over while the blade was still lodged—you can see how the wound is incised significantly more at the lateral edge, indicating movement.”

“Kitchen knife?” Amanda asked.

“Statistically, it's the most likely weapon, and the struggle took place in the kitchen, so it makes sense. They'll have to do a comparison at the ME's office to be sure. Did they find the weapon at the scene?”

“Yes,” she answered. “Are you sure about this? She was on her back?”

Sara could see that Amanda was not pleased with the evaluation. She wanted her friend to be a fighter, not someone who got lucky. “The majority of fatal stab wounds are in the left chest region. If you want to kill someone, you go for the heart, overhanded, straight into the chest. This was defensive.” She indicated the man's sliced palm. “But Evelyn didn't go easily. At some point, she must've come at him directly, because he grabbed the blade of the knife.”

Amanda seemed only slightly placated by this information. “Is there anything in his stomach?”

Sara reached under the gurney and pulled out the transportation packet destined for the Fulton County medical examiner. Krakauer had filled in most of the information while Sara was being interviewed by the police. The form was standard. The ME performing the autopsy needed to know drugs on board, procedures followed, which marks came from the hospital and which had more nefarious origins. Sara found a thermal reproduction of the X-rays on the last page.

She said, "The belly looks clear of any foreign objects. They'll know for sure when they cut him open, but I'm assuming that the amount of heroin we're talking about, something worth dying for, would be easy to spot."

Will cleared his throat. He seemed reluctant as he asked, "Would Evelyn have a lot of blood on her from stabbing this guy?"

"It's not likely. Most of the bleeding happened inside the belly, even after the knife was pulled out. There's the defensive wound on his hand, but the ulnar and radial arteries are intact and none of the digital arteries were compromised. If the cut on his hand was deeper or if one of the fingers was sliced open or off, you could expect a significant amount of blood loss. But that's not the case with Estevez, so I'm guessing Evelyn would've had a minimal amount of blood on her clothes."

Will said, "There was a lot of blood on the floor. You could see footprints back and forth across the tiles."

"How big was the space?"

"Kitchen sized," he said. "Bigger than yours, but not by much, and enclosed. The house is older, ranch-style."

Sara thought about it. "I'd have to see the crime scene photos, but I'm fairly certain that if there was enough blood on the floor to show a struggle, that blood didn't come from Estevez's hand or belly. At least not all of it."

"Could Estevez just get up on his own and walk off after sustaining his injuries?"

"Not without help. Any type of damage to the abdominal wall makes it difficult to breathe, let alone move." Sara put her hand to her stomach. "Think about how many muscles have to fire just to sit up."

Amanda asked Will, "What are you getting at?"

"I'm just wondering who struggled with Evelyn if this guy couldn't get up after being stabbed and there wasn't a lot of blood from his wound."

Sara followed his logic. "You think Evelyn was injured."

"Maybe. They did blood typing on scene, but they didn't look at all of it, and DNA won't be back for another few days." He shrugged. "If Evelyn was hurt, and Estevez didn't bleed much, that could explain the extra blood."

"I'm sure if she's injured it's nothing serious." Amanda waved away Will's theory as if swatting a fly. Any logical person would've already accepted the very real possibility that Evelyn Mitchell's chances of survival were very slim considering how much time had elapsed. Amanda seemed to be holding on to the opposite theory.

Sara wasn't going to be the one to tell her otherwise.

There was a large magnifying glass on one of the trays. Sara pulled down the overhead light and went back to the examination, checking the dead man head to toe for trace evidence, needle marks, anything unusual that might lead them to a clue. When it was time to roll him over, Will put on a pair of surgical gloves and helped flip the body.

"Well, that's interesting," Amanda said with her usual flair for under statement.

Estevez had a large tattoo of an angel on his back. The image covered the width of his shoulders and reached the bottom of his sacrum, and was so intricate that it more closely resembled a carving. "Gabriel," Sara said. "The archangel."

Will asked, "How do you know that?"

She pointed to the horn in the angel's mouth. "There's no biblical foundation, but some religions believe that Judgment Day comes when Gabriel blows his horn." Sara knew that Will had never been to church. "It's the sort of thing they teach kids in Sunday school. And it tracks with his name—Marcellus Benedict. I believe those are the names of two different popes."

Amanda asked, "How recently would you say this tattoo was worked on?"

The skin at the small of his back was still irritated from the needle. "A week, maybe five days?" She leaned in closer to look at the scrollwork. "This was done in stages. Whoever did this took a long time. Probably months. It's not the kind of thing you'd forget, and I imagine it'd be very expensive."

Will held the dead man's hand in his. "Did you see this under the fingernails?"

"I saw they're dirty," she admitted. "That's fairly typical for a man this age. I can't do any scrapings. The ME's office would have a fit and anything I found would be inadmissible because we haven't established the chain of evidence."

Will put his nose close to the man's fingers. "It smells like oil to me."

Sara smelled for herself. "I can't tell. The police told me that they checked the outside security cameras. They're not static. They sweep back and forth across the back lot, which the bad guys obviously knew because they managed not to get caught leaving the body. The time stamp says that Estevez was by the Dumpster at least twelve hours. The smell could be anything." She rolled over the hand to show Will. "This is more interesting. Estevez obviously worked with his hands. There's a hardening of the skin on the ball of the thumb and here on the side of the index finger. He held some kind of tool for long periods of time. It would've had some weight to it and moved around a bit."

He asked Amanda, "You said he was unemployed?"

"The state shows he's been collecting unemployment insurance for almost a year."

Sara thought of something else. "Can you hand me that?" She pointed to the magnifying glass. Will picked it up and waited as Sara forced open Estevez's mouth. The jaw was stiff. The tendon popped when she pried open the lips. "Hold it here," she told Will, indicating he should focus on the upper teeth. "Do you see these tiny indentations in the bottom edges of his top front teeth?" Will leaned in closer, then let Amanda take a look. "These are repetitive impressions. They come from constantly gripping something between his teeth. You see this sort of thing with seamstresses who bite thread or finish carpenters who put nails in their mouth."

"Or cabinetmakers?" Will asked.

"That's possible." Sara looked at Estevez's hand again. "These calluses could come from holding a nail gun. I'd have to see the tool for comparison, but if you told me he worked as a carpenter, I'd agree that his hands show signs of working in that industry." She picked up the man's left hand. "Do you see these scars on his index finger? These line up with common injuries for carpenters. Hammers slip. A nail pinches the skin. Threads from screws scrape off the top dermal layer. Do you see this scar down the center line of his nail?" Will nodded. "It cuts through his cuticle, too. Carpenters use carpet knives to cut edges or score wood. Sometimes the blade skips down the fingernail or shaves the skin off the side of the finger. A lot of times they'll use their nondominant hand to smooth out putty or caulk, which causes wearing at the tip. His fingerprints would be different week-to-week, sometimes day-to-day."

Amanda said, "So, he's been at this job for a while?"

"I'd say whatever job he's been working at that caused these marks has been going on for two to three years."

"What about Heeney, the shooter?"

Sara reached under the sheet to check the other man's hands. She did not want to look at his face again. "He was left-handed, but I would hazard he worked in the same industry as Estevez."

Will said, "There's one connection, at least. They both worked for Ling-Ling."

Sara asked, "Who's Ling-Ling?"

"A missing person of interest." Amanda checked her watch. "We should hurry this along. Dr. Linton, can you examine our other friend here?"

Sara didn't give herself time to think about it. She pulled back the sheet in one quick motion. It was the first time she'd looked at Franklin Warren Heeney's face since he'd tried to kill her. His eyes were open. His lips were wrapped around the tube that had been inserted into his throat to help him breathe. A crusty layer of blood circled his neck where the flesh gaped open. He was still dressed from the waist down, but his jacket and shirt had been cut open so that the ER staff could try to save his life. The exercise had been perfunctory; the man had sliced open his own jugular. He'd lost nearly half his blood volume before they'd managed to pick him up off the floor and put him on the table. Sara knew this because she had been the doctor working on him.

She looked up. Both Amanda and Will were staring at her.

"Sorry," she apologized. She had to clear her throat before she could talk again. "He's around the same age as Estevez. Mid-to-late twenties. Underweight for his build." She pointed to the needle tracks on his arm. The IV port she'd inserted was still taped to his skin. "Recent user, at least intravenously." She found an otoscope and checked inside the man's nose. "There's significant scarring in the nasal passages, probably from snorting powder." She shoved the scope in farther. "He's had surgery to repair the septum, so you're looking at coke or meth, maybe Oxy. They're all extremely corrosive to cartilage."

Will asked, "What about heroin?"

"Oh, heroin, of course." Sara apologized again. "Sorry, most of the heroin users I see are smokers or needle junkies. The snorters usually go straight to the morgue."

Amanda crossed her arms. "What about his stomach?"

Sara didn't have to check the file. No X-rays had been taken. The man had expired before any tests could be ordered. Instead of continuing the exam, Sara found herself looking at his face again. Franklin Heeney hardly resembled a choirboy, but the acne-scarred skin and sunken cheeks were recognizable to someone out in the world. He had a mother. He had a father, a child, perhaps a sister or brother, who right at this moment was probably hearing that their loved one was dead.

Their loved one who had killed a man in cold blood and punched Sara so violently that the breath had gone out of her body. She felt the bruise on her chest start to throb at the memory. She had a mother, too—a sister, a father—all of whom would be horrified if they heard what had happened to Sara today.

Amanda asked, “Dr. Linton?”

“Sorry.” In the time it took to walk over to the box of gloves and put on a fresh pair, she had managed to pull herself back together. She ignored Will’s look of concern and pressed her fingers into the dead man’s belly. “I don’t feel anything unusual. The organs are in their proper position and are normal size. No swelling or compaction in the bowel or stomach.” She snapped off the gloves and threw them into the trash. The water in the sink was cold, but Sara washed her hands anyway. “I can’t send him to X-ray because they’ll need a patient ID, and frankly, I’m not going to make a living person wait to satisfy a curiosity. The ME’s office will have to give you a definitive answer.” She squirted antibacterial gel into her palm, fighting to keep her voice steady. “Is that all?”

“Yes,” Amanda said. “Thank you, Dr. Linton.”

Sara didn’t acknowledge the answer. She ignored Will. She ignored the two bodies. She kept her eyes on the door until she had passed through it. In the hallway, she concentrated on the elevator, the button she would press, the numbers that would light up over the door. She only wanted to think about the steps ahead, not the ones behind her. She had to get out of this place, to get home and wrap herself in a blanket on the couch and pull the dogs around her and forget this miserable day.

There were footsteps behind her. Will was running again. He caught up with her quickly. She turned around. He stopped a few feet away.

He said, “Amanda’s putting out an APB on the tattoo.”

Why was he just standing there? Why did he keep rushing up to her and doing absolutely nothing?

He said, “Maybe we’ll find—”

“I really don’t care.”

He stared at her. His hands were in his pockets. The sleeve of his jacket was tight around his upper arm. There was a small tear in the material.

Sara leaned her shoulder against the wall. She hadn’t noticed before, but there was a fresh cut at the top of his earlobe. She wanted to ask him about it, but he would probably tell her that he’d cut himself shaving. Maybe she didn’t want to know what had happened. The Polaroid of his damaged mouth still burned in her memory. What else had they done to him? What else had he done to himself?

Will said, “Why is it that none of the women in my life call me when they need help?”

“Doesn’t Angie call you?”

He looked down at the floor, the space between them.

She said, “I’m sorry. That wasn’t fair. It’s been a really long day.”

Will didn’t look up. Instead, he took her hand. His fingers laced through hers. His skin was warm, almost hot. He traced his thumb along the inside of her palm, the webbing between her fingers. Sara closed her eyes as he slowly explored every inch of her hand, caressing the lines and indentations, pressing his thumb gently against the pulse beating in her wrist. His touch was palliative. She felt her body starting to relax. Her breathing took on an easy cadence that matched his.

The doors to the morgue swished open. Sara yanked away her hand at the same time as Will. Neither of them looked at each other. They were like two kids caught in the back of a parked car.

Amanda held her cell phone in the air, triumphant. "Roger Ling wants to talk."

CHAPTER TWELVE

Faith felt as close to a nervous breakdown as she'd ever been in her life. Her teeth kept chattering despite the sweat dripping down her body. She'd thrown up her breakfast and had to force down lunch. Her head ached so badly that it hurt to even close her eyes. Her blood sugar levels were just as fragile. She'd had to call her doctor's office to find out what to do. They had threatened to put her in the hospital if she didn't get her numbers under control. Faith had promised to report back, then she'd gone into the bathroom, turned on the shower as hot as she could stand it, and sobbed for half an hour.

The same series of thoughts kept running through her mind like tires wearing a groove in a gravel road. They had been in her house. They had touched her things. Touched Jeremy's things. They knew when he was born. They knew his schools. They knew his likes and dislikes. They had planned this—all of it, down to the last detail.

The threat was like a death sentence. Mouth shut. Eyes open. Faith didn't think her eyes could open any wider or her mouth could close any tighter. She'd searched the house twice. She was constantly checking her phone, her email, Jeremy's Facebook page. It was three o'clock in the afternoon. She had been trapped in the house like a caged animal for nearly ten hours.

And still nothing.

"Hey, Mom?" Jeremy came into the kitchen. Faith was sitting at the table, staring at the backyard, where Detective Taylor and Ginger were talking earnestly to the ground. She could tell from their bored demeanors that they were just waiting for the word from their boss so they could get back to their real jobs. As far as they were concerned, this case had come to a screeching halt. Too many hours had passed. No one had made contact. She could read the truth in their eyes. They honestly believed that Evelyn Mitchell was dead.

"Mom?"

Faith rubbed Jeremy's arm. "What is it? Is Emma up?" The baby had slept too long last night. She was fussy and irritable, and had screamed for nearly a full hour before finally relenting to her afternoon nap.

"She's fine," Jeremy answered. "I was gonna go for a walk. Get out of the house for a minute. Take some fresh air."

"No," she told him. "I don't want you leaving the house."

His expression told her how hard her voice was.

She squeezed his arm. "I want you to stay here, all right?"

"I'm tired of being cooped up inside."

"So am I, but I want you to promise me you won't leave the house." She played at his emotions. "I've already got Grandma to worry about. Don't make me add you to my list."

His reluctance was obvious, but he told her, "All right."

"Just do something with your uncle Zeke. Play cards or something."

"He pouts when he loses."

"So do you." Faith shooed him out of the kitchen. She charted his path through the house and up to his room by the familiar squeaks in the floorboards and on the stairs. She should put Zeke to work on her list of handyman repairs. Of course, that would involve actually talking to him, and Faith was doing her best to avoid her brother. Miraculously, he seemed to be doing the same. He'd been in the garage for the last three hours, working on his laptop.

Faith pushed herself up from the table and started pacing in hopes that she could work out some of her nervous energy. That didn't last long. She leaned over the table and tapped the keyboard on her laptop to wake it up. She moused up to reload Jeremy's Facebook page. The rainbow wheel started to spin. Jeremy was probably playing some game upstairs that was slowing down the wireless network.

The phone rang. Faith jumped. She startled any time there was an unexpected noise. She was as nervous as a cat. The back door slid open. Ginger waited while she took the receiver off the hook. She could tell from his tired expression that he felt this was not only perfunctory, but beneath his talents.

She put the phone to her ear. "Hello?"

"Faith."

It was Victor Martinez. She waved away Ginger. "Hey."

"Hi."

Now that the easy part was out of the way, neither of them seemed capable of talking. She hadn't spoken to Victor in thirteen months, not since she'd sent him a text that he needed to get his stuff out of her house or she was going to leave it on the street.

Victor broke the silence. "Is there any news on your mother?"

"No. Nothing."

"It's been over twenty-four hours, right?"

She didn't trust herself to speak. Victor had a habit of pointing out the obvious, and his love of crime shows meant that he knew as well as Faith that time was against them.

"Is Jeremy all right?"

"Yes. Thank you for bringing him home yesterday. And staying with him." She thought to ask, "You didn't see anything unusual when you were here, right? No one hanging around the house?"

"Of course not. I would've told the police."

"How long were you here before they arrived?"

"Not long. Your brother came about an hour later and I left."

Faith's exhausted brain struggled to do the math. Evelyn's kidnappers hadn't hesitated. They'd driven straight here from her house. They were familiar enough with the space to walk right upstairs to her room and plant the finger under Faith's pillow. Maybe they were watching the house even before that. Maybe they had listened to Faith's phone calls or checked her calendar on her laptop and knew that she would be away. Nothing in the house was password protected because she had always assumed that she was safe here.

Faith had missed something Victor said. "What?"

"I said, your brother's kind of an asshole."

Faith snapped, "It's not exactly an easy time for him, Victor. Our mother is missing. God knows whether she's dead or alive. Zeke dropped everything to be with Jeremy. I'm sorry if you thought he was rude. It's kind of hard to be friendly right now."

"Hold on, all right? I'm sorry. I shouldn't have said that."

Her breathing was revved up again. Faith tried to get her control back. She wanted to yell at someone. That person probably didn't need to be Victor.

"Are you there?" he asked.

Faith couldn't drag this out any longer. "I know that Jeremy showed you Emma's picture."

He cleared his throat.

"What you're thinking about her ..." Faith pressed her fingers to her closed eyelids. "You're right."

He was silent for what felt like an eternity. Finally, he said, "She's beautiful."

Faith dropped her hand. She looked up at the ceiling. Her hormones were so out of whack that the stupidest thing could set her off. She cradled the phone against her shoulder and tried to reload Jeremy's Facebook page again.

"I'd like to meet her when this is all over."

Faith watched the wheel spin on the computer screen as the processor worked. She couldn't think about seeing Victor with Emma. Holding her in his arms. Stroking her hair. Pointing out that looking into her light brown eyes was like looking into a mirror. Faith could only think about right now, and how every second that ticked by made it less likely that Evelyn Mitchell would see her granddaughter's first birthday.

"Your mom's a fighter," Victor said. Then, almost ruefully, "Just like you."

The page finally loaded. GoodKnight92 had posted a comment eight minutes ago.

"I have to go." Faith hung up the phone. Her hand hovered over the laptop. She stared at the words on the screen. They had a familiar ring.

You must be feeling cooped up. Why don't you get out of the house and take some fresh air?

They had contacted Jeremy again, and her son, her little boy, had been ready to walk out the front door and put his life on the line so that he could get his grandmother back.

She raised her voice, calling, "Jeremy?"

Faith waited. There were no footsteps overhead, no squeaks on the stairs or floorboards.

"Jeremy?" she called again, going into the living room. An eternity passed. Faith grabbed the back of the couch so she wouldn't fall down. Her voice trilled in panic. "Jeremy!"

Her heart stopped at the thumping sound from upstairs, heavy footsteps across the floor. But it was Zeke who called from the top of the landing. "Jesus, Faith, what's wrong?"

Faith could barely speak. "Where's Jeremy?"

"I told him he could go for a walk."

Ginger came in from the kitchen, a puzzled look on his face. Before he could say anything, Faith grabbed the gun out of his shoulder holster and bolted from the room. She didn't remember opening the front door or running down the driveway. It wasn't until she was in the middle of the street that Faith stopped. She saw a figure up ahead. He was about to turn the corner onto the next street.

Tall, lanky, baggy jeans and a yellow Georgia Tech sweatshirt.

"Jeremy!" she yelled. A car pulled up to the intersection, stopping a few feet from her son. "Jeremy!" He didn't hear her. He walked toward the car.

Faith ran all out, arms pumping, bare feet pounding the pavement. She gripped the gun so tightly in her hand that it felt like part of her skin.

"Jeremy!" she screamed. He turned around. The car was in front of him. Dark gray. Four doors. New-model Ford Focus with chrome trim. The window rolled down. Jeremy turned back to the car, bent down to look inside. "Stop!" Faith yelled, her throat clenching around the word. "Get away from the car! Get away from the car!"

The driver was leaning toward Jeremy. Faith saw a teenage girl behind the wheel, mouth agape, obviously terrified by the armed madwoman running down the street. The car screeched off as Faith reached her son. She bumped into him, almost pushing him down.

"Why?" she asked, gripping his arm so tight that her fingers hurt.

He pulled away, rubbing his arm. "Jesus, Mom, what is wrong with you? She was lost. She needed directions."

Faith was dizzy from fear and adrenaline. She bent over and put her hand on her knee. The gun was at her side. So was Ginger.

He snatched the weapon back. "Agent Mitchell, that was not cool."

His words filled her with anger. "Not cool?" She thumped her open palm against his chest. "Not cool?"

"Agent." His tone of voice implied she was acting hysterical, which only served to amp up her fury another notch.

"How about letting my son walk out the door when you were assigned to watch him? Was that not cool, too?" She pushed him again. "How about you and your partner standing around holding your dicks while my boy is gone?" Another push. "Is that cool?"

Ginger held up his hands in surrender.

"Faith," Zeke said. She hadn't noticed her brother standing there, maybe because for once he wasn't making things worse. "Let's just go back to the house."

She held out her hand to Jeremy, palm up. "iPhone."

He looked appalled. "What?"

"Now," she ordered.

"That's got all my games on it."

"I don't care."

"What am I supposed to do?"

"Read a book!" she screamed, her voice screeching. "Just stay offline. Do you hear me? No Internet!"

"Jesus." He glanced around for support, but Faith didn't care if God Himself came down and told her to give the kid a break.

She said, "I'll tie you to my waist with a rope if I have to."

He knew she wasn't bluffing; she'd done it before. "This isn't fair." He slapped the phone in her hand. She would've thrown it to the ground and crushed it with her foot if the damn thing hadn't cost so much.

"No Internet," Faith repeated. "No phone calls. No communication of any kind, and you stay in the fucking house. Do you hear me?" He walked toward the house, giving her his back. Faith wasn't going to let him off that easy. "Do you hear me?"

"I heard you!" he yelled. "God!"

Ginger shoved his gun back into the holster, adjusting the straps like a haughty cheerleader. He followed Jeremy down the street. Faith limped along after them. Her feet were bruised from the rocky asphalt. Zeke fell in beside her. His shoulder brushed against hers. Faith braced herself for some kind of tirade, but he was mercifully silent as they walked up the driveway and entered the house.

Faith threw Jeremy's iPhone onto the kitchen table. No wonder he wanted to leave. The space was beginning to feel like a prison. She leaned heavily against the chair. What had she been thinking? How could any of them be safe here? Evelyn's kidnappers knew the layout of the house. They had obviously targeted Jeremy. Anyone could've been in that car. They could've rolled down the window, pointed a gun at Jeremy's head, and pulled the trigger. He could've bled out in the middle of the street and Faith wouldn't have known until his stupid Facebook page loaded that something was wrong.

"Faith?" Zeke was standing in the middle of the kitchen. His tone indicated this wasn't the first time he'd said her name. "What's wrong with you?"

Faith crossed her arms low on her stomach. "Where have you been staying? You weren't sleeping at Mom's. I would've seen your stuff."

"Dobbins." She should've known. Zeke had always loved the soulless anonymity of base housing, even if Dobbins Air Reserve was an hour drive from the VA hospital where he was doing his inservice.

"I need you to do me a favor."

He was instantly skeptical. "What?"

"I want you to take Jeremy and Emma back to the base with you. Today. Right now." The Atlanta police couldn't protect her family, but the United States Air Force could. "I don't know how long it'll be for. I just need you to keep them on the base. Don't let them off until I tell you."

"Why?"

"Because I need to know that they're safe."

"Safe from what? What are you planning?"

Faith checked the backyard to make sure the detectives weren't listening. Ginger stared at her, his jaw rigid. She turned her back to him. "I need you to trust me."

Zeke snorted a laugh. "Why would I start doing that?"

"Because I know what I'm doing, Zeke. I'm a police officer. I was trained to do this kind of thing."

"What kind of thing? Run into the street barefooted like you're escaping from the loony bin?"

"I'm going to get Mom back, Zeke. I don't care if it kills me. I'm going to get her back."

"You and what army?" he scoffed. "You gonna call in Aunt Mandy and go smear lipstick all over them?"

She punched him in the face. He looked more shocked than hurt. Her knuckle felt like it might be broken. Still, she got some satisfaction when she saw a thin line of blood drip onto his upper lip.

“Christ,” he muttered. “What the hell was that for?”

“You’ll need to take my car. You can’t fit a car seat in the Corvette. I can give you some money for gas and groceries and I—”

“Wait.” His voice was muffled by his hand as he felt the bridge of his nose for damage. He looked at her—really looked at her—for the first time since she’d walked through her own front door. Faith had hit her brother before. She’d burned him with a match. She’d beaten him with a clothes hanger. To her recollection, this was the first time any violence between them actually seemed to work.

“All right.” He used the toaster to check his reflection. His nose wasn’t broken, but a deep, purple bruise was working its way underneath his eye. “But I’m not taking your Mini. I’m going to look retarded enough as it is.”

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Will had never been quick to anger, but once he got there, he held on to it like a miser with a pot of gold. He didn't throw things or use his fists. He didn't rage or even raise his voice. Actually, the opposite happened. He went quiet—completely silent. It was as if his vocal cords were paralyzed. He kept it all on the inside because, in his vast experience with angry people, Will knew that letting it out meant that someone could end up very badly hurt.

Not that this particular expression of anger didn't have its drawbacks. His stubborn silence had gotten him suspended from school on more than one occasion. Years ago, Amanda had transferred him to the nether regions of the north Georgia mountains for his refusal to respond to her questions. Once, he'd stopped speaking to Angie for three whole days for fear of saying things to her that could never be taken back. They'd lived together, slept together, dined together, done everything together, and he hadn't uttered one word to her for a full seventy-two hours. If there had been a category in the Special Olympics for functionally illiterate mutes, Will would've had no problem cinching the gold.

This was all to say that not speaking to Amanda during the five-hour drive down to Coastal State Prison was nothing in the scheme of things. The worrying part was that the intensity of Will's anger would not dissipate. He had never hated another human being as much as he did when Amanda told him that, by the way, Sara had almost been murdered. And that hatred would not go away. He kept waiting to feel that click of it letting up, the pot going from a boil to a simmer, but it wouldn't come. Even now as Amanda paced back and forth in front of him, going from one end of the empty visitors' waiting room to the other like a duck in a shooting gallery, he felt the rage burning inside him.

The worst part was that he wanted to speak. He yearned to speak. He wanted to lay it all out for her and watch her face crumble as she realized that Will truly and irrevocably despised her for what she had done to him. He had never been a petty man, but he really, really wanted to hurt her.

Amanda stopped pacing. She put her hands on her hips. "I don't know what you've been told, but sulking is not an attractive trait in a man."

Will stared at the floor. Grooves had been worn into the linoleum by the women and children who had wiled away their weekends waiting to visit the men inside the cells.

She said, "As a rule, I only let someone call me that word once. I think you picked an appropriate time."

So, he hadn't been completely mute. When Amanda had told him about Sara, he'd called her the word that rhymes with her name. And not in Spanish.

"What do you want, Will, an apology?" She huffed a laugh. "All right, I'm sorry. I apologize for not letting you get distracted so that you could do your job. I apologize for making sure your head didn't get blown off. I apologize—"

His mouth moved of its own accord. "Could you just shut up?"

"What was that?"

He didn't repeat himself. He didn't care whether or not she heard him, or if his job was in jeopardy, or if she was going to unleash a new kind of hell on him for standing up to her. Will could not remember the last time he had experienced the kind of agony he'd suffered this afternoon. They'd sat outside that damn warehouse for a full hour before the Doraville police released them. Will understood intellectually why the detectives wanted to talk to them. There were two dead bodies and bullet holes everywhere. There was a stockpile of illegal machine guns on a shelf in the back. There was a large safe in Julia Ling's office with the door swinging open and hundred-dollar bills scattered on the floor. You didn't just roll up on a scene like that and release the only two witnesses. There were forms to be filled out, questions to be answered. Will had to give a statement. He'd had to wait while Amanda gave hers. It seemed like she had taken her time. He'd sat in the car, watching her talk to the detectives, feeling like an earthquake was going off in his chest.

His cell phone had been in and out of his hand a dozen times. Should he call Sara? Should he leave her alone? Did she need him? Wouldn't she call him if she did? He had to see her. If he saw her, he would know how to react, to do what she needed. He would wrap his arms around her. He would kiss her cheek, her neck, her mouth. He would make everything better.

Or, he would just stand there in the hallway like a jackass, molesting her hand.

Amanda snapped her fingers for his attention. Will didn't look up, but she talked anyway. "Your emergency contact is Angela Polaski. Or I should say Angie Trent, I suppose, since she's your wife." She paused for effect. "She is still your wife?"

He shook his head. He had never wanted to punch a woman so badly in his life.

"What did you expect me to do, Will?"

He kept shaking his head.

"So, I tell you that your—I don't know, what is Dr. Linton to you these days? Mistress? Girlfriend? Pal?—is in trouble, and then what? We drop everything so you can go make googly eyes at her?"

Will stood up. He wasn't going to do this. He would hitchhike back to Atlanta if he had to.

She sighed like the world was against her. "The warden will be here any minute. I need you to pull up your big-girl pants so I can prep you for your conversation with Roger Ling."

Will looked at her for the first time since they'd left the hospital. "Me?"

"He asked for you specifically."

This was some kind of trick, but he couldn't see where it was going. "How does he even know my name?"

"I imagine his sister filled him in."

As far as Will knew, Julia Ling was still on the run. "She called him at the prison?"

She crossed her arms over her chest. "Roger Ling is in solitary confinement for hiding a razor blade in his rectum. He doesn't get phone calls. He doesn't get visitors."

Isolation had never deterred the prison message system. There were so many illegal cell phones inside the walls that last year during a statewide prisoner strike, The New York Times had been flooded with calls from inmates making their demands.

Still, Will said, "Roger Ling asked for me specifically?"

"Yes, Will. The request came through his lawyer. He asked for you specifically." She allowed, "Of course, they called me first. No one knows who the hell you are. Except for Roger, apparently."

Will sat back down in the chair. He felt his jaw ratcheting tight. The silence wanted to come back. He could feel it like a shadow looming behind him.

She asked, "Who do you think the cop is who confronted Dr. Linton in the hospital?"

He shook his head. He didn't want to think about Sara anymore. He felt sick every time he thought about what she'd been through today. Alone.

Amanda repeated herself. "Who do you think the cop is?" Again, she snapped her fingers to get his attention.

He looked up. He wanted to break her hand.

"This isn't about me. This is about Faith and getting back her mother. Now, who do you think the cop is?"

He cleared the glass out of his throat. "How do you know all of these people?"

"What people?"

"Hector Ortiz. Roger Ling. Julia Ling. Perry the bodyguard who drives a Mercedes. Why are you on a first-name basis with all these people?"

She was silent, obviously debating about whether or not to answer. Finally, she relented. "You know I came up in the job with Evelyn. We were cadets together. We were partners before they got tired of us busting all their cases." She shook her head at the memory. "These are the bad guys who were on the other side. Drugs. Rape. Murder. Assault. Hostage negotiation. RICO cases. Money laundering. They've been around as long as we have." She added ruefully, "Which is a very, very long time."

"You've worked cases against them?"

There were fifty chairs in the room, but she sat down right beside him. "Ignatio Ortiz and Roger Ling didn't just vault to the top. There are bodies they climbed over. Lots and lots of dead bodies. And the sad part is that they were human beings once. They were nice, normal people who went to church every Sunday and clocked into their jobs during the week." Amanda shook her head again, and Will could tell that her words invoked memories she'd rather forget.

Still, she told him, "You know the word underbelly refers to the part of society that's never seen, but it also means the vulnerable part. The weak part. That's what monsters like Roger Ling and Ignatio Ortiz prey on. Addiction. Greed. Poverty. Desperation. Once these guys figured out how to exploit these people, they never looked back. They cut their teeth doing carhops for dealers when they were twelve. They murdered before they were old enough to legally buy a drink in a bar. They've slit throats and beaten old women to death and done whatever it takes to get to the top and hold on to that power. So, when you ask me why I'm on a first-name basis with them, it's because I know them. I know who they are. I have stared into the darkness of their souls. But I guarantee you it doesn't go the other way. They don't have a damn idea who I am, and I've spent my career keeping it that way."

Will was finished treading carefully. "They know Evelyn."

"Yes," Amanda allowed. "I think they do."

He sat back in his chair. It was a stunning admission. He didn't know how to respond. Unfortunately—or maybe fortunately—she didn't give him the chance.

She clasped her hands together. Sharing time was over. "Let's talk about this cop who confronted Sara in the hospital."

Will was still trying to wrap his brain around what had just happened. For just a moment, he'd forgotten all about Sara.

"Chuck Finn," she prompted.

Will leaned his head against the wall. The concrete block felt cold against his scalp. "He used to be a cop. You don't lose that no matter how much heroin you shoot up. He's tall. He's probably lost a lot of weight from his habit. Sara wouldn't have recognized him from his mugshot. I'm assuming he's a smoker. Most junkies are."

"So, at the hospital: you think Chuck Finn discerned from Sara that Marcellus Estevez might live, so he sent Franklin Heeney in to kill him."

"Don't you?"

Amanda wasn't quick with her response. He could tell what she'd said about Evelyn Mitchell still weighed heavily on her. "I don't know what I think anymore, Will. And that's the God's honest truth."

She sounded tired. Her shoulders were slumped. There was a sort of detachment about her. He went back over their conversation, wondering what had finally made her admit that Evelyn Mitchell wasn't squeaky clean. He had never in his life seen Amanda give up on anything. Part of him felt sorry for her, and another part of him realized that he might not ever have this chance again.

He struck while her defenses were down. "Why didn't they shoot you outside the warehouse?"

"I'm a deputy director with the GBI. That's a lot of heat."

"They've already kidnapped a decorated police officer. They shot at you inside the warehouse. They killed Castillo. Why didn't they kill you?"

"I don't know, Will." She rubbed her eyes with her fingers. "I think we must be caught in the middle of some kind of war."

Will stared at the Meth Project poster on the wall. A toothless woman with scabby skin stared back. He wondered if that was what the junkie had looked like, the woman who had told Sara that there was a guy laid out by the Dumpster. How long had it taken before Marcellus Estevez was dead and Franklin Heeney was struggling with Sara on the floor, threatening to cut open her face with a scalpel?

Minutes. Maybe ten at the most.

Will couldn't help it. He put his elbows on his knees and dropped his head in his hands. "You should've told me." He could hear a distant voice in his head screaming at him to shut up. But he couldn't. "You had no right to keep that from me."

Amanda gave a heavy sigh. "Maybe I should have. Or maybe I was right to hold it back. If it's the first one, I'm sorry. If it's the second, then you can be mad at me later. I need you to talk this through with me. I need to figure out what is going on. If not for my sake, then for Faith's."

Her voice sounded as desperate as he felt. The day had utterly defeated her.

Will couldn't help it. As much as he hated her right now, he couldn't be cruel.

And somewhere in all of this, the click happened. He hadn't noticed it, but sometime during the last ten minutes, his anger had started to seep out, so that now when he thought about it, when he considered what Amanda had done about Sara, Will felt a festering anger rather than a burning hate.

He took a deep breath and slowly let it go as he sat back up. "Okay. We have to assume that all the dead guys worked in Julia Ling's shop—some of them on the books, some of them off, all of them doing both sides of her business."

"You think Ling-Ling sent Ricardo Ortiz to Sweden to pick up some heroin?"

"No, I think Ricardo got ahead of himself. I think he got all the young guys worked up, thinking they could take over Ling-Ling's business. He took it on himself to go to Sweden." Will looked at his watch. It was almost seven o'clock. "He was tortured, probably by Benny Choo."

"Then why didn't they just cut the drugs out of him and be done with it?"

"Because he told them that he knew where they could get more money."

"Evelyn."

"It's what I said earlier." He turned toward her. "Chuck Finn mentioned in one of his Healing Winds group sessions with Hironobu Kwon that his old boss was sitting on a pile of money. Cut to yesterday morning. Ricardo has a belly full of heroin and Benny Choo beating his ass. His friend Hironobu Kwon says he knows where they can get some cash to buy themselves out of the situation." Will shrugged. "They go to Evelyn's. Benny Choo tags along to keep them from doing a runner. Only, they can't find the money, and Evelyn won't give it up to them."

"Perhaps they weren't expecting to find Hector Ortiz there. Ricardo would recognize his father's cousin."

Will wanted to ask what Hector Ortiz was doing at Evelyn's in the first place, but he didn't want to make Amanda lie to him right now. "Ricardo Ortiz would know that killing Hector would bring some heat. He's already turned his back on his own father by smuggling in the heroin. Ling-Ling is out for his blood because she's found out that Ricardo turned on her, too. Ricardo's gang can't find the money in Evelyn's house. She's not talking. Ricardo has to see at this point that his life isn't worth much. He's packed full of balloons he can't pass. He's been beaten nearly to death. Benny Choo's got a gun to his head." Will ran through Faith's statement about her confrontation with Choo and Ortiz. "Ricardo's last word was 'Almeja.' That's what Julia Ling called Evelyn, right? How would Ricardo know that?"

"I suppose if your theory holds that this all came from Chuck Finn, then that's where he got it."

"Why would Evelyn's name be the last word on Ricardo's lips?"

"It's her street name. I'd be surprised if Ricardo knew her real one." She explained, "It's not just the bangers who give themselves nicknames. You work narcotics long enough, they come up with something street to call you by. Sometimes, that spills over into the squad. 'Hip' and 'Hop' were obviously shortened from their last names. Boyd Spivey was Sledge, as in hammer. Chuck Finn was called Fish, I suppose because they couldn't remember the name for a lemming." She smiled; another private joke. "Roger Ling took credit for coming up with 'Almeja,' which seemed curious at the time until we realized he doesn't speak a bit of his parents' language. Mandarin, in case you're curious."

"What about you?"

"I don't work narcotics."

"But they know you."

"Wag," she told him. "Short for Wagner."

Will didn't believe her. "Why did Roger Ling ask to speak with me?"

She gave a startled laugh. "You can't really think that you're the only man in this prison right now who despises me."

There was a loud buzz and a clanging of gates opening and closing. Two guards came into the waiting room, followed by a younger man with Harry Potter spectacles and a floppy haircut to match. He was definitely not one of Amanda's old gals. There were velvet patches on the elbows of his corduroy jacket. His tie was made of a knit cotton. His shirt had a stain over the pocket. He smelled of pancakes.

"Jimmy Kagan," he said, shaking their hands. "I'm not sure what strings you pulled, Deputy Director, but this is the first time in my six years as warden here that I've been called back to work this late at night."

Amanda had easily transitioned back to her old self. It was like seeing an actor slip into character. "I appreciate your cooperation, Warden Kagan. We all have to do our part."

"I didn't have much of a choice," Kagan admitted, indicating the guards should open the door into the main prison. He led them down a long hallway at a fast clip. "I'm not going to disrupt my entire system no matter who you get on the phone. Agent Trent, you'll have to go back into the cells. Ling has been in solitary for the last week. You can talk to him through the slot in the door. I'm sure you know the type of person you're dealing with, but I'll tell you straight up I wouldn't be in the same room with Roger Ling if you held a gun to my head. I'm actually terrified that's going to happen to me one day."

Amanda raised an eyebrow at Will. "You make it sound as if the primates are running the zoo."

Kagan gave her a look that said he thought she was either deluded or insane. He told Will, "At any given time in the U.S. penal system, at least half the inmate population have been diagnosed with some kind of mental illness."

Will nodded. He'd heard the statistic before. All the prisons in the country combined bought more Prozac than any other single institution.

Kagan said, "Some of them are worse than others. Ling is worse than the worst. He should be in a mental ward. Locked down. Throw away the key."

Another gate opened and closed.

Kagan listed the rules. "Don't get close to the door. Don't think you're safe just because you're an arm's length away. This man is very resourceful, and he has a lot of time on his hands. The razor blade we found up his ass was wrapped in a hand-tied pouch Ling made from strings he pulled out of his bedsheets. It took him two months. He braided a Yellow Rebel star into it as some kind of joke. Must've dyed it with urine."

Kagan stopped at yet another door and waited for it to open. "I have no idea how he got the razor blade. He's in his cell twenty-three hours a day. His yard time is isolated—he's the only one in the cage. He doesn't have contact visits, and the guards are all terrified of him." The door opened and he continued walking. "If it was up to me, I'd leave him to rot in the hole. But it's not up to me. He'll be confined another week unless he pulls something awful. And believe me, he is capable of the awful."

The warden stopped at a set of metal doors. The first one clanged open and they went inside. "The last time we locked him in the hole, the guard who sent him there was attacked the next day. We never found the responsible party, but the man lost one of his eyes. It was plucked out by hand."

The door behind them shut and the one in front of them banged open.

Kagan said, "We'll have the cameras on you, Mr. Trent, but I have to warn you that our response time clocks in at sixty-one seconds, just over a minute. We can't get it any tighter than that. I have a full raid team suited up and on standby if anything happens." He patted Will on the back. "Good luck."

There was a guard waiting to take Will through. The man looked filled with the kind of dread you'd see on a death row inmate's face. It was like staring into a mirror.

Will turned to Amanda. He had broken his silence in the waiting room so that she could coach him on what to say to Roger Ling, but he just now realized she hadn't offered any advice. "You want to help me here?"

She said, "Quid pro quo, Clarice. Don't come back without some useful information."

Will remembered again that he hated her.

The guard motioned him through. The door closed behind them. The man said, "Keep close to the walls. If you see something coming at you, cover your eyes and close your mouth. It's probably shit."

Will tried to walk as if his testicles hadn't receded into his body. The lights were out in the cells, but the hall was well lit. The guard kept to the wall, away from the prisoners opposite. Will followed suit. He could feel a new set of eyes tracking him as he passed each cell. There was a skittering noise behind him as kites, tiny pieces of paper with strings attached to them, slid across the concrete floor in his wake. In his mind, Will listed out all the possible contraband in the cells. Shivs made from toothbrushes and combs. Blades fashioned from pieces of metal lifted out of the kitchen. Feces and urine mixed in a cup to create gas bombs. Threads from a sheet braided into a whip with razor blades tied at the ends.

Another set of double gates. The first one opened. They walked through. The first one closed. Seconds ticked by. The second set groaned open.

They came to a solid door with a piece of glass at eye level. The guard took out a heavy ring of keys and found the right one. He stuck it into a lock on the wall. There was a ka-thunk as a bolt opened. He turned around and looked at the camera overhead. They both waited until there was a responding click from the guard watching them in a remote viewing room. The door slid open.

Solitary confinement. The hole.

The hallway was about thirty feet deep and ten feet wide. Eight metal doors were on one side. A concrete block wall was on the other. The cells faced inside the prison, not out. There would be no windows. No fresh air. No sunlight. No hope.

As Kagan had pointed out, these men had nothing but time.

Unlike the rest of the prison, all of the overhead lights were on in solitary. The glow of fluorescent bulbs gave Will an instant headache. The hallway was warm and muggy. There was something like pressure in the air, a weighted, heavy feeling. He had the sensation of being in the middle of a field waiting for a tornado to hit.

"He's in the last one," the guard said. He kept to the wall again, his shoulder rubbing against the concrete block. Will could see the paint had been rubbed off from years of guards sliding their shoulders across. The doors opposite were bolted up tight. Each had a viewing window at the top, narrow, eye level, like at a speakeasy. There was a slit at the bottom for passing meals and tightening handcuffs. All of the doors and panels were secured with heavy bolts and rivets.

The guard stopped at the last door. He put his hand to Will's chest and made sure his back was flat against the wall. "I don't need to tell you to stay there, right, big guy?"

Will shook his head.

The man seemed to gather his courage before walking to the cell door. He wrapped his hand around the slide bolt that kept the viewing panel covered. "Mr. Ling, if I pull back this slat, are you going to give me any trouble?"

There was the muffled sound of laughter behind the door. Roger Ling had the same heavy southern accent as his sister. "I think you're safe for now, Enrique."

The guard was sweating. He gripped the bolt and pulled back, stepping out of the way so quickly that his shoes squeaked across the floor.

Will felt a bead of sweat roll down his neck. Roger Ling was obviously standing with his back pressed against the door. Will could see the side of his neck, the bottom of his ear, a hint of the orange prison garb that covered his shoulder. The lights were on inside, brighter than they were in the hallway. Will saw the rear of the cell, the edge of a mattress on the floor. The space was smaller than a normal cell, less than eight feet deep, probably four feet wide. There would be a toilet but nothing else. No chair. No table. Nothing to make you feel like a human being. The usual smells of a prison—sweat, urine, feces—were more pungent here. Will realized there was no screaming. Normally, a prison was as noisy as an elementary school, especially at night. The kites had done their job. The whole place had ground to a stop because Roger Ling had a visitor.

Will waited. He could hear his heart pumping, the sound of breath going in and out of his lungs.

Ling asked, "How's Arnoldo doing?"

Julia Ling's Chihuahua. Will cleared his throat. "He's fine."

"Is she letting him get fat? I told her not to let him get fat."

"He seems ..." Will struggled for an answer. "She's not letting him starve."

"Naldo's a cool little dude," Ling said. "I always say a Chihuahua is only as high strung as his owner. You agree with that?"

Will hadn't given it much thought, but he said, "I guess that makes sense. Mine's pretty laid back."

"What's her name again?"

There was a point to this after all. Ling was confirming that he was talking to the right man. "Betty."

He had passed the test. "Good to meet you in person, Mr. Trent." Ling shifted, and Will saw most of his neck. A tattoo of a dragon went up his vertebrae. The wings were spread across his shaved head. The eyes were bright yellow.

Ling said, "My sister's pretty freaked out."

"I can imagine."

"Those little shits tried to kill her." His voice was hard, exactly the kind of tone you'd expect from a man who'd mutilated and killed two women. "They wouldn't be actin' so tough if I wasn't locked up in here. I'd be bringin' them some pains in their brains. You feel me?"

Will looked at the guard. The man was tensed like a bulldog ready to fight. Or flee, which seemed the smarter option. Will thought about the raid team waiting, and wondered what Roger Ling could do in sixty-one seconds. A lot, probably.

Ling said, "You know why I asked to speak with you?"

Will was honest. "I have no idea."

" 'Cause I don't trust nothin' that bitch has to say."

Obviously, he meant Amanda. "That's probably smart."

He laughed. Will listened to the sound echoing through the cell. There was no joy in the noise. It was chilling, almost maniacal. Will wondered if Ling's victims had heard this laughter while they were being strangled to death with Arnoldo's leash.

Ling said, "We gotta end this. Too much blood on the street is bad for business."

"Tell me how to make that happen."

"I got word from Ignatio. He understands Yellow isn't behind this. He wants peace."

Will wasn't exactly a gang expert, but he doubted that the leader of Los Texicanos would turn the other cheek over his son being beaten and killed. He told Ling as much. "I would assume Mr. Ortiz wants vengeance."

"Nah, man. No vengeance. Ricardo dug his own grave. Ignatio knows that. Make sure Faith knows that, too. She did what she had to do. Family is family, am I right?"

Will didn't like this man knowing Faith's name, and he sure as hell didn't trust his assurances. Still, he said, "I'll tell her."

Ling echoed his sister's words. "These young guys are crazy, man. Got no sense of the value of life. You bust your ass to make the world good for them. You give them brand new cars and send them to private schools, and the minute they're on their own, pow, they turn around and pop you one."

Will thought "pow" was a bit of an understatement, but he kept that thought to himself.

"Ricardo was at Westminster," Ling said. "You know that?"

Will was familiar with the private school, which cost upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars a year. He also knew from Hironobu Kwon's file that he'd attended Westminster on a math scholarship. So, another connection.

Ling said, "Ignatio thought he could buy his son a different life, but them spoiled rich kids got him hooked on Oxy."

"Was Ricardo in rehab?"

"Shit, little dude lived in rehab." He shifted again. Will could hear the material of his stiff orange shirt rub against the metal door. "You got kids?"

"No."

"Not that you know of, right?" He laughed as if this was funny. "I got three. Two ex-wives always bitchin' at me for money. I give it to 'em, though. They keep my boys in line, don't let my daughter dress like no whore. Keep their noses clean." His shoulder raised in a shrug. "What can you do, though? It's in the blood sometimes. No matter how many times you show them the right way, they get to a certain age and they get ideas into their heads. They think maybe they don't have to work their way up. They see what other people got and think they can just walk in and take it."

Ling seemed to know a lot about Ignacio Ortiz's parenting woes. Odd, especially considering the two were locked down in separate prisons that were almost an entire state away from each other. Boyd Spivey had been wrong. Yellow wasn't making a play for Brown. Yellow was working for Brown.

Will said, "You have a business relationship with Mr. Ortiz."

"That's a fair statement."

"Ignacio asked Julia to give his son a job on the legit side of the business."

"It's good for a young man to have a trade. And Ricardo took to it. He had an eye for the work. Most of 'em, they're just putting together boxes, slapping on doors. Ricky was different. He was smart. Knew how to get the right people on the job. Could've run his own shop one day."

Will started to understand. "Ricardo got a crew together—Hironobu Kwon and the others worked at your sister's shop. Maybe they saw the money coming in from the less legitimate side of the business and thought that they deserved a bigger piece. Ortiz would never approve of some upstart gang taking a piece of the Los Texicanos pie, even if it was his own son."

"Starting a business is harder than it looks, especially with a franchise. You gotta pay the fees."

"You heard about Ricardo's trip to Sweden."

"Hell, everybody heard." He chuckled as if it was funny. "Problem with being that age is you don't know when to keep your mouth shut. Young, dumb, and full of come."

"Your people talked to Ricardo about his trip." Will didn't say that they were probably torturing the young man during the discussion. "Ricardo mentioned that there might be a way to buy himself out of his problem." Will imagined Ricardo would've been willing to trade his own mother by the time they were finished torturing him. "He told you that he could get his hands on some money. A lot of money. Almost a million dollars. Cash."

"That sounds like a deal no businessman can say no to."

Everything was lining up. Ricardo had taken his crew to Evelyn's, where they met with a hell of a lot more resistance than they'd anticipated. They had killed Hector. Even if Amanda was right and Hector Ortiz was just a car salesman, there was no getting around that he was Ignacio Ortiz's cousin. "Ricardo took them to Evelyn's house to get the money. Only, they didn't count on her fighting back. They took too many casualties. They had to regroup. And then Faith rolled up."

Ling asked, "You heard this story before?"

Will kept talking. "They took Evelyn somewhere else to question her."

"Sounds like a plan, man."

"Only, she hasn't given up the money. If she had, I wouldn't be here."

He laughed. "I don't know about that, brother. You seem to be missing something in your story."

"What do you mean?"

"Think about it." Will was still at a loss.

"The only way you can kill a snake is to cut off its head."

"Okay." He still wasn't following.

"Far as I can tell, that ol' snake's still out there twitchin'."

"You mean Evelyn?"

"Shit, you think that old bitch could get a bunch of kids to follow her? Where couldn't even keep her own house in order." He tsked his tongue the same way his sister had. "Nah, this is man's work, bro. How do you think they got one over on my sister? Bitches don't got the balls for this kind of work."

Will wasn't going to argue the point. Gangs were the ultimate boys' club—more patriarchal than the Catholic Church. Julia Ling had only been in charge at her brother's pleasure. Generals don't go into battle. They send their pawns to the front lines. Hironobu Kwon was shot within minutes of breaching the house. Ricardo Ortiz had been left behind. Benny Choo had held a gun to his head. The man had been beaten. He was abandoned. He was expendable.

Someone else had tipped them off about Evelyn. Someone else was leading the gang.

Will said, "Chuck Finn."

Ling laughed as if the name surprised him. "Chuckleberry Finn. I thought that brother would be dead by now. Fish sleeping with the fishes."

"Is he behind this?"

Roger didn't answer. "And old Sledge taken down, too. From what I hear, they did the brother a favor. Go out like a man instead of waiting to be put down like a dog. Can't say some good ain't come outta this."

"Who's behind—"

"Yo, this is over." Roger Ling banged on the cell door. "Enrique, close it up."

The guard started to slide back the panel. Will reached out to stop him. Like a snake striking, Ling's hand snared out, clamping around Will's wrist. He pulled so hard that Will's shoulder slammed into the door. The side of his face was pressed against the cold metal surface. He felt hot breath on his ear. "You know why you're here, bro?"

Will pulled back as hard as he could. He pushed with his leg, tried to brace his foot against the bottom of the door.

Ling's grip was tight, but his voice implied effortlessness. "Tell Mandy that Evelyn's gone." His voice got lower. "Tap-tap. Two in the head. Ding-dong, Almeja is dead."

Ling released him. Will fell backward, his shoulders banging into the concrete wall. His heart was going like a metronome. He looked back at the cell door. There was a squeal of metal sliding across metal. The viewing panel closed, but not before Will saw Roger Ling's eyes. They were flat black, soulless. But there was something else there. A flash of triumph mixed in with bloodlust.

"When?" Will yelled. "When did it happen?"

Ling's voice was muffled behind the door. "Tell Mandy to wear something pretty to the funeral. I always did like her in black."

Will brushed himself off. As he walked up the corridor, he wondered which was worse: feeling Roger Ling's hot breath on his neck or having to tell Amanda and Faith that Evelyn Mitchell was dead.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Faith grabbed a grocery buggy from the line outside the store. She found an old list in her purse and clutched it in her hand as she walked into the building, pretending like this was just another day at the market. The Atlanta police had taken her Glock to process for ballistics, but they didn't know about Zeke's Walther P99 that he kept loaded in his glove compartment. The weight dragged on her purse strap as she hefted it over her shoulder. The Germanmade weapon was well suited for her brother, who'd never seen combat. It was bulky and expensive, the sort of thing you'd carry for show. It could also drop a man at one hundred yards, and, at the end of the day, that was all Faith needed it for.

She started out in the produce section, taking more time than usual to test the freshness of the oranges piled on display. She dropped a few into a plastic bag, then moved toward the bakery.

She should've left the house hours ago, but she wanted to wait until she got the call from Zeke that Jeremy and Emma were safely ensconced in the visiting officers' quarters at Dobbins Air Reserve Base. Just getting them all loaded into Jeremy's Impala had taken forever. Zeke had yelled at the car seat. Jeremy was still pouting about his confiscated iPhone. Emma hadn't cried, because her big brother was there to soothe her, but Faith had bawled like a baby the minute their car had disappeared at the end of the street.

Faith had assumed that the men who took her mother were as skilled as they were brazen. Tactically, they had always had the advantage, whether it was taking Evelyn or breaking into Faith's house. But with two cops sitting in her kitchen and her six-foot-four brother stomping around like a bully spoiling for a fight, there was no way they would try the house again.

They had gone for Jeremy, the weakest link save for Emma. Faith felt her breath catch as she thought about her children. She had been so worried about her mother that she'd let the rest of her family slip. That wasn't going to happen again. She was going to keep all of them safe or die trying.

Faith felt a presence over her shoulder. Someone was watching her. She'd felt eyes on her from the moment she left the house. Casually, Faith turned around. She saw a kid in a Frito-Lay uniform stacking bags onto the shelves. He smiled at her. Faith smiled back, then pushed her cart down the aisle.

When Faith was a little girl, the Charles Chip man would come every Monday to fill their brown metal tins with potato chips. Tuesdays and Thursdays, the Mathis Dairy truck idled in front of their house while Petro, the driver, put fresh milk in the metal rack by the door in the carport. A half-gallon was ninety-two cents. Orange juice was fifty-two cents. Buttermilk, her father's favorite, was forty-seven cents. If Faith was good, her mother would let her count out the change to pay Petro. Sometimes, Evelyn would get chocolate milk, fifty-six cents, for special occasions. Birthdays. Good report cards. Winning games. Dance recitals.

Cosmetics. Vitamins. Shampoo. Greeting cards. Books. Soap. Faith kept piling things into her buggy, willing whoever was there to make contact. She slowed her pace. The cart was nearly full. She checked Jeremy's iPhone. There were no new messages on his Facebook wall, no emails from GoodKnight92. Faith backtracked through the store, returning the shampoo and the vitamins, perusing the magazines again. She looked at her watch. She'd been here almost an hour and no one had approached her. Ginger would probably start wondering what was taking her so long. The young detective hadn't seemed fazed when she'd told him that she was going to the grocery store by herself. He was still licking his wounds over Faith taking his gun. She wasn't sure how much farther she could push him without getting a hard shove back.

She angled her buggy around an old man who had stopped in the middle of the cereal aisle. Faith knew that they wanted her in the parking lot. They wanted her alone. She should just give in and get it over with. She put her hand on her purse, ready to take it out of the buggy. Logic intervened. They couldn't abduct her in the middle of the grocery store. They might try, but Faith wouldn't go anywhere. They would either have to bargain with her or shoot her. She wasn't leaving this store without a deal that would get her mother back.

Faith stopped outside the restroom and left her buggy by the door. This was her third trip to the toilet since she'd gotten to the grocery store. She wasn't just trying to draw them out. One of the many benefits of her diabetes acting up was that her bladder felt constantly full. She pushed open the ladies' room door and held her breath at the stench. Grime covered the stainless steel walls and tile floor. The air felt greasy. Given a choice, she would've waited until she got home, but Faith didn't have that luxury.

She checked all four stalls, then went into the handicap space because it was still the least filthy. Her thighs ached as she hovered over the seat. It was a balancing act. She had to keep her purse tucked to her stomach because there was nowhere to hang it and she was afraid the fake leather would become glued to the floor.

The door opened. Faith looked under the stall. She saw a pair of women's shoes. Short heels. Fat ankles stuffed into brown support hose. The faucet turned on. The hand towel dispenser cranked. The faucet turned off. The door opened again, then slowly closed.

Faith closed her eyes and mumbled a prayer of relief. She finished going to the bathroom, flushed the toilet, then hiked her purse back onto her shoulder. The stall door didn't exactly lock. The thumb latch was missing. She had to stick her pinky into the square opening and twist the metal spindle to get the door open.

"Hola."

Instantly, Faith catalogued everything she could about the man standing in front of her. Medium build, a few inches taller than Faith, around one hundred eighty pounds. Brown skin. Dark hair. Blue eyes. Band-Aid around his left index finger. Tattoo of a snake on the right side of his neck. Faded blue jeans with holes at the knees. Black warm-up jacket with a bulge at the front that could only be a gun. The brim of his black baseball cap was pulled low. She could still see his face. The smattering of facial hair. The mole on his cheek. He was about Jeremy's age, but as far from her docile, loving son as could be. Hate seemed to radiate off him. Faith knew his type, had dealt with it many times before. Hair-trigger finger. Full of spite. Too young to be smart, too stupid to grow old.

Faith put her hand in her purse.

He pressed the bulge under his jacket. "Wouldn't do that if I was you."

Faith could feel the cold steel of the Walther. The muzzle was pointing toward the man. Her finger was close to the trigger. She could shoot the gun through her purse before he even thought to lift his jacket. "Where is my mother?"

"My mother," he repeated. "You say that like she only belongs to you."

"Leave my family out of this."

"You ain't the one in the driver's seat here."

"I need to know that she's alive."

He tilted up his chin and clicked his tongue once against the back of his teeth. The gesture was familiar, the same response Faith had gotten from just about every thug she'd ever arrested. "She's safe."

"How do I know that?"

He laughed. "You don't, bitch. You don't know nothin'."

"What do you want?"

He rubbed his fingers against his thumb. "Money."

Faith didn't know if she could pull the bluff again. "Just tell me where she is and we'll end this. No one has to get hurt."

He laughed again. "Yo, you think I'm that stupid?"

"How much do you want?"

"All of it."

A stream of curses came to mind. "She never took any money."

"She done spun me out this story, bitch. We past that. Gimme the fucking money, and I'll give you what's left of her."

"Is she alive?"

"Not for long, you don't do what I say."

Faith felt a bead of sweat roll down her back. "I can have the money tomorrow. By noon."

"What, you waitin' for the bank to open?"

"Safe deposit box." She was making this up as she went along. "Boxes. There are three of them. All over the city. I need time."

He smiled. One of his teeth was capped in a silver-colored metal. Platinum, probably worth more money than Faith had in her checking account. "I knew you'd deal. I told Mommy that little baby girl wouldn't throw her over."

"I need to know she's alive. None of this happens unless I know for sure that she's okay."

"I wouldn't say she's okay, but the bitch is still breathing last time I checked." He took an iPhone out of his pocket, a newer model than she could afford for Jeremy. He held his tongue between his teeth as his thumbs worked across the screen. He found what he was looking for and showed Faith the phone. The screen showed the image of her mother holding a newspaper.

Faith stared at the photo. Her mother's face was swollen, barely recognizable. Her hand had a bloody rag wrapped around it. Faith pressed her lips together. Bile stung the back of her throat. She fought against the tears stinging her eyes. "I can't tell what she's holding."

He used his fingers to enlarge the image. "It's a newspaper."

"I know it's a USA Today," she snapped. "That doesn't prove she's alive right now. It just proves that sometime after the papers were delivered this morning, you made her hold one up."

He looked at the screen. She could tell he was worried. He bit his bottom lip the same way Jeremy did when she'd caught him doing something wrong.

The man said, "This is proof of life. You need to deal with me if you wanna keep it that way."

Faith noticed that his grammar had improved. His voice had gone up an octave, too. There was something familiar about his tone, but she couldn't place it. She just needed to keep him talking. "You think I'm stupid?" she demanded. "This doesn't prove anything. My mother could already be dead. I'm not going to just hand you a pile of money because you have some stupid picture. You could've Photoshopped that. I don't even know if it's really her."

He stepped closer, puffing out his chest. His eyes were almond shaped, deep blue with speckles of green. Again, she had the sensation of knowing him.

"I've arrested you before."

"Shit," he snorted. "You don't know me, bitch. You don't know a goddamn thing about me."

"I need proof that my mother's alive."

"She won't be for long if you keep this shit up."

Faith felt that familiar snap inside of her. All the anger and frustration of the last few days came rushing out. "Have you ever even done this before? Are you some kind of amateur? You don't show up like this without real proof. I've been a fucking cop for sixteen years. You think I'm going to buy this cheap trick?" She pushed him back hard enough to let him know she meant it. "I'm leaving."

He slammed her face into the door. Faith was stunned by the blow. He jerked her around. His left arm pressed into her throat. His right hand gripped her face, fingers pressing into her skull. Spit flew from his mouth. "You want me to leave another present under your pillow? Maybe her eyes?" He pressed his thumb harder against her eye socket. "Maybe her tits?"

The door pushed against Faith's back. Someone was trying to get into the restroom.

"Excuse me?" a woman said. "Hello? Is this open?"

The man stared at Faith, a hyena studying its prey. His hand shook from the effort of gripping her face. Her teeth cut into the inside of her cheek. Her nose started to bleed. He could break her skull if he wanted to.

"Tomorrow morning," he said. "I'll send you instructions." He leaned in so close that Faith's eyes blurred on his features. "You don't tell anybody about this. You don't tell your boss. You don't tell that freak you work with. You don't tell your brother, or anyone else in your precious family. Nobody. You hear me?"

"Yes," she whispered. "Yes."

Impossibly, his grip tightened. "I won't kill you first," he warned her. "I'll cut off your eyelids. Are you listening to me?" Faith nodded. "I'll make you watch while I skin your son. Piece by piece, I'll cut away his flesh until all you see is his muscles and bones and all you hear is him crying like the bitch little spoiled baby that he is. And then I'll go to work on your daughter. Her skin'll be easier, like wet paper peeling back. Do you understand me? You get what I'm saying?" She nodded again. "Don't push me, bitch. You have no idea how little I've got left to lose."

He let go of her as quickly as he'd grabbed her. Faith fell to the floor. She coughed, tasting blood in her throat. He kicked her out of the way so that he could open the door. She reached out to her purse. Her fingers felt the impression of the gun. She should get up. She had to get up.

"Ma'am?" a woman said. She peered around the door, looking down at Faith. "Do you want me to call a doctor?"

"No," Faith whispered. She swallowed the blood in her mouth. The inside of her jaw was ripped open. More blood trickled from her nose.

"Are you sure? I could call—"

"No," Faith repeated. There was no one to call.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Will pulled into his driveway and waited for the garage door to open. All the lights were off in his house. Betty was probably floating on her full bladder like a balloon in the Macy's Thanksgiving Day parade. At least he hoped she was. Will was in no mood to clean up a mess.

He felt like he had killed Amanda. Not literally, not with his bare hands like he'd dreamed of doing for most of the day. Telling her what Roger Ling said, that Evelyn Mitchell was dead, was just as good as shooting her in the chest. She had deflated in front of him. All of her bravado was gone. All the arrogance and meanness and pettiness had rushed out of her, and the woman in front of him had been nothing but a shell.

Will had had the sense to wait until they were outside the prison building to relay the news. She hadn't cried. Instead, to his horror, her knees had buckled. That was when he put his arm around her. She was surprisingly bony. Her hip was sharp under his hand. Her shoulders were frail. She seemed ten, twenty years older by the time he fastened her seatbelt around her lap and closed the car door.

The trip back had been excruciating. Will's silence on the way down paled in comparison. He had offered to pull over but she'd told him not to stop. Just outside of Atlanta, he'd seen her hand grip the door. Will had never been to her house before. She lived in a condo in the middle of Buckhead. It was a gated community. The buildings were all regal looking with keyed corners and large, heavily trimmed windows. She had directed him to a unit in the back.

Will had idled the car, but she didn't get out. He was debating whether or not to help her again when she said, "Don't tell Faith."

He'd stared at her front door. She had a flag hanging from the front post. Spring flowers. A seasonal motif. Amanda had never struck him as a flag person. He couldn't imagine her standing on the porch in her heels and suit, leaning on tippy-toe to clip the appropriate flag onto the pole.

"We have to verify this," she'd said, though what Roger Ling had told Will was merely a confirmation of a truth Will realized he had been sensing for most of the day.

Amanda must've known it, too. That was the only explanation for her earlier capitulation inside the prison waiting room. She had admitted that Evelyn was tainted because she'd known there was no reason to protect her anymore. The twenty-four-hour mark had come and gone. There had been no contact from the kidnappers. There was blood all over Evelyn's kitchen floor, a lot of it—maybe most of it—from Evelyn. The young men they were dealing with had proven themselves to be remorseless killers, nothing more than assassins, even when it was against members of their own crew.

The odds that Evelyn Mitchell had even made it through the night were close to nil.

Will had told her, "Faith has to know."

"I'll tell her when I know for sure." Her voice sounded flat, lifeless. "We meet at seven tomorrow morning. The whole team. If you're a minute late, then don't bother coming."

"I'll be there."

"We're going to find her. I have to see her with my own eyes."

"Okay."

"And if what Roger said is true, we'll find the boys who did this, and we will rain down hell on them. Every last one. We will hound them into the ground."

"Yes, ma'am."

Her voice was so low and tired he could barely hear her. "I will not rest until every single one of them is put to death. I want to watch them slip the needle in and see their feet twitch and their eyes roll and their chests freeze. And if the state won't kill them, then I'll do it myself." Amanda had pushed open the door and gotten out of the car. Will could see the effort it took her to keep her back straight as she walked up the stairs. If it were up to Amanda, if there was a way for her to will her friend to be alive, then there would be no question of Evelyn's survival.

But that just wasn't the case.

The garage door finally finished opening. Will pulled in and pressed the button to close the door. The garage had not been an original part of the house. Will had added on the structure in the neighborhood's more transitional days, back when junkies knocked on his door wondering if this was still a crack den. The entrance was awkward and led into the spare bedroom. Betty raised her head from the pillow when she saw Will. There was a puddle in the corner that neither one of them was ready to talk about.

Will turned on the lights as he walked through the house. There was a chill in the air. He cracked open the kitchen door so Betty could go outside. She hesitated.

"It's all right," he told her, using as soothing a tone as he could muster. Her injuries were healing, but the dog still remembered last week when a hawk had swooped into the yard and tried to pick her up. And Will could still remember the groomer's uncontrollable laughter when he'd told the man that a hawk had mistaken his dog for a rat.

Betty finally went outside, but not without a wary glance over her shoulder. Will put his car key on the hook and placed his wallet and gun on the kitchen table. The pizza from yesterday was still in the refrigerator. Will took out the box but couldn't do anything more than stare at the gelatinous slices.

He wanted to call Sara, but this time his motivations were purely selfish. He wanted to tell her what had happened today. He wanted to ask her if it was right to wait to tell Faith that her mother was dead. He wanted to describe to her the way it felt to see Amanda brought so low. That it scared him to see her fallen so far from her pedestal.

Instead, he returned the pizza box to the fridge, made sure the back door was still cracked open, and went to take a shower. It was almost midnight. He'd been up since five this morning, having slept only a few hours the night before. Will stood under the stream of hot water, trying to wash away his day. The grime of Valdosta State Prison. The warehouse where he'd been shot at. Grady, where he'd felt dizzy with fear. Coastal, where he'd sweated so much that rings were still under the arms of his shirt.

Will thought about Betty while he dried his hair. She'd been stuck in the house all day. The puddle was a responsibility they both shared. As late as it was, he couldn't see himself sleeping. He should take her for a walk. They could both do with stretching their legs.

He pulled on a pair of jeans and a dress shirt that was too worn to wear to work anymore. The collar was frayed. One of the buttons was broken, dangling by a thread.

He walked into the kitchen to get Betty's leash.

Angie was sitting at the table. "Welcome home, baby. How was your day?"

Will would've rather driven to Coastal and faced Roger Ling again than have to talk to his wife right now.

She stood. Her arms went around his shoulders. She put her mouth close to his. "Aren't you going to tell me hello?"

Her hands stroking his neck felt nothing like Sara's. "Stop."

She pulled away, feigning a pout. "Is that any kind of welcome for your wife?"

"Where have you been?"

"Since when do you care?"

He thought about it. She had posed a legitimate question. "I don't, really. I just—" The words came out easier than he'd thought. "I don't want you here."

"Hmm." She tucked her chin down, crossed her arms. "Well, I suppose this was inevitable. I can't leave you alone after all."

She had closed the back door. He opened it. Betty ran in. She saw Angie and growled.

Angie said, "Looks like none of the women in your life are happy to see me."

He felt the hair on the back of his neck go up. "What are you talking about?"

"Sara didn't tell you?" Angie paused, but he couldn't answer her. "It's Sara, right? That's her name?" She gave a breathy laugh. "I have to say, Will, but she's a little plain for you. I mean she's all right up top, but she's got no ass to speak of and she's almost taller than you are. I thought you liked your women more womanly."

Will still couldn't talk. His blood had frozen in his veins.

"She was here when I got home yesterday. Lingered in the bedroom. Didn't she tell you?"

Sara hadn't told him. Why hadn't she told him?

"She colors her hair. You know that, right? Those highlights aren't natural."

"What did you ...?"

"I'm just letting you know she's not the perfect little angel you think she is."

Will forced the words out of his mouth. "What did you say to her?"

"I asked her why she was fucking my husband."

His heart stopped. This was the reason Sara had been crying yesterday afternoon. This explained her initial coldness when he showed up at her house last night. Will's heart clenched like a vise was around it. "You are not allowed to talk to her ever again."

"You're trying to protect her?" She laughed. "Jesus, Will. That's hilarious considering I'm trying to protect you."

"You don't—"

"She's got a thing for cops. You know that, right?" She shook her head at his stupidity. "I looked into her husband. He was quite a catch. Fucked anything that moved."

"Like you."

"Oh, come on. Try harder than that, baby."

"I don't want to try." He finally said the words that he'd been thinking for the last year. "I just want it over. I want you out of my life."

She laughed in his face. "I am your life."

Will stared at her. She was smiling. Her eyes practically glowed. Why was it that she only ever seemed happy when she was trying to hurt him? "I can't do this anymore."

"His name was Jeffrey. Did you know that?" Will didn't answer. Of course he knew Sara's husband's name. "He was smart. Went to college—a real one, not some correspondence school where they charge extra to mail your diploma. He ran a whole police department. They were so fucking in love that she looks cross-eyed in the pictures." Angie grabbed her purse out of the chair. "You wanna see them? They were in the newspaper in that shithole town every other week. They did a fucking collage on the front page when he died."

"Please, just go."

Angie dropped her purse. "Does she know you're stupid?"

He held his tongue between his front teeth.

"Oh, of course she does." She almost sounded relieved. "That explains it. She feels sorry for you. Poor little Willy can't read."

He shook his head.

"Let me tell you something, Wilbur. You're not a great catch. You're not handsome. You're not smart. You're not even average. And you're sure as hell not good in the sack."

She had said this so many times before that the words no longer had meaning. "Is there a point to this?"

"I'm trying to keep you from getting hurt. That's the point."

He looked down at the floor. "Don't do this, Angie. Just this one time—don't do it."

"Do what? Tell you the truth? Because you've obviously got your head so far up your ass that you can't see what's going on here." She put her face inches from his. "Don't you know that every time she kisses you, every time she touches you or fucks you, or holds you, she's thinking about him?" She paused as if she expected an answer. "You're just a replacement, Will. You're just there until somebody better comes along. Another doctor. A lawyer. Someone who can read a newspaper without his lips getting tired."

Will felt his throat tighten. "You don't know anything."

"I know people. I know women. I know them a hell of a lot better than you."

"I'm sure you do."

"Damn right I do. And I know you best of all." She paused to survey the damage. Obviously, it wasn't enough. "You're forgetting I was there, baby. Every visiting day, every adoption rally, there you were standing in front of that mirror combing your hair, checking your clothes, primping yourself up so that some mommy and daddy might see you and take you home with them." She started shaking her head. "But they never did, did they? No one ever took you home. No one ever wanted you. And you know why?"

He couldn't breathe in. His lungs started to ache.

"Because there's something about you, Will. Something wrong. Something off. It makes people's skin crawl. It makes them want to get as far away from you as they can."

"Just stop. All right? Stop it."

"Stop what? Pointing out the obvious? What do you see happening with her? You're gonna get married and have babies and live some kind of normal life?" She laughed as if this was the most ludicrous thing she'd ever heard. "You ever consider the fact that you like what we have?"

He tasted blood on the tip of his tongue. He imagined a wall between them. A thick concrete wall.

"There's a reason you wait for me. There's a reason you don't go on dates and you don't go to bars or pay for pussy like every other man in the world."

The wall got higher, stronger.

"You like what we have. You know you can't be with somebody else. Not really be with them. You can't walk out on that ledge. You can't open yourself up to someone like that, because you know at the end of the day they will always leave you. And that's what your precious Sara is going to do, baby. She's an adult. She's been married before. She had a real life with somebody else. Someone who was worthy of being loved and knew how to love her back. And she's gonna see real fast that you're not capable of that. And then she's gonna drop you on your ass and be gone."

The taste of blood got stronger in his mouth.

"You're just so fucking desperate for somebody to give you a little attention. You've always been that way. Clingy. Pathetic. Needy."

He couldn't stand her being this close to him. He walked over to the sink and filled a glass with water. "You don't know anything about me."

"Have you told her what happened to you? She's a doctor. She knows what a cigarette burn looks like. She knows what happens when somebody holds two live wires to your skin." Will drank the water in one gulp. "Look at me." He didn't look up, but she kept talking anyway. "You're a project for her. She feels sorry for you. Poor little orphan Will. You're Helen Keller and she's whoever the fuck that bitch is who taught her how to read." She grabbed his chin and made him face her. Will still looked away. "She just wants to cure you. And when she gets tired of trying to fix you, when she realizes that there's no magic pill that'll take away the stupid, she's going to drop you back into the trash where she found you."

Something broke inside of him. His resolve. His strength. His flimsy walls. "And then what?" he yelled. "I'll come crawling back to you?"

"You always do."

"I'd rather be alone. I'd rather rot alone in a hole than be stuck with you."

She turned her back to him. Will put the glass in the sink, used the back of his hand to wipe his mouth. Angie didn't cry much, at least not for real. Every kid Will grew up with had a different survival tactic. Boys used their fists. Girls turned bulimic. Some, like Angie, used sex, and when sex didn't work, they used tears, and then when tears didn't work, they found something else to cut into your heart.

When Angie turned around, she had Will's gun in her mouth.

“No—”

She pulled the trigger. He closed his eyes, held up his hands to block his face from the pieces of brain and skull.

But nothing happened.

Slowly, Will dropped his arms, opened his eyes.

The gun was still in her mouth. Dry fire. The echo of the hammer clicking was like a needle piercing his eardrum. He saw the magazine on the table. The bullet he kept in the chamber was beside it.

Will's voice trembled. “Don't you ever—”

“Does she know about your father, Will? Have you told her what happened?”

His whole body was shaking. “Don't ever do that again.”

She dropped the gun back on the table. Her hands cupped his face. “You love me, Will. You know you love me. You felt it when I pulled that trigger. You know you can't live without me.”

Tears came into his eyes.

“We're not whole people unless we're together.” She stroked his cheek, his eyebrow. “Don't you know that? Don't you remember what you did for me, baby? You were willing to give up your life for me. You'd never do that for her. You'd never cut yourself for anybody but me.”

He pulled away from her grasp. The gun was still on the table. The magazine felt cold in his hand. He shoved it home. He pulled back the slide to chamber a round. He held out the gun to her, muzzle pointing to his chest. “Go ahead and shoot me.” She didn't move. He tried to take her hand. “Shoot me.”

“Stop.” She held up her hands. “Stop it.”

“Shoot me,” he repeated. “Either shoot me or let me go.”

She took the gun and dismantled it, throwing the pieces onto the counter. When her hands were free, she slapped him hard across the face. Then again. Then her fists started to fly. Will grabbed her arms. She twisted around, turning her back to him. Angie hated being held down. He pressed his body into hers, forcing her against the sink. She fought furiously, screaming, scratching with her fingernails.

“Let me go!” She kicked back at him, grinding her heel into his foot. “Stop it!”

Will tightened his grip. She leaned into him. All the anger and frustration of the last two days pooled into one place. He could feel his body responding to her, yearning to release. She managed to turn back around. Her hand went behind his neck, pulling him closer. She put her lips to his. Her mouth opened.

Will stepped back. She moved to put her arms around him again but he took another step away. He was breathing too hard to speak. This was their dance. Anger. Fear. Violence. Never compassion. Never kindness.

He took Betty's leash off the hook. The dog pranced at his feet. Will's hands were shaking so badly he could barely clip the leash to her collar. He took his keys off the hook and tucked his wallet into his back pocket. “I don't want you here when I get back.”

“You can't leave me.”

He reassembled the gun and clipped the paddle holster to his jeans.

“I need you.”

He turned around to face Angie. Her hair was wild. She looked desperate, ready to do anything. He was so tired of this. So tired. “Don't you understand? I don't want to be needed. I want to be wanted."

She didn't have a good answer to that, so she went with a threat. "I swear I'll kill myself if you walk out that door."

Will left the room.

She followed him down the hallway. "I'll take pills. I'll slit my wrists. That's one of your favorites, isn't it? I'll slit my wrists, and you'll come home and find me. How's that gonna make you feel, Wilbur? How're you gonna feel if you come home from fucking your precious little doctor and I'm dead in the bathroom?"

He picked up Betty from the floor. "Annie Sullivan."

"What?"

"That's the woman who taught Helen Keller."

Will went into the garage and closed the door behind him. The last thing he saw was Angie standing in the hallway, fists clenched in front of her. He got into his car. He waited for the garage door to open. He backed the car into the driveway and waited for the door to close.

Betty settled down into the seat beside him as he drove away. He cracked the window so she could enjoy the night air. Will didn't think about where he was going until he pulled into the parking lot in front of Sara's building. He grabbed the dog and carried her to the front entrance. Sara was on the top floor. He pressed the buzzer. He didn't have to say anything. There was a responding buzz, and the lock clicked open.

Betty squirmed as they got into the elevator. He put her down at his feet. When they reached the top floor, she ran out into the hall. Sara's door was open. She was standing in the middle of the room. Her hair was loose and down around her shoulders. She was wearing jeans and a thin white T-shirt that didn't do much to conceal what was underneath.

Will closed the door. There were so many things he wanted to tell her, but when he finally managed to speak, none of it came out. "Why didn't you tell me you saw Angie?"

She didn't answer. She just stood there looking at him. Will couldn't stop himself from looking back. Her shirt was tight. He could see the swell of her breasts, her nipples pressing into the thin material.

He said, "I'm sorry." His voice broke. He would never forgive himself for bringing Angie into Sara's life. It was the most awful thing he had ever done to anyone. "What she said to you. I never wanted ..."

Sara walked toward him.

"I'm so sorry."

She took his hand and turned it so that the palm was facing up. Her fingers moved nimbly over the buttons on his sleeve.

Will wanted to pull away. He needed to pull away. But he couldn't move. He couldn't make his muscles work. He couldn't stop her hands or her fingers or her mouth.

She pressed her lips to his bare wrist. It was the gentlest kiss he had ever known. Her tongue flicked lightly along the skin, tracing the scar up his arm. Will felt like a current was going through his body, so that by the time she kissed his mouth, he was already on fire. Her body curved into his. The kiss deepened. Her hand wrapped around the back of his head, nails scraping through his hair. Will was dizzy. He was in free fall. He couldn't stop touching her—her narrow hips, the curve at the small of her back, her perfect breasts.

His breath caught when her hand slipped inside his shirt. Her fingers brushed over his chest, down his belly. She didn't flinch. She didn't falter. Instead, she put her forehead to his, looked him in the eye, and told him, "Breathe."

Will let out a breath he felt like he'd been holding his entire life.

MONDAY

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Sara woke to hear the shower running. She turned over in bed. Her hand traced along the indentation left in the pillow. The sheets were twisted around her body. Her hair was a mess. She could still smell Will in the room, taste him in her mouth, remember what his arms felt like when they'd wrapped around her.

She could not recall the last time good reasons had made her not want to get out of bed in the morning. Obviously, it had happened when Jeffrey was alive, but for the first time in four and a half years, Jeffrey was the last thing on Sara's mind. She wasn't making comparisons. She wasn't weighing differences. Her worst fear had always been that her husband's ghost would follow her into the bedroom. But that hadn't been the case. There was only Will, and the absolute joy she felt when she was with him.

Sara had a vague recollection that her clothes were somewhere between the kitchen and the dining room. She pulled a black silk robe out of the closet and made her way down the hall. The dogs gave her a lazy look from the couch as she walked into the living room. Betty was sleeping on a pillow. Billy and Bob were piled into a crescent shape around her. Will had to be at work in an hour or Sara would've joined him in the shower. Yesterday, she had told the hospital staff that she didn't need time off after her ordeal, but this morning, she was glad they had insisted. She needed to process what had happened. And she wanted to be home when Will got off work.

Her clothes were neatly folded on the counter. Sara smiled, thinking she'd at last found a good use for her dining room table. She turned on the coffeemaker. There was a yellow Post-it note on the wall above the dog bowls. Will had drawn a smiley face in the center. She saw another note with the same graphic above the leashes. There was something to be said for a man who fed and walked the dogs while Sara was sleeping. She stared at the blue ink, the arc of a smile and two dots for eyes.

Sara had never pursued a man before. She had always been on the receiving end of the wooing. But she'd realized last night that nothing would ever happen if she didn't make the first move. And she had wanted something to happen. She had wanted Will more than anything she'd wanted in a long while.

He'd been tentative at first. He was obviously self-conscious about his body, which was laughable considering how beautiful it was. His legs were strong and lean. His shoulders were roped with muscle. His abs would be perfectly at home on an underwear billboard in the middle of Times Square. It wasn't just that, though. His hands knew exactly where to touch her. His mouth felt wonderful. His tongue felt wonderful. Everything about him was wonderful. Being with him felt like a key sliding into a lock. Sara had never dreamed that she would ever again be so open with another man.

If there was any comparison to be made, it was between Sara and her old self. Something was altered inside of her, and not just her moral compass. She felt different with Will. She didn't have to immediately know everything about this man she'd shared her bed with. She didn't feel the need to demand answers about the obvious abuse he had suffered. For the first time in her life, Sara felt patient. The girl who had gotten kicked out of Sunday school for arguing with the teacher and driven her parents, her sister, and eventually her husband crazy with her unyielding desire to understand every last detail about everything on earth was finally learning how to relax.

Maybe seeing the Polaroid of Will's sutured mouth had taught her a lesson about prying. Or maybe it was just the nature of life that you learned from past mistakes. For now, Sara was content to just be with Will. The rest would come in time. Or it wouldn't. Either way, she felt remarkably content.

There was an insistent knock at the door, probably Abel Conford from across the hall. The lawyer had anointed himself czar of the parking lot. Every board meeting Sara attended started with Abel complaining about visitors parking in the wrong spaces.

Sara pulled her robe tight as she opened the door. Instead of her neighbor, she found Faith Mitchell.

"I'm sorry to barge in on you." Faith pushed her way into the apartment. She was wearing a bulky navy blue jacket with the hood pulled over her head. Dark sunglasses obscured half her face. Her jeans and Chuck Taylors completed the ensemble. She looked like a PTA mom's idea of a cat burglar.

Sara could only ask, "How did you get in?"

"I told your neighbor I was a cop and he let me in."

"Great," Sara mumbled, wondering how long it would take for everyone in the building to think she was being arrested. "What's going on?"

Faith took off the sunglasses. There were five tiny bruises circling her face. "I need you to call Will for me." She went to the window and looked down at the parking lot. "I thought about this all night. I can't do it alone. I don't think I'm capable." She shielded her eyes with her hand, though the sun had yet to come up. "They don't know I'm here. Ginger fell asleep. Taylor left last night. I sneaked out. Through the back yard. I took Roz Levy's car. I know they've tapped my phones. They're watching me. They can't know that I'm doing this. They can't know that I talked to anybody."

She was a poster child for hypoglycemia. Sara suggested, "Why don't you sit down?"

Faith kept her perch over the parking lot. "I sent my children away. They're with my brother. He's never even changed a diaper. This is too much responsibility for Jeremy."

"Okay. Let's talk about it. Come over here and sit down with me."

"I have to get her back, Sara. I don't care what it takes. What I have to do."

Her mother. Will had told Sara about his trip to Coastal State Prison, his conversation with Roger Ling. "Faith, sit down."

"I can't sit or I'll never get up again. I need Will. Can you please just call him?"

"I'll get him for you. I promise, but you have to sit down." Sara guided her over to the stool by the kitchen counter. "Did you eat breakfast?"

She shook her head. "My stomach's too upset."

"How's your blood sugar?"

She stopped shaking her head. Her guilty expression was answer enough.

Sara made her voice firm. "Faith, I'm not going to do anything until we get your numbers in order. Do you understand me?"

Faith didn't argue, perhaps because part of her knew that she needed help. She felt around in her jacket pockets and pulled out a handful of hard candy that she dropped on the counter. Next came a large gun, then her wallet, a set of keys with a gold cursive L on the chain, and finally, her blood-testing kit.

Sara scrolled through the tester's memory, checking the stats. Faith had obviously been playing candy roulette for the last two days. It was a common trick among diabetics, using candy to fight the lows, gritting out the highs. It was a good way to get through a difficult period, but it was an even better way to end up in a coma. "I should take you to the hospital right now." Sara gripped the monitor in her hand. "Do you have your insulin?"

Faith dug into her pockets again and put four disposable insulin pens on the counter. She started babbling. "I got them from the pharmacy this morning. I didn't know how much to take. They showed me, but I've never used them before and they're so expensive I didn't want to mess up. My ketones are okay. I used a strip last night and this morning. I should probably get a pump."

"An insulin pump wouldn't be a bad idea." Sara slid a testing strip into the monitor. "Did you eat supper last night?"

"Sort of."

"I'll take that as a no," Sara mumbled. "What about snacks? Anything?"

Faith leaned her head in her hand. "I can't think straight with Jeremy and Emma gone. Zeke called this morning. He says they're settled in but I can tell he's annoyed. He's never been good around kids."

Sara took Faith's finger and lined up the lancet. "We are going to have a long talk when this is over about your noncompliance. I know that saying right now is stressful for you is an incredible understatement, but your diabetes isn't something you can magically put on hold. Your vision, your circulation, your motor skills ..." Sara didn't finish the sentence. She'd lectured so many diabetics about this same issue that she felt like she was reading from a script. "You have to take care of yourself or you're going to end up blind or in a wheelchair or worse."

Faith said, "You look different."

Sara patted down her hair, which was sticking straight up in the back.

"You're practically glowing. Are you pregnant?"

Sara laughed, surprised by the question. An ectopic pregnancy in her twenties had led to a partial hysterectomy. Will wasn't that much of a miracle worker. "You're one-thirty?"

"One thirty-five."

Sara dialed out the correct dosage on the pen. "You're going to inject this, then I'm going to cook breakfast for you, and you're not doing anything else until you've eaten every bite."

"That stove cost more than my house." Faith leaned over the counter for a better look. Sara pushed her back down. "How much money do you make?"

She took Faith's hand and wrapped her fingers around the insulin pen. "You do this, and I'll go get Will."

"You can call him from here. I know what you're going to say."

Sara didn't stop to explain herself, especially since Faith was obviously having trouble processing information. She grabbed her clothes off the counter and went into the bedroom. Will was standing in front of the dresser putting on his shirt. She saw his broad chest reflected in the mirror, the dark stain of electrical burns traveling down the flat of his belly and disappearing into his jeans. Sara had put her mouth on every inch of him last night, but standing here in the light of day, she felt awkward around him.

He looked at her reflection. Sara pulled her robe tighter around her waist. He had made the bed. The pillows were stacked neatly against the headboard. This wasn't how she'd envisioned her morning.

He asked, "What's wrong?"

She put her folded clothes on the bed. "Faith is here."

"Here?" He turned around. He sounded almost panicked. "Why? How did she know?"

"She doesn't know. She asked me to call you. She's terrified her phone's being tapped."

"Does she know about her mother?"

"I don't think so." Sara put her hand to her chest, cinching the robe again, feeling every bit of her nakedness underneath. "She said that people are watching her. She's acting paranoid. Her blood sugar is off the charts. She's taking her insulin now. She should settle once we get some food into her."

"Do I need to get breakfast?"

"I can make her something."

"I can—" He stopped, looking extremely uncomfortable. "Maybe I should do that. For Faith, I mean. You could cook me something after."

So much for the honeymoon period. At least she knew now why Bob had smelled like scrambled eggs the other night. "I'll stay in here to give you some privacy."

"Could you ...?" He hesitated. "It might be better if you were there. I'm going to have to tell her about her mother."

"I thought Amanda said to wait."

"Amanda says a lot of things I don't agree with." He indicated that she should leave the room ahead of him. Sara walked down the hall. She could feel Will close behind her. Despite what had happened the night before—some of it in this very hallway—he felt like a stranger to her. Sara gripped her robe tighter, wishing she had stopped to change into some real clothes.

Faith was still sitting at the kitchen bar. Some of her nervous energy had dissipated. She saw Will and said, "Oh."

He looked embarrassed. Sara felt the same. Maybe that explained his standoffish mood. It seemed wrong for them to be together given what had happened to Evelyn Mitchell.

Still, Faith said, "It's all right. I'm happy for you."

Will didn't acknowledge the comment. "Dr. Linton says you need to eat."

"I need to talk to you first."

Will looked at Sara. She shook her head.

"You need breakfast first." Will opened the dishwasher and took out the frying pan. He found the eggs and bread in their proper place. Faith watched him make breakfast. She didn't speak. Sara didn't know if she was crashing or if she just didn't know what to say. Probably a little of both. For her part, Sara had never felt so uncomfortable in her own home. She watched Will break the eggs and butter the toast. His jaw was rigid. He didn't look up at her. She might as well have stayed in the bedroom.

Will took three plates out of the cabinet and loaded them up with food. Sara and Faith sat at the bar. Though there was a third chair, Will stood, leaning against the counter. Sara picked at her food. Faith ate half her eggs and a slice of toast. Will cleaned his plate, then finished Faith's toast as well as Sara's, before scraping the rest into the trash and stacking the plates in the sink. He rinsed the bowl that had held the eggs, ran some water in the frying pan, then washed his hands.

Finally, he said, "Faith, I have to tell you something."

She shook her head. She must've known what was coming.

He stood with his back against the counter. He didn't lean over and take her hands. He didn't come around and sit beside her. He just told her the news straight out. "Last night, I was at Coastal State Prison. I talked to a man who's pretty high up in the drug trade. Roger Ling." He kept his eyes focused on hers. "There's no other way to say this. He told me that your mother was killed. Shot in the head."

She didn't respond at first. She sat there with her elbows on the counter, hands hanging down, mouth open. Eventually, she said, "No, she's not."

"Faith—"

"Did you find the body?"

"No, but—"

"When was this? When did he tell you?"

"Late, around nine o'clock."

"It's not true."

"Faith, it's true. This guy knows what he's talking about. Amanda says—"

"I don't care what Amanda says." She dug around in her pockets again.

"Mandy doesn't know what she's talking about. Whoever this guy is who you talked to was lying."

Will glanced at Sara.

"Look," Faith said. She had an iPhone in her hands. "Do you see this? It's Jeremy's Facebook page. They've been sending messages."

Will pushed away from the counter. "What?"

"I met one of them last night. At the grocery store. He did this." She indicated the bruises on her face. "I told him I had to have proof of life. He emailed me through Jeremy's Facebook account this morning."

"What?" Will repeated. The color had drained from his face. "You met him alone? Why didn't you call me? He could've—"

"Look at this." She showed him the phone. Sara couldn't see the image, but she heard the sound.

A woman's voice said, "It's Monday morning. Five thirty-eight." She paused. There was background noise. "Faith, listen to me. Don't do anything they say. Don't trust them. Just walk away from this. You and your brother and the kids are my family. My only family ..." Suddenly, the voice grew stronger. "Faith, this is important. I need you to remember our time together before Jeremy—"

Faith said, "It stops right there."

Will asked, "What's she talking about? The time before Jeremy?"

"When I was pregnant." Her cheeks colored, though almost twenty years had passed. "Mom stayed with me. She was ..." Faith shook her head. "I wouldn't have made it through without her. She just kept telling me to be strong, that it would be over eventually and then everything would be all right."

Sara put her hand on Faith's shoulder. She could not imagine the pain that the other woman was going through.

Will stared at the iPhone. "What's on the television set behind her?"

"Good Day Atlanta. I checked with the station. This is the weather segment they aired half an hour ago. You can see the time over the station logo. I got the file two minutes later."

He handed Sara the phone, but still would not look her in the eye.

Curiosity had always been her weakness. Sara's reading glasses were on the counter. She slipped them on so she could see the small details. The screen showed Evelyn Mitchell sitting beside a large plasma-screen TV. The sound was off, but Sara saw the weather woman pointing to the five-day forecast. Evelyn was looking off-camera, probably at the man filming her. Her face was a bloody mess. She moved stiffly, as if in a great deal of pain. Her words slurred as she began, "It's Monday morning."

Sara let the video play out, then put the phone down.

Faith was watching Sara closely. "How does she look?"

Sara took off her glasses. She could hardly render a medical opinion based on a grainy video, but it was obvious to anyone that Evelyn Mitchell had been very badly beaten. Still, she said, "She looks like she's holding up."

"That's what I thought." Faith turned to Will. "I told them I'd meet them at noon, but the email says twelve-thirty. Mom's house."

"Your mother's house?" he repeated. "It's still an active crime scene."

"Maybe it's been released. APD isn't telling me anything. Let me find the email." Faith moved her thumbs across the screen again and handed the phone to Will. "Oh," she said, reaching for the device. "I forgot—"

"I've got it." Will took Sara's glasses off the counter and slipped them on. He stared at the phone for a few seconds. Sara couldn't tell if he'd read the email or was just making a lucky guess when he said, "They want the money."

Faith took the phone away from him. "There is no money."

Will just stared at her.

"It's not true," Faith said. "It was never true. You couldn't prove anything. She wasn't dirty. Boyd and the rest of them were on the take, but Mom never took anything."

"Faith," Will said. "Your mother had a bank account."

"So what? Everyone has a bank account."

"An out-of-state bank account. It's in your father's name. She still has it. There's been about sixty grand in and out of it as far as I can tell. There might be other accounts in other states, other names. I don't know."

Faith shook her head. "No. You're lying."

"Why would I lie about that?"

"Because you can't admit that you were wrong about her. She wasn't dirty." Tears filled her eyes. She had the look of someone who knew the truth but could not accept it. "She wasn't."

There was another knock at the door. Sara guessed that Abel Conford had finally noticed the extra cars in the parking lot. Wrong again.

“Good morning, Dr. Linton.” Amanda Wagner did not look pleased to be standing in the hallway. Her eyes were red. The makeup had been wiped off her nose. Her skin was darker where foundation and blush covered her cheeks.

Sara opened the door wider. She tightened her robe again, wondering where the nervous tic had come from. Perhaps it was because she was completely naked underneath and the black silk was as thin as crepe paper. She hadn’t planned on hosting a party this morning.

Faith seemed incensed to see Amanda. “What are you doing here?”

“Roz Levy called. She said you stole her car.”

“I left a note.”

“Which she strangely did not interpret as the proper way to ask for permission. Fortunately, I was able to talk her out of calling the police.” She smiled at Will. “Good morning, Dr. Trent.”

Will feigned a sudden fascination with the tiles on Sara’s kitchen floor.

“Wait a minute,” Faith said. “How did you know where I was?”

“Roz LoJacked the car. I called in a few favors at dispatch.”

“LoJack? It’s a nine-hundred-year-old Corvair. It’s worth five dollars.”

Amanda took off her coat and handed it to Sara. “I’m sorry to intrude on your morning, Dr. Linton. I love what you’ve done to your hair.”

Sara forced a smile onto her face as she hung the coat in the closet. “Would you like some coffee?”

“Yes, thank you.” She turned to Will and Faith. “Should I be hurt that I wasn’t invited to this party?”

No one seemed up to answering her. Sara took three mugs down from the cabinet and poured coffee into each of them. She heard Evelyn Mitchell’s voice on the iPhone as Faith played the video for their new guest.

Amanda asked her to play it again, then a third time, before asking, “When did this come in?”

“A little over half an hour ago.”

“Read me the message that came with it.”

Faith read, “ ‘Twelve-thirty at 339 Little John. Bring the cash in a black duffel bag. Do not alert anyone. We are watching you. If you deviate from these instructions, she will be dead and so will you and your family. Remember what I said.’ ”

“Roger Ling.” Amanda’s voice was one of restrained fury. “I knew that bastard was lying. You can’t trust a goddamn word any of them say.” She seemed to realize the greater meaning of her words. Her mouth opened in surprise. “She’s alive.” She laughed. “Oh, God, I knew the old girl wouldn’t give up without a fight.” She put her hand to her chest. “How could I think for a minute that ...” She shook her head. The smile on her face was so wide that she finally covered it with her hand.

Will asked the more important question. “Why would they want to meet at your mother’s house? It’s not secure. They won’t have the advantage. It doesn’t make sense.”

Faith answered, “It’s familiar. It’s easy to keep an eye on.”

Will said, “But there’s no way that the crime scene’s been released. It’ll take days to process everything.”

Amanda supplied, "The kidnappers must know something we don't."

"It could be a test," Will countered. "If we clear out the forensic team, it'll be obvious that Faith called the police. Or us." He told Faith, "You pull up to the house and you're out in the open. You go inside and you're walking right into their hands. What's to stop them from shooting you and taking the money? Especially if we can't put in a tactical team to secure the area."

"We can make do," Amanda insisted. "There are only three routes in and out of that neighborhood. They make a move in either direction and we'll have pistols at the ready."

Will ignored the bravado. He opened the drawer by the refrigerator and took out a pen and pad of paper. He held the pen awkwardly in his left hand, resting the barrel between his middle and fourth finger. Sara watched as he covered the page with a large T, then drew two irregularly shaped squares—one on the arm of the T, one at the base. His spatial recollection was better than Sara would have guessed, but then, he'd probably been to Faith's house several times.

He explained, "Faith's house is on the corner here. Evelyn is here on Little John." He traced an L-shaped line between the two houses. "We've got all this open space. They could block the intersection here and take her. They could park a van at the same spot and shoot her from a distance. She could pull into the driveway here, and up comes their black van. Two in the head, just like Castillo at the warehouse, or they could grab her and be on the interstate or Peachtree Road within five minutes. Or they could make it easy and set up here —" He drew an oblong square beside Evelyn's house. "Roz Levy's carport. She's got a knee wall here where they could set up with a rifle. The bathroom window to Evelyn's house faces Mrs. Levy's. It's down an incline. You can see straight through to the kitchen door from Mrs. Levy's without anyone knowing. Faith comes in the door with the bag of cash and they drop her."

Amanda took the pen and turned the base of the T into a circle. "Little John loops around. The whole neighborhood folds back on itself." She drew more arcs. "This is Nottingham. Friar Tuck. Robin Hood. Beverly. Lionel." She drew large X's at the end points. "Beverly dumps out onto Peachtree here, where every car in the world eventually passes; the other end throws you back into the infinite loop of Ansley Park. Lionel does the same. They're bottlenecks. Most of the houses along these routes have on-street parking. We could have ten cars at each point and no one would notice."

Will said, "I'm not worried about their exit routes. I'm worried about Faith going into that house alone. If they really are watching the place, they'll know the minute someone shows up who shouldn't be there. They've had almost three full days to get the lay of the neighborhood, possibly more. Even if the CSU guys leave, they'll be counting the number who go in and the number who go out."

Amanda turned over the paper. She drew a rough diagram of a house, pointing out the rooms. "Faith comes in through the kitchen. The foyer is here, looking into the living room. Here's the bookcase on the left—my left. Takes up the entire wall. Sofa backs up to here. The wingback chair is here on the right. A couple of other chairs are here and here. Stereo console here. Sliding glass doors opposite the foyer." She tapped the pen to what must've been the master bedroom. "They'll keep Ev in here until Faith comes with the money, then they'll bring her into the living room. It's the obvious area for the exchange."

"Nothing is obvious here." He grabbed the pen. "We can't cover the front windows because we don't know who's watching the house. We can't cover the back because the yard is wide open to the neighbors' and they'll see movement at any window. We still don't know how many kids are left on this team. There could be one, there could be a hundred." He threw down the pen. His tone was firm. "I don't like it, Faith. You can't go in there. Not on their terms. We'll find another way to do this. We'll suggest another location that we can secure ahead of time so that we can make sure you're safe."

Amanda's tone betrayed her irritation. "Don't be so fatalistic, Will. We've got six hours. All of us know the layout of the house, so that's our advantage as well as theirs. I know every old broad in that neighborhood. It's a residential street. We've got joggers, delivery-men, cable trucks, meter readers, postal carriers, and afternoon strollers we can tap into. I can dribble in four teams over the next few hours and no one will be the wiser. We're not a bunch of Keystone Kops. We can figure out a way to do this."

"I'll do it," Will offered, and Sara felt her heart jump into her throat.

"You can hardly pass for Faith."

"We'll send them an email to let them know I'm going to make the exchange. Roger Ling knows what I look like. Even if he's not involved in this, he's obviously enjoying the show. He knows who these guys are. He can tell them to trust me."

Sara felt a wave of relief to see Amanda start shaking her head even before he'd finished talking.

He insisted, "It's safer this way. Safer for Faith."

As usual, Amanda didn't hold back. "That's one of the most idiotic things I've ever heard come from your mouth. Think about what we've seen over the last couple of days. This is amateur hour. Julia Ling practically laid it out for us. We're dealing with a bunch of young, stupid boys who think they know how to play cops and robbers. We'll either have them on the ground or in it before they know what hit them."

Will wasn't swayed. "They may be young, but they're fearless. They've killed a lot of people. They've taken a lot of stupid risks."

"None more stupid than sending you in instead of Faith. That's the way to get people killed." Amanda decided, "We'll do it my way. We'll figure out how to strategically place our people. We'll have eyes on Faith at all times. We'll wait until the kidnappers show up with Evelyn. Faith will do the swap, and then we'll nab them when they try to make their escape."

Will wouldn't give in. He was adamant. "She can't do this. She can't go in there alone. Either let me do it or we'll find another way."

Faith said, "If I'm not alone, then my mother is dead."

Will looked down at the floor. He obviously thought that there was still the real possibility that Evelyn Mitchell was dead. Sara found herself silently agreeing with him. This didn't sound like a plan to get Evelyn back. It sounded like a plan to get Faith killed. Amanda was so hellbent on saving her friend that she couldn't see the collateral damage.

Sara had forgotten about the coffee. She kept one for herself, then passed the other mugs to Amanda, then Will.

"Thank you." Will awkwardly took his. It was as if he was making sure that their hands didn't touch.

Faith said, "He doesn't drink coffee. I'll take it."

Sara felt her cheeks start to burn. "You probably shouldn't be drinking caffeine right now."

Will cleared his throat. "That's okay. I like it sometimes." He took a sip from the mug. He practically grimaced as he swallowed.

Sara couldn't take much more of this. The only way she could be more out of place would be if she pulled out an accordion and started singing polka tunes. "I should give y'all some privacy."

Amanda stopped her. "If you don't mind, Dr. Linton, I'd like a fresh ear on this."

They were all looking at her. Impossibly, Sara felt even more naked than before. She looked at Will for help, but his blank expression was probably the same one he gave to the woman at the bank or the guy who picked up his recyclables.

There was nothing to be done about it. She sat down beside Faith.

Amanda took the other seat. "All right, let's go over what we know so we're all on the same page. Will, run it down for us."

He put down the coffee mug and started talking. He told Faith about everything that had happened since Evelyn had been taken, detailing the crime scene, their visit with Boyd Spivey at the D&C and his silent ex-colleagues at Valdosta State Prison. Faith's lips parted in surprise when he told her about Roz Levy's photographs of Evelyn's gentleman friend. Still, she kept silent as he detailed Sara's ordeal at the hospital and the shootout at Julia Ling's warehouse. Sara felt that familiar tightness in her chest when he got to this last part. The cut on his ear. A bullet had whizzed by, less than an inch from his skull.

Will said, "Ricardo Ortiz and Hironobu Kwon knew each other from school. They both went to Westminster. They were most likely working in Ling-Ling's cabinet shop together. They got it into their heads to start their own business. They obviously pulled together a crew from the other guys working in the shop. Ricardo went to Sweden and picked up some heroin for them to sell. According to Roger Ling, the boys were all bragging about it. Benny Choo, strongarm for the Yellow Rebels, picked up Ricardo and basically beat the crap out of him. He was about to pull the plug, but Ricardo, or maybe Hironobu, told him where they could get some serious money."

Faith had been quietly taking all this in, but now she mumbled, "Mom."

"Right," Will confirmed. "Chuck Finn and Hironobu Kwon were in the same rehab facility for at least a month. Chuck must've told Hironobu about the money. Ricardo was about to die, so Hironobu says, 'I know where I can get almost a million in cash.' Benny Choo takes him up on the offer."

Amanda picked up the story. "That's what they were looking for at Evelyn's. They thought she had money at the house. When she didn't give it up, they took her."

Sara thought it was convenient that Amanda had skipped over the fact that Hector Ortiz, the cousin of one of the most powerful drug lords in Atlanta, was dead in Evelyn's trunk. She should've kept her mouth shut, but this was her house, they had barged in without notice, and Sara was tired of being polite. "That doesn't explain why Hector Ortiz was there."

Amanda raised one eyebrow. "No, it doesn't, does it?"

Sara didn't work for this woman. She wasn't going to walk on eggshells. "You're not going to answer the question?"

There was a crocodile smile on Amanda's lips. "The more important issue here is that they did all of this because they want money. We can negotiate with people who want money."

Will said, "It's not about money."

"We don't have time for your woman's intuition," Amanda snapped.

His voice sounded tired, but he didn't back down. "They're trying to get Faith trapped in that house for a reason. If we go in without knowing that reason, then it's not going to end well. Not for any of us." What he said sounded perfectly reasonable, but Sara could tell Amanda wasn't buying it. Still, he kept trying. "Look, if it was just about money, they would've made a ransom demand the first day. They wouldn't be doing this back-and-forth through Facebook. They wouldn't risk meeting Faith face-to-face in the grocery store. It would be a simple transaction. Make the call. Pick up the money. Leave the hostage somewhere, and you're home free."

Again, a reasonable assumption. Again, Amanda ignored it.

She said, "There is no secret endgame here. They want cash. We'll give them cash. We'll shove it so far down their throats they'll be shitting paper all the way to prison."

"He's right." Faith had been staring blankly ahead for most of this exchange, but with her hypoglycemia finally leveled out, she was back to thinking like a detective. "What about the bank account?"

Amanda stood up to get more coffee. "The account doesn't matter."

Will seemed ready to disagree, but for his own reasons, he kept silent.

Amanda told Faith, "Your father was a gambler."

Faith shook her head. "That's not true."

"He played poker every weekend."

"For quarters." She kept shaking her head. "Dad was an insurance salesman. He hated risk."

"He wasn't risking anything. He was very careful." Amanda went back around the kitchen island and sat down by Faith. "How many times did he and Kenny go to Vegas when you were little?"

Faith was still unconvinced. "That was for work conventions."

"Bill was methodical about it. He was methodical about everything. You know that. He knew how to bluff and he knew when to walk away. Kenny wasn't as smart, but that's a story for another time." She looked at Will. "Bill didn't pay taxes on the money. That's why the bank account was a secret."

Sara could see her own confusion reflected in Will's face. Past a certain amount, you couldn't just walk out of a Vegas casino, or any legal casino in America, for that matter, without paying taxes.

Faith didn't pick up on this. "I can't see Dad taking that kind of risk. He hated gambling. He was all over Kenny about it."

"Because Kenny was an idiot with his money," Amanda countered. The bitter edge to her voice reminded Sara that the two had dated for many years. "For Bill, it was just fun, blowing off steam, and sometimes he won a lot of money, and sometimes he lost a little, but he always knew when to walk away. It wasn't an addiction for him. It was sport.”

Will finally spoke up. “Why didn’t Evelyn tell me that when I was investigating her?”

Amanda smiled. “She didn’t tell you a hell of a lot about anything when you were investigating her.”

“No,” he agreed. “But she could’ve easily gotten rid of the suspicion if—”

“There was no suspicion,” Amanda interrupted. She directed her words toward Faith. “Your mother was the one who turned in the team. That’s why they called her Almeja. She was a snitch.”

“What?” Faith’s confusion was almost palpable. She looked at Will as if he had the answers. “Why didn’t she tell me?”

Amanda said, “Because she wanted to protect you. The less you knew, the safer you were.”

Will said, “Then why are you telling her now?”

Amanda was obviously annoyed. “Because you won’t get off that stupid account, even though I’ve told you time and again that it doesn’t matter.”

Will had put his coffee mug on the counter. He slowly turned the handle so that it was parallel to the backplash.

Faith asked what Sara was thinking. “How did she find out they were taking money?”

Amanda shrugged. “Does it matter?”

“Yes,” Will answered. He obviously wanted to hear the story so that he could find the holes.

Amanda took a deep breath before starting, “There was a bust on the southside, one of the projects in East Point. Evelyn led the raid team into the apartment. Early morning. The bad guys were still asleep, hungover from the night before, with a pile of money sitting on the coffee table and enough coke to take down an elephant.” Amanda started to smile, clearly enjoying the story. “They rounded them up and perp walked them into the street. They had their hands behind their backs, sitting on their knees, staring at the doors on the squad cars to remind them who was in charge. In comes the media, which Boyd could never resist. He lines up the team for photos, with the bad guys in the background. Charlie’s Angels territory. Your mother always hated that part. She usually left—went back to the office to do the paperwork—when the press came. This time, the street was blocked, so she went back into the apartment and looked around for herself.” Amanda pursed her lips. “First thing she notices is that the cash pile doesn’t look like it did before. She said it was stacked into a pyramid when they busted down the door. You know your mom was always the first one in.” Faith nodded. “She said she noticed the pyramid right off, because Zeke used to—”

“Pyramid everything.” Faith explained, “When he was ten or eleven, he started stacking stuff—books, Legos, Matchbox cars—into pyramids.”

“Your mother thought he was autistic. Maybe she was right.” Amanda continued, “Anyway, she noticed the pile, is the point here. That the pyramid was a square when she went back into the apartment. She started watching the team more closely after that, keeping her ear to the ground, tracking which cases made it and which fell apart because evidence was lost or witnesses went missing. And then when she was sure, she came to me.”

Will said, "You told me the tip was anonymous."

"Evelyn had to be investigated just like everyone else. These weren't choirboys we were dealing with. Boyd and the crew were raking in tons of cash. They were also being paid to look the other way. You don't cut into that kind of business without risking your life. Ev had to be protected. So we decided that we'd call it an anonymous tip and put her through the ringer just like everyone else."

Faith said, "But they must've suspected the tip came from Mom. She was the only one who wasn't in on it."

"There's a big leap between suspecting and knowing." Her tone became strained. "And Boyd Spivey protected her. He let it be known that she was off limits. He stood up for her at every turn. I suppose that's why they took him out. They could take the GBI and the APD on their tails, but someone with Boyd's juice could get to them in ways we can't."

Faith was quiet, probably thinking about the dead man who had protected her mother. For her part, Sara was thinking about the time and money that went into putting a hit on a man who lived on death row. The whole thing had been carefully planned and executed by people who knew Evelyn Mitchell's weak points: Boyd Spivey, her muscle; Faith, her daughter; Amanda, her best friend. This was sounding more and more like a revenge attack and less like a money grab. Sara could tell that Will had made the same connections. But as usual, when he finally spoke, he didn't make mention of the obvious.

Instead, he asked Amanda, "Did you redact the bank account out of my report?"

"We're not the IRS." She shrugged. "No reason to punish someone for doing the right thing."

Sara could tell Will was angry, but he still said nothing. He didn't even seethe. He just tucked his hands into his pockets and leaned his back against the counter. She had never had an argument with him. At this point, she wasn't sure she ever would, but Sara could imagine that it would be a grand exercise in futility.

For her part, Faith seemed oblivious to the holes in Amanda's story. Considering her blood sugar had been spiking and plummeting like a Ping-Pong ball for the last few days, it was surprising she could even sit up straight. That was why Sara was sure she'd heard wrong when Faith finally spoke.

"They left her finger under my pillow."

Amanda didn't blink an eye. "Where is the finger?"

"In my medicine cabinet." Faith put her hand to her mouth. She looked as if she was going to be sick. Sara jumped up and grabbed the trashcan, but Faith waved her away. "I'm all right." She took a few deep breaths. Sara got a glass out of the cabinet and filled it with water.

Faith drank greedily, her throat making gulping sounds.

Sara refilled the glass and put it in front of her. She leaned back against the counter and kept an eye on Faith. Will was leaning a few feet down from her. His hands were still in his pockets. She felt the distance between them like a cold rush of air.

Faith took a sip of water before telling them, "They tried to get Jeremy. I sent him away with my brother. Emma, too. And then I went to the grocery store and the guy cornered me in the bathroom."

Amanda asked, "What did he look like?"

Faith gave them a very detailed description of his height, weight, clothing, grammar. "I think he was Hispanic. He had blue eyes." She looked at Sara. "Is that normal?"

"It's not common, but it's not rare." Sara explained, "Mexico was settled by Spaniards. Some of them married Native Americans. Not all Mexicans have brown skin and dark hair. Some have blond hair and lighter skin. Some have blue or green eyes. It's a recessive gene, but it shows up."

Amanda asked, "But this guy had blue eyes?"

Faith nodded.

"No tattoos?"

"A snake on his neck."

It was Amanda's turn to nod. "We can put that on the wire. At the very least, we can get a list of Hispanic men eighteen to twenty who have blue eyes." She seemed to remember something. "No luck on the search for tattoo parlors. Whoever did Marcellus Estevez's tattoo of the archangel Gabriel is either out of state, off the books, or isn't talking."

"There was something familiar about him," Faith said. "I thought maybe I'd arrested him, but he told me no."

"I'm sure he was telling the truth." Amanda pulled out her BlackBerry and started typing as she talked. "I'll have records look through your reports. I know someone in the APD who can sneak in the back door for your cases before you started working with us."

"I doubt you'll find anything." Faith rubbed her temples. "He's Jeremy's age. Maybe he knows him. Maybe they went to school together. I don't know."

Amanda finished her email. "Did you ask Jeremy?"

Faith nodded her head. "I gave him a rough description last night. He doesn't know anybody who fits the bill. At least no one he can recall."

Will asked, "Is there anything else you can remember?"

Obviously, there was something. Faith looked reticent. "It's something really stupid. Maybe ..." She looked at Sara. "My blood sugar has been crazy. It's making me hallucinate."

Sara asked, "In what way?"

"I just—" She shook her head. "It's stupid. The silverware drawer was wrong." She laughed at herself. "It's really stupid. Never mind."

"Go on," Sara told her. "What was wrong with it?"

"The forks were turned the wrong way. And the spoons. And my pens were in the wrong drawer. I always put them in the same place, and ... And then I went into the living room and the snow globes were all turned toward the wall. They usually face out. I'm really careful with them. They belonged to my father. I dust them every week. Jeremy isn't allowed to touch them. Zeke wouldn't go near them. I just ..." She shook her head. "I don't know. Maybe I did it last night and I don't remember. Maybe I just thought they were turned around. But I remember turning them back around, so ..." She put her head in her hands. "My mind has been off-kilter since all of this happened. I'm not sure what's real and what's not. Maybe I'm just going crazy. Could I be hallucinating?"

Sara told her, "Your numbers are erratic, but they don't point to metabolic derangement. You're not that dehydrated, but you're certainly under a lot of stress. Do you feel like you have a cold or infection?" Faith shook her head. "I'd expect confusion, which you've shown, and paranoia, which is understandable, but not full-on hallucinations." She felt the need to add, "Turning the snow globes around sounds more like something a kid would do for attention. You're sure your son didn't do it?"

"I haven't asked him. It's embarrassing even to talk about. I'm sure it's nothing."

Amanda was shaking her head. "Jeremy wouldn't do something like that, especially with what's been going on. He wouldn't want to cause you more stress. And he's almost twenty years old. He's too mature for that sort of thing."

"Maybe I just imagined it," Faith said. "Why would these guys turn around all the snow globes?" She seemed to remember something else. "And unscrew the light bulbs."

Amanda sighed. "It doesn't matter, Faith. What matters is that we've got to get a plan together." She checked her watch. "It's almost seven o'clock. We need to put our thinking caps on."

Faith said, "Will's right. They're watching Mom's house. I know they're watching mine. If we bring in the APD—"

"I have no intention of doing something so stupid," Amanda interrupted. "We still don't know if Chuck Finn is involved in this or not." Faith opened her mouth to protest, but Amanda held up her hand to stop her. "I know you think that Chuck was pushed into a life of crime while the others willingly jumped in, but guilty doesn't come in shades. He took the money. He spent it. He confessed to his crimes and he's out on the street somewhere with a very serious habit that costs a great deal of money. You also need to remember that Chuck still has friends on the Atlanta force, and where he doesn't have friends, he might have the money to buy them. I know you don't want to hear this, but there's no getting around that he either gave Hironobu Kwon the tip-off or he's pulling the strings on this new group of young guns."

Faith countered, "That doesn't sound like Chuck."

"Skimming money off busts didn't sound like Chuck, either, but here we are." She told Will, "You mentioned the vantage point from Roz Levy's house. There's no way they could set up there. She'd shoot them the second they set foot in the driveway."

"It's true," Faith agreed. "Mrs. Levy watches the street like a hawk."

Will countered, "Unless someone's getting shot or kidnapped next door."

Amanda ignored the observation. "The point, Will, is that we can exploit the position just as easily as the kidnappers can. Short of shipping you in the world's largest box, we need to figure out how we're going to get you and your rifle into Roz Levy's carport without being seen." She looked at Faith. "Are you sure you weren't followed here?"

Faith shook her head. "I was careful. I wasn't followed."

"Good girl," Amanda told her. She was back in her element, almost giddy with the task at hand. "I need to make some phone calls to find out what's going on at Evelyn's house. Our bad guys wouldn't have suggested a meeting there if they thought the Atlanta Crime Scene Unit was going to be steady at work. We'll see if Charlie can make some inquiries, too. Failing that, I think I've got a few more favors in my pocket with some old gals in Zone Six who would love nothing more than to show the kids how it's done. Dr. Linton?"

Sara was surprised to hear her name. "Yes?"

"Thank you for your time. I trust you'll keep this little party to yourself?"

"Of course."

Faith stood behind Amanda. "Thank you," she said. "Again."

Sara hugged her. "Be careful."

Will was next. He held out his hand. "Dr. Linton."

Sara looked down, wondering if she was having one of Faith's hallucinations. He was actually shaking her hand goodbye.

He said, "Thank you for your help. I'm sorry we imposed on you this morning."

Faith mumbled something Sara couldn't hear.

Amanda opened the closet. Sara guessed the smile on her face wasn't there because she was happy to see her coat. "I know a lot of Evelyn's neighbors. They're mostly retired and I think that with the exception of that old battle-ax across the street, they'll be okay with us using their places. I'll need to get my hands on some cash. I think I can make that happen, but we'll be tight for time." She slipped on her coat. "Faith, you'll need to go home and wait until you hear from us. I imagine at some point we'll need you to run to a bank or two. Will, go home and change that shirt. The collar's frayed and you're missing a button. And while you're at it, you'd better start building a Trojan horse or come up with a plan to romance Roz Levy. She was ready to have Faith arrested an hour ago. God knows what bee is up her wrinkled old butt this morning."

"Yes, ma'am."

Sara opened the front door for them. Amanda started toward the elevator. Will, ever the gentleman, stepped aside so that Faith could leave first.

Sara shut the door after Faith.

"What—" Will began, but she put her finger to his lips.

"Sweetheart, I know you've got work to do and I know it's going to be dangerous, but whatever you get into today will not be nearly as life-threatening as what'll happen if you ever do to me what you did to me last night and then think you can get off with a handshake the next morning. Okay?"

He swallowed.

"Call me later." She kissed him goodbye, then opened the door so that he could leave.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Will subscribed to a lot of car magazines. Mostly, he bought them for the pictures, but sometimes he felt compelled to read the articles. That's how he knew that Roz Levy's avocado green 1960 Chevrolet Corvair 700 sedan was worth considerably more than Faith's five-dollar appraisal.

The car was a beauty, the sort of classic American carmakers used to be known for. The rear-mounted, air-cooled, horizontally opposed, aluminum flat-six engine had been engineered to directly take on the increasingly more popular compact-sized European models coming onto the market. The design was renowned for its innovative swing-axle rear suspension, which received its own chapter in Ralph Nader's Unsafe at Any Speed. The spare tire was mounted in the forward luggage compartment, where the engine was normally located in other cars, nestled right next to a gasoline heater for the passenger area. Though winter was over, the tank was still filled with gas, which Will knew because his face had been pressed against the metal canister while Faith drove him to Mrs. Levy's house. The sloshing of gasoline had been like ocean waves crashing against the shore. Or, a highly volatile accelerant churning less than a rusty millimeter from his face.

The car had been built well before the 2001 National Highway Traffic Safety Administration deadline that required all manufacturers to install a glow-in-the-dark emergency release strap in case someone got trapped in the trunk of the car. Will wasn't sure whether he would be able to reach a handle even if one existed. The trunk was deep but not wide, more like a pelican's mouth. He was folded into a space meant to hold a spare tire and maybe a couple of suitcases—1960s suitcases, not the modern wheelie kinds that people nowadays used to pack their entire houses in for a weekend trip to the mountains.

In short, there existed the very real possibility that he might die in here before Roz Levy remembered that she was supposed to let him out.

There was a thin sliver of light coming through the cracked rubber seal around the hinge. Will lifted up his cell phone to check the time. He'd been in the trunk for almost two hours and had at least another half hour to go. His rifle was jammed between his legs in a way that was no longer pleasant. His paddle holster was turned so that his Glock dug into his side like an insistent finger. The bottle of water Faith had given him had long been recycled back into the plastic bottle. It was approximately six thousand degrees inside the metal tomb. He had lost feeling in his hands and feet. He was beginning to think that this was a very bad idea.

It was the words "Trojan horse" that had gotten him thinking. One call to Roz Levy proved that she wasn't going to make this easy for them. She was still pissed about Faith taking her car. She'd refused to let any of them inside of her house. Unusually, Will was the person who suggested the idiotic thing for him to do. Faith would return the Corvair to the carport. He would hide in the trunk until a few minutes before the appointed time. Mrs. Levy would take out her trash, releasing the trunk lid along the way. Will would then crawl out and give Faith cover.

The fact that Roz Levy agreed to this alternate plan so easily made him suspect that she wasn't going to play along, but by then another hour had passed and they didn't really have a choice in the matter.

There were other Trojan horses, too—most of them more clever than Will's. The good thing about Amanda's old gals was that they were old and they were women, which went against type in this particular situation. Whoever was watching the neighborhood would be expecting testosterone-pumped young guns with trigger fingers and short haircuts. Amanda had sent in six of her friends to various houses around the block. They'd had bakeware and cake stands in their hands, their purses dangling from their arms. Some of them carried Bibles. They would look like visitors to anyone who was paying attention.

The outside perimeter was covered by a cable truck, a mobile pet groomer's van, and a bright yellow Prius that no self-respecting cop would ever drive. Between the three vehicles, they could monitor all traffic coming in and out of the two roads that led to the Mitchell section of the neighborhood.

Even with all of this, Will still was not happy with the plan. It was the lesser of two evils, the greater evil being no police presence at all. He didn't like the idea of Faith being so vulnerable, even though she was armed and had proven to anyone who was paying attention that she would not hesitate to shoot somebody. He felt in his gut that Amanda was wrong. This wasn't about money. Maybe on the surface it was. Maybe even the kidnappers themselves thought it was about cold, hard cash. But at the end of the day, their behavior belied that motivation. This was personal. Someone was working out a grudge. Chuck Finn seemed like the most likely culprit. His underlings wanted the cash. Chuck wanted revenge. It was a win-win for everyone but Faith.

And for the idiot trapped in a 1960 Corvair.

Will winced as he tried to shift his position. His back ached. His nose itched. His ass felt like he had been pressing his full weight against a piece of hardened steel for two hours. In retrospect, shoving Will into a trunk sounded more like the kind of idea Amanda would have. Painful. Humiliating. Bound to end badly for Will. He must've had some sort of death wish. Or maybe he just wanted to spend a couple of hours simmering in the heat because it was the only way he'd have time to think about what he'd gotten himself into. And he didn't mean the car.

Will had never smoked a cigarette. He'd never done an illegal drug of any kind. He hated the taste of alcohol. As a kid, he'd seen how addictions could ruin lives, and as a cop, he saw how it could end them. He'd never been tempted to imbibe. He'd never understood how people could be so desperate for the next high that they were willing to trade away their lives and everything that mattered for another hit. They stole. They prostituted themselves. They abandoned or sold their children. They murdered people. They would do anything to avoid getting dopesick, that point at which the body craved the drug so badly that it turned on itself. Muscle cramps. Stabbing pains in the gut. Blinding headaches. Cotton mouth. Heart palpitations. Sweaty palms.

Will's physical discomfort wasn't solely caused by the tight quarters in Mrs.

Levy's Corvair.

He was dopesick for Sara.

To his credit, he realized that his response to her was completely disproportionate to what a normal human being should be feeling right now. He was going to make a fool of himself. More so than he already had. He didn't know how to be around her. At least not when they weren't having sex. And they'd had a lot of sex, so it had taken Sara some time before she finally got the full-on view of Will's astounding stupidity. And what a show he had put on for her. Shaking her hand like a realtor at an open house. He was surprised that she hadn't slapped him. Even Amanda and Faith had been at a loss for words as they'd all waited for the elevator in the hall. His idiocy had actually rendered them speechless.

Will was beginning to wonder if there was something physically wrong with him. Maybe he was diabetic like Faith. She was always yelling at him about his afternoon sticky bun, his second breakfast, his love of cheesy nachos from the downstairs vending machine. He went through his symptoms. He was sweating profusely. His thoughts were racing. He was confused. He was thirsty and he really, really needed to urinate.

Sara hadn't seemed mad at him when she'd told him goodbye. She had called him sweetheart, which he'd only been called once before, and that time was by her, too. She had kissed him. It wasn't a passionate kiss—more like a peck. The sort of thing you saw on 1950s television shows right before the husband put on his hat and went off to work. She had told him to call her later. Did she really want him to call her or had she just been making a point? Will was used to the women in his life making points at his expense. But what defined later? Did that mean later tonight or later tomorrow? Or later in the week?

Will groaned. He was a thirty-four-year-old man with a job and a dog to take care of. He had to get himself back under control. There was no way he was going to call Sara. Not later tonight or even later next week. He was too unsophisticated for her. Too socially awkward. Too desperate to be with her. Will had learned the hard way that the best thing to do when you really wanted something was to put it out of your mind, because you were never going to get it. He had to do that now with Sara. He had to do that before he got himself shot or he ended up getting Faith killed because he was acting like a lovesick schoolgirl.

The worst part was that Angie had been right about everything.

Well, maybe not everything.

Sara didn't color her hair.

His phone vibrated. Will struggled not to castrate himself with his rifle while he pressed the Bluetooth piece into his ear. The trunk was well insulated, but he still kept his voice to a whisper. "Yeah?"

"Will?" That's all he needed—Amanda's voice in his head. "What are you doing?"

"Sweating," he whispered back, wondering if she could've asked a more pointless question. He'd had this idea of springing out of the trunk like a superhero. After all this time, he realized he'd probably do well not to roll out onto the ground like a tongue.

"We're set up at Ida Johnson's." Evelyn's backyard neighbor. Will wasn't sure how Amanda had sweet-talked the woman into letting a bunch of cops sit in her house. Maybe she'd promised that Faith wouldn't shoot any more drug dealers in her yard again. "I just heard a call on the scanner. There was a drive-by shooting in East Atlanta. Two dead. Ahbidi Mittal and his team just left Evelyn's house so they can process the car. High profile. A woman and her kid. White, blonde, middle class, pretty."

So, now they knew how the kidnappers planned to get Evelyn's house cleared out. Amanda had made some discreet calls earlier and found out that the CSU team had at least another three days on the house. They knew that Evelyn's abductors had some drive-by experience. Obviously, these particular bad guys weren't afraid of killing innocent bystanders, and they knew exactly the right victim profile to make sure every news station in Atlanta halted programming to cover the events live at the scene.

The most troubling part to Will was that this proved they had no problem murdering a mother and her child.

Amanda said, "Evelyn's backyard is dug up."

Maybe it was the heat. Will had the image of a dog looking for a bone.

"She must've told them the money was in the backyard. Holes are everywhere."

That had been one of Will's early guesses. He saw how stupid it was now. People didn't hide money like that anymore. Even Evelyn had a bank account. Everything was on a file in a computer these days.

He kept his tone low. "Did Mrs. Levy see them digging?"

Amanda was uncharacteristically silent.

"Amanda?"

"She's not answering her phone right now, but I'm sure she's just taking a nap."

He couldn't swallow. It wasn't funny anymore now that it might actually happen.

"She'll have her alarm set to wake her."

Will wondered how the old woman was going to hear her alarm if she couldn't hear a phone. And then he stopped worrying, because he was going to pass out from heat stroke long before that happened.

Amanda said, "I've got two friends with me and another old gal in the street. She'll keep an eye on Faith while she's on route to the house. Bev's with the Secret Service. She requisitioned a mail truck."

Will wished that he were more surprised by this information. If Amanda told him that she called an old gal at the White House and borrowed the nuclear codes, he would just nod.

"Everything's lining up." Amanda always got chatty right before a case was about to break, and now was no exception. "Faith is waiting at her house. She went to three different banks this morning to support her safe deposit box story. We had one of the managers hand her the cash at the last drop. All the bills are registered. There's a tracker in the lining of the duffel." She was silent for a moment. "I think she'll be okay. Sara got her evened out for now. I'm worried that she's not taking care of herself."

Will was worried about that, too. He'd always thought of Faith as indestructible. She seemed capable of handling any crisis. Maybe that had come from being thrust into motherhood before she was ready. Mrs. Levy's words about the pregnancy scandal rocking the neighborhood kept coming back to him. Faith obviously still carried some shame. She had blushed when she explained her mother's words to Sara, though Evelyn was obviously just using what might be her last words to her daughter to lift away some of that guilt. Faith's entire life had been shattered by her pregnancy. Somehow, she had managed to pick up the pieces. Evelyn had been there to offer her support, but Faith had done all the heavy lifting. Getting her GED. Joining the Academy. Going back to college. Raising her kid. She was one of the strongest women Will had ever met. In some ways, she was even stronger than Amanda.

And she deserved the truth.

Will whispered, "Why did you lie to Faith about her father being a gambler?"

Amanda didn't answer.

He started to ask her again. "Why did you—"

"Because he was," Amanda said. "I would think after this morning, you would recognize that there are other things a man can gamble with besides money."

Will swallowed the last bit of saliva in his mouth. He wasn't up to Amanda's riddles right now. "Evelyn was on the take."

"She made a big mistake a long time ago, and she's been paying for it ever since."

He struggled to keep his voice quiet. "She took money—"

"I'll make you a promise, Will. If we get Evelyn out of this, then she'll tell you the whole truth about everything. You can have a whole hour with her. She'll answer any question you have."

He glanced around the trunk, the slit of light coming through the cracked rubber seal. "And if we don't?"

"Then it won't matter, will it?" He heard talking in the background. "I need to go. I'll call you when I have news."

Will shifted the rifle again so that he could end the call. He closed his eyes and tried to clear his mind. A bead of sweat glided down his back. There was a stinging sensation near the base of his spine where Sara had scratched him.

He shook his head, trying to clear the image from his mind so that his rifle didn't file a complaint for sexual assault. Will thought about the rifle sitting in the witness stand, using its trigger to wipe a tear from its scope.

He shook his head again. The heat was really getting to him. He started going over the case to focus his mind. Amanda always wanted him to talk it out from the beginning. It was the best way to see what they had missed. In the heat of the moment, it was hard to put together the pieces. Now, Will went through the last few days step-by-step, examining all the angles, reviewing all the lies and half-truths the bad guys had told them as well as the lies and half-truths Amanda had spun.

As before, Will's mind kept coming back to Chuck Finn. It was a process of elimination. Chuck was the only man from Evelyn's former team who was not accounted for. He had been at Healing Winds with Hironobu Kwon. He obviously knew Roger Ling, who called him Chuckleberry Finn.

Roger had also talked about cutting off the head of the snake. There had to be one person in charge. Chuck could very well be that person. He ticked a lot of boxes: He had a personal vendetta against Evelyn Mitchell for turning him in.

His life in prison wasn't a cakewalk. He'd gone from being a well-respected police officer to having to watch his back in the shower room.

The man had probably developed his habit inside the joint, then reveled in it the minute he'd been paroled. Heroin and crack added up to an expensive habit. Even if Chuck was clean now, his money would be long gone. Of all the detectives Will investigated, Chuck was the one who had the least to show for his crimes. He'd shot his wad on luxury travel, seeing every corner of the world in the style of a multimillionaire. The trip to Africa alone had cost around a hundred thousand dollars. The only person Will interviewed who seemed to really be upset about the charges against Chuck Finn was his travel agent.

Will guessed he would find out soon enough whether or not Chuck was really behind all of this. He heard the carport door open, the shuffle of bedroom slippers across the concrete. The trunk cracked open, daylight pouring in like water. He saw Mrs. Levy pad by with a white garbage bag in her hand. There was the clatter of a plastic Herbie Curbie garbage can as she threw away the trash.

Will clutched the rifle in one hand and held down the trunk lid with the other. His movement was as predicted—more like a lazy tongue flopping onto the concrete than Superman leaping into action. Roz Levy passed right by him. She looked straight ahead, cool as a cucumber. Her hand reached out, effortlessly making the small movement to close the trunk. Without a glance down at Will, she was back inside the house, door closed, and he was left thinking that it was entirely possible this old woman had been calm enough not just to kill her husband but to lie to Amanda's face about it for the last decade.

Will lay on the concrete for a few seconds, relishing the feel of cold on his skin, gulping in the crisp, fresh air tinged with the odor of leaking oil from the Corvair's back end. He got up on his elbows. His memory of the carport, while accurate, was next to useless. It was a wide-open space front to back, like the underpass of a bridge, only more dangerous. Roz Levy's house was on one side of the structure. On the other was the brick knee wall, about four feet high, with an ornate metal column at each end to support the roof. Will could see into the street from under the car, but there was no vantage point from which to tell whether or not he was being watched.

He looked to his side. The Herbie Curbie was equidistant between the half wall and the car. Will guessed the blur of movement would be obvious to anyone watching, but he didn't really have a choice. He got up into a low squat. He held his breath, thinking there was no time to waste, and darted behind the large trashcan.

No bullets. No shouts. Nothing but his heart pounding in his chest.

There were at least three more feet to go to the knee wall. Will braced himself to move, then stopped because there was probably a better way to do this than sit against the wall with a neon sign pointing to his head. Slowly, he pushed the trash container, duckwalking behind it, and closing the gap between the car and the wall. At least he had some visual cover, if not protection, from anyone out in the street. Across the yard was another matter. The brick wall might protect him from shots fired from Evelyn's house, but he was basically an easy target to anyone who walked up on him from the backyard.

Will couldn't squat like this forever. He bent down on one knee and chanced a look over the wall. The space was clear. Evelyn's house was on a lower elevation. He could not have lined up the bathroom window any better if he'd planned it. It was high in the wall, probably inside the shower. The opening was narrow enough to fit a small child through, though unfortunately not a grown man. Especially an overgrown man. The shade was pulled up. Will could see clear down the hallway. With the rifle scope to his eye, he could make out the wood grain in the door that led to Evelyn's carport. It was closed. Black powder dusted the white where the CSU techs had taken fingerprints.

They had already talked this out. When Faith came into the house, she was supposed to enter through that door.

Will's phone vibrated. He pressed the Bluetooth piece. "I'm in position."

"The black van was just spotted on Beverly. They came from the Peachtree side."

Will tightened his hand on the grip. "Where's Faith?"

"She just left her house. She's on foot."

He didn't have to say anything. They both knew this was not part of the plan. Faith was supposed to drive, not go for a stroll.

He heard the rattling of an engine in the street. The black van pulled close to the curb. They weren't exactly incognito. Bullet holes pocked the side panels. Will slid the lever on the side of the rifle to fire. He aimed down on the middle section of the van as the side door slid open. He scanned the inside, surprised by what he found.

Will whispered to Amanda, "There are only two of them. They have Evelyn."

"You're authorized to take your shot."

He didn't see how that was going to happen. The two young men on either side of Evelyn Mitchell each had their weapons aimed at her head. It looked impressive, but if one of them pulled the trigger, it wouldn't just take out Evelyn—the bullet would go straight through her skull and into his buddy's head. Amanda would've called this doing the Lord's work if her best friend in the world weren't in the middle of these two Einsteins.

They jerked Evelyn down from the van, making sure that her body gave them cover. She screamed in pain, the sound piercing the quiet afternoon. She wasn't tied up, but Evelyn Mitchell could hardly run off to safety. One of her legs was crudely splinted with two broken-off broom handles. Duct tape kept them in place. She was obviously severely wounded. Her abductors obviously did not care.

Both boys were wearing black jackets and black baseball hats. Their heads swiveled around as they looked for possible threats. They walked single file, with Evelyn sandwiched between them. The one in back kept a Glock jammed into her ribs, spurring her on the way you would a horse. She obviously couldn't walk on her own. Glock's arm was wrapped around her waist. She leaned back into him with every step, her face a mask of pain. The one in front kept his knees bent as he walked. Evelyn's hand dug into his shoulder for balance. The man didn't falter. He kept sweeping a Tec-9 back and forth across the front of the house. His finger was on the notoriously sensitive trigger. Will hadn't seen a Tec-9 since the now-expired federal assault-weapons ban had forced the manufacturer out of business. The gun had been used during the Columbine massacre. It was a semiautomatic, but that hardly mattered when you had fifty rounds in the magazine.

For just a second, Will took his eye away from the scope and checked the street. It was empty. No Chuck Finn. No more young guns in black jackets and black baseball hats. He looked back through the scope. His stomach dropped. There couldn't just be two of them.

Amanda's voice was terse. "Do you have the shot?"

Will's sights were lined up on Tec-9's chest. Maybe the two kids weren't complete amateurs after all. Tec-9 was directly in front of Evelyn, guaranteeing that any bullet that went through him would go through Evelyn, too. The same held true for Glock, who was pressed behind her. A head shot was out of the question. Even if there was a way to take down Tec-9, Glock would have a round in Evelyn before Will could realign his sights. Will may as well kill the prisoner as kill one of her captives. "No shot," he whispered to Amanda. "It's too risky."

She didn't argue with him. "Keep the line open. I'll let you know when Faith reaches the house."

Will tracked the three figures until they disappeared inside the carport. He pivoted, lining up the rifle to the kitchen door, holding his breath as he waited. The door was kicked open. Will kept his finger resting on the trigger guard as Evelyn Mitchell stumbled into the kitchen. Glock was still behind her. He lifted and carried her, the strain showing on his face. Tec-9 was still in front, still walking low. The top of his hat showed at Evelyn's chest level. Will studied her face. One of her eyes was swollen shut. The skin on her cheek was ripped open.

They were in the foyer. Evelyn winced when Glock loosened his grip around her waist to set her down. She was a thin woman, but she was practically dead weight. The kid behind her was breathing heavy. He pressed his head into her back. Like Tec-9, he was still more teenager than man.

The light in the foyer changed. The space darkened. They must have pulled down the blinds covering the front windows. They were vinyl, meant to filter the light, not completely block it. Will could still clearly see all three figures. Evelyn was half carried, half pushed again, this time into the living room. He saw the black hat, the Tec-9 waving in the air. Then they were gone. His line of sight cleared straight through to the kitchen.

"They're in the living room," he told Amanda. "All of them." He didn't point out that her obvious plan was already off the rails. Evelyn wasn't being kept in the back bedroom. They wanted her front and center when Faith entered the house.

Amanda said, "They're using Ev as a shield while they close the curtains in the back. I can't get a shot." She muttered a curse. "I can't see anything."

"Where's Faith?"

"She should be here soon."

Will tried to relax his body so his shoulders didn't ache. No Chuck Finn. No stashing Evelyn. The two boys had not checked the house for lurking cops. They hadn't secured the scene. They hadn't barricaded the front door or taken any precautions to make sure their escape was just as easy as their entry.

Every item they failed to check off the list was like a noose tightening around Faith's neck.

All Will could do now was wait.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Before she left the house, Faith used Jeremy's iPhone to make a video for her children. She told them that she loved them, that they were everything to her, and that no matter what happened today, they should always know that she cherished every hair on their precious heads. She told Jeremy that keeping him was the best decision she had made in her life. That he was her life. She told Emma the same, and added that Victor Martinez was a good man, and that she was glad that her daughter would get to know her father.

Dramatic, Zeke would've called it. She had made a video for him, too. Her words to her brother had surprised her, mostly because the phrase "you asshole" hadn't come up once. She told him that she loved him. She told him that she was sorry for what she'd put him through.

And then she'd tried to leave a video for her mother. Faith had stopped and started the recording at least a dozen times. There was so much to say. That she was sorry. That she hoped Evelyn wasn't disappointed with the choices that Faith had made. That every small bit of good inside of Faith had come from her parents. That her only goal in life ever had been to be as good a cop, as good a mother, as good a woman, as her own mother.

In the end, she had given up, because the likelihood that Evelyn Mitchell would ever see the recording was very slim.

Faith was not completely delusional. She knew that she was walking into a trap. Earlier, in Sara's kitchen, Amanda hadn't been listening to Will but Faith had. She saw the logic in what he was saying, that there was more to this than just a money grab. Amanda was infused with the thrill of the chase, the opportunity to tell these upstart bastards who'd had the gall to take her best friend that they weren't going to get away with it. Will, as usual, was more clearheaded about the situation. He knew how to ask the right questions, but, just as importantly, he knew how to listen to the answers.

He was a logical man, not given to emotion—at least Faith didn't think he was. There was no telling what went on in that head of his. God help Sara Linton and the Herculean task in front of her. The handshake this morning wouldn't be the worst of it. Even if Sara managed to get Angie Trent out of the picture, which Faith doubted was possible, there was still Will's immutable stubbornness. The last time Faith had seen a man shut down so quickly was when she'd told Jeremy's father that she was pregnant.

Or maybe Faith was wrong about Will. She was about as good at reading her partner as he was at reading a book. The only thing Faith could swear by was Will's uncanny ability to understand emotional behavior in others. Faith supposed this came from being raised in care, having to quickly discern whether the person in front of him was friend or foe. He was a maestro at massaging facts out of the subtle clues that normal people tended to ignore. She knew it was just a matter of time before Will figured out what had happened with Evelyn all those years ago. Faith had only figured it out herself this morning when, for what might be the last time, she went through Jeremy's things.

Of course, she couldn't completely leave it to Will's investigative telepathy. Faith, ever the control freak, had written a letter outlining everything that had happened and why. She'd mailed it to Will's house from the last bank she visited. The Atlanta police would look at the videos on Jeremy's iPhone, but Will would never tell them what Faith had written in the letter.

This much she trusted to her core: Will Trent knew how to keep a secret.

Faith blocked the letter from her mind as she walked out her front door. She stopped thinking about her mother, Jeremy, Emma, Zeke—anyone who might cloud her mind. She was armed to the teeth. There was a kitchen knife inside the duffel bag, hidden below the cash. Zeke's Walther was stuck down the front of her pants. She was wearing an ankle holster with one of Amanda's backup S&Ws pressed firmly against her skin. The metal chafed. It felt obvious and bulky in a way that made her have to concentrate so she didn't limp.

Faith walked past the Mini. She refused to drive her car to her mother's house. It was too much like every other normal day when she loaded up Emma and her things and drove the block and a half to her mother's home. Faith had been stubborn her entire life and she wasn't going to stop that now. She wanted to at least do one thing today on her own terms.

She took a left at the bottom of her driveway, then a right toward her mother's house. She scanned the long stretch of street. Cars were pulled into carports and garages. No one was out on their front porch, though that was hardly unusual. This was a back porch neighborhood. For the most part, people minded their own business.

At least they did now.

There was a parked mail delivery truck on her right. The carrier got out as Faith passed. Faith didn't recognize the woman—an older, hippie-looking type with a salt-and-pepper Crystal Gayle ponytail down her back. The hair swung as she walked to Mr. Cable's mailbox and shoved in a bunch of lingerie catalogues.

Faith shifted the duffel to her other hand as she took a left onto her mother's street. The canvas bag and the cash inside it were heavy, almost fifteen pounds all together. The money was in six bricks, each approximately four inches high. They had settled on $580,000, all in hundred-dollar bills, mostly because that was the amount of cash Amanda could sign out of evidence. It seemed like a credible amount of money if Evelyn had been mixed up in the corruption that had taken down her squad.

But she hadn't been involved in the corruption. Faith had never doubted her mother's innocence, so the confirmation from Amanda had not brought her much peace. Part of Faith must have sensed there was more to the story. There were other things her mother had been mixed up in that were equally as damning, yet Faith, ever the spoiled child, had squeezed her eyes shut for so long that part of her couldn't believe the truth anymore.

Evelyn had called this kind of denial "voluntary blindness." Normally, she was describing a particular type of idiot—a mother who insisted her son deserved another chance even though he'd been twice convicted of rape. A man who kept insisting that prostitution was a victimless crime. Cops who thought it was their right to take dirty money. Daughters who were so wrapped up in their own problems that they didn't bother to look around and see that other people were suffering, too.

Faith felt a breeze in her hair as she reached her mother's driveway. There was a black van on the street, directly in front of the mailbox. The cab was empty, at least as far as she could tell. There were no windows in the back. Bullet holes pierced the metal on one side. The tag was nondescript. There was a faded Obama/Biden sticker on the chrome bumper.

She lifted up the yellow crime scene tape blocking off the driveway. Evelyn's Impala was still parked under the carport. Faith had played hopscotch in this driveway. She had taught Jeremy how to throw a basketball at the rusty old hoop Bill Mitchell had bolted to the eaves. She had dropped off Emma here almost every day for the last few months, giving her mother and daughter a kiss on the cheek before driving off to work.

Faith tightened her grip around the duffel as she walked into the carport. She was sweating, and the cool breeze in the covered area brought a chill. She looked around. The shed door was still open. It was hard to believe that only two days had passed since Faith had first seen Emma locked in the small building.

She turned toward the house. The door to the kitchen had been kicked open. It hung at an angle from the hinges. She saw the bloody handprint her mother had left, the space where her ring finger should've pressed against the wood. Faith held her breath as she pushed open the door, expecting to be shot in the face. She even closed her eyes. Nothing came. Just the empty space of the kitchen, and blood everywhere.

When she'd entered the house two days ago, Faith had been so focused on finding her mother that she hadn't really processed what she was seeing. Now, she understood the violent battle that had taken place. She'd worked her share of crime scenes. She knew what a struggle looked like. Even with the body long removed from the laundry room, Faith could still recall the placement, what he'd been wearing, the way his hand fanned out against the floor.

Will had told her the kid's name, but she couldn't remember it. She couldn't remember any of them—not the man she had shot in the bedroom or the man she had killed in Mrs. Johnson's backyard.

After what they had done, they didn't deserve for her to know their names.

Faith turned her attention back to the kitchen. The pass-through was empty. She could see straight down the hallway. It was the middle of the afternoon, but the house appeared to be in dusk. The bedroom doors were closed. The blinds covering the large windows on either side of the front door were drawn. The only unfiltered light came from the bathroom window. The shade was pulled up. Faith walked past the dining room and into the front foyer. She stood with the hallway on her right and the kitchen on her left. The living room was in front of her. She should take out her gun, but she didn't think they were going to shoot her. At least not yet.

The room was dim. The curtains had been pulled closed, but they were more sheer than opaque. A gentle breeze stirred the material where the glass door had been broken. The room was still turned upside down. Faith couldn't recall what it had looked like before, though she'd lived here eighteen years of her life. The packed bookshelves that lined the left-hand wall. The framed family photos. The console stereo with the scratchy speakers. The overstuffed couch. The wingback chair her father sat in while he read. Evelyn was sitting there now. Her left hand was wrapped in a blood-soaked towel. Her right was so swollen it could've belonged to a mannequin. Two broom handles were duct-taped around her leg, keeping it straight out in front of her. Her white blouse was stained with blood. Her hair was matted to the side of her head. A piece of duct tape covered her mouth. Her eyes widened when she saw Faith.

"Mama," Faith whispered. The word echoed in her brain, conjuring all the memories Faith had from the last thirty-four years. She had loved her mother. She had fought with her. Screamed at her. Lied to her. Cried in her arms. Run from her. Returned to her. And now, there was this.

The young man from the grocery store was on the other side of the room, leaning against the bookcases. His vantage point was ideal, the top of a triangle. Evelyn was down and to his left. Faith was fifteen feet away from her mother, forming the second base angle. He was in shadow, but the gun in his hand was easy to see. The barrel of a Tec-9 was pointed in Evelyn's direction. The fifty-round magazine jutted out at least twelve inches from the bottom. More clips hung out of his jacket pocket.

Faith dropped the duffel bag onto the floor. Her hand wanted to go to the Walther. She wanted to shoot the entire clip into his chest. She wouldn't aim for the head. She wanted to see his eyes, hear his screams, as the bullets ripped him apart.

"I know what you're thinking." He smiled, his platinum tooth catching a bit of what light was in the room. "'Can I pull my gun before he pulls the trigger?'"

She told him, "No." Faith was a quick draw, but the Tec-9 was already pointed at her mother's head. The math was against her.

"Get her gun."

She felt the cold metal of a muzzle pressed to her head. Someone was behind her. Another man. He wrenched the Walther from the waist of her jeans, then grabbed the duffel bag. The zip ripped open. His laughter was like a child's on Christmas morning. "Shit, man, look at all this green!" He bounced on the balls of his feet as he walked toward his friend. "Goddamn, bro! We're rich!" He threw the Walther into the bag. He had his Glock tucked in the back of his pants. "Goddamn!" he repeated, showing the bag to Evelyn. "See this, bitch? How you like that? We got it anyway."

Faith kept her eyes on the kid from the grocery store. He wasn't happy like his partner, but that was to be expected. This was never about the money. Will had called it hours ago.

The man asked Faith, "How much is in there?"

She told him, "A little over half a million."

He gave a low whistle. "You hear that, Ev? That's a lot of money you stole."

"Damn right." The partner fanned out a stack of bills. "You coulda stopped all this two days ago, bitch. I guess they call you Almeja for a reason."

Faith couldn't look at her mother. "Take it," she told the man. "That was the deal. Take the money and leave."

His friend was ready to do just that. He dropped the bag beside Evelyn's chair and picked up a roll of duct tape from the floor. "Yo, man, let's go straight up to Buckhead. I'm'a get me a Jag and—"

Two shots rang out in rapid succession. The duct tape dropped to the floor. It rolled under the chair where Evelyn sat, then the boy's body collapsed in a heap beside her. The back of his head looked like someone had taken a hammer to it. Blood gushed onto the floor, pooling around the legs of the chair, her mother's feet.

The young man said, "He talked too much. Don't you think?"

Faith's heart was pounding so loudly she could barely hear her own voice. The concealed revolver in her ankle holster felt hot, like it was burning her skin. "Do you really think you're going to make it out of here alive?"

He kept the Tec-9 aimed at her mother's head. "What makes you think I want to get out of here?"

Faith allowed herself to look at her mother. Sweat dripped from Evelyn's face. The edge of the duct tape was pulling away from her cheek. They hadn't bound her. The broken leg ensured she wasn't going anywhere. Still, she was sitting up straight in the chair. Shoulders back. Hands clasped in her lap. Her mother never slumped. She never gave away anything—except for now. There was fear in her eyes. Not fear of the man with the gun, but fear of what her daughter would be told.

"I know," Faith told her mother. "It's all right. I already know."

The man turned the gun to the side, squinting his eye as he aimed down on her mother. "What do you know, bitch?"

"You," Faith told him. "I know who you are."

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Will had his eye pressed to the rifle scope when the Tec-9 went off. He saw the flashes first, two bright strobes. A millisecond later, he registered the sound. He flinched away; he couldn't help it. When he looked back in the scope, he saw Faith. She was still standing in the front entrance hall, facing the family room. Her body swayed. He waited, counting the seconds, making sure she didn't fall. She didn't.

"What the hell happened?"

Roz Levy was on the other side of the Corvair. He looked under the car and found himself staring at the business end of a bright nickel Colt Python. Will didn't know how she managed to keep the thing steady. The gun's barrel was at least six inches long. The .357 magnum load could produce hydrostatic shock, meaning the impact from a chest wound was great enough to cause brain hemorrhaging.

He tried to keep his voice calm. "Could you please point that somewhere else?"

She drew back the gun and uncocked the hammer. "Motherfuck," she mumbled, pushing herself up. "Here comes Mandy."

Will saw Amanda running through the backyard. Her shoes were off. She had her walkie-talkie in one hand and her Glock in the other.

"Faith's okay," he told her. "She's still in the house. I don't know who—"

"Move," Amanda ordered, darting past the Corvair and into Roz Levy's house.

Will didn't follow orders. Instead, he used the scope to check Evelyn's hallway again. Faith was still standing there. She had her hands out in front of her, palms down, as if she was trying to reason with somebody. Had the flashes been warning shots or kill shots? The drive-by shooter favored two hits, one right after the other. If they'd killed Evelyn, Faith wouldn't be standing there with her hands out. Will knew in his gut that she'd either be on the floor or on top of the killers if anything happened to her mother.

"Will!" Amanda snarled.

He kept the rifle close to his body as he ran past the car and into the house. The two women were standing in what must've been a screened porch at one time but was now a laundry room. Before he could close the door, Roz Levy started yelling at Amanda.

"Give me back that!" the old woman demanded.

Amanda had the Python. "You could've killed all of us." She opened the chamber and ejected the load of .38 Specials onto the dryer. "I should arrest you right now."

"I'd like to see you try."

Roz Levy wasn't the only one who was pissed. Will felt his throat clench around the effort to keep from yelling. "You said this would be an easy exchange. You said they'd take the money and give Evelyn—"

"Shut up, Will." Amanda spun the empty cylinder back into the revolver and tossed it onto the washer.

She must've taken Will's silence as following orders, but the truth was that he was so furious that he didn't trust himself to speak. Arguing wouldn't change the fact that Faith was stuck in that house without a clear exit plan. There was nothing they could do now except wait for SWAT to show up and pretend this was a hostage negotiation instead of a suicide mission.

Unless Will went in himself. He gripped his rifle. He should go in there. He should do exactly what Faith had done two days before and bust down the door and start shooting.

Amanda's hand clamped around his wrist. "Don't you dare leave this room," she warned him. "I'll shoot you myself if I have to."

Will's teeth started to ache from grinding together. He pulled away from her, banging into a metal lawn chair in the middle of the room. He couldn't help but take in his surroundings. A high-speed camera was mounted on a tripod, pointing out the window in the door. Roz Levy had covered the glass with black construction paper, leaving a small hole for the lens to peer through. A shotgun was beside the door. No wonder she hadn't allowed Will into the house. She didn't want him obstructing her view.

Will looked into the camera viewfinder. The lens was sharper than his scope. He could see sweat dripping down the side of Faith's face. She was still talking. She was trying to reason with the shooter.

One shooter. One man left standing.

Two bad guys had gone into that house. Both were dressed in black jackets and hats. One had been shot. Will was certain of that, at least. He had watched both kids forcing Evelyn across the lawn and into the house. The one in back had done all of the heavy lifting. He was expendable, just like Ricardo, just like Hironobu Kwon, just like every other man who'd tried to get his hands on Evelyn Mitchell's money.

But it had never been about the money. Chuck Finn wasn't pulling the strings. There was no wizard behind the curtain. Here was the head of Roger Ling's snake: an angry kid with blue eyes and a Tec-9 and some kind of grudge he was intent on carrying out.

Will spoke through clenched teeth. "It's just him now. This is what he wanted all along."

"He'll never spend a dime of that money."

He struggled to keep his voice down. "He doesn't care about the money."

"Then what does he care about?" She grabbed his shoulder and jerked him away from the camera. "Come on, genius. Tell me what he wants."

Mrs. Levy mumbled, "You know what he wants." She was loading the cartridges back into her revolver.

"Zip it, Roz. I've had enough of you for one day." Amanda glared at Will. "Enlighten me, Dr. Trent. I'm all ears."

"He wants to kill her. He wants to kill both of them." Will finally dropped the biggest I-told-you-so of his life. "And if you had deigned for once to listen to me, none of this would be happening."

Anger flared in Amanda's eyes, but she told him, "Go on. Get it all out."

In the end, it was her acquiescence that sent him over the edge. "I told you we should slow this down. I told you we should figure out what they really wanted before we sent Faith in there with a target on her back.” He closed the space between them, backing her against the washer. “You were so hell-bent on proving your dick is bigger than mine that you didn’t stop to think that I might be right about something.” Will leaned in close enough to feel her breath on his face. “Any blood spilled is on your hands, Amanda. You did this to Faith. You did this to all of us.”

Amanda turned her head away from him. She didn’t answer Will, but he could see the truth in her eyes. She knew that he was right.

Her silent acceptance was no consolation, but Will backed off anyway. He had been looming over her like a bully, clutching his rifle so hard that his hands were shaking. Shame crowded out his anger. He made his grip loosen, his jaw relax.

“Ha,” Mrs. Levy laughed. “You gonna take that tone from him, Wag?” She had re-loaded the Python. She snapped the cylinder home, telling Will, “That’s what we used to call her—Wag, because she shut up and wagged her tail like a dog every time a man was around.”

Will was shocked by her words, mostly because he couldn’t imagine anything that could be further from the truth.

Mrs. Levy hefted the Python in her hands. She told Amanda, “Talk about swinging your dick around. You could’ve stopped this twenty years ago if you’d’a had the balls to force Ev to—”

Amanda hissed, “Spare me your sanctimonious bullshit, Roz. If it wasn’t for me standing between you and your cookie recipe, you’d be on death row right now.”

“I warned you when it happened. You don’t mix pigeons and bluebirds.”

“You don’t know what the hell you’re talking about. You never have.” Amanda barked more orders into the walkie-talkie. Her voice shook, which worried Will as much as anything that had happened in the last ten minutes. “Take out that black van. I want all four tires down. Clear out this block as quickly as you can. Call in APD to gumshoe it and give me an ETA on SWAT within the next five minutes or don’t bother showing up for work tomorrow.”

Will put his eye back to the camera. Faith was still talking. At least, her mouth was moving. Her arms were crossed over her chest. Will found his mind working through Roz Levy’s mildly racist choice of words: pigeons and bluebirds. Mrs. Levy was full of old adages, like the one she’d told him two days ago: A woman can run faster with her skirt up than a man can with his pants down. It was a strange thing to say about a pregnant fourteen-year-old girl who’d had a baby by the age of fifteen.

Will asked the old woman, “Why didn’t you take that Python over to Evelyn’s when you heard the shots the other day?”

She looked down at the gun. There was a bit of petulance in her tone. “Ev told me not to come over no matter what.”

Will hadn’t pegged her as an order-follower, but maybe her bark was worse than her bite. Poisoning was a coward’s choice, coldblooded murder without the inconvenience of getting your hands dirty. He tried to push her toward the truth. “But you heard gunshots.”

“I assumed Evelyn was taking care of some old business.” She jabbed her thumb Amanda’s way. “Notice she didn’t call her for help.”

Amanda rested her chin on the walkie-talkie. She was watching Will like she was waiting for a pot to boil. She was always ten steps ahead of him. She knew where his brain was going even before he did.

She told Mrs. Levy, "I knew Evelyn was seeing Hector again. She told me months ago."

"Like hell she did. You were as shocked to see that picture as I was when I took it."

"Does it matter, Roz? After all this time, does it really matter?"

The old woman seemed to think that it did. "It's not my fault she was willing to gamble away her life for ten seconds of pleasure."

Amanda laughed, incredulous. "Ten seconds? No wonder you murdered your husband. Is that all the old bastard could give you—ten seconds?" Her tone was cutting, rueful, the same one she'd used on the phone half an hour ago.

There are other things a man can gamble with besides money.

She was talking about Will and Sara. She was talking about the inherent risks that came with love.

Will turned back to the camera. Faith was still talking. Had Roz Levy set up the camera today, or had it been there all along? The view into the house was clear. What would she have seen two days ago? Evelyn making sandwiches. Hector Ortiz carrying in groceries. They were comfortable around each other. They had a history. A history that Evelyn was trying to hide from her family.

Pigeons and bluebirds.

Will looked up from the camera. "He's Evelyn's son." Both women stopped talking.

Will said, "Hector's the father, right? That's the mistake Evelyn made twenty years ago. She had a son by Hector Ortiz. Was the bank account used to help support him?"

Amanda sighed. "I told you, the account doesn't matter."

Roz made a disgusted sound. "Well, I'm not going to keep it a secret anymore." She gleefully told Will, "She couldn't very well raise a brown baby, could she? I always said just switch it with Faith's. That girl was wild. No one would've been surprised to hear she was running around with some wetback." She cackled at Will's stunned expression. "Fast-forward twenty years and she did it anyway."

"Nineteen years," Amanda corrected. "Jeremy's nineteen." She looked around the room, finally realizing what Roz Levy had been up to. "Christ," she mumbled. "We should've charged you for a front-row seat."

Will asked, "What happened?"

Amanda pressed her eye to the camera. "Evelyn gave the baby to a girl we worked with. Sandra Espisito. She was married to another cop. They couldn't have children of their own."

"Can we get them here? Maybe they could talk to him."

She shook her head. "Paul was shot in the line of duty ten years ago. Sandra died last year. Leukemia. She needed a bone marrow transplant. She had to explain to her son why he couldn't be a donor." She turned back to Will. "He looked into his father's side of the family first. I suppose Sandra thought it might be easier. Hector invited him to a get-together. That's how he met Ricardo. That's how he got mixed up in Los Texicanos. He started using drugs. Pot at first, then heroin, then there was no looking back. Evelyn and Hector had him in and out of rehab.”

Will felt a burning in his gut. “Healing Winds?”

She nodded her head. “This last time, at least.”

“He met Chuck Finn there.”

“I don’t know the details, but I imagine so.”

If Will had known this earlier, there was no way he would’ve let Faith go into that house alone. He would’ve tied her up. He would’ve shoved Amanda inside Mrs. Levy’s trunk. He would’ve called in SWAT from every police force in the country.

Amanda said, “Go ahead and get it out. I deserve it.”

Will had already wasted enough time yelling at her. “What does the back of the house look like?”

She couldn’t process the question. “What?”

“The back of the house. Faith is standing in the foyer. She’s looking into the family room. The whole back wall is windows and a sliding glass door. You said the curtains were pulled closed. They’re thin cotton. Can you see anything like a shadow or movement?”

“No. It’s too bright outside and the lights are off inside.”

“When is SWAT supposed to be here?”

“What are you thinking?”

“We need to get the helicopter.”

For once, she didn’t ask questions. She got on the walkie-talkie and patched directly into the SWAT commander.

Will pressed his eye to the camera as Amanda negotiated the request. Faith was still standing in the foyer. She wasn’t talking anymore. “Is there some reason you didn’t tell me that Evelyn had a love child with Hector Ortiz?”

“Because it would kill Faith,” Amanda told him, seemingly unaware of the irony. Her next words were more directed toward Roz. “And Evelyn didn’t want anyone to know, because it’s nobody’s damn business.”

Will took out his cell phone.

“What are you doing?”

“I’m calling Faith.”

CHAPTER TWENTY

Faith's cell phone vibrated in her pocket. She didn't move. She just stared at her mother. Tears were streaming down Evelyn's face.

"It's all right," Faith told her. "It doesn't matter."

"Doesn't matter?" the man echoed. "Thanks a lot, sis."

Faith flinched at the word. How blind she'd been. How selfish. It all made so much sense now. The extended leave her mother had taken from work. Her father's sudden business trips and angry silences. Evelyn's expanding waistline when she'd never been overweight before or since. The vacation she had taken with Amanda the month before Jeremy was born. Faith had been furious when, after nearly eight months of shared imprisonment, Evelyn had announced that she was going to drive to the beach for a week of fun with Aunt Mandy. Faith had felt betrayed. She had felt abandoned. And now, she felt so stupid.

Remember our time together before Jeremy—

That's what Evelyn had said in the video. She was giving Faith a clue, not strolling down memory lane. Remember that time. Try to recall what was really going on—not just with you, but with me.

Back then, Faith had been so wrapped up in herself that all she cared about was her own misery, her own shattered life, her own lost opportunities. Looking back now, she saw the obvious signs. Evelyn wouldn't go outside during the daytime. She wouldn't answer the door. She woke at the crack of dawn to shop at a grocery store on the other side of town. The phone rang plenty of times, but Evelyn refused to answer it. She isolated herself. She cut herself off from the world. She slept on the couch instead of in her marital bed. Except for Amanda, she talked to no one, saw no one, reached out to no one. And all the while, she had given Faith the one thing every child secretly longs for: every ounce of her attention.

And then everything had changed when Evelyn returned from her vacation with Amanda. She called it "my time away," like she'd gone down to the springs to take the cure. She was different, happier, as if a burden had been lifted from her shoulders. Faith had seethed with jealousy to find her mother so altered, so seemingly carefree. Before the trip, they had luxuriated in their shared misery, and Faith could not understand how her mother could so easily let it go.

Faith was weeks from delivering Jeremy, but Evelyn's life went back to normal—or as normal as could be expected with a sulky, spoiled, extremely pregnant teenager in the house. She started going back to their regular grocery store. She had lost a few pounds during her time away, and she set about taking off the rest with strict diet and exercise. She forced Faith to take long walks after lunch and eventually started calling old friends, her tone of voice indicating that she'd survived the worst of it and, now that the end was near, was ready to jump back into the fray. Her pillow was no longer on the couch, but back on the bed she shared with her husband. She let the city know she'd be returning after Jeremy was born. She had her hair cut in a new, short style. In general, she started acting like her old self. Or at least a new version of her old self.

There had been cracks in the happy façade, something Faith only now realized.

For the first few weeks of Jeremy's life, Evelyn cried every time she held him. Faith could remember finding her mother sobbing in the rocking chair, holding Jeremy so close that she was afraid the baby couldn't breathe. As with everything, Faith was jealous of the bond between them. She had sought ways to punish her mother, keeping Jeremy away from her. Staying out late with him. Taking him to the mall or the movies or any number of places a baby didn't belong—just to be spiteful. Just to be mean.

And all the while Evelyn had been aching not just for a child, but for her child. This angry, soulless young man who now pointed a gun at her head.

Faith felt the phone stop ringing. Almost immediately, it started back again. She told her mother, "I'm so sorry I wasn't there for you."

Evelyn shook her head. It didn't matter. But it did.

"I'm so sorry, Mama."

Evelyn glanced down, then back at Faith. She was sitting on the edge of the chair, her injured leg straight out in front of her. The dead man lay on the floor less than two feet away. The Glock was still stuck in the back of his pants. It might as well be miles away. Evelyn could hardly jump up and grab the gun. Still, she could've reached up and taken off the tape covering her mouth. The adhesive was already detaching. The corners of the silver tape were folding back. Why was she pretending to be silenced? Why was she being so passive?

Faith stared at her mother. What did she want her to do? What could she do?

A heavy thunk got their attention. They both looked at the man.

One by one, he pushed the remaining books off the shelves. "What was it like growing up here?"

Faith was silent. She wasn't going to have this conversation.

"Mommy and Daddy sittin' around the hearth." He kicked the Bible on the floor. Pages fluttered as it flew across the room. "Musta been real nice coming home every day to milk and cookies." He kept the gun at his side as he walked toward Evelyn. Halfway there, he turned back, pacing in a tight line. His street slang slipped again. "Sandra had to work every day. She didn't have time to come home and make sure I was doing my homework."

Neither had Evelyn. Bill worked from home. It was her father who'd made sure they had snacks and did their book reports.

"You kept all his shit in your closet. What's up with that?"

He meant Jeremy. Faith still didn't answer. Evelyn had made her keep everything because she had known that one day, Faith would cherish it more than anything else save for Emma's things.

She looked at her mother. "I'm so sorry."

Evelyn glanced back down at the dead man again, the Glock. Faith didn't know what her mother wanted her to do. He was at least fifteen feet away.

"I asked you a question." He'd stopped pacing. He stood in the middle of the floor, directly across from Faith. The Tec-9 was pointed straight at Evelyn's head. "Answer me."

She wasn't going to tell him the truth, so she gave him the last clue that had clicked it all into place. "You changed out the lock of hair."

His smile turned her blood cold. Faith had realized this morning that the strand of Jeremy's hair hadn't darkened with time. The baby blue bow holding the lock of hair together was different from the one that held Jeremy's. The edges were crisp, not frayed, where Faith had rubbed them like a talisman the last few months of her pregnancy with Emma.

The silverware. The pens. The snow globes. Sara was right. It was something a kid would do for attention. When Faith first met the man in the bathroom, she had been so concerned with remembering his description that she hadn't processed what she was seeing. He was Jeremy's age. He was around Faith's height. He had chewed his lip the way Jeremy did. He had Zeke's bully bluster. And he had Evelyn's blue eyes.

The same almond shape. The same deep blue with specks of green.

Faith said, "Your mother obviously loved you. She kept a lock of your hair."

"Which mother?" he asked, and Faith was startled by the question.

Had Evelyn kept a lock of his hair for all of these years? Faith had an image of her mother at the hospital, holding her baby for what she knew would be the last time. Was it Amanda who had thought to find a pair of scissors? Had she helped Evelyn clip a piece of hair and tie it in a blue bow? Had Evelyn kept it with her for the last twenty years, taking it out every now and then to feel the soft, baby-fine strands between her fingers?

Of course she had.

You didn't give up a child and not think about him every day, every moment, for the rest of your life. It wasn't possible.

He asked, "Don't you even want to know my name?"

Faith's knees were shaking. She wanted to sit down, but she knew that she couldn't move. She was standing in the front foyer. The kitchen door was on her left. The front door was behind her. The hall was to her right. At the end of the hall was the bathroom. Beyond that bathroom was Will and his Colt AR-15A2 and his excellent shot, if she could just get this bastard to make a move toward her.

He turned the gun on its side, gangster-style, as he lined up the sights. "Ask me my name."

"What's your name?"

"What's your name, little brother?"

She tasted bile on her tongue. "What's your name, little brother?"

"Caleb," he said. "Caleb. Ezekiel. Faith. I guess Mommy likes her Bible names."

She did, which was why Jeremy's middle name was Abraham and Faith's first name was Hannah. Why had Faith chosen Emma's name because it was pretty instead of honoring her mother's tradition? Evelyn had suggested Elizabeth or Esther or Abigail, and Faith had been stubborn just because she didn't know any other way.

"This is where he grew up, too, right?" Caleb waved the gun, indicating the house. "Your precious Jeremy?"

Faith hated the sound of her child's name in his mouth. She wanted to punch it back down his throat with her fist.

"Watched TV. Read some books. Played some games." The bottom cabinet of the bookcase was open. He kept one eye on Faith as he pulled out the board games and tossed them on the floor. "Monopoly. Clue. Life." He laughed. "Sorry!"

"What do you want from us?"

"Damn, you sound just like her." He turned back to Evelyn. "Ain't that what you said to me, Mommy? 'What do you want from me, Caleb?' Like you can pay me off." He stared back at Faith. "She offered me money. What do you think about that? Ten thousand bucks to go away."

Faith didn't believe him.

"All she cared about was protecting you and your spoiled bitch kid." The platinum tooth glimmered in the low light. "You got two kids now, right? Mommy can't keep her little brown baby, but you got no problem keeping yours."

"It's different now," she told him. Evelyn's condition may have been a secret, but Faith had brought down enough shame on her family to last a lifetime. Her father had lost longtime clients. Her brother had been forced into exile. What would they have made of Evelyn Mitchell raising a child who was obviously not her husband's? There had been no good choice. Faith could not begin to imagine how her mother had suffered. "You have no idea what it was like back then."

"Two for two. Mom said the same thing." He pointed to her pocket. "Are you going to get that?"

Her phone had started vibrating again. "Do you want me to?"

"SOP," he said. Standard operating procedure. "They wanna know my demands."

"What are your demands?"

"Answer the phone and we'll find out."

She rubbed her hand on her leg to wipe off the sweat, then pulled out the phone. "Hello?"

Will said, "Faith, this guy is—"

"I know who he is." She stared at Caleb, hoping he could see every ounce of hate she had for him. "He has demands." She held out the phone to Caleb, praying that he would come get it.

He stood rooted to the floor. "I want milk and cookies." He paused as if giving it some more thought. "I want my mom to be there every day when I get home from school. I want one day to go by where my ass isn't dragged to mass at the crack of dawn and my knees aren't sore from having to pray every night." His hand swept in an arc toward the bookshelf. "I want my mom to read books to me about happy goats and moons. You did that with ol' Jaybird, right?"

Faith could barely speak. "Don't say his name."

"You took little Jay to the park and to Six Flags and to Disney World and to the beach."

He must have memorized every picture in Jeremy's keepsake box. How much time had he spent in her home? How many hours had he spent pawing through Jeremy's things? "Stop saying my son's name."

"Or what?" He laughed. "Tell 'em that's what I want. I want y'all to take me to Disney World."

Faith's arm was shaking from holding out the phone. "What do you want me to tell him?"

He snorted in disgust. "Hell, I don't need nothin' right now. I got my family around me. My mom and my big sister. What else do I need?" He went back to the bookcase and leaned against the shelves. "Life is good."

Faith cleared her throat. She put the phone back to her ear. "He has no demands."

Will asked, "Are you okay?"

"I—"

"Speakerphone," Caleb said.

Faith looked down at the phone so she could find the right button. She told Will, "He can hear you."

He hesitated. "Is your mom comfortable? Can she sit down?"

He was asking for clues. "She's in Dad's chair, but I'm worried about her." Faith took a deep breath. She kept her eyes on her mother's. "I might need insulin if this drags on." Caleb had been in Faith's refrigerator. He would know she was diabetic. "My blood sugar was at eighteen hundred this morning. Mom only has enough for fifteen hundred. I had my last dose at noon. I'm going to need the next one by ten at the latest or my blood sugar will start swinging back and forth."

"All right," he agreed, and she prayed that he really understood the message and wasn't just giving a quick answer.

She said, "Your phone—" Her mind wasn't quick enough. "Do we call you on your phone if we need something? Your cell phone?"

"Yes," he paused. "We can have your insulin there in five minutes. Just let us know. Let me know."

Caleb's eyes narrowed. She was talking too much, and neither Will nor Faith was good at this.

"Be careful." Faith didn't have to pretend to be scared. Her voice shook without any effort on her part. "He's already killed his partner. He has a—"

"End it," Caleb said.

Faith tried to find the button.

"End it!" he yelled.

The phone slipped out of her hand. Faith scrambled to get it off the floor. She remembered the revolver on her ankle. The S&W felt cold under her fingers.

"No!" her mother screamed. Her mouth had opened so wide that the tape finally pulled loose. Caleb had the gun jammed into her ribs. His free hand pressed against her broken leg.

"No!" Evelyn screeched. Faith had never heard another human being make that kind of noise. That it was coming from her mother was like a hand reaching straight into her chest and wrenching out her heart.

"Stop!" Faith begged, standing up, holding out her hands. "Please, stop! Please, just—please!"

Caleb released the pressure, but he kept his hand hovering over the broken leg. "Kick the gun over here. Slow, or I might kill the bitch anyway."

"It's okay." She knelt down. A tremor rushed through her entire body like a seizure. "I'm doing what you said. I'm doing exactly what you said." She lifted her pant leg, then pinched the gun between her thumb and forefinger. "Don't hurt her anymore. Look."

"Easy," he warned.

She slid the gun across the floor at an angle, praying that Caleb would go back to where he'd been standing. He let the gun sail by, staying at Evelyn's side instead.

He said, "Try something like that again, bitch."

"I won't," Faith told him. "I promise."

He rested the Tec-9 on the back of the chair, angling the muzzle down toward Evelyn's head. The tape was dangling from her mouth. He ripped it away.

She gulped in air. The breath wheezed in and out of her broken nose.

He warned her, "Don't get too used to breathing that clean air."

"Let her go." Evelyn's voice was raw. "You don't want her. She had no idea. She was just a child."

"I was a child, too."

Evelyn coughed out a spray of blood. "Just let her go, Caleb. It's me you want to punish."

"Did you even think about me?" He kept the gun to her head as he knelt down beside her. "All them times with her bastard little baby, did you even think about me?"

"I never stopped thinking about you. Not a day went by without—"

"Bullshit." He stood back up.

"Sandra and Paul loved you like their own flesh and blood. They worshipped you."

He looked away from her. "They lied to me."

"All they ever wanted was for you to be happy."

"Do I look happy now?" He indicated the dead man on the floor. "All my friends are gone now. Ricky, Hiro, Dave. All of them. I'm the last one standing." He seemed to be forgetting his part in the carnage. "My fake father is dead. My fake mother is dead."

Evelyn said, "I know you cried at her funeral. I know you loved Paul and—"

He smacked the back of her head with his open palm. Faith moved without thinking. He waved the gun in her direction and she froze.

She looked back at her mother. Evelyn's head had dropped down. Blood dripped from her mouth. "I never forgot about you, Caleb. You know that somewhere in your heart."

He slapped her harder this time.

"Stop," Faith begged. She didn't know if she was talking to her mother or to Caleb. "Please just stop."

Evelyn whispered, "I always loved you, Caleb."

He raised the rifle and slammed the butt against the side of her head. The impact knocked over the chair. Evelyn fell hard to the floor. She screamed in pain as her leg twisted around. The broom handle splint broke in two. Bone stuck out of her thigh.

"Mama!" Faith started for her.

There was a pinging sound. Wood kicked up from the floor.

Faith froze. She couldn't tell if she'd been shot. All she could see was her mother on the floor, Caleb standing above her with his fist clenched. He kicked Evelyn. Hard.

"Please stop," Faith pleaded. "I promise—"

"Shut up." He looked up at the ceiling. At first, Faith didn't recognize the sound. It was a helicopter. The blades chopped through the air, shaking her eardrums.

Caleb had the Tec-9 pointed at Faith now. He had to raise his voice to be heard. "That was a warning shot," he told her. "Next one goes right between your eyes."

She looked down at the floor. There was a hole in the wood. She took a step back, swallowed the cry that wanted to come out of her throat. The chopping sound receded as the helicopter pulled up. Faith could barely speak. "Please don't hurt her. You can do anything to me, but please ..."

"Oh, I'm gonna hurt you soon enough, sister girl. I'm gonna hurt you real bad." He held up his arms as if he was on stage. "That's what this is all about, yo. I'm gonna show your precious baby boy what it's like to grow up without his mama." He kept the gun on Faith. "You were good yesterday running after him in the street. A little closer and I'd'a had him dead on the ground."

Vomit came into her mouth.

He pushed Evelyn with his sneaker. "Ask her why she gave me up."

Faith didn't trust her mouth to open.

"Ask her why she gave me up," Caleb repeated. He raised his foot, ready to kick her mother's shattered leg.

"Okay!" Faith yelled. "Why did you give him up?"

Caleb said, "Why did you give him up, Mom?"

"Why did you give him up, Mom?"

Evelyn didn't move. Her eyes were closed. Just as the panic started to well up inside Faith, her mother's mouth opened. "I didn't have a choice."

"Yo, ain't that what you've been saying to me for the last year, Mom? Everybody's got choices?"

"It was a different time." Her good eye opened. The lashes stuck together. She stared at Faith. "I'm so sorry, baby."

Faith shook her head. "You have nothing to apologize for."

"Ain't this nice. A little mother-daughter reunion here." He shoved the chair so hard against the wall that the back leg broke. "She was ashamed of me, that's why." He paced over to the bookcase and back. "She couldn't explain some little brown baby squirting outta her. Not like you, right? Different times." He started pacing again. "And you think your daddy was so good growing up. Tell her what he said, Mom. Tell her what he made you do."

Evelyn lay on her side, eyes closed, arms out in front of her. The shallow in-and-out of her chest was the only thing that indicated she was still alive.

"Your good ol' daddy told her it was me or him. What do you think about that? Mr. Galveston Insurance Agent of the Year for six years running and he told your mama that she couldn't keep her baby boy, because if she did, she'd never see her other kids again."

Faith struggled not to show that he'd finally managed to hit the mark. She had adored her father, worshipped him like only a spoiled daddy's girl can, but as an adult, she could easily see Bill Mitchell giving her mother this ultimatum.

Caleb had moved back to his original spot near the bookcase. The gun was down at his side, but she knew he could swing it up at any moment. His back was to the sliding glass doors. Evelyn was to his left. Faith was at a diagonal, about twelve feet away from him and waiting for all hell to break loose.

She prayed Will had understood her message. The room was a clock. Faith was at eighteen hundred, or six o'clock. Evelyn was at fifteen hundred, three o'clock. Caleb was swinging back and forth between ten and twelve.

Faith had offered at least twenty times over the last month to take Will's cell phone off military time. He kept refusing because he was stubborn and full of an odd mixture of shame and pride where his disability was concerned. He was also watching her through the bathroom window right now. He had told her to give him a sign. She ran her fingers through her hair, pulling her thumb and index finger into an okay sign.

Faith looked down at her mother lying on the floor. Evelyn was staring at her with her one good eye. Had she seen Faith give Will the signal? Was she capable of understanding what was going to happen? Her breaths were labored. Her lips were blistered. She had obviously been choked. Dark bruises circled her neck. There was a cut on the side of her head. Blood seeped from an angry gash in her cheek. Faith felt a rush of love wash through her, straight to where her mother lay. It was like a light shining out from her body. How many times had Faith gone to this woman for help? How many times had she cried on her shoulder?

So many times that Faith had lost count.

Evelyn raised her hand. Her fingers trembled. She covered her face. Faith turned around. A blinding bright light came through the front windows. It pierced the flimsy blinds, shining a spotlight inside the house.

Faith ducked down. Maybe muscle memory recalled some training exercise from years past. Maybe it was human nature to make yourself as small as possible when you sensed something bad was about to happen.

Nothing happened in the immediate. Seconds went by. Faith found herself counting, "... two ... three ... four ..."

She looked up at Caleb.

Glass shattered. He jerked as if someone had punched him in the shoulder. His expression was a mixture of shock and pain. Faith pushed herself off the floor. She lunged toward Caleb. He pointed the gun at her face. She looked straight into the threaded muzzle, the dark eye of the snubbed barrel, staring back. Rage took hold, burning inside of her, urging her forward. She wanted to kill this man. She wanted to rip open his throat with her teeth. She wanted to cut his heart out of his chest. She wanted to watch the pain in his eyes as she did everything to him that he had done to her mother, her family, their lives.

But she would never get the chance.

The side of Caleb's head exploded. His arms jerked up. Bullets fired from the Tec-9 brought down a rain of white chalk from the ceiling. Muscle memory. Two pops, close together, one after the other.

Slowly, he collapsed to the ground. The only thing Faith could hear was the sound of his body slamming into the floor. First his hip, then his shoulder, then his head popping against the hard wood. His eyes stayed open. Dark blue. So familiar. So lifeless.

So long.

Faith looked at her mother. Evelyn had managed to prop herself up against the wall. She still held the Glock in her right hand. The muzzle started to tilt down. The weight was too much. She dropped her arm. The gun clattered to the floor.

"Mama ..." Faith could barely stand. She half walked, half crawled to her mother. She didn't know where to touch her, which part of her body wasn't bruised or broken.

"Come here," Evelyn whispered. She pulled Faith into her arms. She stroked her back. Faith couldn't help it. She started to weep like a child. "It's all right, baby." Evelyn pressed her lips to the top of Faith's head. "Everything's going to be all right."

THURSDAY

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Will tucked his hands into his pockets as he walked down the hallway to Evelyn Mitchell's hospital room. He was almost giddy with exhaustion. His vision was so sharp that the world was his Blu-ray. There was a high-pitched whine in his ear. He could feel every pore in his skin. This was why he never drank coffee. Will felt wired enough to power a small city. He had spent the last three nights with Sara. His feet barely touched the ground.

He stopped outside Evelyn's room, wondering if he should've brought flowers. Will had cash in his wallet. He turned around, heading back toward the elevators. He could at least get her a balloon from the gift shop. Everybody liked balloons.

"Hey." Faith pushed open her mother's door. "Where are you going?"

"Does your mom like balloons?"

"I'm sure she did when she was seven."

Will smiled. The last time he'd seen Faith, she was crying in her mother's arms. She looked a little better now, but not by much. "How's she doing?"

"Okay. Last night was slightly better than the one before, but the pain is still bad."

Will could only imagine. Evelyn had been rushed to Grady with a full police escort. She'd been in surgery over sixteen hours. They'd put enough metal in her leg to fill a deluxe erector set.

He asked, "What about you?"

"It's a lot to take in." Faith shook her head, as if she still couldn't make sense of it. "I always wanted another brother, but that was only because I thought he might beat up Zeke."

"Seems like you can take care of yourself."

"It's a lot more work than you'd think." She leaned her shoulder against the wall. "It must've been so hard for her. What she went through. I can't imagine giving up one of my children. I'd just as soon rip out my heart."

Will looked over her shoulder at the empty hallway.

"I'm sorry. I wasn't thinking about—"

"It's okay," he told her. "You know, a surprising number of orphans end up in the penal system." He gave her some of the better examples. "Albert DeSalvo. Ted Bundy. Joel Rifkin. Son of Sam."

"I think Aileen Wuornos was given up by her parents, too."

"I'll let the others know. It's good to have a woman on the list."

She laughed, but obviously her heart wasn't into it. Will looked over her shoulder again. There was a large nurse with a bouquet of flowers walking down the hall.

Faith said, "I was sure that we weren't going to make it out of that house."

There was something in her voice that told him she still wasn't past what had happened to her family. Maybe she never would be. Some things never left you, no matter how hard you tried.

Will said, "We should really get better codes in case this happens again."

"I was terrified you wouldn't understand. Thank God we had all those arguments about changing your phone off military time."

"Actually, I didn't understand." He grinned at her shocked expression. Will had kept his cell on speakerphone while he talked to Faith. Roz Levy had rendered her opinion as soon as the call ended, telling them the room was a clock and that she'd be more than happy to run over there with her Python and take out the punk standing at noon.

Will told Faith, "I'd like to think that I would've figured it out eventually."

"You realize that a blood sugar of eighteen hundred would probably mean I was either dead or in an irreversible coma?"

"Sure, I knew that."

"Jesus Christ," she whispered. "So much for our well-oiled machine."

He felt the need to tell her, "The helicopter was all me. The infrared camera told us where you were, confirmed that his partner was dead." She didn't seem impressed, so Will added, "And the lights were my idea." They'd lined up two squad cars and blasted their xenon lights at the front windows. Caleb's shadow against the curtains had given them something to aim for.

"Well, thanks anyway for shooting him." She could obviously read his expression. "Oh, Will, it wasn't you?"

He let out a long breath. "Amanda promised me she'd give me one of my testicles back if I let her take the shot."

"I hope you got that in writing. She didn't exactly hit a bull's-eye."

"She blames my rifle. Something about me being left-handed."

The grip was universal, but Faith didn't argue. "Well, I'm glad you were there. It made me feel safer."

He smiled, though he was fairly certain all of this could've happened without his presence. Amanda was resourceful, and Will had basically hidden behind a wall while Faith risked her life.

She said, "I'm glad you're with Sara."

He fought the silly grin that wanted to come. "I'm just hanging in there until she decides she can do better."

"I wish I thought you were joking."

So did Will. He didn't understand Sara. He didn't know what made her tick or why she was with him. And yet, she was. And not just that—she seemed to be happy about it. Sara had been smiling so much this morning that she could barely purse her lips to kiss him goodbye. Will had thought maybe some toilet paper was stuck to his face where he'd cut himself shaving, but she'd told him that she was smiling because he made her happy.

He didn't know what to do with that. It didn't make sense.

Faith knew how to stop the grin on his face. "What about Angie?"

He shrugged, as if Angie hadn't left so many messages on his home and cell phone that both voicemail boxes had run out of space. Each message got nastier and nastier. Each threat more severe. Will had listened to every message. He couldn't help himself. He could still see Angie with that gun in her mouth. He could still feel his heart rattle at the thought of pushing open his bathroom door and finding her bleeding out in his bathtub.

Thankfully, Faith didn't dwell for long on the negative. "Have you told Sara you're terrified of chimpanzees?"

"It hasn't really come up."

"It will eventually. That's what happens in relationships. Everything comes up whether you like it or not."

Will nodded, hoping his quick acquiescence would shut her up. He wasn't that lucky.

"Look." She put on her mom voice, the one she used when he wasn't standing up straight or wore the wrong tie. "The only way you're going to screw this up is if you keep worrying about screwing it up."

Will would rather be stuck in Mrs. Levy's trunk again than have this conversation. "It's Betty I'm worried about."

"Really."

"She's become quite attached." That much was true. The dog had refused to leave Sara's apartment this morning.

"Just promise me that you'll wait at least a month before you tell her that you're in love with her."

He let out a stream of breath, longing for the isolation of the Corvair. "Did you know that Bayer used to own the trademark for heroin?"

She shook her head at the subterfuge. "The aspirin company?"

"They lost the trademark after World War I. It's in the Treaty of Versailles."

"You learn something new every day."

"Sears used to sell preloaded syringes of heroin in their catalogue. A buck fifty for two."

She put her hand on his arm. "Thank you, Will."

He patted the back of her hand once, then again, because just once was probably not enough. "It's Roz Levy you should thank. She's the one who figured it out."

"She's not quite the sweet little old lady, is she?"

There was an understatement. The old biddy had made sport of watching Evelyn's worst nightmare play out. "She's a bit of a devil."

"Did she give you her 'pigeons and bluebirds' lecture?" Faith turned around when she heard talking. The door to her mother's room opened. Jeremy came out, followed by a tall man with a military haircut and a square jaw that instantly brought to mind the word jarhead. He held Emma on one of his broad shoulders. The baby looked like a sack of frozen peas hanging off a skyscraper. Her body gave a slight jerk as she hiccupped.

"This should be fun." Faith pushed away from the wall with a groan. "Will, this is my brother Zeke. Zeke, this is—"

"I know who this douche is."

Will extended his hand. "I've heard a lot about you."

Emma hiccupped. Zeke glowered. He didn't shake Will's hand.

Will tried for light conversation. "I'm glad that your mother's okay."

He kept glowering. Emma hiccupped again. Will felt bad for the man. As the owner of a Chihuahua, he knew the difficulties of acting tough while holding something impossibly tiny in your hand.

Jeremy saved them from their staring contest. "Hey, Will. Thanks for coming."

Will shook his hand. He was a scrawny-looking kid, but he had a strong grip. "I hear your grandma's doing better."

"She's tough." He draped his arm around Faith's shoulders. "Just like my mom."

Emma hiccupped.

"Let's go, Uncle Zeke." Jeremy grabbed him by the elbow. "I told Grandma we'd move my bed downstairs so Mom can take care of her when she gets out of the hospital."

Zeke took his time breaking eye contact. Emma's continued hiccups probably had something to do with his decision to follow his nephew down the hall.

"Sorry," Faith apologized. "He can be a bit of an asshole. I don't know how it happened, but Emma loves him."

Probably because she couldn't understand a word he said.

Faith asked, "Do you want to go ahead and talk to Mom?"

"I was just here to check on you."

"She's already asked for you a couple of times. I think she wants to talk about it."

"She can't talk about it with you?"

"I've got the gist. There's no reason for me to know the gory details." She forced a smile onto her face. "Amanda told her that she promised you an hour."

"I didn't think that'd actually happen."

"They've been best friends for forty years. They keep each other's promises." She patted his arm again and started to leave. "Thanks for coming."

"Wait." Will reached into his jacket pocket and pulled out the envelope that had come in the mail this morning. "I've never gotten a letter before. I mean, other than bills."

She studied the sealed envelope. "You didn't open it."

Will didn't need to. She would never know how much it meant to him that she'd known that he could read the letter. "Do you want me to open it?"

"Hell no." She snatched it out of his hand. "It's bad enough Zeke and Jeremy saw those videos I made. I had no idea I was such an ugly crier."

Will couldn't disagree.

"Anyway." She looked down at her watch. "I need to take my insulin and eat something. I'll be in the cafeteria if you need me."

Will watched Faith walk down the hallway. She stopped in front of the elevator and looked back at him. While he was watching, she tore the letter in two, then tore it again. Will saluted her, then pushed open the door to Evelyn's room. Almost every surface was covered with flowers of all kinds. Will felt his nose start to itch from the heavy perfume smell.

Evelyn Mitchell turned her head toward him. She was lying in bed. Her broken leg was elevated, Frankenstein bolts jutting out of a hard cast. Her hand rested on a foam wedge. Gauze was packed where her ring finger should've been. Tubes ran in and out of her body. The gash on her cheek was held together with white butterfly tape. She looked smaller than he remembered, but then, what she had been through was the sort of thing that could reduce a person.

Her lips were chapped and raw. She held her jaw still, talking with as little movement as possible. Her voice was stronger than he'd imagined it would be. "Agent Trent."

"Captain Mitchell."

She showed him the trigger for the morphine pump. "I've held off on this because I wanted to talk to you."

"You don't have to. I don't want to cause you any more pain."

"Then please sit down. It hurts my neck to look up at you."

There was already a chair pulled up beside her bed. Will sat down. "I'm glad that you're well."

Her lips barely moved. "Well is a bit down the road. Let's just say I'm hanging in there."

"Beats the alternative."

She said, "Mandy told me about your part in all of this." Will assumed that had been a very short conversation. "Thank you for looking out for my daughter."

"I think you get more credit for that than I do."

Her eyes watered. He wasn't sure whether it was from pain or the thought of losing Faith.

And then he remembered that she had lost another child, too. "I'm sorry for your loss."

She swallowed with obvious difficulty. The skin on her neck was nearly black with bruises. Evelyn Mitchell had been forced twice now to choose between her family with Bill Mitchell and the son she'd had with Hector Ortiz. Both times, she had made the same decision. Though Caleb had made it pretty easy for her the last time.

She said, "He was a very troubled young man. I didn't know how to make it better. He was so angry."

"You don't have to talk about it."

A gravelly chuckle came from her throat. "No one wants me to talk about him. I think they'd rather he just disappear." She indicated the cup of water on the table. "Could you—"

Will picked up the cup and angled the straw so that she could drink. She couldn't lift her head. Gently, Will reached around and supported her.

She drank for almost a full minute before releasing the straw. "Thank you."

Will sat back down. He stared at the bouquet of flowers on the table across from him. There was a business card attached to the white bow. He recognized the logo from the Atlanta Police Department.

Evelyn said, "Hector was a CI." Confidential informant. "He snitched on his cousin. They were in this gang, and it had started as something small, a reason to break into cars and snatch purses so they could play video games, and then it got really mean really fast."

"Los Mexicanos."

She nodded slowly. "Hector wanted out. He kept talking and I kept listening because it was good for my career." She waved her good hand in the air. "And then one thing led to another." Her eyes closed. "I was married to an insurance salesman. He was a very kind man and a very good father, but ..." Breath stuttered through her lips as she sighed. "You know how it is when you're out there in the street chasing down bad guys and your heart is pounding and you feel like you've got the whole world bucking between your legs, and then you go home and—what?—cook dinner? Iron shirts and give the kids a bath?"

"Were you in love with Hector?"

"No." She was firm in her answer. "Never. And the strange thing is, I didn't realize how much I was in love with Bill until I had hurt him so badly that I was going to lose him."

"But he stayed with you."

"On his terms," she told him. "I was out of the negotiations by then. He met with Hector. They came to a gentleman's agreement."

"The bank account."

She turned her gaze toward the ceiling. Slowly, her eyes closed. He thought she had fallen asleep until she started talking again. "Sandra and Paul had a lot of debt from helping her family back home. They couldn't afford a child, even if they could've had one of their own. Part of the money in the account was from Hector. Part of it was from me. Ten percent of every paycheck I got went to Caleb. It was like tithing, only not for the church—but still for penance." The corner of her mouth went up slightly in something like a smile. "Though I suppose that Sandra gave a lot of that money to the church every week. They were very religious. Catholic, but that didn't bother me like it bothered Bill. I thought they would give him a strong moral foundation." The sound of laughter came from her mouth. "So much for that."

"Caleb found out about you when Sandra got sick?"

She looked at Will. "I got a call from her. She sounded like she was warning me, which didn't make sense at the time, so I ignored it. The first time I saw him as a grown man was at her funeral." She shook her head at the memory. "God, he looked just like Zeke at that age. More handsome, if you want to know the truth. More angry, which was the problem." Her head kept moving side to side. "I didn't see how angry he was until it was too late. I had no idea."

"Did you talk to Caleb at the funeral?"

"I tried to start a conversation, but he just walked away. A few weeks later I was cleaning the house and I noticed things were out of place. My office had been searched. He did a very good job. I wouldn't have noticed if not for the fact that I was looking for a particular thing." She explained, "I kept a lock of his baby hair hidden somewhere the children didn't know about. I went to look for it, and it was gone. I should've known then. I should've realized how obsessed he was with me. How much he hated me."

Evelyn stopped to catch her breath. Will could see that she was tired. But still, she continued. "I called Hector to meet. We'd been in touch since Sandra got sick. There wasn't much time to catch up. We'd go to a Starbucks down by the airport so nobody would see us. It was the same as before—all that hiding. All that sneaking around so that my family wouldn't find out." She closed her eyes again. "Caleb was constantly in trouble. I tried everything with him—even offered to give him money so that he could go to college. Faith's struggling to help Jeremy with his tuition, and here I was offering this boy a full ride. He just laughed in my face." Her tone turned sharp, angry. "The next day, I got a call from an old friend in narcotics. They'd picked up Caleb with some serious weight on him. I had to get Mandy to pull some strings. She didn't want to. She said he'd been given too many chances already. But I begged her."

"Heroin?"

"Coke," she corrected. "Heroin would've been beyond my reach, but the coke we could work with. They knocked it down because we agreed to send him to rehab.”

“You sent him to Healing Winds.”

“Hector lives a few miles from there. His cousin’s boy had been at the facility, Ricardo. And Chuck was there. Poor Chuck.” She stopped, swallowing to clear her throat. “He called me at the beginning of this year to make amends. He’s been sober for eight months now. I knew that he was doing some counseling work at Healing Winds, and I thought Caleb would be safe there.”

“Chuck shared his story with them.”

“Apparently, that’s one of the steps. He told them about the money. And of course, even though Chuck assured them that I had nothing to do with it, they didn’t believe him.”

“It was Chuck in the hospital that day. He was the cop who asked Sara whether or not the kid was going to make it.”

She nodded. “He saw what happened to me on the news and came down to see if he could help. He didn’t stop to realize that with his record, no one would want his help. I’ve asked Mandy to try to smooth things over with his parole officer. It was really me who got him into trouble. My guys have always stood up for me, even when it wasn’t in their best interest.”

“Do you think Caleb thought you were on the take like the rest of them?”

She was obviously surprised by the question. “No, Agent Trent. I really don’t think he did. He had this preconceived notion of me as cold and uncaring, the mother who never loved him. He said that the only thing he’d inherited from me was my black heart.”

Will remembered the song that had been playing when Faith pulled up to her mother’s house. “ ‘Back in Black.’ ”

“It was his theme song. He kept insisting I listen to the words, though who the hell knows what all that screeching is?”

“It’s about taking revenge on the people who’ve given up on you.”

“Ah.” She seemed relieved to finally understand. “He played it over and over again on my kitchen radio. And then Faith came and the music stopped. I was terrified. I don’t think I’ve ever held my breath for that long. But they didn’t want Faith. Not Caleb’s crew, at any rate. Benny Choo told them that he would handle everything. He kept Ricardo back with him. The H inside him was much too valuable, but he told the other boys to take me and leave, so they did.”

Will wanted to be sure about the sequence. “Caleb was there at the same time as Faith?”

“He looked at her out the window.” Evelyn’s voice trembled. “I have never been so frightened in my life. Not before that, anyway.”

Will was more than familiar with that kind of fear. “What happened before Faith came? You were making sandwiches, right?”

“I knew Faith would be late. Those sessions usually run long. There’s always some jackass in the first row who wants to show off.” She was silent for a moment, collecting her thoughts. “Hector came to get me at the grocery store. He knew my routines. That’s the sort of man he was. He paid attention when you told him something.” She was silent a moment, perhaps in honor of her former lover. “He’d gone to visit Caleb at rehab and been told that he’d checked himself out. They don’t lock them down. Caleb just walked out. We shouldn’t’ve been surprised. I had already made some calls and figured out that Ricardo was getting himself mixed up in things that were not going to be good for any of them.”

“Heroin.”

She let out a slow breath. “Hector and I put it together as I drove him back to the house. We knew that Ricardo was working at Julia’s shop, just like we knew that nothing good was going to come out of any of these boys getting together. Folie à plusieurs.”

Will had heard the phrase before. It referred to a psychological syndrome where a group of seemingly normal people developed a shared psychosis when they were together. The Manson Family. The Branch Davidians. There was always an unstable leader at the center of the sickness. Roger Ling had called it the head of the snake. A man like Roger Ling should know.

Evelyn said, “Part of me wanted Faith to come home early. I wanted her to meet Hector, so I would be forced into explaining.”

“Did Caleb kill Hector?”

“I think it must’ve been him. It was sneaky, and cowardly. I heard the gun—you don’t forget the sound a silencer makes once you’ve heard it before—and I looked out into the carport. The trunk was closed and there was no one there. I didn’t think twice. Maybe I had thought this was going to happen all along. I scooped up Emma and took her into the shed. I came back with my gun and there was a man in the laundry room. I shot him before he could open his mouth. And then I turned around and there was Caleb.”

“You struggled with him?”

“I couldn’t shoot him. He was unarmed. He was my son. But I got the better of him.” She looked down at her wounded hand. “I don’t think he was expecting me to be so aggressively opposed to his trying to cut off my finger.”

“He cut it off right then?” Will had assumed it was part of a later negotiation.

“One of the other boys sat on my back while Caleb cut it off. He used the bread knife. He sawed it back and forth like you’d do with a tree. I think he enjoyed hearing me scream.”

“How did you get the knife away from him?”

“I don’t really know. It’s one of those things that happens without your thinking about it. Actually, I don’t remember much of what came next, but I do recall that other boy falling on top of me, and the feel of that knife going into his stomach.” She exhaled sharply. “I ran into the carport to get Emma and get the hell out of there. And then I heard Caleb screaming. ‘Mama, Mama.’” She paused for another moment. “He sounded like he was hurt. I don’t know what made me go back inside. It was instinctual, like with the knife, but that was self-preservation, and this was self-destruction.” She obviously still struggled with the memory. “I was aware of it—how wrong it was. I remember thinking quite clearly as I ran past my car and back into the house that this was one of the stupidest things I would ever do in my life. And I was right. But I couldn’t stop myself. I heard him crying for me, and I just ran back inside.”

She paused again for breath. Will could see that the angle of the sun had changed so that it was shining into her eyes. He got up and tilted down the blinds.

She breathed out an exhausted-sounding “Thank you.”

“Do you want to rest?”

"I want to finish this, and then I never want to talk about it again."

That sounded exactly like the kind of thing Faith would say. Will knew better than to argue. He sat down in the chair, waiting for her to continue.

Evelyn didn't start back immediately. For a full minute, she just lay there, her chest rising and falling as she breathed.

Finally, she said, "For about three years after he was born, around once a month, I'd tell Bill and the kids I had to go do paperwork at the office. Usually it was a Sunday while they were at church, because it was easier." She coughed. Her voice was getting raspier. "But I'd really go to the park up the street, and I would sit on that bench by myself, or if it was raining, I would sit in my car, and I would just cry and cry. Not even Mandy knew about it. I've shared everything in my life with her, but not this." She gave Will a meaningful look. "You don't know how hard it was for her with Kenny. She couldn't give him children, and he wanted a family. His own blood. He was very insistent about that. Telling her about how I longed for Caleb would've been cruel."

Will felt a little squeamish hearing something so personal about his boss. He tried to get Evelyn back to the day she'd been abducted. "Caleb tricked you to get you back into the house. That's why you didn't take Emma and leave?"

She was silent long enough to let him know that she was aware he was changing the subject. "You can't fool someone who doesn't want to be fooled."

Will wasn't so sure about that, but he nodded anyway.

"I ran into the kitchen. There was Benny Choo. Of course it was Benny Choo. Carnage everywhere. He was in his element. We had a bit of a struggle, which he won, mostly because he had help. He wanted the money. Everybody wanted the money. The place was filled with angry men demanding money."

"Except Caleb," Will guessed.

"Except Caleb," she confirmed. "He just sat on the couch eating sandwich meat right out of the bag, watching them run around and tear apart my house. I think he loved it. I think it was the most fun he had ever had in his life—watching me sitting there, scared to death, while his friends ran around like chickens with their heads cut off looking for something that he knew wasn't there."

"What about the A on the bottom of the chair?"

She gave a stuttered laugh. "That was an arrow. I assumed that the crime scene techs would find it. I wanted them to know that the main culprit was sitting on the couch. Caleb must've left hair, fiber, fingerprints."

Will wondered if Ahbidi Mittal's team would've figured out the message. Will had certainly botched the job.

She asked, "Tell me, did they really dig up my backyard?"

Will realized she meant Caleb's crew, not Ahbidi Mittal's. "You told them the money was there?"

She chuckled, probably thinking about the boys running around in the dark with shovels. "I thought it seemed plausible, inasmuch as it's happened in the movies."

Will didn't confess that he'd seen too many of those movies himself.

Abruptly, Evelyn's demeanor changed. She looked back at the ceiling. The tiles were stained brown. It wasn't much of a view. Will recognized an avoidance technique when he saw one.

She whispered, "I keep struggling with the fact that I killed my son."

"He was going to kill you. And Faith. He killed countless more people."

She kept staring at the tiles. "Mandy told me not to talk to you about the shooting."

Will knew that Caleb Espisito's death was being reviewed by the police, but he assumed Evelyn would be cleared in a few days, just as Faith had been. "It was self-defense."

She let out a slow breath. "I think he wanted me to make a choice between the two of them. Between him and Faith."

Will didn't confirm that he shared this opinion.

"He could forgive his father. Hector had a nice life, but he never married and he never had another child. But when Caleb saw what I had—what I had struggled to build back with Bill and the children—he resented the hell out of it. He hated me so much." Her eyes glistened with tears. "I remember one of the last things I told him before all of this happened was that holding on to that kind of grudge was like drinking poison and waiting for the other person to die."

Will guessed this was the kind of advice mothers gave their sons. Unfortunately, he'd had to learn that lesson the hard way. "Do you remember anything about where they kept you?"

"It was a warehouse. Abandoned, I'm sure. I yelled enough to wake the dead."

"How many men were there?"

"At the house? I think eight. There were only three at the warehouse, counting Caleb. Juan and David were their names. They tried not to use them, but they weren't very sophisticated, if you get my meaning."

Juan Castillo had been shot outside of Julia Ling's warehouse. David Herrera had been shot in cold blood right in front of Evelyn and Faith. Benny Choo, Hironobu Kwon, Hector Ortiz, Ricardo Ortiz. In all, eight people were dead now because of one man's twenty-year grudge.

Evelyn must have been thinking the same thing. Her voice took on a desperate tone. "Do you think I could've stopped him?"

Short of killing Caleb before it happened, Will didn't see how. "Hate like that doesn't burn out."

She didn't seem comforted. "Bill thought what happened with Faith was my fault. He said that because I was with Hector, I took my eye off my children. Maybe he was right."

"Faith is pretty determined to do her own thing."

"You think she takes after me." She waved away Will's protest. "No, she is exactly like me. God help her."

"There are worse things."

"Hm." Evelyn's eyes closed again. Will stared at her face. Her features were almost obscured by the swelling. She was about Amanda's age, the same kind of cop, but not the same kind of woman. Will hadn't spent a lot of his life feeling envious of other people's parents. It was a waste of time to think about what could've been. But talking to Evelyn Mitchell, knowing the sacrifices she had made for all of her children, Will couldn't help but feel a little jealous.

He stood, thinking he should let her sleep, but Evelyn's eyes opened. She pointed to the pitcher of water. Will helped her drink from the straw. She wasn't as thirsty this time, but Will saw her hand clench around the morphine trigger.

"Thank you." She put her head back on the pillow. She pressed the trigger again.

Will didn't take his seat. "Can I get you anything else before I leave?"

She either didn't hear the question or chose to ignore it. "I know Mandy is hard on you, but it's because she loves you."

Will felt his eyebrows shoot up. The morphine had started working fast.

"She's so proud of you, Will. She brags about you all the time. How smart you are. How strong. You're like a son to her. In more ways than you know."

He felt the need to glance over his shoulder in case Amanda was laughing from the doorway.

Evelyn said, "She should be proud of you. You're a good man. And I wouldn't want my daughter partnered with anyone else. I was so happy when you two got together. I only wish it had turned into something more."

He checked the door one more time. No Amanda. When he turned back around, Evelyn was staring at him.

She asked, "May I be honest with you?"

He nodded, though Will wondered if that meant she hadn't been honest so far.

"I know you've had a difficult life. I know how hard you've worked to turn yourself into the right kind of person. And I know you deserve happiness. And it's not going to come from your wife."

As usual, Will's first impulse was to take up for Angie. "She's been through a lot."

"You deserve so much better."

He felt the need to tell her, "I've got some demons of my own."

"But yours are the good demons, the kind that make you stronger for having them." She tried to smile. " 'If I got rid of my demons, I'd lose my angels.' "

He took a wild guess. "Hemingway?"

"Tennessee Williams."

The door opened. Amanda tapped her watch. "Time's up." She waved for him to leave.

Will looked at the clock on his cell phone. She'd given him exactly an hour. "How did you even know I was here?"

"Walk and talk." She clapped her hands together. "Our girl needs her rest."

Will touched Evelyn's elbow because that was the only place that wasn't bandaged or hooked up to something. "Thank you, Captain Mitchell."

"Take care of yourself, Agent Trent."

Amanda gave Will a shove as he left the room. He almost knocked down a nurse in the hallway.

Amanda said, "You tired her out."

"She wanted to talk."

"She's been through a lot."

"Are there going to be any problems on her shooting Caleb Espisito?"

Amanda shook her head. "The only person who should be worried is Roz Levy. If it was left to me, I'd have her up on obstruction charges."

Will didn't disagree, but Mrs. Levy had perfected her old lady act. No jury in the world would ever convict her.

"I'll get the old hag eventually," Amanda promised. "She's like a stick—always stirring up shit."

"Right." Will tried to wrap this up. Sara had gotten off work five minutes ago. This morning, he'd suggested they have lunch together, but he wasn't sure she would remember. He told Amanda, "I'll see you tomorrow." He started walking toward the elevator. To his dismay, Amanda followed him.

She asked, "What did Evelyn tell you?"

He lengthened his strides, trying to lose her, or at least make her have to work for it. "The truth, I hope."

"I'm sure it was buried in there somewhere."

Will hated that she could so easily sow doubt in his mind. Evelyn Mitchell was Amanda's best friend, but the two women were nothing alike. Evelyn didn't play games. She didn't take pleasure in humiliating people. "I think she told me what I needed to know." He punched the down button on the elevator. He couldn't resist. "She said that you were proud of me."

Amanda laughed. "Well, that doesn't sound like me at all."

"No." A thought occurred to Will. Maybe Evelyn had been dancing around the truth after all. Had she secretly given him a clue? Will felt a wave of nausea come over him.

You're like a son to her. In more ways than you know.

He turned to Amanda, preparing himself for the worst day of his life. "Are you going to tell me that you're really my mother?"

Her laugh echoed down the hallway. She braced her hand against the wall so she wouldn't fall over.

"All right." He punched the button for the elevator again. And again. And then a third time. "I get it. Very funny."

She wiped tears from her eyes. "Oh, Will, do you really think a child of mine would turn out to be a man like you?"

"You know what?" He bent down so that he could look her in the eye. "I'm going to take that as a compliment, and you can't stop me."

"Don't be ridiculous."

He walked toward the emergency stairwell. "Thank you, Amanda, for saying such a nice thing to me."

"Come back here."

He pushed open the door. "I will treasure it forever."

"Don't you dare walk away from me."

Will did just that, taking the steps two at a time, safe in the knowledge that her little feet could not keep up with him.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Sara took off her reading glasses and rubbed her eyes. She had been sitting at the table in the doctors' lounge for at least two hours. The patient's chart on the tablet in front of her was starting to blur. She had slept a total of six hours in the last four days. Her level of exhaustion was reminiscent of her residency, when she'd slept on a cot in the broom closet behind the nurses' station. The cot was still there. Grady had undergone a billion-dollar renovation since the last time Sara worked in the emergency department, but no hospital had ever wasted money on making residents' lives easier.

Nan, the student nurse, was on the couch again. She had a half-empty box of cookies on one side of her and a bag of potato chips on the other. Her thumbs were barely visible as they furiously tapped on her iPhone. She giggled every few minutes as, presumably, a new email came in. Sara wondered if it was possible that the girl was getting younger before her eyes. Her only consolation was that in a few years, the junk food Nan loved so much would start to matter.

"What's up?" Nan asked, dropping the phone. "You cool?"

"I'm cool." Sara was oddly relieved that the girl was talking to her again. Nan had been pouting since she'd realized that Sara was not going to share the juicy details of her part in the hospital shooting.

The girl stood, brushing crumbs off her scrubs. "You want lunch? I think Krakauer was gonna order from the Hut."

"Thanks for asking, but I've got plans." Sara looked at her watch. Will was supposed to take her to lunch. It would be their first date, which said a lot about the way Sara's life was going lately considering Will was the reason she wasn't getting any sleep.

"Later." Nan didn't so much push open the door as throw her body against it.

Sara took a moment to enjoy the peace and quiet in the lounge. She reached into her pocket and pulled out a folded sheet of paper. She'd accidentally left her glasses in her car this morning and had to hike back up the stairs in the parking deck to fetch them. That was when she'd found the note stuck under her windshield wiper. Oddly enough, it wasn't the first time someone had left the word cunt on Sara's car. She supposed she should be grateful that this time it wasn't keyed into the paint.

Sara didn't have to consult a handwriting expert to know that the message was from Angie Trent. There had been another note left on Sara's car yesterday morning, though this time the greeting had been waiting for her when she left her apartment. Angie was getting better. This second note packed more punch than the more innocuous "Whore" from the previous day.

Sara wadded up the paper and threw it toward the trashcan. Of course she missed. She got up to retrieve the note. Instead of tossing it into the trash where it belonged, she unfolded the paper again and stared at the word. It was certainly nasty, but Sara could not help but think it was deserved. In the heat of the moment, she never let herself think about the wedding ring around Will's finger. The cold light of day was another matter. He was a married man. Even without that legal designation, there was still a bond between him and Angie. They were both connected in a way that Sara would never understand.

And it was very clear that Angie was not going to bow out gracefully. The only question was how long it would take before the woman managed to drag Sara down into the gutter with her.

There was a knock at the door.

Sara made sure the note was in the trash before opening the door. Will was there. He had his hands in his pockets. Though they had been together in every way possible, the first ten minutes between them were always awkward. It was as if he was perpetually waiting for Sara to make the first move, to give him some sort of sign that she hadn't yet tired of him.

He asked, "Is this a bad time?"

She opened the door wide. "Not at all."

He glanced around the room. "Am I allowed back here?"

"I think we can make an exception."

He stood in the middle of the room. His hands stayed in his pockets.

Sara asked, "How's Evelyn doing?"

"She's good. At least, I think she is." He took his hands out of his pockets, but only to start twisting the wedding band on his finger. "Faith's going to take some time off work to take care of her. I think it'll be good for both of them to have some time together. Or really bad. You never know."

Sara couldn't help it. She looked at the wadded-up note in the trashcan. Why was he still wearing his wedding ring? Probably for the same reason Angie kept leaving notes on Sara's car.

Will asked, "What is it?"

She indicated the table. "Can we sit down?"

He waited until she was seated, then took the chair across from her. He said, "This doesn't sound good."

"No," she agreed.

He tapped his fingers on the table. "I think I know what you're going to say."

She said it anyway. "I like you, Will. I really, really like you."

"But?"

She touched his hand, resting her finger on his wedding ring.

"Yeah," he said. No explanation. No excuse. No offer to take off the ring and throw it to the wind. Or at the very least, stick it in one of his damn pockets.

Sara forced herself to continue. "I know that Angie is a big part of your life. I respect that. I respect what she means to you."

She waited for a response, but none seemed to be coming. Instead, Will took her hand. His thumb traced along the lines in her palm. Sara couldn't stop the reaction her body felt from his touch. She looked down at their hands together. She let her finger slip under the cuff of his shirt. The ridge of the scar felt rough against her skin. She thought about all of the things she did not know about him—the torture he had endured. The pain he'd brought on himself. And all of it had happened with Angie right by his side.

"I can't compete with her," Sara admitted. "And I can't be with you if I'm worried about you wanting to be with her."

He cleared his throat. "I don't want to be with her." She waited for him to say that he wanted to be with Sara. But he didn't.

She tried again. "I can't be second place. I can't know that no matter how much I might need you, you'll always go running to Angie first."

Again, she waited for him to say something—anything—that would convince her that she was wrong. Seconds ticked by. It felt like an eternity.

When he finally spoke, his voice was so quiet that she could barely hear him. "She cried wolf a lot." He licked his lips. "When we were little, I mean." He glanced up to make sure Sara was listening, then looked back down at their hands. "There was this one time when we were placed together. It was a foster home. More like a factory farm. They were doing it for the money. At least the wife was. The husband was doing it for the teenage girls."

Sara felt her throat tighten. She struggled against the impulse to feel sorry for Angie.

"So, like I said, Angie cried wolf a lot. When she accused the guy of molesting her, the caseworker didn't believe her. Didn't even open a file. Didn't listen to me when I said she wasn't lying this time." His shoulders went up in a shrug. "I would hear her at night sometimes. Screaming when he hurt her. He hurt her a lot. None of the other kids cared. I guess they were happy it wasn't happening to them. But for me ..." His words trailed off. He watched his thumb move along the back of her fingers. "I knew that they'd have to open an investigation if one of us got hurt. Or hurt ourselves." He tightened his grip around her hand. "So, I told Angie, this is what I'm going to do. And I did it. I took a razor blade out of the medicine cabinet and I cut myself. I knew it couldn't be a half measure. You've seen it." He gave a strained laugh. "It's not a half measure."

"No," she agreed. It was hard to understand how he'd managed not to pass out from the pain.

"So," Will said. "That got us out of that home and they shut it down and the people running it weren't allowed to foster kids anymore." He looked up, blinking a few times to clear his eyes. "You know, one of the things Angie said to me the other night was that I would never do that for you—never cut myself like that—and I think she's right." There was a sadness in his smile. "Not because I don't care about you, but because you would never put me in that kind of situation. You would never ask me to make that choice."

Sara looked into his eyes. The sun streaming in through the windows turned his eyelashes white. She could not imagine what he'd been through, the level of desperation that had driven him to take that razor in hand.

"I should let you get on with your day." He leaned over and kissed her hand, letting his lips linger for a few seconds. When he straightened up, something about him had changed. His voice was firmer, more determined. "You have to know that if you ever need me, I'll be there. No matter what else happens. I'll be there."

There was something final in what he said, as if everything was settled. He almost seemed relieved.

"Will—"

"It's all right." He gave one of his awkward laughs. "I guess you're immune to my astounding charm."

Sara felt a lump in her throat. She couldn't believe that he was giving in so easily. She wanted him to fight for this. She wanted him to pound his fist on the table and tell her there was no way this was over, that he wasn't going to give her up that easily.

But he didn't. He just slid his hand out of hers and stood up. "Thank you. I know that sounds stupid." He glanced at her, then at the door. "Just—thank you."

She heard his footsteps cross the floor, the noise from the hallway as the door swung open. Sara pressed her fingers to her eyes, trying to stop the tears. She couldn't get past his tone of resignation, his easy acquiescence to what he clearly felt was inevitable. She had no idea what his story about Angie was meant to accomplish. Was Sara supposed to feel sorry for the woman? Was she supposed to find it romantic that Will was ready to kill himself in order to rescue her?

She realized now that Will was more like Jeffrey than she'd wanted to admit. Maybe Sara had a thing for firemen, not cops. Both men had shown a propensity for running straight into burning buildings. In the last week alone, Will had been shot at by gangsters, threatened by a psychopath, browbeaten by at least three women, emasculated in front of strangers, crammed into the trunk of a car for hours on end, and willingly volunteered himself to go into a situation where he knew there was a high probability that he would be killed. He was so damn intent on rescuing everyone else in the world that Will didn't realize what he really needed was rescuing from himself. Everyone took advantage of him. Everyone exploited his good graces, his decency, his kindness. No one thought to ask Will what he needed.

His whole life had been spent in the shadows, the stoic kid sitting in the back of the classroom, afraid to open his mouth for fear of being found out. Angie kept him in the dark because it served her selfish needs. Sara had quickly realized her first time with Will that he'd never been with a woman who really knew how to love him. No wonder he had capitulated so easily when she'd told him it was over. Will had taken it as a given that nothing good in his life would ever last. That was why he had sounded so relieved. His toes had been dangling over the edge. He was too afraid to take the leap because he'd never really fallen.

Sara felt her mouth open in surprise. She was just as guilty as the rest of them. She had been so desperate for Will to fight for her that it had never occurred to her that Will was waiting for Sara to fight for him.

She was through the door and running down the hallway before logic could intervene. As usual, the ER was packed. Nurses ran with bags of IVs. Gurneys flew past. Sara sprinted to the elevator. She stabbed the down button a dozen times, silently begging the doors to open. The stairs exited at the back of the hospital. Parking was in the front. Will would be home by the time she ran around the building. Sara looked at her watch, wondering how much time she had wasted feeling sorry for herself. Will was probably halfway to the decks by now. Three structures. Six stories of cars. More if he'd used one of the decks for the university. She should wait in the street. Sara tried to map the roads in her head. Bell. Armstrong. Maybe he had parked at the Grady Detention Center.

The doors finally opened. George, the security guard, was standing there with his arm resting on his gun. Will was beside him.

George asked, "Everything okay, Doc?"

Sara could only nod.

Will stepped off the elevator, a sheepish look on his face. "I forgot that Betty's at your place." He gave that familiar, awkward smile. "At the risk of sounding like a country music singer, you can take my heart, but I can't let you take my dog."

Sara was bumped by an EMT passing behind her. She braced her palms against Will's chest to keep from falling. He just stood there with his hands in his pockets, smiling down at her with a curious look on his face. Who had ever taken up for this man? Not his family, who'd abandoned him to state care. Not the foster parents who'd thought he was expendable. Not the doctors who'd experimented on his busted lip. Not the teachers and social workers who'd taken his dyslexia for stupidity. And especially not Angie, who had so easily gambled with his life. His precious life.

"Sara?" Will looked concerned. "Are you okay?"

She slid her hands up to his shoulders. Sara could feel the familiar hard muscle beneath his shirt, the heat from his skin. She had kissed his eyelids this morning. He had delicate lashes, blond and soft. She had teased him, kissing his eyebrows, his nose, his chin, letting her hair drape across his face and chest. How many hours had Sara spent over the last year wondering how the scar above his mouth would feel against her lips? How many nights had she dreamt about waking up in his arms?

So many hours. So many nights.

Sara stood on her toes to look him in the eye. "Do you want to be with me?"

"Yes."

She relished the sound of his certainty. "I want to be with you, too."

Will shook his head. He looked like he was waiting for the punch line to a very bad joke. "I don't understand."

"It worked."

"What worked?"

"Your astounding charm."

His eyes narrowed. "What charm?"

"I changed my mind."

He still didn't seem to believe her.

"Kiss me," she told him. "I changed my mind."

To all the librarians in the world on behalf of all the kids y'all helped grow up to be writers

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

As always, tremendous thanks go to Victoria Sanders, my agent, and my editors Kate Miciak and Kate Elton. Angela Cheng Caplan should be in here somewhere, too. I would also like to thank everyone at my publishing houses for their continued support. Gina Centrello and Libby McGuire, it's been a pleasure getting to know y'all. Adam Humphrey, I appreciate your letting me kill you. And beat you. And humiliate you. And all the other things Claire takes for granted.

Thanks to the incomparable Vernon Jordan for regaling me with tales of 1970s Atlanta. You, sir, are a legend. David Harper, this is at least your tenth year of helping me make Sara look like a doctor. As always, I am enormously grateful for your help and apologize for any errors, which were committed in service of story. Special Agent John Heinen, the same goes for you. Any gun mistakes are my own. I have many people to thank at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, including Pete Stuart, Wayne Smith, John Bankhead, and Director Vernon Keenan. Y'all are so generous with your time, and so passionate about what you do, that it's a pleasure to be in your company. Speaker David Ralston, I appreciate your continued support.

Daddies don't get much page time in this book, but I'd like to thank mine for being such a wonderful father. I'd write a story about you, but no one would believe how good you are. And speaking of goodness, DA—as always, you are my heart.

To my readers, please note that this is a work of fiction. Though I have been an Atlanta resident for more than half my life, I am also a writer, and have changed streets, building design, and neighborhoods to suit my dastardly needs. (Come on, Sherwood Forest, you know you deserve it!)

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLER

KARIN SLAUGHTER

“[A] hold-on-to-your-hat, nail-biting story.”

—The Washington Post

FIRST TIME IN PRINT:
THE BONUS STORY “SNATCHED”

Criminal

A NOVEL

“Slaughter’s best yet, by far.”

—LEE CHILD

CRIMINAL

A NOVEL

KARIN SLAUGHTER

DELL BOOKS
NEW YORK

Criminal is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Copyright © 2012 by Karin Slaughter

All rights reserved.

Published in the United States by Delacorte Press, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., New York.

DELACORTE PRESS is a registered trademark of Random House, Inc., and the colophon is a trademark of Random House, Inc.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Slaughter, Karin
Criminal : a novel / Karin Slaughter.
p. cm.

eISBN: 978-0-345-52851-3

I. Title.

PS3569.L275C75 2012

813'.54—dc23 2012001504

www.bantamdell.com

Jacket design: Carlos Beltrán

v3.1_r3

Contents

Master - Table of Contents

Criminal

Title Page

Copyright

Chapter 1
Chapter 2
Chapter 3
Chapter 4
Chapter 5
Chapter 6
Chapter 7
Chapter 8
Chapter 9
Chapter 10
Chapter 11
Chapter 12
Chapter 13
Chapter 14
Chapter 15
Chapter 16
Chapter 17
Chapter 18
Chapter 19
Chapter 20
Chapter 21
Chapter 22
Chapter 23
Chapter 24
Chapter 25
Chapter 26
Chapter 27
Chapter 28
Chapter 29
Chapter 30
Chapter 31
Chapter 32
Chapter 33

Dedication
Acknowledgments

August 15, 1974

LUCY BENNETT

A cinnamon brown Oldsmobile Cutlass crawled up Edgewood Avenue, the windows lowered, the driver hunched down in his seat. The lights from the console showed narrow, beady eyes tracing along the line of girls standing under the street sign. Jane. Mary. Lydia. The car stopped. Predictably, the man tilted up his chin toward Kitty. She trotted over, adjusting her miniskirt as she navigated her spiked heels across the uneven asphalt. Two weeks ago, when Juice had first brought Kitty onto the corner, she'd told the other girls she was sixteen, which probably meant fifteen, though she looked no older than twelve.

They had all hated her on sight.

Kitty leaned down into the open window of the car. Her stiff vinyl skirt tipped up like the bottom of a bell. She always got picked first, which was becoming a problem that everyone but Juice could see. Kitty got special favors. She could talk men into doing anything. The girl was fresh, childlike, though like all of them, she carried a kitchen knife in her purse and knew how to use it. Nobody wanted to do what they were doing, but to have another girl—a newer girl—picked over them hurt just as much as if they were all standing on the sidelines at the debutante ball.

Inside the Oldsmobile, the transaction was quickly negotiated, no haggling because what was on offer was still worth the price. Kitty made the signal to Juice, waited for his nod, then got into the car. The muffler chugged exhaust as the Olds made a wide turn onto a narrow side street. The car shook once as the gear was shoved into park. The driver's hand flew up, clamped around the back of Kitty's head, and she disappeared.

Lucy Bennett turned away, looking up the dark, soulless avenue. No headlights coming. No traffic. No business. Atlanta wasn't a nighttime town. The last person to leave the Equitable building usually turned off the lights, but Lucy could see the bulbs from the Flat-iron glowing clear across Central City Park. If she squinted hard enough, she could find the familiar green of the C&S sign that anchored the business district. The New South. Progress through commerce. The City Too Busy to Hate.

If there were men out walking these streets tonight, it was with no amount of good on their minds.

Jane lit a smoke, then tucked the pack back into her purse. She wasn't the kind to share, but she was certainly the kind to take. Her eyes met Lucy's. The dead in them was hard to look at. Jane must've felt the same. She quickly glanced away.

Lucy shivered, even though it was the middle of August, heat wafting off the pavement like smoke from a fire. Her feet were sore. Her back ached. Her head was pounding like a metronome. Her gut felt like she'd swallowed a truckload of concrete. Cotton filled her mouth. Her hands felt the constant prick of pins and needles. A clump of her blonde hair had come out in the sink this morning. She had turned nineteen two days ago and already she was an old woman.

In the side street, the brown Olds shook again. Kitty's head came up. She wiped her mouth as she got out of the car. No dawdling. No giving the john time to reconsider his purchase. The car drove away before she could shut the door, and Kitty teetered for a moment on the high heels, looking lost, afraid, and then angry. They were all angry. Fury was their refuge, their comfort, the only thing that they could truly call their own.

Lucy watched Kitty pick her way back toward the corner. She gave Juice the cash, trying to keep her forward momentum, but he caught her arm to make her stop. Kitty spat on the sidewalk, trying to look like she wasn't terrified as Juice unfolded the wad of cash, counted off each bill. Kitty stood there, waiting. They all waited.

Finally, Juice lifted his chin. The money was good. Kitty took her place back in the line. She didn't look at any of the other girls. She just stared blankly into the street, waiting for the next car to roll up, waiting for the next man who would either give her a nod or pass her by. It'd taken two days, tops, for her eyes to develop the same dead look as the rest of the girls. What was going through her mind? Probably the same as Lucy, that familiar chant that rocked her to sleep every night: When-will-this-be-over? When-will-this-be-over? When-will-this-be-over?

Lucy had been fifteen once. From this distance, she could barely remember that girl. Passing notes in class. Giggling about boys. Rushing home from school every day to watch her soap. Dancing in her room to the Jackson Five with her best friend, Jill Henderson. Lucy was fifteen years old, and then life had opened up like a chasm, and little Lucy had plummeted down, down into the unrelenting darkness.

She had started taking speed to lose weight. Just pills at first. Benzedrine, which her friend Jill had found in her mother's medicine cabinet. They took them sparingly, cautiously, until the feds had gone crazy and banned the pills. The medicine cabinet was empty one day, and the next—or so it seemed—Lucy's weight ballooned back up to well over one hundred fifty pounds. She was the only overweight kid in school save for Fat George, the boy who picked his nose and sat by himself at the lunch table. Lucy hated him the same way he hated her, the same way she hated her own reflection in the mirror.

It was Jill's mother who taught Lucy how to shoot up. Mrs. Henderson wasn't stupid; she had noticed the missing pills, been pleased to see Lucy finally doing something to get rid of her baby fat. The woman availed herself of the drug for the same reason. She was a nurse at Clayton General Hospital. She walked out of the emergency room with glass vials of Methedrine chattering like teeth in the pocket of her white uniform. Injectable amphetamine, she told Lucy. The same as the pills, only faster.

Lucy was fifteen years old the first time the needle pierced her skin.

"Just a little bit at a time," Mrs. Henderson coached, drawing a red tinge of blood into the syringe, then slowly pressing home the plunger. "You control it. Don't let it control you."

There was no real high, just a lightheadedness, and then of course the welcome loss of appetite. Mrs. Henderson was right. The liquid was faster than the pills, easier. Five pounds. Ten pounds. Fifteen. Then—nothing. So Lucy had redefined her "just a little bit at a time" until she was drawing back not five cc's, but ten, then ten turned to fifteen, then her head exploded and she was on fire.

What did she care about after that?

Nothing.

Boys? Too stupid. Jill Henderson? What a drag. Her weight? Never again.

By the age of sixteen, Lucy was just under a hundred pounds. Her ribs, her hips, her elbows, jutted out like polished marble. For the first time in her life, she had cheekbones. She wore dark Cleopatra eyeliner and blue eye shadow and ironed her long blonde hair so that it slapped stiffly against her impossibly thin ass. The little girl her fifth-grade PE coach had, much to the delight of the rest of the class, nicknamed "Steam Roller" was model-thin, carefree, and—suddenly—popular.

Not popular with her old friends, the ones she had known since kindergarten. They all spurned her as a waste, a dropout, a loser. For once in her life, Lucy didn't care. Who needed people who looked down on you for having a little fun? Lucy had only ever been a token anyway—the fat girl to pal around with so the other girl could be the pretty one, the charming one, the one all the boys flirted with.

Her new friends thought Lucy was perfect. They loved it when she made a sarcastic quip about someone from her old life. They embraced her weirdness. The girls invited her to their parties. The boys asked her out. They treated her as an equal. She finally fit in with a group. She finally didn't stick out as too anything. She was just one of many. She was just Lucy.

And what of her old life? Lucy felt nothing but disdain for everyone who had inhabited it, especially Mrs. Henderson, who abruptly cut her off and said Lucy needed to get her shit together. Lucy's shit was more together than it had ever been. She had no intention whatsoever of giving up her new life.

All of her old friends were squares, obsessed with college prep, which mostly consisted of debating which sorority they would rush. The finer points of these sororities, whose Victorian and Greek Revival-style mansions dotted Milledge Avenue and South Lumpkin Street at the University of Georgia, had been part of Lucy's vernacular since the age of ten, but the lure of amphetamine reduced her Greek to a forgotten language. She didn't need the disapproving glances from her old friends. She didn't even need Mrs. Henderson anymore. There were plenty of new friends who could hook her up, and Lucy's parents were generous with her allowance. On the weeks she was short, her mother never noticed money missing from her purse.

It was so easy to see now, but at the time, the spiraling down of her life seemed to happen in seconds, not the actual two full years it had taken for Lucy to fall. At home, she was sullen and sulky. She started sneaking out at night and lying to her parents about stupid things. Mundane things. Things that could be easily disproven. At school, Lucy failed class after class, finally ending up in rudimentary English with Fat George sitting in the front and Lucy and her new friends in the back row, mostly sleeping off the lows, biding their time until they could get back to their real love.

The needle.

That finely honed piece of surgical steel, that seemingly innocuous device of delivery that ruled every moment of Lucy's life. She dreamed about shooting up. That first prick of flesh. That pinch as the tip pierced vein. That slow burn as the liquid was injected. That immediate euphoria of the drug entering her system. It was worth everything. Worth every sacrifice. Worth every loss. Worth the things she had to do to get it. Worth the things she all but forgot about the second the drug entered her bloodstream.

Then, suddenly, came the crest of the last hill, the biggest hill, on her roller coaster ride down.

Bobby Fields. Almost twenty years older than Lucy. Wiser. Stronger. He was a mechanic at one of her father's gas stations. Bobby had never noticed her before. Lucy was invisible to him, a pudgy little girl with lank pigtails. But that changed after the needle entered Lucy's life. She walked into the garage one day, her jeans hanging low on her newly lean hips, bell-bottoms frayed from dragging the floor, and Bobby told her to stop and talk awhile.

He listened to her, too, and Lucy only then realized that no one had really listened to her before. And then, Bobby had reached up with his grease-stained fingers and stroked back a piece of hair that was hanging in her face. And then, somehow, they were in the back of the building and his hand was on her breast, and she felt alive under the bright glare of his undivided attention.

Lucy had never been with a man before. Even high as a kite, she knew she should say no. She knew that she had to save herself, that no one wanted spoiled goods. Because as improbable as it now seemed, back then there was still a part of her who assumed that despite the slight detour, one day she'd end up at UGA, pledge herself to whichever house she chose, and get married to an earnest young man whose bright future met with her father's approval.

Lucy would have babies. She would join the PTA. She would bake cookies and drive her kids to school in a station wagon and sit in her kitchen smoking with the other mothers while they complained about their boring lives. And, maybe while the other women discussed marital discord or colicky babies, Lucy would smile pleasantly, remembering her reckless youth, her crazy, hedonistic affair with the needle.

Or, maybe one day she would be on a street corner in the middle of Atlanta and feel her stomach drop at the thought of losing that homey kitchen, those close friends.

Because, while sixteen-year-old Lucy had never been with a man before, Bobby Fields had been with plenty of women. Plenty of young women. He knew how to talk to them. He knew how to make them feel special. And, most important, he knew how to move his hand from breast to thigh, from thigh to crotch, and from there to other places that made Lucy gasp so loudly that her father called from the office to see if she was okay.

"I'm all right, Daddy," she had said, because Bobby's hand had felt so good that Lucy would've lied to God Himself.

At first, their relationship was a secret, which of course made it more exciting.

They had a bond. They had a forbidden thing between them. For nearly a full year, they carried on their clandestine affair. Lucy would avoid Bobby's gaze when she made her weekly trek to the garage to count quarters with her daddy. She would pretend Bobby didn't exist until she couldn't take it anymore. She would go to the dirty bathroom behind the building. He would grip his greasy hands so hard around her ass that she would feel the pain when she sat back down beside her father.

The hunger for Bobby was almost as intense as her hunger for the needle. She skipped school. She fabricated a part-time job and fake sleepovers that her parents never bothered to verify. Bobby had his own place. He drove a Mustang Fastback like Steve McQueen. He drank beer and he smoked dope and he scored speed for Lucy and she learned how to go down on him without gagging.

It was all perfect until she realized that she couldn't keep up her fake life anymore. Or maybe she just didn't want to. She dropped out of high school two months before graduation. The final straw came the weekend her parents took a trip to visit her brother in college. Lucy spent the entire time at Bobby's. She cooked for him. She cleaned for him. She made love to him all night, and during the day she stared at the clock, counting down the minutes until she could tell him that she loved him. And Lucy did love him, especially when he got home at night with a big grin on his face and a little vial of magic in his pocket.

Bobby was generous with the needle. Maybe too generous. He got Lucy so high that her teeth started chattering. She was still high when she stumbled home the next morning.

Sunday.

Her parents were supposed to go to church with her brother before driving back, but there they were, sitting at the kitchen table, still in their traveling clothes. Her mother hadn't even taken off her hat. They had been waiting up all night. They had called her friend, her alibi, who was supposed to say that Lucy had spent the night. The girl had lied at first but after only the slightest bit of pressure told Lucy's parents exactly where their daughter was and exactly what she'd been up to for the last several months.

Lucy was seventeen by then, still considered a child. Her parents tried to have her committed. They tried to have Bobby arrested. They tried to prevent other garages from hiring him, but he just moved to Atlanta, where no one cared who fixed their car so long as it was cheap.

Two months of hell passed, and then, suddenly, Lucy was eighteen. Just like that, her life was different. Or different in a different way. Old enough to quit school. Old enough to drink. Old enough to leave her family without the pigs dragging her back home. She went from being her daddy's girl to Bobby's girl, living in an apartment off Stewart Avenue, sleeping all day, waiting for Bobby to come home at night so he could shoot her up, screw her, then let her sleep some more.

The only regret Lucy felt at the time was toward her brother, Henry. He was in law school at UGA. He was six years older, more like a friend than a sibling. In person, they generally shared long moments of silence, but since he'd gone away to school, they had written each other letters two or three times a month.

Lucy had loved writing letters to Henry. She was the old Lucy in all of her correspondences: silly about boys, anxious for graduation, eager to learn how to drive. No talk of the needle. No talk of her new friends who were so far outside the margins of society that Lucy was afraid to bring them home lest they steal her mother's good silver. That is, if her mother even let them through the door.

Henry's responses were always brief, but even when he was covered up in exams, he managed to send Lucy a line or two to let her know what was going on. He was excited about her joining him on campus. He was excited about showing around his baby girl to his friends. He was excited about everything, until he wasn't, because her parents told him that his darling sister had moved to Atlanta as the whore of a thirty-eight-year-old hippie, drug-dealing gearhead.

After that, Lucy's letters came back unopened. Henry's scrawl informed her, "Return to sender." Just like that, he dropped Lucy like trash in the street.

Maybe she was trash. Maybe she deserved to be abandoned. Because once the rush wore off, once the highs turned less intense and the lows became almost unbearable, what was there left to Lucy Bennett but a life on the street?

Two months after Bobby moved her to Atlanta, he kicked her out. Who could blame him? His hot young fox had turned into a junkie who met him at the door every night begging for the needle. And when Bobby stopped supplying her, she found another man in the complex who was willing to give her anything she wanted. So what if she had to spread her legs for it? He was giving her what Bobby wouldn't. He was supplying her demand.

His name was Fred. He cleaned planes at the airport. He liked to do things to Lucy that made her cry, and then he'd give her the needle and everything would be okay again. Fred thought he was special, better than Bobby. When Fred figured out the gleam in Lucy's eye was for the drug and not for him, he started beating her. He didn't stop beating her until she landed in the hospital. And then when she got a taxi back to the apartment complex, the manager told her that Fred had moved out, no forwarding address. And then the manager told Lucy that she was welcome to stay with him.

Much of what came next was a blur, or maybe it was so clear that she couldn't see it, the way putting on someone else's glasses makes your eyes cross. For almost a year, Lucy went from man to man, supplier to supplier. She did things—horrible things—to get the needle. If there was a totem pole in the world of speed, she had started at the top and quickly hit bottom. Day after day, she felt the dizzying spin of her life circling the drain. Yet, she felt helpless to stop it. The pain would kick in. The need. The yearning. The longing that burned like hot acid in her gut.

And then finally, the very bottom. Lucy was terrified of the bikers who sold speed, but eventually, inevitably, her love of the speed won out. They tossed her around like a baseball, everyone taking a hit. All of them had fought in Vietnam and were furious at the world, the system. Furious at Lucy, too. She had never overdosed before, at least not bad enough to end up in the hospital. Once, twice, a third time, she was dropped off the back of a Harley in front of the Grady emergency room. The bikers didn't like that. Hospitals brought the cops and the cops were expensive to buy off. One night, Lucy got too high and one of them brought her down with heroin, a trick he'd picked up fighting Charlie.

Heroin, the final nail in Lucy's coffin. As with the speed, she was a quick convert. That deadening sensation. That indescribable bliss. The loss of time. Space. Consciousness.

Lucy had never taken money for sex. Her transactions until this point had always had an air of bartering. Sex for speed. Sex for heroin. Never sex for money.

But now, Lucy found herself in desperate need of money.

The bikers sold speed, not heroin. Heroin belonged to the coloreds. Even the Mafia was hands-off. H was a ghetto drug. It was too potent, too addictive, too dangerous for white people. Especially white women.

Which is how Lucy ended up being tricked out by a black man with a tattoo of Jesus on his chest.

The spoon. The flame. The smell of burning rubber. The tourniquet. The filter from a broken cigarette. There was a romantic pageantry to the whole thing, a drawn-out process that made her former affair with the needle seem woefully unsophisticated. Even now, Lucy could feel herself getting excited at the thought of the spoon. She closed her eyes, imagining the bent piece of silver, the way the neck resembled a broken swan. Black swan. Black sheep. Black man's whore.

Suddenly, Juice was at her side. The other girls cautiously moved away. Juice had a way of sensing weakness. It was how he got them in the first place. "What it is, Sexy?"

"Nothing," she mumbled. "Everything's dyn-o-mite."

He took the toothpick out of his mouth. "Don't play me, gal."

Lucy looked down at the ground. She could see his white patent leather shoes, the way the bell-bottom of his custom-made green pants draped across the wingtips. How many strangers had she screwed to put the shine on those shoes? How many back seats had she lain down in so he could go to the tailor in Five Points to have his inseam measured?

"Sorry." She chanced a look at his face, trying to gauge his temper.

Juice took out his handkerchief and rubbed the sweat off his forehead. He had long sideburns that connected to his mustache and goatee. There was a birthmark on his cheek that Lucy stared at sometimes when she needed to concentrate on other things.

He said, "Come on, gal. You don't tell me what's on your mind, I cain't fix it." He pushed her shoulder. When she didn't start talking, he pushed her harder to get the point across. He wasn't going away. Juice hated when they kept secrets from him.

"I was thinking about my mother," Lucy told him, which was the first time she'd told a man the truth in a long while.

Juice laughed, used the toothpick to address the other girls. "Ain't that sweet? She been thinkin' about her mammy." He raised his voice. "How many'a y'all's mama's here for ya now?"

There was a titter of nervous laughter. Kitty, ever the suck-up, said, "We just need you, Juice. Only you."

"Lucy," Mary whispered. The word nearly got trapped in her throat. If Juice got pissed off, none of them would get what they wanted, and all that they wanted right now, all that they needed, was the spoon and the H that Juice had in his pocket.

"Nah, it's all right." Juice waved off Mary. "Let her talk. Come on, girl. Speak."

Maybe it was because he said the same thing that you'd say to a dog

—“speak,” like Lucy would get a treat if she barked on command—or maybe it was because she was so used to doing exactly what Juice told her to do, that Lucy’s mouth started moving of its own volition.

“I was thinkin’ about this time my mama took me into town.” Lucy closed her eyes. She could feel herself back in the car. See the metal dashboard of her mother’s Chrysler gleaming in the bright sunlight. It was hot, steamy, the sort of August that made you wish you had air-conditioning in your car. “She was gonna drop me off at the library while she did her chores.”

Juice chuckled at her memory. “Aw, that’s sweet, girl. Your mama takin’ you to the liberry sose you can read.”

“She couldn’t get there.” Lucy opened her eyes, looked directly at Juice in a way she’d never before dared. “The Klan was having a rally.”

Juice cleared his throat. He cut his eyes to the other girls, then zeroed back in on Lucy. “Keep going.” His deep tone wedged a splinter of cold into her spine.

“The streets were blocked. They were stopping traffic, checking cars.”

“Hush now,” Mary whispered, begging for Lucy to stop. But Lucy couldn’t stop. Her master had told her to speak.

“It was a Saturday. Mama always took me to the library on Saturdays.”

“That right?” Juice asked.

“Yes.” Even with her eyes open, Lucy could still see the scene playing out in her head. She was in her mother’s car. Safe. Carefree. Before the pills. Before the needle. Before the heroin. Before Juice. Before she lost that little Lucy who sat so patiently in her mother’s car, worried that she wasn’t going to get to the library in time for her reading group.

Little Lucy was a voracious reader. She gripped the stack of books in her lap as she stared at the men blocking the streets. They were all dressed in their white robes. Most of them had their hoods pulled back because of the heat. She recognized some from church, a couple from school. She waved at Mr. Sheffield, who owned the hardware store. He winked at her and waved back.

Lucy told Juice, “We were on a hill near the courthouse, and there was a black guy in front of us, stopped at the stop sign. He was in one of those little foreign cars. Mr. Peterson walked right up to him, and Mr. Laramie was on the other side.”

“That right?” Juice repeated.

“Yes, that’s right. The guy was terrified. His car kept rolling back. He must’ve had a clutch. His foot was slipping because he was so panicked. And I remember my mama watching him like we were watching Wild Kingdom or something, and she just laughed and laughed, and said, ‘Lookit how scared that coon is.’ ”

“Jesus,” Mary hissed.

Lucy smiled at Juice, repeated, “Lookit how scared that coon is.”

Juice took the toothpick out of his mouth. “You best watch yourself, gal.”

“Lookit how scared that coon is,” Lucy mumbled. “Lookit how scared ...” She let her voice trail off, but it was only like an engine idling before it was gunned. For no reason, the story struck her as hilariously funny. Her voice went up, the sound echoing off the buildings. “Lookit how scared that coon is! Lookit how scared that coon is!”

Juice slapped her, open palm, but hard enough to spin her around. Lucy felt blood slide down her throat.

Not the first time she'd been hit. Not the last. It wouldn't stop her. Nothing could stop her. "Lookit how scared that coon is! Lookit how scared that coon is!"

"Shut up!" Juice punched his fist into her face.

Lucy felt the crack of a tooth breaking. Her jaw twisted like a Hula Hoop, but she still said, "Lookit how scared—"

He kicked her in the stomach, his tight pants keeping his foot low so that she felt the toe of his shoe scrape her pelvic bone. Lucy gasped from the pain, which was excruciating, but somehow liberating. How many years had it been since she'd felt something other than numb? How many years had it been since she'd raised her voice, told a man no?

Her throat felt tight. She could barely stand. "Lookit how scared that—"

Juice punched her in the face again. She felt the bridge of her nose splinter. Lucy staggered back, arms open. She saw stars. Literal stars. Her purse dropped. The heel of her shoe snapped off.

"Get out my face!" Juice waved his fist in the air. "Get outta here 'fore I kill you, bitch!"

Lucy stumbled into Jane, who pushed her away like a diseased dog.

"Just go!" Mary begged. "Please."

Lucy swallowed a mouthful of blood and coughed it back out. Pieces of white speckled the ground. Teeth.

"Get on, bitch!" Juice warned her. "Get on outta my sight."

Lucy managed to turn. She looked up the dark street. There were no lights showing the way. Either the pimps shot them out or the city didn't bother to turn them on. Lucy stumbled again, but kept herself upright. The broken heel was a problem. She kicked off both shoes. The soles of her feet felt the intense heat of the asphalt, a burning sensation that shot straight up to her scalp. It was like walking on hot coals. She'd seen that on TV once—the trick was to walk fast enough to deprive the heat of oxygen so your skin didn't burn.

Lucy picked up her pace. She straightened herself as she walked. She kept her head held high despite the breathtaking pain in her ribs. It didn't matter. The darkness didn't matter. The heat in her soles didn't matter. Nothing mattered.

She turned, screaming, "Look at how scared that coon is!"

Juice made to run after her, and Lucy bolted down the street. Her bare feet slapped against the pavement. Her arms pumped. Her lungs shook as she rounded the corner. Adrenaline raced through her body. Lucy thought of all those PE classes in school, when her bad attitude had earned her five, ten, twenty laps around the track. She had been so fast then, so young and free. Not anymore. Her legs started to cramp. Her knees wanted to buckle. Lucy chanced a look behind her, but Juice was not there. No one was there. She stumbled to a stop.

He didn't even care enough to chase her.

Lucy bent over, bracing her hand against a phone booth, blood dripping from her mouth. She used her tongue to find the source. Two teeth were broken, though thank God they were in the back.

She went inside the booth. The light was too bright when she closed the door. She let it hang open and leaned against the glass. Her breath was still labored. Her body felt as if she'd run ten miles, not a handful of blocks.

She looked at the phone, the black receiver on the hook, the slot for the dime.

Lucy traced her fingers along the bell symbol engraved in the metal plate, then let her hand move down to find the four, the seven, the eight. Her parents' phone number. She still knew it by heart, just like she knew the street number where they lived, her grandmother's birthday, her brother's upcoming graduation date. That earlier Lucy was not completely lost. There still existed her life in numbers.

She could call, but even if they answered, no one would have anything to say.

Lucy pushed herself out of the phone booth. She walked slowly up the street, in no particular direction but away. Her stomach clenched as the first wave of withdrawal made itself known. She should go to the hospital to get patched up and beg the nurse for some methadone before it got really bad. Grady was twelve blocks down and three over. Her legs weren't cramping yet. She could make the walk. Those laps around the high school track hadn't always felt like a punishment. Lucy used to love to run. She loved jogging on weekends with her brother Henry. He always gave up before she did. Lucy had a letter from him in her purse. She'd gotten it last month from the man at the Union Mission, where the girls took their downtime when Juice was mad at them.

Lucy had kept the letter for three whole days before opening it, afraid it would be bad news. Her father dead. Her mother run off with the Charles Chips man. Everyone was getting divorced now, weren't they? Broken homes. Broken children. Though Lucy had been broken for a long time, so it was nothing to open and read a simple letter, right?

Henry's cramped script was so familiar that it felt like a soft hand on her cheek. Tears had filled her eyes. She read the letter through once, then again, then again. One page. No gossip or family news, because Henry was not that way. He was precise, logical, never dramatic. Henry was in his last year of law school. He was looking for a job now because he'd heard the market was tough. He would miss being a student. He would miss being around his friends. And he really missed Lucy.

He missed Lucy.

This was the part she had read four times, then five, then so many more that she had lost count. Henry missed Lucy. Her brother missed his sister.

Lucy missed herself, too.

But Lucy had dropped her purse back on the street corner. Juice probably had it now. He'd probably shaken it out onto the sidewalk and combed through everything like it belonged to him. Which meant he had Henry's letter and Lucy's kitchen knife that was sharp enough to cut the skin on her leg, which she knew because she had done it last week just to make sure she could still bleed.

Lucy took a left at the next corner. She turned around to look at the moon. It punctured the black sky with the curved edge of its fingernail. The skeleton of the unfinished Peachtree Plaza hotel loomed in the distance—the tallest hotel in the world. The whole city was under construction. In a year or two, there would be thousands of new hotel rooms opening downtown. Business would be booming, especially in the streets.

She doubted she'd live to see it.

Lucy tripped again. Pain shot up her spine. The damage to her body was making itself known. Her rib must be fractured. She knew that her nose was broken. The clenching in her stomach was getting worse. She would need a fix soon or she'd go into the DTs.

She made herself put one foot in front of the other. "Please," she prayed to the God of Grady Hospital. "Let them give me methadone. Let them give me a bed. Let them be kind. Let them be—"

Lucy stopped. What the hell was wrong with her? Why was she leaving her fate to some bitch nurse who would take one look at her and know exactly what she was? Lucy should go back to her strip. She should make up with Juice. She should get down on her hands and knees and beg him for forgiveness. For mercy. For a hit. For salvation.

"Good evening, sister."

Lucy spun around, half expecting to see Henry, though he had never greeted her that way. There was a man standing a few feet behind her. White. Tall. Covered in shadow. Lucy's hand flew to her chest. Her heart pounded underneath her palm. She knew better than to let some john sneak up on her like that. She reached for her purse, the knife she kept inside, but too late remembered that she'd lost everything.

"Are you all right?" the man asked. He was clean-cut, something Lucy hadn't seen in a long while, except on a pig. His light brown hair was shaved into a buzz cut. Sideburns short. No shadow of a beard even this late at night. Military, she guessed. Lots of guys were coming home from Nam. In six months, this asshole would be just like all the other vets Lucy knew, wearing his dirty hair in a braid, beating down some woman and talking shit about the Man.

Lucy tried to make her voice strong. "Sorry, handsome. I'm done for the night." Her words echoed in the cavern formed by the tall buildings. She was aware that she was slurring, and straightened her shoulders so he wouldn't think she was an easy target. "Closed for business."

"I'm not looking for business." He took a step forward. He had a book in his hands. The Bible.

"Shit," she mumbled. These guys were everywhere. Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, even some of the freaks from the local Catholic church. "Lookit, I don't need saving."

"I hate to argue, sister, but you look like you do."

"I'm not your sister. I have a brother, and you're not him." Lucy turned around and started walking. She couldn't go back to Juice right now. Lucy didn't think she could stand another beating. She would go to the hospital and make such a stink that they'd have to sedate her. That, at least, would get her through the night.

"I bet he's worried about you."

Lucy kept walking.

"Your brother?" the man asked. "I bet he's worried about you. I know I'd be."

She clutched her hands together, but didn't turn around. Footsteps followed her. Lucy didn't quicken her pace. Couldn't quicken her pace. The pain in her stomach was strong, a knife cutting through her viscera. The hospital was fine for one night, but there was tomorrow, and the next day, and the next. Lucy would have to find a way back into Juice's good graces. Tonight had been slow. Even Kitty wasn't bringing in much. Juice was all about cold, hard cash, and Lucy was betting this Jesus freak had at least ten bucks on him. Sure, Juice would still beat her, but the money would soften his blows.

"I want to call him." Lucy kept a careful pace. She could hear the man following, keeping his distance. "My brother. He'll come get me. He said he would." She was lying, but her voice was strong. "I don't have any money. To call him, that is."

"If it's money you want, I can give you that."

Lucy stopped. Slowly, she turned around. The man was standing in a sliver of light that came from the lobby of a nearby office building. Lucy was too tall, five-ten with her shoes off. She was used to looking down at most people. This guy was well over six feet. The hands that held the Bible were huge. His shoulders were broad. Long legs, but not lean. Lucy was fast, especially when she was scared. The minute he took out his wallet, she would grab it and dash away.

She asked, "You a marine or what?"

"4-F." He took a step toward her. "Medical disability."

He looked capable enough to Lucy. He probably had a daddy who bought him out of the draft, same as Lucy's dad had with Henry. "Give me some money so I can call my brother." She remembered, "Please."

"Where is he?"

"Athens."

"Greece?"

She sputtered a laugh. "Georgia. He's in college. Law school. He's about to get married. I wanna call him. Congratulate him." She added, "Get him to pick me up and take me home. To my family. Where I belong."

The man took another step forward. The light picked out the features of his face, which were normal, even average. Blue eyes. Nice mouth. Sharp nose. Square jaw. "Why aren't you in college?"

Lucy felt a tingle at the back of her neck. She wasn't sure how to describe it. Part of her was afraid of the man. Part of her was thinking she hadn't talked to a guy like this in more years than she could remember. He wasn't looking at her like she was a whore. He wasn't proposing a transaction. There was nothing in his eyes that told her he was a threat. And yet, it was two in the morning and he was standing in the empty street of a city that pretty much closed its doors at six o'clock after all the white people went back to the suburbs.

The truth was, neither one of them belonged here.

"Sister." He took another step closer. Lucy was shocked to see the concern in his eyes. "I don't want you to be afraid of me. I let the Lord guide my hand."

Lucy had trouble answering. Years had passed since anyone had looked at her with anything close to compassion. "What makes you think I'm afraid?"

"I think you've lived with fear for a long time, Lucy."

"You don't know what I've—" She stopped. "How do you know my name?"

He seemed confused. "You told me."

"No, I didn't."

"You told me your name was Lucy. Just a few minutes ago." He held up the Bible for emphasis. "I swear."

All the saliva in her mouth was gone. Her name was her secret. She never gave it away to strangers. "No, I didn't."

"Lucy ..." He was less than five feet away from her now. There was that same concerned look in his eyes, though he could easily take one more step and wrap both hands around her neck before she knew what was happening.

But he didn't. He just stood there holding his Bible to his chest. "Please, don't be scared of me. You have no reason to be afraid."

"Why are you here?"

"I want to help you. To save you."

"I don't need saving. I need money."

"I told you I'd give you all the money you need." He tucked the Bible under his arm and took out his wallet. She could see bills stacked neatly in the fold. Hundreds. He fanned them out in his hand. "I want to take care of you. That's all I've ever wanted."

Her chest shook. She eyed the money. There was at least five hundred there, possibly more. "I don't know you."

"No, not yet."

Lucy's foot stepped back, but she needed to go forward, needed to grab the cash and run. If the man sensed her plans, he didn't show it. He stood there with the hundreds looking like postage stamps in his large hands, not moving, not speaking. All that cash. Five hundred dollars. She could rent a hotel room, keep herself off the street for months, maybe a year.

Lucy felt her heart banging against her shattered rib. She was torn between snatching the dough and running for her life and just plain running from her life. The hair on the back of her neck stood at attention. Her hands were shaking. She felt heat radiating somewhere behind her. For a moment, Lucy assumed the sun was coming up over Peachtree Plaza, streaking down the street, warming her neck and shoulders. Was this some sign from above? Was this finally her moment of salvation?

No. No salvation. Just money.

She forced herself to take a step forward. Then another. "I want to know you," she told the man, fear making the words slur on her tongue.

He smiled. "That's good, sister."

Lucy made herself return the smile. Made her shoulders curve so she looked younger, sweeter, innocent. And then she grabbed the wad of cash. She turned to run, but her body jerked back like a slingshot.

"Don't fight me." His fingers were clamped around her wrist. Half her arm disappeared inside his grip. "You can't escape."

Lucy stopped fighting. She didn't have a choice. Pain was shooting up her neck. Her head was throbbing. Her shoulder crunched in the socket. Still, she kept her fist wrapped around the money. She could feel the stiff bills scraping against her palm.

He said, "Sister, why do you crave a life of sin?"

"I don't know." Lucy shook her head. She looked down at the ground. She sniffed back the blood that dripped from her nose. And then she felt his grip start to loosen.

"Sister—"

Lucy wrenched away her arm, her skin feeling torn, like a glove ripping off. She ran as fast and as hard as she could, feet slapping pavement, arms pumping. One block. Two. She opened her mouth, taking deep gulps of air that sent stabbing pains into her chest. Broken ribs. Busted nose. Shattered teeth. Money in her hand. Five hundred dollars. A hotel room. A bus ticket. Safety. All the H that she could handle. She was free. Goddamn it, she was finally free.

Until her head flew back. Her scalp felt like the teeth of a zipper being wrenched apart as chunks of hair were snatched out at the root. Lucy's forward momentum didn't stop. She saw her legs shoot out in front of her, feet level to her chin, and then her back slammed down flat to the ground.

"Don't fight," the man repeated, straddling her, his hands wrapping around her neck.

Lucy clawed at his fingers. His grip was relentless. Blood poured from her torn scalp. It went into her eyes, her nose, her mouth.

She couldn't scream. She blindly reached out, trying to dig her fingernails into his eye sockets. She felt the side of his face, his rough skin, then her hands dropped because she couldn't hold up her arms anymore. His breath quickened as her body spasmed. Warm urine ran down her leg. She could feel his excitement even as a sense of hopelessness took over. Who was Lucy fighting for? Who cared if Lucy Bennett lived or died? Maybe Henry would be sad when he heard the news, but her parents, her old friends, even Mrs. Henderson, would probably feel nothing but relief.

Finally, the inevitable.

Lucy's tongue swelled in her mouth. Her vision blurred. It was useless. There was no air left for her lungs. No oxygen going to her brain. She felt herself start to give, her muscles releasing. The back of her head hit pavement. She stared up. The sky was impossibly black, pinholes of stars barely visible. The man stared down at her, the same concerned look in his eyes.

Only this time, he was smiling.

Present DayMONDAY

Will Trent had never been alone in someone else's home before unless that person was dead. As with many things in his life, he was aware that this was a trait he shared with a lot of serial killers. Fortunately, Will was an agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, so the empty bathrooms he searched and the deserted bedrooms he tossed all fell under the category of intrusions for the greater good.

This revelation didn't help ease his mind as he walked through Sara Linton's apartment. Will had to keep telling himself he had a legitimate reason to be here. Sara had asked him to feed and walk the dogs while she worked an extra shift at the hospital. Barring that, they were hardly strangers. They'd known each other for almost a full year before they'd finally gotten together two weeks ago. Will had spent every night here since. Even before that, he'd met Sara's parents. He'd dined at her family's table. Given all of this familiarity, his feelings of trespass didn't really add up.

Which still didn't stop him from feeling like a stalker.

Maybe this came from the way Will felt being alone here. He was pretty sure that he was obsessed with Sara Linton. He wanted to know everything about her. And while he wasn't seized by the urge to take off his clothes and roll around naked on her bed—at least, not without Sara there with him—he felt the compulsion to look at all the things on her shelves and in her drawers. He wanted to flip through the photo albums she kept in a box in her bedroom closet. He wanted to peruse her books and scroll through her iTunes collection.

Not that he would act on these impulses. Unlike most serial killers, Will was aware that any one of these things crossed the line into creepy. But the desire left him feeling unsettled all the same.

He looped the dogs' leashes around the hook inside the hall closet. Sara's two greyhounds were piled onto the living room couch. A ray of sun bleached their fawn-colored fur. The loft was a penthouse corner unit, which was one of the perks of being a pediatrician instead of a lowly civil servant. The L-shaped wall of windows gave a stellar view of downtown Atlanta. The Bank of America Plaza that looked like the builders had forgotten to remove the scaffolding up top. The steplike Georgia Pacific tower that was built over the movie theater where Gone with the Wind premiered. The tiny Equitable building sitting like a black granite paperweight beside the pencil cup of the Westin Peachtree Plaza.

Atlanta was a small town in the scheme of things—the population inside the city limits was slightly north of five hundred thousand. Bump that out to the metro area and it was closer to six million. The city was a Mecca on the Piedmont, the center of business in the Southeast. Over sixty languages were spoken here. There were more hotel rooms than residents, more office spaces than people. Three hundred murders a year. Eleven hundred reported rapes. Nearly thirteen thousand aggravated assault charges.

More like a small town with a chip on its shoulder.

Will made his way to the kitchen and picked up the water bowls from the floor. The thought of going home to his small house made him feel lonely, which was strange considering Will had grown up wanting to be nothing but alone. There was more to his life than Sara Linton. He was a grown man. He had a job. He had his own dog to look after. He had a home. He'd even been married before. Technically, he was still married, though that hadn't mattered much until recently.

Will was eight years old when the cops dropped off Angie Polaski at the Atlanta Children's Home. She was eleven, and a girl, which meant she stood a good chance of being adopted, but Angie was mouthy and wild and no one wanted her. No one wanted Will, either. He'd spent most of his early life being checked in and out of the children's home like a dog-eared library book. Somehow, Angie made all of it more bearable. Except for the times when she was making it unbearable.

Their marriage had taken place two years ago. It had been perpetrated on a double dog dare, which might explain why neither of them took it very seriously. Angie had lasted less than a week. Two days after the civil ceremony, Will woke up to find her clothes gone, the house empty. He wasn't surprised. He wasn't hurt. Actually, he was enormously relieved that it had happened sooner rather than later. Angie disappeared on him all the time. Will knew that she would be back. She always came back.

Only, this time, for the first time, something had happened while Angie was away. There was Sara. There was the way she breathed in Will's ear. There was the way she traced her fingers down his spine. There was her taste. Her smell. There were all these things Will had never even noticed with Angie.

He clicked his tongue as he put down the water bowls. The dogs stayed on the couch, unimpressed.

Will's Glock was on the counter beside his suit jacket. He clipped the holster onto his belt. He checked the time on the stove as he pulled on his jacket. Sara's shift ended in five minutes, which meant it was at least ten minutes past time for Will to leave. She would probably call him when she got home. He would tell her he was doing paperwork or about to get on the treadmill or some other lie that made it clear he hadn't been sitting around waiting for her to call, and then he would run back over here like Julie Andrews prancing up that hill in The Sound of Music.

He was heading to the front door when his cell phone vibrated in his pocket. Will recognized his boss's number. For a split second, he considered sending the call to voicemail, but he knew from experience that Amanda would not be easily deterred.

He answered, "Trent."

"Where are you?"

For some reason, he found the question intrusive. "Why?"

Amanda gave a weary sigh. He could hear noises on her end—the low murmur of a crowd, a repetitive clicking sound. "Just answer me, Will."

"I'm at Sara's." She didn't respond, so he asked, "Do you need me?"

"No, I most certainly do not. You're still on airport duty until further notice. Do you understand me? Nothing else."

He stared at the phone for a moment, then put it back to his ear. "All right."

Abruptly, she ended the call. Will had the distinct feeling she would've slammed down the receiver if such a thing were possible on a cell phone.

Instead of leaving, he stood in the foyer, trying to figure out what had just happened. Will replayed the conversation in his head. No obvious explanation jumped out. Will was used to his boss being obtuse. Anger was hardly a new emotion. But while Amanda had certainly hung up on him before, Will couldn't fathom why she cared where he was at the moment. Actually, he was surprised that she was even talking to him. He hadn't heard her voice in two weeks.

Deputy Director Amanda Wagner was an old-timer, from that group of cops who easily bent the rules to make a case but stuck to the manual when it came to the dress code. The GBI required all non-undercover agents to keep their hair half an inch off their collar. Two weeks ago, Amanda had actually slapped a ruler to the back of Will's neck, and when he hadn't taken the hint, she'd transferred him to airport duty, which required Will to hang out in various men's toilets, waiting for someone to sexually proposition him.

Will's mistake was mentioning the ruler to Sara. He'd told her the story as a sort of joke as well as an explanation for why he needed to run up the street to the barbershop before they went to dinner. Sara hadn't told Will not to get his hair cut. She was so much smarter than that. She'd told him she liked his hair the length that it was. She'd told him that it looked good on him. She'd stroked the back of his neck while she said this. And then she had suggested that instead of going to the barber, they go into the bedroom and do something so filthy that Will had experienced a few seconds of hysterical blindness.

Which was why he was looking at spending the rest of his career doing a Mr. Bojangles under the bathroom stall of every men's toilet in the busiest passenger airport in the world.

But it didn't explain why Amanda had felt the need to locate Will on this particular day at this particular time.

Or the sound of people gathered in the background. Or the familiar clicking noise.

Will went back into the living room. The dogs shifted on the couch, but Will didn't sit down. He picked up the remote and turned on the television. A basketball game was on. He flipped to the local station. Monica Pearson, the Channel 2 anchor, was sitting behind her news desk. She was doing a story on the Beltline, the new transportation system that was hated by everyone in Atlanta except for the politicians. Will's finger was on the power button when the story changed. Breaking news. The image of a young woman appeared over Pearson's shoulder. Will turned up the volume as the story was tossed to a live news conference.

What he saw made him sit down.

Amanda Wagner stood at a wooden podium. A handful of microphones were in front of her. She was waiting for silence. Will heard the familiar sounds: cameras clicking over the low murmur of the crowd.

He'd seen his boss do hundreds of news conferences. Usually, Will was in the back of the room, trying to stay off camera, while Amanda basked in the glow of undivided attention. She loved being in charge. She lived to control the slow trickle of information that fed the media. Except for now. Will studied her face as the camera closed in. She looked tired. More than that—she looked worried.

She said, "The Georgia Bureau of Investigation has released an Alert Bulletin on Ashleigh Renee Snyder. The nineteen-year-old female was reported missing at approximately three-fifteen this afternoon." Amanda paused, giving the newspaper journalists time to scribble down the description. "Ashleigh lives in the Techwood area and is a sophomore at the Georgia Institute of Technology."

Amanda said more, but Will tuned out the words. He watched her mouth move. He saw her point to different reporters. Their questions were long. Her answers were brief. She didn't put up with much. There was none of her usual bantering back and forth. Finally, Amanda left the podium. Monica Pearson returned. The photo of the missing girl was back over her shoulder. Blonde, pretty, thin.

Familiar.

Will took his phone out of his pocket. He touched his thumb to the speed dial for Amanda, but didn't press the number.

By state law, the GBI had to be asked by the local police before they could take over a case. One of the rare exceptions was with kidnappings, where timing was critical and abductors could quickly cross county and state lines. An Alert Bulletin would mobilize all of the GBI field offices. Agents would be called back in. Any collected evidence would be given top priority at the labs. All the agency's resources would be directed toward this one case.

Every resource but Will.

He probably shouldn't read anything into this. It was just another way Amanda had found to punish him. She was still mad about Will's hair. She was petty enough to make a point of keeping him off a case. That was all it was. Will had worked kidnappings before. They were awful cases. They seldom ended well. Still, every cop wanted to work one. The ticking clock. The tension. The chase. The adrenaline jolt was part of the reason they joined in the first place.

And Amanda was punishing Will by keeping him off the case.

Techwood.

A student.

Will turned off the TV. He felt a drop of sweat slide down his back. His mind couldn't settle on any one particular thought. Finally, he shook his head to clear it. That was when he noticed the time on the cable box. Sara's shift had ended twelve minutes ago.

"Crap." Will had to move the dogs before he could stand up. He headed to the front door. Abel Conford, Sara's neighbor, was in the hallway waiting for the elevator.

"Good after—"

Will ducked into the stairwell. He took the steps two at a time, eager to leave so Sara wouldn't think he'd been mooning over her. She lived a few blocks from the hospital. She would be here any minute.

She was actually already here.

Will saw her sitting in her BMW as soon as he opened the lobby door. For a foolish split second, he considered darting into the trees. Then he realized that Sara had already seen his car. His '79 Porsche was parked nose-out beside her brand-new SUV. Will couldn't open his door without hitting Sara's.

He muttered under his breath as he plastered a smile onto his face. Sara didn't return it. She was just sitting there gripping the steering wheel, staring straight ahead. He walked toward the car. The sun was bright enough to turn her windshield into a mirror, so he didn't notice until he was right up on her that she had tears in her eyes.

Instantly, his issue with Amanda ceased to matter. Will pulled the handle on the door. Sara unlocked it from the inside.

He asked, "You okay?"

"Yep." She turned around to face him, propping her feet on the running board. "Bad day at work."

"Want to talk about it?"

"Not really, but thank you." She traced her fingers along the side of his face, tucked his hair behind his ear.

Will leaned in closer. All he could do was look at her. Sara's auburn hair was pulled back into a ponytail. The sunlight brought out the intense green of her eyes. She was wearing her hospital scrubs. There were a few drops of dried blood on the sleeve. She had a series of numbers scribbled on the back of her hand. Blue ink on milky white skin. All the patient charts at Grady were on digital tablets. Sara used the back of her hand to calculate dosages for patients. Knowing this last week would've saved Will two sleepless nights of insane jealousy, but he wasn't one to quibble.

She asked, "Were the dogs okay?"

"They did all the things dogs are supposed to do."

"Thank you for taking care of them." Sara rested her hands on his shoulders. Will felt a familiar stirring. It was like there was an invisible string between them. The slightest tug and he was incapacitated.

She stroked the back of his neck. "Tell me about your day."

"Boring and sad," he answered, which was mostly true. "Some old guy told me I have a nice package."

She gave a sly smile. "Can't arrest him for being honest."

"He was pleasuring himself when he said it."

"That sounds like something fun to try."

Will felt the string go taut. He kissed her. Sara's lips were soft. They tasted like peppermint from the lip balm she used. Her fingernails scratched into his hair. He leaned in closer. And then everything stopped when the front door to the building banged open. Abel Conford gave them a scowl as he stomped toward his Mercedes.

Will had to clear his throat before he could ask Sara, "Are you sure you don't want some time to yourself?"

She adjusted the knot in his tie. "I want to go for a walk with you, and then I want to eat an entire pizza with you, and then I want to spend the rest of the night with you."

Will looked down at his watch. "I think I can fit that in."

Sara slid out of the car and locked the door. Will tucked the key fob into his pocket. The plastic hit the familiar cold metal of his wedding ring. Will had taken off the ring two weeks ago, but for reasons he couldn't begin to decipher, that was as far as he'd gotten.

Sara took his hand as they walked down the sidewalk. Atlanta was at its most spectacular in late March, and today was no exception. A light breeze cooled the air. Every yard was packed with flowers. The oppressive heat of the summer months seemed like an old wives' tale. The sun cut through the swaying trees, lighting up Sara's face. Her tears had dried, but Will could see that she was still troubled about what had happened at the hospital.

He asked, "Sure you're okay?"

Instead of answering, Sara wrapped his arm around her shoulders. She was a few inches shorter than Will, which meant she fit like a puzzle piece under his arm. He felt her hand slip up under his suit jacket. She hooked her thumb over the top of his belt, just shy of his Glock. They passed the usual foot traffic in the neighborhood—joggers, occasional couples, men pushing baby strollers. Women walking dogs. Most of them were on their cell phones, even the runners.

Sara finally spoke. "I lied to you."

He glanced down at her. "About what?"

"I didn't pull an extra shift at the hospital. I stayed around because ..." Her voice trailed off. She looked out into the street. "Because no one else was there."

Will didn't know what else to say but, "Okay."

Her shoulders went up as she took a deep breath. "An eight-year-old boy was brought in around lunchtime." Sara was the pediatric attending in Grady's ER. She saw a lot of kids in bad shape. "He OD'd on his grandmother's blood pressure meds. He took half her ninety-day supply. It was hopeless."

Will kept silent, giving her time.

"His heart rate was less than forty when they brought him in. We lavaged him. We ran through the glucagon. Maxed out on dopamine, epinephrine." Her voice got softer with each word. "There was nothing else I could do. I called the cardiologist to put in a pacemaker, but ..." Sara shook her head again. "We had to let him go. We ended up shipping him to the ICU."

Will saw a black Monte Carlo coasting down the street. The windows were down. Rap music shook the air.

Sara said, "I couldn't leave him alone."

His attention moved away from the car. "Weren't the nurses there?"

"The ward was already packed." Again, she shook her head. "His grandmother wouldn't come to the hospital. Mom's in jail. Dad's unknown. No other relatives. He wasn't conscious. He didn't even know I was there." She paused a moment. "It took him four hours to die. His hands were already cold when we moved him upstairs." She stared down at the sidewalk. "Jacob. His name was Jacob."

Will chewed at the inside of his mouth. He'd been in and out of Grady as a kid. The hospital was the only publicly funded facility left in Atlanta.

He said, "Jacob was lucky to have you."

She tightened her grip around him. Her gaze was still lowered, as if the cracks in the sidewalk needed further study.

They walked on, both silent. Will felt a weight of expectancy. He knew that Sara was thinking about Will's childhood, the fact that his own life could've ended the same way Jacob's had. Will should at least acknowledge this, remind her that the system had done better by him than most. But he couldn't find the words.

"Hey." Sara tugged at the back of Will's shirt. "We should probably turn around."

She was right. The foot traffic had thinned out. They were nearing Boulevard, which wasn't the best place to be this time of day. Will glanced up, blinking at the bright sun. There were no tall buildings or skyscrapers blocking the light. Just rows and rows of government-subsidized housing.

Techwood had been like this neighborhood up until the mid-nineties, when the Olympics had changed everything. The city had razed the slums. The inhabitants had been moved farther south. Students lived in the upscale apartment buildings now.

Students like Ashleigh Snyder.

Will spoke before he could stop himself. "Why don't we go up that way?"

Sara gave him a curious look. He was pointing toward the projects.

He said, "I want to show you something."

"Around here?"

"It's just a few blocks this way." Will pulled at her shoulder to get her going again. They crossed another street, stepping over a pile of litter. Graffiti was everywhere. Will could practically feel the hair standing up on the back of Sara's neck.

She asked, "Are you sure about this?"

"Trust me," he said, though as if on cue, they approached a seedy-looking clump of shirtless teenagers. All of them sported scowls and low-hanging jeans. They were a veritable rainbow coalition of tweakers, representing almost every ethnicity Atlanta had to offer. One of them had a small swastika tattooed on his fish-white belly. Another had a Puerto Rican flag on his chest. Ball caps were turned backward. Teeth were missing or covered in gold. All of them held liquor-shaped brown paper bags in their hands.

Sara leaned closer to Will. He stared back at the kids. Will was six-three on a good day, but pulling back his jacket sent the stronger message. Nothing discouraged conversation more than the fourteen rounds in a government-issued Glock model 23.

Wordlessly, the group turned and headed in the opposite direction. Will let his eyes track them just to make it clear they should keep moving.

"Where are we going?" Sara asked. She obviously hadn't planned on their afternoon stroll turning into a tour of one of the city's most crime-ridden areas. They were in the full glare of the sun now. There was no shade in this part of town. No one planted flowers in their front yards. Unlike the dogwood-lined streets in the more affluent areas, there was nothing here but bright xenon streetlights and clear open spaces so the police helicopters could track stolen cars or fleeing perpetrators.

"Just a little bit more," Will said, rubbing her shoulder in what he hoped was a soothing manner.

They walked silently for a few more blocks. He could feel Sara tense up the farther they got from home.

Will asked, "Do you know what this area is called?"

Sara glanced around at the street signs. "SoNo? Old Fourth Ward?"

"It used to be called Buttermilk Bottom."

She smiled at the name. "Why?"

"It was a slum. No paved streets. No electricity. See how steep the grade is?"

Sara nodded. "The sewage used to back up here. They said it smelled like buttermilk." Will saw she wasn't smiling anymore. He dropped his arm to Sara's waist as they turned onto Carver Street. He pointed to the boarded-up coffee shop on the corner. "That used to be a grocery store."

She looked up at him.

"Mrs. Flannigan sent me there every day after school to buy her a pack of Kool 100s and a bottle of Tab."

"Mrs. Flannigan?"

"She ran the children's home."

Sara's expression didn't change, but she nodded.

Will felt an odd sensation in his belly, like he'd swallowed a handful of hornets. He didn't know why he'd brought Sara here. He wasn't generally impulsive. He'd never been one to volunteer details about his life. Sara knew Will had grown up in care. She knew that his mother had died shortly after he was born. Will assumed she'd figured out the rest on her own. Sara wasn't just a pediatrician. She'd been the medical examiner back in her small town. She knew what abuse looked like. She knew what Will looked like. Given her training, it wasn't hard to put together the clues.

"Record shop," Will said, pointing out another abandoned building. He kept his arm around her waist, guiding her toward their ultimate destination. The hornet sensation got worse. Ashleigh Snyder kept flashing into his mind. The photo they showed on the news must have been from her student ID card. The girl's blonde hair was pulled back. Her lips showed an amused smile, as if the photographer had said something funny.

Sara asked, "Where did you live?"

Will stopped. They had almost passed the children's home. The building was so changed that it was barely recognizable. The Spanish Revival brick architecture had been completely bastardized. Large metal awnings eyebrowed the front windows. The red brick had been painted a rheumy yellow. Chunks of the façade were missing. The huge wooden front door that had been gloss black as long as Will could remember was now a garish red. The glass was caked with dirt. In the yard, Mrs. Flannigan's white painted tires no longer held tulips and pansies. They were no longer white, either. Will was afraid to guess what was inside them now, and he didn't want to get close enough to find out. There was a sign slapped onto the side of the building.

"'Coming soon: Luxury Condos,'" Sara read. "Not too soon, I'm guessing."

Will stared up at the building. "It didn't used to be like this."

Sara's reluctance was palpable, but she still asked, "Do you want to look inside?"

He wanted to run away from here as fast as he could, but Will forced himself to walk up the front steps. As a kid, he'd always felt a certain amount of dread every time he entered the home. There were new boys constantly in and out. Each of them had something to prove, sometimes with their fists. This time, it wasn't physical violence that sent a cold fear through Will. It was Ashleigh

Snyder. It was the unreasonable connection Will was making because the missing girl looked so much like his mother.

He pressed his face close to the window, but couldn't see anything other than the reflection of his own eyes staring back. The front door was secured with an expensive-looking padlock. The wood was so rotted that one yank on the hasp pulled out the screws.

Will hesitated, his palm flat to the door. He felt Sara standing behind him, waiting. He wondered what she would do if he changed his mind and walked back down the stairs.

As if sensing his thoughts, she said, "We can go." Then, more pointedly, "Why don't we go?"

Will pushed open the door. There was no expected creaking of hinges, but the door caught on the warped wooden floor so that he had to shove it open. Will tested the floorboards as he entered. Though it was still light out, the house was dark, thanks mostly to the heavy awnings and dirty windows. A musky smell greeted him, nothing like the welcoming scent of Pine-Sol and Kool 100s Will recalled from his childhood. He tried the light switch to no avail.

Sara said, "Maybe we should—"

"Looks like it was turned into a hotel." Will pointed to the caged front desk. Keys still hung from the cubbyholes along the back wall. "Or a halfway house."

Will glanced around what he guessed was the lobby. Broken glass pipes and tinfoil littered the floor. The crack addicts had demolished the couch and chairs. There were several used condoms melted into the carpet.

"My God," Sara whispered.

Will felt oddly defensive. "Picture it with the walls painted white, and the sofa this big, yellow, kind of corduroy sectional." He looked down at the floor. "Same carpet. It was a lot cleaner, though."

Sara nodded, and he walked toward the back of the building before she could run out the front. The large open spaces from Will's childhood had been chopped up into single-room apartments, but he could still remember what it had looked like in better times.

He told Sara, "This was the dining hall. There were twelve tables. Kind of like picnic benches, but with tablecloths and nice napkins. Boys on one side, girls on the other. Mrs. Flannigan was careful about letting the girls and boys mingle too much. She said she didn't need more kids than she already had."

Sara didn't laugh at the joke.

"Here." Will stopped in front of an open doorway. The room was a dark hole. He could easily picture how it used to be. Flowery wallpaper. A metal desk and wooden chair. "This was Mrs. Flannigan's office."

"What happened to her?"

"Heart attack. She died before the ambulance got here." He continued down the hallway and pushed open a familiar-looking swinging door. "The kitchen, obviously." This space, at least, hadn't changed. "That's the same stove from when I was a kid." Will opened the pantry door. There was still food stacked on the shelves. Mold had turned a loaf of bread into a black brick. Graffiti marred the back of the door. "Fuck you! Fuck you! Fuck you!" was carved into the soft wood.

Sara said, "Looks like the addicts redecorated."

"That was always there," Will admitted. "This is where you had to go if you acted up."

Sara pressed her lips together as she studied the bolt on the door.

Will said, "Trust me, being locked in a pantry wasn't the worst thing that ever happened to a lot of these kids." He saw the question in her eyes. "I was never locked in there."

She gave a strained smile. "I should hope not."

"It wasn't as bad as you're thinking. We had food. We had a roof over our heads. We had a color TV. You know how much I love watching television."

She nodded, and he led her back into the hallway toward the front stairs. He tapped a closed door along the way. "Basement."

"Did Mrs. Flannigan lock kids down there, too?"

"It was off limits," Will answered, though he happened to know that Angie had spent a lot of time down there with the older boys.

Carefully, Will walked up the stairs, testing each step before letting Sara follow. The scruffy treads were just as he remembered, but he had to duck at the top of the landing to keep from smacking his head on a structural beam.

"Back here." He took purposeful strides down the hallway, acting as if this was exactly what he'd planned to do with his evening. As with downstairs, the space was divided into single rooms that met with the needs of the prostitutes, drug addicts, and alcoholics who'd likely rented space by the hour. Most of the doors were open or hanging off their hinges. The plaster around the baseboards had been nibbled away by rats. The walls were probably crawling with their offspring. Or cockroaches. Or both.

Will stopped at the next-to-last door and pushed it open with his foot. An iron cot and a smashed wooden table were the only contents. The carpet was a fecal brown. The one window in the room was cut in half, the other side shared with the next-door neighbor.

"My bed was here against the wall. Bunk bed. I got the top."

Sara didn't respond. Will turned around to look at her. She was biting her lip in a way that made him think that the pain was the only thing keeping her from crying.

"I know it looks awful," he said. "But it wasn't like this when I was a kid. I promise. It was nice. It was clean."

"It was an orphanage."

The word echoed in his head like she'd shouted it down a well. There was no getting past this difference between them. Sara had grown up with two loving parents, a doting sister, and a stable, solidly middle-class life.

And Will had grown up here.

"Will?" she asked. "What just happened?"

He rubbed his chin. Why was he such an idiot? Why did he keep making mistakes with Sara that he'd never made with anyone else in his life? There was a reason he didn't talk about his childhood. People felt pity when they should've felt relief.

"Will?"

"I'll take you home. I'm sorry."

"Please don't be. This is your home. Was your home. It's where you grew up."

"It's a flophouse in the middle of a slum. We're probably going to get stabbed by a junkie as soon as we leave.”

She laughed.

“It’s not funny, Sara. It’s dangerous here. Half the crime in the city happens—”

“I know where we are.” She put her hands on either side of his face. “Thank you.”

“For what? Making you need a tetanus shot?”

“For sharing part of your life with me.” She gently kissed him on the lips.

“Thank you.”

Will stared into her eyes, wishing he could read her mind. He didn’t understand Sara Linton. She was kind. She was honest. She wasn’t storing up information to later use against him. She wasn’t jabbing her thumb into open wounds. She wasn’t anything like any woman he’d ever met in his life.

Sara kissed him again. She stroked his hair back over his ear. “Sweetheart, I know that look, and it’s not going to happen here.”

Will opened his mouth to respond, but stopped when he heard the sound of a car door slamming.

Sara jumped at the noise, her fingers digging into his arm.

“It’s a busy street,” Will told her, but he still went to the front of the house to investigate. Through the broken window at the end of the hallway, he saw a black Suburban parked at the curb. The glass was smoked black. The freshly washed exterior sparkled in the sun. The back end was lower than the front because of the large metal gun cabinet bolted into the rear of the SUV.

Will told Sara, “That’s a G-ride.” A government-issued vehicle. Amanda drove one exactly like it, so he shouldn’t have been surprised to see her get out of the Suburban.

She was talking on her BlackBerry. A hammer was in her other hand. The claw was long and nasty. She swung it at her side as she walked toward the front door.

Sara asked, “What’s she doing here?” She tried to look out the window, but Will pulled her back. “Why does she have a hammer?”

Will didn’t answer—couldn’t answer. There was no reason for Amanda to be here. No reason for her to call and ask Will where he was. No reason to tell him to report to the airport like she was giving a child a time-out in the corner.

Amanda’s voice carried through the closed window as she talked on the phone. “That’s unacceptable. I want the full team answering to me. No exceptions.”

The front door opened. It creaked this time. Will heard footsteps across the floor.

Amanda made a disgusted noise. “This is my case, Mike. I’ll work it how I see fit.”

Sara whispered, “What is she—”

Will’s expression must’ve stopped her. His jaw felt clamped shut. He was gripped by a sudden, inexplicable fury. He held up his hand, indicating Sara should stay there. Before she could argue, Will headed down the stairs, stepping carefully so the treads wouldn’t creak. He was sweating again. The hornets in his gut had worked their way into his chest, trapping his breath.

Amanda tucked her BlackBerry in her back pocket. She gripped the hammer in her hand as she started down the basement stairs.

He said, "Amanda."

She spun around, grabbing the handrail for support. There was no mistaking the look on her face for anything but absolute shock. "What are you doing here?"

"Is the girl still missing?"

She didn't move from the top stair. She was obviously still too shocked to speak.

He repeated his question. "Is the girl still—"

"Yes."

"Then why are you here?"

"Go home, Will." He'd never heard anything like fear in her voice, but he could tell now that she was deathly afraid—not of Will, but of something else. "Just let me handle this."

"Handle what?"

She rested her hand on the doorknob, as if she wanted nothing more than to close him out. "Go home."

"Not until you tell me why you're alone in an abandoned building when there's an active case."

She raised an eyebrow. "I'm not actually alone, am I?"

"Tell me what's going on."

"I'm not—" Her words were cut off by a loud crack. Panic filled her eyes. Another crack came like a shotgun blast. Amanda started to fall. She clutched the doorknob. Will lunged to help, but he was too late. The door slammed closed as the stairs collapsed. The noise rumbled through the building like a charging freight train.

Then—nothing.

Will jerked open the door. The knob rattled at his feet. He stared down into absolute blackness. Uselessly, he flipped the light switch up and down.

"Amanda?" he called. His voice echoed back at him. "Amanda?"

"Will?" Sara was on the landing. She quickly took in what had happened. "Give me your phone."

Will tossed her the phone. He took off his jacket and holster and got down on the floor.

Sara said, "You are not going down there."

Will froze, startled by the order, the unfamiliar sharp tone of her voice.

"We're in a crack house, Will. There could be needles down there. Broken glass. It's too dangerous." She held up her finger as the phone was obviously answered on the other end. "This is Dr. Linton from the ER. I need a bus and rescue sent to Carver Street for an officer down."

Will provided, "Street number's 316." He sat on his knees and leaned his head into the basement as Sara rattled off the details. "Amanda?" He waited. No response. "Can you hear me?"

Sara ended the call. "They're on their way. Just stay there until—"

"Amanda?" Will glanced around the hallway, trying to put together a plan. Finally, he turned around and got down on his belly.

Sara pleaded, "Will, don't."

He elbowed back until his feet hung down into the basement.

"You're going to fall."

He edged back farther, expecting any moment for his feet to hit solid ground.

"There are broken pieces of wood down there. You could shatter your ankle. You could land on Amanda."

Will gripped the edge of the doorjambs with his fingers, praying that his arms wouldn't give. Which they eventually did. He dropped straight down like the blade on a guillotine.

"Will?" Sara was in the open doorway. She got down on her knees. "Are you all right?"

Pieces of wood poked into his back like sharp fingers. Sawdust filled the air. Will's nose had banged into his knee so hard that pinpoints of light exploded in front of his eyes. He touched the side of his ankle. A nail had scraped across the bone. His teeth ached at the memory.

"Will?" Sara's tone rose in alarm. "Will?"

"I'm all right." He felt his ankle squick as he moved. Blood pooled into the heel of his shoe. He tried to make light of the situation. "Looks like I was right about needing that tetanus shot."

She mumbled a shocking expletive.

Will tried to stand, but his feet couldn't find purchase. He blindly reached out, thinking Amanda was close by. He got on his knees, leaning out farther, and finally was rewarded with a foot. Her shoe was missing. Her pantyhose were torn.

"Amanda?" Carefully, Will picked his way across the shards of wood and broken nails. He put his hand on her shin, then her thigh. He gently felt along until he found her arm folded over her stomach.

Amanda moaned.

Will's stomach roiled as his fingers followed the unnatural angle of her wrist. "Amanda?" he repeated.

She moaned again. Will knew she'd have a Maglite in the Suburban. He dug his fingers into the front pockets of her jeans, trying to find her keys. He could send Sara out to the car. She would have to search for the flashlight. He would tell her it was in the glove compartment or one of the locked drawers. She would spend several minutes looking for the light, which was exactly what Will needed.

"Amanda?" He checked her back pockets. The tips of his fingers brushed along the broken plastic case on her BlackBerry.

Suddenly, Amanda's good hand clamped around his wrist. She asked, "Where's My-kel?"

Will stopped searching for the keys. "Amanda? It's Will. Will Trent."

Her tone was terse. "I know who you are, Wilbur."

Will felt his body go rigid. Only Angie called him Wilbur. It was the name on his birth certificate.

Sara asked, "Is she okay?"

Will had to swallow before he could speak. "I think her wrist is broken."

"How's her respiration?"

He listened for the cadence of her breath, but all he could hear was his own blood pounding in his ears. Why was Amanda here? She should be out looking for the missing girl. She should be leading the team. She shouldn't be here. In this basement. With a hammer.

"Will?" Sara's tone was softer now. She was worried about him.

He asked, "How long before the ambulance gets here?"

"Not much longer. Are you sure you're all right?"

"I'm fine." Will put his hand on Amanda's foot again. He could feel a steady pulse near her ankle. He'd worked for this woman most of his career but still knew very little about her. She lived in a condo in the heart of Buckhead. She had been on the job longer than he had been alive, which put her age in the mid-sixties. She kept her salt-and-pepper hair coiffed in the shape of a football helmet and wore pantyhose with starched blue jeans. She had a sharp tongue, more degrees than a college professor, and she knew that his name was Wilbur even though he'd had it legally changed when he entered college and every piece of paper the GBI had on file listed his legal name as William Trent.

He cleared his throat again so that he could ask Sara, "Is there anything I should be doing?"

"No, just stay where you are." Sara used a raised, clear tone Will thought of as her doctor's voice. "Amanda. This is Dr. Linton. Can you tell me today's date?"

She groaned out a pained breath. "I told Edna to shore up those steps a million times."

Will sat back on his heels. Something sharp pressed against his knee. He felt blood sliding across his ankle, dripping through his sock. His heart was pounding so hard that he was sure Sara could hear it.

"Will," Amanda mumbled. "What time is it?"

Will couldn't answer her. His mouth felt wired shut.

Sara took over, saying, "It's five-thirty."

"In the evening," Amanda said, not a question. "We're at the children's home. I fell down the basement stairs." She lay there taking deep breaths of the pungent air. "Dr. Linton, am I going to live?"

"I'd be very surprised if you didn't."

"Well, I suppose that's as much as I can ask for right now. Did I lose consciousness?"

"Yes," Sara answered. "For about two minutes."

Amanda spoke more to herself. "I don't know what that means. Are you touching my foot?"

Will pulled away his hand.

"I can move my toes." Amanda sounded relieved. "My head feels like it's been cracked open." He heard movement, the rustling of clothes. "No, nothing sticking out. No blood. No soft spots. God, my shoulder hurts."

Will tasted blood. His nose was bleeding. He used the back of his hand to wipe his mouth.

Amanda let out another heavy sigh. "I'll tell you what, Will. You get past a certain age and a broken bone or a cracked head is no laughing matter. It's with you for the rest of your life. What's left of the rest of your life."

She was quiet for a few seconds. From the sound of it, she was trying to keep her breathing steady. Despite the fact that he was obviously not going to answer, she told Will, "When I joined the Atlanta Police Department, there was a whole division assigned to checking our appearance. The Inspection Division. Six full-duty officers. I'm not making that up."

Will glanced up at Sara. She shrugged.

"They would show up during roll call, and if you didn't fix what they told you to fix, you were suspended without pay."

He put his hand to his watch, wishing he could feel the second hand ticking by. Grady Hospital was only a few blocks away. There was no reason for the ambulance to be taking so long. They knew Amanda was a cop. They knew she needed help.

Amanda said, "I remember the first time I rolled up on a signal forty-five. Some jackass had a CB radio stolen out of his car. We were always getting forty-fives on CB radios. They had those big antennas pointing like arrows off their back bumpers."

Again, Will glanced up at Sara. She made a circling motion, indicating he should keep Amanda talking.

Will's throat was too tight. He couldn't force out the words, couldn't pretend that they were all just a bunch of friends who'd had a bad day.

Amanda didn't seem to need encouragement. She chuckled under her breath. "They laughed at me. They laughed at me when I got there. They laughed at me when I took the report. They laughed at me when I left. No one thought women should be in uniform. The station would get calls every week—someone reporting that a woman had stolen a squad car. They couldn't believe we were on the job."

Sara said, "I think they're here," just as Will heard the distant wail of a siren. "I'll go wave them down."

Will waited until Sara's footsteps were on the front porch. It took everything in him not to grab Amanda by the shoulders and shake her. "Why are you here?"

"Is Sara gone?"

"Why are you here?"

Amanda's tone turned uncharacteristically gentle. "I have to tell you something."

"I don't care," he shot back. "How did you know—"

"Shut up and listen," she hissed. "Are you listening?"

Will felt the dread come flooding back. The siren was louder. The ambulance braked hard in front of the house.

"Are you listening?"

Will found himself speechless again.

"It's about your father."

She said more, but Will's ears felt muffled, as if he was listening to her voice underwater. As a kid, Will had ruined the earpiece to his transistor radio that way, putting the bud in his ear, dunking his head in the bathtub, thinking that would be a cool new way to hear music. It had been in this very house. Two floors up in the boys' bathroom. He was lucky he hadn't electrocuted himself.

There was a loud thunk overhead as paramedics shoved open the front door. Heavy footsteps banged across the floor. The bright beam of a Maglite suddenly filled the basement. Will blinked in the glare. He felt dizzy. His lungs ached for breath.

Amanda's words came rushing back to him the same way sound had come back to his ears when he'd grabbed the sides of the tub and thrust his head above water.

"Listen to me," she'd ordered.

But he didn't want to. He didn't want to know what she had to say.
The parole board had met. They had let Will's father out of prison.

three

October 15, 1974

LUCY BENNETT

Lucy had lost track of time once the symptoms had subsided. She knew it took heroin three days to fully leave your bloodstream. She knew that the sweats and sickness lasted a week or more, depending on how far gone you were. The stomach cramps. The throbbing pain in your legs. The alternating constipation and diarrhea. The bright red blood from your lungs giving up the Drano or baby formula or whatever was used to cut down the Boy.

People had died trying to leave H on their own. The drug was vengeful. It owned you. It clawed into your skin and wouldn't let go. Lucy had seen its castoffs laid out in back rooms and vacant parking lots. Their flesh desiccated. Fingers and toes curled. Their nails and hair kept growing. They looked like mummified witches.

Weeks? Months? Years?

The stifling August heat had been broken by what could only be fall temperatures. Cool mornings. Cold nights. Was winter coming? Was it still 1974, or had she missed Thanksgiving, Christmas, her birthday?

Sands through the hourglass.

Did it really matter anymore?

Every day, Lucy wished that she was dead. The heroin was gone, but not a second went by when she wasn't thinking about that high. The transcendence. The obliteration. The numbing of her mind. The ecstasy of the needle hitting vein. The rush of fire burning through her senses. Those first few days, Lucy could still taste the H in her vomit. She'd tried to eat it, but the man had forced her to stop.

The man.

The monster.

Who would do something like this? It defied logic. There was no pattern in Lucy's life to explain why this was happening. As bad as some of her johns were, they always let her go. Once they got what they wanted, they tossed her back into the street. They didn't want to see her again. They hated the sight of her. They kicked her if she didn't move fast enough. They shoved her out of their cars and sped away.

But not him. Not this man. Not this devil.

Lucy wanted him to fuck her. She wanted him to beat her. She wanted him to do anything but the loathsome routine she had to endure every day. The way he brushed her hair and teeth. The way he bathed her. The chaste way he used the rag to wash between her legs. The gentle pats of the towel as he dried her. The look of pity every time her eyes opened and closed. And the praying. The constant praying.

“Wash away your sins. Wash away your sins.” It was his mantra. He said nothing directly to her. He only spoke to God, as if He would listen to an animal like this man. Lucy asked why—why her? Why this? She screamed at him. She begged him. She offered him anything, and all he said was, “Wash away your sins.”

Lucy had grown up with prayer. Over the years, she had often found solace in religion. The smell of a burning candle or the taste of wine could send her back to the church pew, where she happily sat between her mother and father. Her brother, Henry, would scribble crude drawings on the bulletin, bored nearly to death, but Lucy loved listening to the preacher extol the vast rewards of a godly life. On the streets, it gave her comfort to think about those sermons from long ago. Even as a sinner, she was not completely without salvation. The crucifixion meant nothing if not to redeem Lucy Bennett’s soul.

But not like this. Never like this. Not the soap and water. Not the blood and wine. Not the needle and thread.

There was penance, and then there was torture.

July 7, 1975

MONDAY

Amanda Wagner let out a long sigh of relief as she drove out of her father's Ansley Park neighborhood. Duke had been in rare form this morning. He'd begun a litany of complaints the moment Amanda walked through his kitchen door and not stopped until she was waving goodbye from behind the wheel of her car. Feckless veterans looking for handouts. Gas prices through the roof. New York City expecting the rest of the country to bail them out. There was not one story in the morning paper about which Duke did not share his opinion. By the time he'd started listing the seemingly endless faults of the newly organized Atlanta Police Department, Amanda was only half listening, nodding occasionally to keep his temper from turning in the wrong direction.

She cooked his breakfast. She kept his coffee mug filled. She emptied his ashtrays. She laid out a shirt and tie on his bed. She wrote down directions for thawing the roast so she could fix his supper after work. Meanwhile, the only thing that made it all bearable was thinking about her tiny studio apartment on Peachtree Street.

The place was less than five minutes away from her father's house, but it might as well be on the moon. Stuck between the library and the hippie compound along Fourteenth Street, the apartment was one of six units in an old Victorian mansion. Duke had taken one look at the space and snorted that he'd had better accommodations on Midway during the war. None of the windows would properly close. The freezer wasn't cold enough to make ice. The kitchen table had to be moved before the oven door could be opened. The toilet lid scraped the side of the bathtub.

It was love at first sight.

Amanda was twenty-five years old. She was going to college. She had a good job. After years of begging, she'd finally managed by some miracle to persuade her father to let her move out. She wasn't exactly Mary Richards, but at least she wouldn't pass for Edith Bunker anymore.

She slowed her car and took a right turn onto Highland Avenue, then another right into the strip mall behind the pharmacy. The summer heat was almost suffocating, though it was only quarter till eight in the morning. Steam misted from the asphalt as she pulled into a parking space at the far end of the lot. Her hands were sweating so badly that she could barely grip the steering wheel. Her pantyhose were cutting into her waist. The back of her shirt stuck to the seat. There was a throbbing ache in her neck that was working its way up to her temples.

Still, Amanda rolled down her shirtsleeves and buttoned the tight cuffs at her wrists. She dragged her purse off the passenger's seat, thinking the bag got heavier every time she lifted it. She reminded herself that it was better than what she was wearing on patrol this time last year. Undergarments. Pantyhose. Black socks. Navy-colored, polyester-blend pants. A man's cotton shirt that was so big the breast pockets tucked below her waist. Underbelt. Metal hooks. Outer belt. Holster. Gun. Radio. Shoulder mic. Kel-Lite. Handcuffs. Nightstick. Key holder.

It was no wonder the patrolwomen of the Atlanta police force had bladders the size of watermelons. It took ten minutes to remove all the equipment from your waist before you could go to the bathroom—and that was assuming you could sit down without your back going into spasms. The Kel-Lite alone, with its four D-cell batteries and eighteen-inch-long shaft, weighed in at just under eight pounds.

Amanda felt every ounce of the weight as she hefted her purse onto her shoulder and got out of the car. Same equipment, but now that she was a plainclothes officer it was in a leather bag instead of on her hips. It had to be called progress.

Her father had been in charge of Zone 1 when Amanda joined the force. For nearly twenty years, Captain Duke Wagner had run the unit with an iron fist, right up until Reginald Eaves, Atlanta's first black public safety commissioner, fired most of the senior white officers and replaced them with blacks. The collective outrage had nearly toppled the force. That previous chief John Inman had done basically the same thing in reverse seemed to be a fact lost in everyone's collective memory. The good ol' boy network was fine so long as you were one of the lucky few who were dialed in.

Consequently, Duke and his ilk were suing the city for their old jobs back. Maynard Jackson, the city's first black mayor, was backing his man. No one knew how it would end, though to hear Duke talk, it was just a matter of time before the city capitulated. No matter their color, politicians needed votes, and voters wanted to feel safe. Which explained why the police force gripped the city like a devouring octopus, its tentacles spreading in every direction.

Six patrol zones stretched from the impoverished Southside to the more affluent northern neighborhoods. Spotted within these zones were so-called "Model Cities," precincts that served the more violent sections of the downtown corridor. There were small pockets of wealth inside Ansley Park, Piedmont Heights, and Buckhead, but a good many of the city's inhabitants lived in slums, from Grady Homes to Techwood to the city's most notorious housing project, Perry Homes. This Westside ghetto was so dangerous it warranted its own police force. It was the sort of job returning vets clamored for, more like a war zone than a neighborhood.

The plainclothes and detective units were posted across the zones. There were twelve divisions in all, from vice control to special investigations. Sex crimes was one of the few divisions that allowed women in any numbers. Amanda doubted very seriously her father would've let her apply for the unit had he still been on the force when she submitted her application. She cringed to think what would happen if Duke won his lawsuit and got reinstated. He'd likely have her back in uniform performing crossing-guard duties in front of Morningside Elementary.

But that was a long-term problem, and Amanda's day—if it was like any other—would be filled with short-term problems. The primary issue each morning was with whom she would be partnered.

The federal Law Enforcement Assistance Association grant that had created the Atlanta police sex crimes division required all teams to be comprised of three-officer units that were racially and sexually integrated. These rules were seldom followed, because white women could not ride alone with black men, black women—at least the ones who wanted to keep their reputations—did not want to ride with black men, and none of the blacks wanted to ride with any man who was white. Every day was a battle just to figure out who was going to work with whom, which was ludicrous considering that most of them changed partners once they were out on the streets anyway.

Still, there were often heated arguments about assignments. Much posturing was to be found. Names were called. Occasionally fists were employed. In fact, the only thing that the men of the sex crimes unit could agree upon as far as assignments were concerned was that none of them wanted to be stuck with women.

At least, not unless they were pretty.

The problem trickled down to other divisions as well. Every morning, Commissioner Reginald Eaves's daily bulletin was read at the beginning of roll call. Reggie was always transferring people around to fill whatever federal quota was being forced down their throats that day. No officer knew where he or she would land when they showed up for work. It could be the middle of Perry Homes or the living hell that was the Atlanta airport. Just last year, a woman had been assigned to SWAT for a week, which would've been a disaster if she'd actually had to do anything.

Amanda had always been on day watch, probably because her father wanted it that way. No one seemed to notice or care that she continued with the schedule even as Duke sued the city. Day watch, the easiest rotation, was from eight to four. Evening watch was four to midnight, and morning watch, which was the most dangerous, ran from midnight until eight in the morning.

The patrol officers worked roughly the same schedules as the detective and plainclothes divisions, less an hour on either side, which followed the old 7–3–11 railroad schedule. The thinking was that one would hand over to the other. This seldom happened. Most of the time when Amanda got into work, she'd run into a couple of suspects sporting black eyes or bloody bandages on their heads. They were generally handcuffed to the benches by the front door and no one could say exactly how they'd gotten there or with what they'd been charged. Depending on how a uniformed officer's arrests were looking that month, some of the prisoners were freed, then immediately arrested again for loitering.

As with most zone headquarters, Zone 1 was housed in a dilapidated storefront that looked like the sort of place the police should be raiding, not milling around inside of drinking coffee and trading war stories about yesterday's arrests. Located behind the Plaza Pharmacy and a theater specializing in pornographic films, the zone headquarters had been unceremoniously relocated to this location when it was discovered the previous HQ was located directly above a sinkhole. The Atlanta Constitution had had a field day with that one.

There were only three rooms in the building. The largest was the squad room, which had the sergeant's office cordoned off by a glass partition. The captain's office was far nicer, meaning that the windows actually opened and closed. Before the Fourth of July holiday, someone had broken the plate-glass window in front of the squad room in order to let in fresh air. No one had bothered to fix it, probably because they knew it would just be broken again.

The third room was the toilet, but it was shared, and it had been ensured that no woman would ever be able to sit down on the seat. The one time Amanda had walked into the bathroom, she'd ended up dry heaving behind the Plaza Theater while the grunts and moans of Winnie Bango reverberated through the cinder-block wall.

"Mornin', ma'am." One of the patrolmen tipped his hat as Amanda walked by.

She nodded in return, making her way past a cluster of familiar white Atlanta Police cruisers as she headed for the squad entrance. The stench of winos permeated the air, though the benches were absent any handcuffed vagrants. A veil of cigarette smoke hugged the stained drop ceiling. Every surface had a layer of dust, even the long cafeteria-style tables set out in crooked lines across the room. The podium in front was empty. Amanda looked at the clock. She had ten minutes to spare before morning roll call.

Vanessa Livingston was sitting in the back of the squad room going over paperwork. She was wearing gray slacks and the same ugly, black men's shoes they'd all been forced to wear when they were in uniform. Her light blue shirt was short-sleeved and she wore her dark hair in a pageboy that curved out widely at the sides.

Amanda had patrolled with Vanessa a few times back when they were both in uniform. She was a reliable partner, but she could be a little hippie-dippie and there were rumors going around that she was trim—code for women who made themselves sexually available to police officers. Amanda didn't have a choice but to sit by her. As usual, the squad room was divided into four quadrants. White and black either side, women in back, men in the front.

Amanda kept her gaze straight ahead as she walked through a cluster of uniformed men. They all waited until the last minute to let her pass. A group in the corner were working deadbolt locks. There were daily competitions to see who could pick a lock the fastest. A few officers were trading hot-loaded ammunition. Over the last two years, fourteen Atlanta cops had been shot dead. A faster bullet in your gun was not a bad idea.

Amanda dropped her purse onto the table as she sat down. "How are you?"

"I'm very well." Vanessa's voice was cheerful, as usual. "I lucked up with Inspection Division this morning."

"They've already left?"

Vanessa nodded. Amanda immediately unbuttoned her cuffs and rolled up her sleeves. The fresh air on her arms was almost enough to make her swoon.

Amanda asked, "It wasn't Geary?" There was no way Sergeant Mike Geary would've given Vanessa a pass. He didn't think women should be on the job, and he had the power to do something about it. For some reason, he particularly had it in for Amanda. She was one more citation away from a daylong suspension.

She couldn't even think what she'd do for rent if that happened.

"Geary's out today." Vanessa stacked her reports together. "It was Sandra Phillips, the black chick keeps her head shaved like a man?"

"I have a class with her," Amanda said. Most everyone she knew was taking night courses at Georgia State. The federal government paid tuition and the city was forced to bump up your pay if you got a degree. This time next year, Amanda would be pulling in almost twelve thousand dollars.

Vanessa asked, "You have a good Fourth?"

"I took a few extra shifts," Amanda admitted. She'd volunteered for no other reason than she couldn't face a whole day of her father rehashing every story he'd read in the newspapers. Thank goodness the paper only came twice a day or he'd never sleep. "What about you?"

"Drank so much I crashed my car into a telephone pole."

"Is the car all right?"

"Fender's smashed, but it still drives." Vanessa made her voice low. "You heard about Oglethorpe?"

Lars Oglethorpe was one of Duke's friends. They'd both been fired the same day. "What about him?"

"State supreme court ruled in his favor. Full back pay and benefits. Reinstated rank. He's been assigned to his old uniformed squad. I bet Reggie had a cow when he heard."

Amanda didn't have time to answer. There was a series of masculine cheers as Rick Landry and Butch Bonnie walked into the squad. As usual, the homicide detectives were up against the clock. Roll call was scheduled to start in two minutes. Amanda reached into her purse and pulled out a stack of typed reports.

"You're a doll." Butch took the reports and tossed his notebook on the table in front of Amanda. "Hope you can read it."

She looked at his scrawl across the first page and frowned. "I swear sometimes you make this illegible on purpose."

"Gimme a call, sweetheart. Day or night." He gave her a wink as he followed Landry to the front of the room. "Night's preferable."

There were chuckles around the room, which Amanda pretended to ignore as she flipped through Butch's notes. The words got easier to read as she paged along. Butch and Rick worked homicide division. There was a job Amanda never wanted. Because she typed Butch's reports, she couldn't help but absorb some of the details. They had to tell relatives that their family members were murdered. They had to look at dead people and watch autopsies. Just reading about these things turned Amanda's stomach. There really were some jobs that only men could do.

Vanessa asked, "Did you hear we've got a new sergeant?"

Amanda waited expectantly.

"He's one of Reggie's boys."

Amanda suppressed a groan. One of Reginald Eaves's seemingly better ideas was to finally institute a written exam for promotions. Amanda had actually been foolish enough to believe she had a chance. When none of the black officers could pass the written exam, Eaves had thrown out the results and instituted an oral exam. Predictably, very few white officers were able to pass the orals. None of them had been women.

Vanessa said, "I hear he's from up North. Sounds like Bill Cosby."

They both turned around, trying to see into the sergeant's office. There were filing cabinets stacked in front of the glass partition. The door was open, but all Amanda could see was another filing cabinet and the edge of a wooden desk. A glass ashtray was on the leather blotter. A black hand reached over and tapped a cigarette against the glass. The fingers were slim, almost delicate. The nails were trimmed in a straight, blunt line.

Amanda turned back around. She pretended to read Butch's notes, but her mind wouldn't focus. Maybe it was the heat. Or maybe it was because she was sitting next to a mynah bird.

Vanessa said, "I wonder where Evelyn is?"

Amanda shrugged, still staring at the notes.

"I can't believe she came back," Vanessa continued. "She's gotta be trippin'."

Despite her best intentions, Amanda felt herself getting sucked back in. "It's been almost two years," she realized. Duke had been off the job eleven months. Evelyn had left to have her baby the year before that. The woman had just made plainclothes division. Everyone assumed that was the end of her working life.

Vanessa said, "If I had a husband and a kid, no way I'd show up at this dump every day. It'd be 'Good night, John-Boy' for me."

"Maybe she has to." Amanda kept her voice low so no one could hear her gossiping. "For the money."

"Her husband makes plenty of dough. He's sold insurance to half the force." Vanessa snorted a laugh. "That's probably the only reason she came back—to help him sell policies." Her teasing tone dropped. "You really should talk to him, though. He's got cheaper rates than Benowitz. Plus, you wouldn't be giving your money to a Jew."

"I'll ask Evelyn," Amanda said, though she liked Nathan Benowitz. Her Plymouth belonged to the city, but they all had to pay for their own car insurance. Benowitz had always been nice to Amanda.

"Shh," Vanessa hushed, though Amanda hadn't said anything. "He's coming."

The assembled officers quieted down as the new sergeant walked into the room. He was wearing their winter colors, dark navy pants and a matching long-sleeved shirt. He was very light skinned. He kept his hair shaved in a square military cut. Unlike everyone else, there was no visible sweat on the man's brow.

Amanda watched as he navigated the invisible line down the center of the squad where none of the tables touched. The new sergeant looked to be around thirty years old. He was fit and lean, his body more like a teenager's than a grown man's, but he still had to turn sideways to pass between the tables. Amanda noticed that the gap was tighter than usual. Pettiness was generally the only thing that compelled them all to work together. The black cops would hate the new man because he was from the North. The whites would hate him because he was one of Reggie's boys.

He stacked his papers against the podium, cleared his throat, and said in a surprisingly deep baritone, "I'm Sergeant Luther Hodge." He glanced around the room as if he expected someone to challenge him. When no one spoke, he continued, "I'll read the daily briefing before roll call, since there are a considerable number of transfers."

A groan went around the room, but all Amanda could think was how refreshing it was that someone had actually figured out it was better to announce transfers before taking roll.

Hodge read through the names. Vanessa was right that he sounded like Bill Cosby. He spoke carefully if not slowly. Every word was fully enunciated. The uniformed men in the front rows stared openly, as if they were watching a dog walk on its hind legs. Black or white, they were all straight off the farm or freshly discharged from military service. The majority of them spoke in the same heavy dialect that Amanda's country cousins used. She couldn't help staring at Hodge herself.

He finished reading out the lengthy transfers, then cleared his throat again. "Roll will be called in teams. Some of you will have to wait for your partners to come from other divisions. Please check with me to make certain that your partner is accounted for before you go out into the streets."

As if on cue, Evelyn Mitchell rushed into the squad room, glancing around with an almost panicked look in her eyes. Amanda was still in uniform when Evelyn got promoted to sex crimes, but the few times she'd seen her, the woman was always stylishly dressed. Today, she was carrying a large suede purse with an Indian pattern on the front and tassels hanging down from the wide gusset. She wore a navy skirt with a yellow blouse. Her blonde hair was cut to shoulder length and very flattering, reminiscent of the style worn by Angie Dickinson. Obviously, Amanda wasn't the only one thinking this. Butch Bonnie called out, "Hey, Pepper Anderson, you can cuff me anytime."

The men laughed in unison.

"I'm sorry I'm late," Evelyn told the new sergeant. "It won't happen again." She spied Amanda and Vanessa and headed toward the back table. Her heels made a clicking sound that echoed through the space.

Hodge stopped her. "I didn't catch your name, Detective."

His words seemed to suck all the air from the room. Heads swiveled around to Evelyn, who stood frozen beside Amanda. The dread coming off of her was as palpable as the heat.

Hodge cleared his throat again. "Am I missing something, Officer? I assume you're a detective since you're not in a patrolman's uniform?"

Evelyn opened her mouth, but it was Rick Landry who answered. "She's plainclothes, not detective."

Hodge persisted. "I'm not sure I understand the difference."

Landry jabbed his thumb toward the back of the room. The cigarette in his mouth bobbed as he spoke. "Well, ya see those two tits under her shirt?"

The room erupted in laughter. Evelyn clutched her purse to her chest, but she laughed along with them. Amanda laughed, too. The sound rattled in her throat like a drain.

Hodge waited for the chatter to die down. He asked Evelyn, "What's your name, Officer?"

"Mitchell," she provided, sinking down into the chair beside Amanda. "Mrs. Evelyn Mitchell."

"I suggest you avoid tardiness in the future, Mrs. Mitchell." He looked down at the roll sheet and checked off her name. "You'll be with Miss Livingston today." He went to the next name. "Miss Wagner, we'll put you with Detective Peterson, who'll be coming from—" Someone gave a loud wolf whistle. Hodge talked over it. "—from Zone Two."

Evelyn turned to Amanda and rolled her eyes. Kyle Peterson was a mess. When he wasn't trying to put his hand up your skirt, he was sleeping one off in the back of the car.

Vanessa leaned over and whispered to Evelyn, "I like your new cut. It's very chic."

"Thanks." She pulled at the back of her hair as if she wished she could make it longer. She asked Amanda, "Did you hear Oglethorpe got reinstated?"

"They gave him his old squad back," Vanessa supplied. "I wonder what that means for us?"

"Probably nothing at all," Evelyn murmured.

They all turned their attention back to the front of the room. There was a white man standing on the periphery, just inside the open doorway. He was around Amanda's age and wearing a sharp, powder blue three-piece suit. His sandy blond hair was long in the back, his sideburns untrimmed. His arms were crossed impatiently over his chest. The round paunch of his stomach stuck out below.

"Brass?" Vanessa guessed.

Evelyn shook her head. "Too well dressed."

"Lawyer," Amanda told them. She'd been to the downtown office of her father's lawyer enough times to know what they looked like. The nice suit was a giveaway, but the arrogant tilt to his chin was the only clue she needed.

"Detectives Landry and—" Luther Hodge seemed to realize no one was paying attention to him anymore. He looked up from the roll sheet and stared at the visitor for a few seconds before saying, "Mr. Treadwell, we can talk in my office." He told the squad, "I'll be a few minutes. If someone could take over?"

Butch jumped up. "I'll handle it."

"Thank you, Detective." Hodge seemed to miss the wary expressions around the room. Putting Butch in charge of the schedule was like putting a fox in charge of the henhouse. He would change the assignments into his own version of The Dating Game.

Hodge made his way back to the rear of the room, angling his lanky frame through the narrow dividing line. The lawyer, Treadwell, followed along the outside wall. He lit a cigarette as he walked into the office and shut the door.

Evelyn asked, "Wonder what that's about?"

"Never mind them," Vanessa said. "Why on earth did you come back?"

"I like it here."

Vanessa pulled a face. "Come on, kid. The truth."

"The truth is really boring. Let's wait to see what the rumors say." Evelyn smiled, then unzipped her purse and searched around inside.

Vanessa looked to Amanda for an explanation, but she could only shake her head.

"Yassuh, yassuh," someone said.

Amanda saw a group of black patrolmen had taken it upon themselves to narrate the goings-on in Hodge's office. Amanda glanced at Evelyn, then Vanessa. They all turned around for the full effect.

Behind the glass partition, Treadwell's mouth moved, and one of the black cops said in a pompous voice, "Now, see here, boy, my taxes pay your salary."

Amanda stifled a laugh. She heard this same phrase almost every day—as if Amanda's taxes didn't pay just as much of her salary as the next person's.

Hodge was looking down at his desk. There was a meekness to the slump in his shoulders as his mouth moved. "Yassuh," the first cop supplied. "I's'a gone look into it fo ya, suh. Yes indeedy-do."

Treadwell jabbed a finger at Hodge. The second cop grumbled, "This city is a mess, I say. What's the world coming to? The monkeys are running the zoo!"

Hodge nodded, his eyes still trained downward. The first cop offered, "Yassuh, it sho do be a mess. Cain't even eat my cone-bread without hearing 'bout them po' white women what's gettin' harassed by Negro men."

Amanda chewed her bottom lip. There were a few nervous titters.

Treadwell's hand dropped. The second cop said, "I say, you damn niggers act like you own the place!"

No one laughed at that, not even the black officers. The joke had gone too far.

When Treadwell threw open the office door and stormed out, the room remained stiflingly silent.

Luther Hodge was a study in contained fury as he walked to the open door. He pointed at Evelyn. "You." His finger jabbed in Amanda and Vanessa's general direction. "And you. In my office."

Vanessa stiffened in her chair. Amanda put her hand to her chest. "Me or—"

"Do you women understand orders? In my office." He told Butch, "Continue roll call, Detective Bonnie. I shouldn't have to tell you twice."

Evelyn clutched her purse to her chest as she stood. The back of Amanda's legs felt cool as she rose to follow. She turned to Vanessa, who looked both guilty and enormously relieved. Evelyn was standing in front of Hodge's desk when Amanda joined her. He sat in his chair and started writing on a piece of paper.

Amanda turned to shut the door, but Hodge said, "Leave it open."

If Amanda thought she'd been sweating before, it was nothing compared to how she felt now. Evelyn was obviously feeling it, too. She nervously pulled at the back of her hair. The thin silver of her wedding ring caught the light from the overhead fluorescents. Butch Bonnie's dull monotone called out team assignments in the other room. Amanda knew that even with the door closed, Luther Hodge had heard the black officers making fun of him.

Hodge put down his pen. He sat back in his chair and looked at first Evelyn, then Amanda. "You two are on the sex crimes unit."

They both nodded, though he hadn't asked a question.

"There's been a signal forty-nine reported at this address." A rape. Hodge held out the sheet of paper. There was a moment's hesitation before Evelyn took it.

She looked down at the page. "This is in Techwood." The ghetto.

"That's correct," Hodge answered. "Take statements. Determine whether or not a crime has been committed. Make an arrest if necessary."

Evelyn glanced at Amanda. They were obviously wondering the same thing: what did this have to do with the lawyer who'd just been in here?

"Do you need directions?" Hodge asked, though, again, it wasn't really a question. "I assume you ladies know your way around the city? Should I have one of the squad cars provide you with an escort? Is that how this works?"

"No," Evelyn said. Hodge stared at her until she added, "Sir."

"Dismissed." He opened a file and began reading it.

Amanda looked to Evelyn, who nodded toward the door. They both edged out, not quite sure what had just happened. Roll call was finished. The squad room was empty but for a few stragglers who were waiting for their newly transferred partners to arrive. Vanessa was gone, too. Probably with Peterson. She would certainly enjoy the assignment more than Amanda.

"Can we take your car?" Evelyn asked. "I'm in the station wagon today and it's packed full."

"Sure." Amanda followed her into the parking lot. Evelyn wasn't lying. Boxes were crammed into every available space in her red Ford Falcon.

"Bill's mother moved in down the street this weekend. She's going to help take care of the baby while I'm at work."

Amanda climbed into her Plymouth. She didn't want to pry into Evelyn's private life, but the arrangement struck her as odd.

"Don't get me wrong," Evelyn said, settling into the passenger's seat. "I love Zeke and it was great spending this last year and a half with him, but I swear to God, one more day being stuck at home with a kid, and I'd end up swallowing a bucket of Valium."

Amanda had been about to put her key in the ignition, but she stopped. She turned to Evelyn. Most everything she knew about the woman had been filtered through her father. She was beautiful, which Duke Wagner didn't view as an asset for someone in uniform. "Opinionated" was the word that came up most often, with "pushy" serving a close second.

Amanda asked, "Your husband was okay with you working again?"

"He came around to it." She unzipped her purse and pulled out an Atlanta city map. "Do you know Techwood?"

"No. I've been to Grady Homes a few times." Amanda didn't mention that she mostly took calls from North Atlanta, where the victims were white and generally had mothers who offered sweet tea and talked about quickly putting this ordeal behind them. "How about you?"

"Somewhat. Your dad sent me there a few times."

Amanda pumped the gas as she turned the key. The engine caught on the second try. She kept her mouth closed as she backed out of the parking lot. Evelyn had been on patrol for most of her tenure under Duke Wagner. Her plainclothes promotion had been something he didn't agree with, but the winds were shifting by then and he had lost the battle. Amanda could easily see her father sending Evelyn out to the projects to teach her a lesson.

"Let's try to figure this out." Evelyn unfolded the map and spread it out on her lap. She traced her finger down and across to the area near Georgia Tech. The projects of Techwood were incongruous with the setting of one of the state's top technological universities, but the city was running out of places to house the poor. Clark Howell Homes, University Homes, Bowen Homes, Grady Homes, Perry Homes, Bankhead Courts, Thomasville Heights—they all had long waiting lists, despite the fact that they were effectively slums.

Not that any of them had started out that way. In the 1930s, the city had built the Techwood apartment buildings on the site of a former shantytown called Tanyard Bottom. It was the first public housing of its kind in the United States.

All the buildings had electricity and running water. There was a school on site, a library and laundry facilities. President Roosevelt had been at the opening ceremonies. It had taken less than ten years for Techwood to revert back to its original shantytown state. Duke Wagner often said that desegregation was the final nail in Techwood's coffin. No matter what the case, Georgia Tech spent thousands of dollars a year hiring private security to keep students safe from their neighbors. The area was one of the most dangerous in the city.

"Okeydokey." Evelyn folded the map, saying, "Get us to Techwood Drive and I can tell you where to go from there."

"The buildings don't have numbers." This was a problem not just limited to the projects. When Amanda was in uniform, the first half hour of most of her calls was wasted searching for the correct address.

"Don't worry," Evelyn said. "I've figured out their system."

Amanda made her way up Ponce de Leon Avenue, past old Spiller Field where the Crackers used to play. The stadium had been torn down to build a shopping mall, but the magnolia tree that had been in center field was still there. She cut through a side alley by the Sears building to get to North Avenue. Both Amanda and Evelyn rolled up their windows as they approached Buttermilk Bottom. The shanties had been torn down a decade ago, but no one had bothered to do anything about the sewage problem. A sour smell filled Amanda's nostrils. She had to breathe through her mouth for the next five blocks. Finally, they were able to roll down the windows again.

"So," Evelyn said. "How's your father's case going?"

This was the second time she'd asked about it, which made Amanda wary. "He doesn't really talk about it with me."

"That's good news about Oglethorpe, right? Good news for your father?"

"I expect it is." Amanda stopped at a red light.

"What do you think this Techwood forty-nine has to do with Treadwell showing up?"

Amanda had been too flustered before to consider the question, but now she said, "Perhaps he was reporting a rape on behalf of a client."

"Lawyers in hundred-dollar suits don't have clients at Techwood." Evelyn rested her head against her hand. "Treadwell shows up bossing Hodge around. Hodge calls us in and bosses us around. There has to be a connection. Don't you think?"

Amanda shook her head. "I have no idea."

"He looked young, right? He must've just gotten out of school. His daddy's firm really got behind the mayor's election bid."

"Maynard Jackson?" Amanda asked. She hadn't really thought about white people supporting the city's first black mayor, but then, Atlanta's businessmen had never let race get in the way of making money.

Evelyn supplied, "Treadwell-Price was knee-deep in the campaign. Daddy Treadwell had his picture in the paper with Jackson the day he won. They had their arms around each other like two showgirls. Adam? Allen?" She blew out a stream of air. "Andrew. That's his name. Andrew Treadwell. Sonny boy must be a Junior. I bet they call him Andy."

Amanda shook her head slowly from side to side. She left politics to her father. "Never heard of any of them."

"Junior was certainly walking around with confidence. Hodge was terrified of him. Pantomime aside. Wasn't that a gas?"

"Yes." Amanda looked up at the red light, wondering why it was taking so long to change.

"Just pull through," Evelyn suggested. She noticed Amanda's worried expression and said, "Relax. I won't arrest you."

Amanda checked both ways twice, then a third time, before edging the Plymouth forward.

"Watch it," Evelyn warned. There was a Corvette cresting the hill on Spring Street. Sparks flew from under the engine as it scraped the asphalt and blew through the intersection. "Where's a cop when you need 'em?"

Amanda's calf ached from pounding the brake home. "My car insurance is with Benowitz, if you're trying to make your husband some money."

Evelyn laughed. "Benowitz isn't bad once you look past the horns."

Amanda couldn't tell if Evelyn was mocking her or stating her own opinion. She checked the light. Still red. She inched forward again, wincing as she pressed the accelerator. Amanda didn't feel her shoulders relax until they had passed the Varsity restaurant. And then they went back up again.

The smell engulfed the interior of the car as soon as they had crossed over the four-lane expressway. It wasn't sewage this time, but poverty, and people living stacked on top of one another like animals in crates. The heat was doing no one any favors. Techwood Homes was made of poured concrete with a brick façade, which breathed about as well as Amanda's nylons.

Beside her, Evelyn closed her eyes and took a few shallow breaths through her mouth. "Okay." She shook her head, then looked down at the map. "Left on Techwood. Right on Pine."

Amanda slowed the car to navigate the narrow streets. In the distance, she could see the brick row houses and garden apartments of Techwood Homes. Graffiti marred most surfaces, and where there was no spray paint, there was trash piled waist-high. A handful of children were playing in the dirt courtyard. They were dressed in rags. Even from a distance, Amanda could see the sores on their legs.

Evelyn directed, "Take a right up here."

Amanda went as far as she could go before the road became impassable. A burned-out car blocked the street. The doors were open. The hood was raised, showing the engine like a charred tongue. Amanda pulled onto a berm and put the gear in park.

Evelyn didn't move. She was staring at the children. "I'd forgotten how bad it is."

Amanda stared at the boys. They were all dark skinned and knobby kneed. They used their bare feet to kick around a flat-looking basketball. There was no grass here, only dry, red Georgia clay.

The kids stopped playing. One of the boys pointed to the Plymouth, which the city bought in lots and the population easily recognized as an unmarked police car. Another boy ran into the nearest building, dust kicking up behind him.

Evelyn huffed a laugh. "And there the little angel goes to alert the welcoming committee."

Amanda popped open the door handle. She could see the Coca-Cola tower in the distance, sandwiching the fourteen-block slum with Georgia Tech. “My father says Coke’s trying to get the city to tear this place down. Move them somewhere else.”

“I can’t see the mayor throwing away the people who elected him.”

Amanda didn’t vocally disagree, but in her experience, her father was always right about these things.

“Might as well get this over with.” Evelyn pushed open her door and got out of the car. She unzipped her purse and pulled out her radio, which was half as long as a Kel-Lite and almost as heavy. Amanda checked to make sure the zipper on her own bag was closed as Evelyn gave dispatch their location. Amanda’s radio seldom worked, no matter how many times she changed the battery. She would’ve left it at home but for Sergeant Geary. Every morning, he made all the women dump out their purses so he could make sure they were properly equipped.

“This way.” Evelyn walked up the hill toward the apartment block. Amanda could feel hundreds of sets of eyes tracking their movement. Given the setting, not many people were at work during the day. There was plenty of time to stare out the window and wait for something awful to happen. The farther away they got from the Plymouth, the sicker Amanda felt, so that by the time Evelyn stopped in front of the second building, she felt as if she might be ill.

“Okay.” Evelyn pointed to the doorways, counting off, “Three, four, five ...” She mouthed the rest silently as she continued walking. Amanda followed, wondering if Evelyn knew what she was doing or was just trying to show off.

Finally, Evelyn stopped again and pointed to the middle unit on the top floor. “Here we are.”

They both stared at the open doorway that led to the stairwell. A single shaft of sunlight illuminated the bottom steps. The windows at the front of the vestibule and on the upper landings were all boarded over, but the metal-encased skylight provided enough light to see by. At least so long as it was daytime.

“Fifth floor, penthouse,” Evelyn said. “How’d you do on the fitness exam?”

Another one of Reggie’s new rules. “I barely clocked the mile.” They were given eight and a half minutes. Amanda had pushed it to the last second.

“They gave me a pass on the pull-ups or I’d be at home right now watching Captain Kangaroo.” She gave a cheery smile. “I hope your life doesn’t depend on my upper body strength.”

“Surely you can outrun me if it comes to that.”

Evelyn laughed. “I’m planning on it.” She zipped her purse, then buttoned the flap closed. Again, Amanda made sure her purse was closed tightly. The first thing you learned about going into the projects was you never left your bag open and you never put it down anywhere. No one wanted to bring lice or cockroaches home to their families.

Evelyn took a deep breath, as if she was about to dunk her head underwater, then entered the building. The smell hit them both like a brick to the face. Evelyn covered her nose with her hand as she started up the steps. “You’d think sniffing a baby’s diaper all day would accustom me to the smell of urine. I suppose grown men eat different foods. I know asparagus makes mine smell. I tried cocaine once. I can’t remember what my pee smelled like, but zow-ee, did I not care one bit.”

Amanda stood shocked at the bottom of the stairs, looking up at Evelyn, who seemed not to realize that she’d just admitted to using an illegal narcotic.

“Oh, don’t pimp me out to Reggie. I looked the other way on that red light.” Evelyn flashed a smile. She turned the corner on the landing and she was gone.

Amanda shook her head as she followed her up the stairs. Neither of them touched the handrails. Cockroaches skittered underfoot. Trash seemed glued to the treads. The walls felt as if they were closing in.

Amanda forced herself to breathe through her mouth, just as she forced one foot after the other. This was crazy. Why hadn’t they called for backup? Half of the signal 49s in Atlanta were reported by women who’d been raped in stairwells. They were as ubiquitous to the housing projects as rats and squalor.

As Evelyn rounded the next landing, she tugged at the back of her hair. Amanda guessed this was a nervous tic. She shared the anxiety. The higher up they climbed, the more her insides rattled. Fourteen cops killed in the last two years. Gunshots to the head. Sometimes to the stomach. One officer had lived for two days before finally succumbing. He’d been in so much pain you could hear his screams all the way downstairs in the Grady Hospital ER.

Amanda’s heart clenched as she rounded the next landing. Her hands started shaking. Her knees wanted to give out. She felt seized by the desire to burst into tears.

Surely one of the patrol units had heard Evelyn call in their location to dispatch. The men seldom waited for any female officer to request backup. They just arrived on scene, taking over the case, shooing the women away like they were silly children. Normally, Amanda felt slightly irked by this macho grandstanding, but today, she would’ve welcomed them with open arms.

“This is crazy,” she mumbled, rounding the next landing. “Absolutely crazy.”

“Just a little bit farther,” Evelyn happily called back.

It wasn’t like they were undercover. Everyone knew there were two cops in the building. White cops. Female cops. The hum of televisions and whispered conversations buzzed around. The heat was as stifling as the shadows. Every closed door represented an opportunity for someone to jump out and hurt one or both of them.

“Okay, what’ve we got?” Evelyn asked no one in particular. “Four hundred forty-three rapes reported last year.” Her voice clattered down the stairs like a bell. “One hundred thirteen were white women. What is that, a one-in-four chance of us being raped?” She looked back at Amanda. “Twenty-five percent?”

Amanda shook her head. The woman might as well be speaking in tongues.

Evelyn continued up the stairs. “Four times one hundred thirteen ...” Her voice trailed off. “I was almost right. We have a twenty-six percent chance of being raped today. That’s not high at all. That’s a seventy-four percent chance of nothing happening.”

The numbers, at least, made sense. Amanda felt an ounce of pressure lift off her chest. “That doesn’t seem so bad.”

“No, it doesn’t. If I had a seventy-four percent chance of winning the Bug, I’d be down on Auburn right now betting my paycheck.”

Amanda nodded. The Bug was a numbers game run out of Colored Town. “Where did you—”

There was a commotion down the hallway. A door slammed. A child screamed. A man's voice shouted for everyone to shut the hell up.

The pressure came back like a boulder dropping from the sky.

Evelyn had stopped on the stairs. She was looking directly down at Amanda. "Statistically, we're fine. More than fine." She waited for Amanda to nod before continuing the climb. Evelyn's posture had lost its certainty. She was breathing heavily. Suddenly, Amanda realized that the other woman had taken the lead. If there was something bad waiting for them at the top of the stairs, Evelyn Mitchell would meet it first.

Amanda asked, "Where did you get those numbers?" She'd never heard them before and frankly did not care. All she knew was that talking was the only thing keeping her from vomiting. "The reported rapes?"

"Class project. I'm taking statistics at Tech."

"Tech," Amanda repeated. "Isn't that hard?"

"It's a great way to meet men."

Again, Amanda didn't know if she was joking. Again, she didn't care. "How many of the perpetrators were white?"

"What's that?"

"Techwood is ninety percent black. How many of the rapists were—"

"Oh, right, right." Evelyn stopped at the top of the stairs. "You know, I can't recall. I'll look it up for you later. This is it." She pointed down the hallway. All the lights were blown out. The skylight cast everything in shadow. "Fourth door on the left."

"Do you want my Kel?"

"I don't think a light will make much difference. Ready?"

Amanda felt her throat work as she tried to swallow. There was an apple core on the floor that seemed to be moving. It was completely covered in ants.

Evelyn said, "Smell's not so bad up here."

"No," Amanda agreed.

"I suppose if you're going to relieve your bladder on the floor, you need not climb five flights of stairs to do it."

"No," Amanda repeated.

"Shall we?" Evelyn walked down the hall with renewed purpose. Amanda caught up with her in front of the closed door. A plastic cutout of the letter C was nailed to the wall. Taped just below the spyhole was a strip of notebook paper with blue capital letters written in a child's hand.

Amanda read, "Kitty Treadwell."

"The plot thickens." Evelyn took a deep breath through her nose. "You smell that?"

Amanda had to concentrate in order to discern the new odor. "Vinegar?"

"That's what heroin smells like."

"Don't tell me you've tried that, too?"

"Only my hairdresser knows for sure." She motioned for Amanda to stand to the side of the door. Evelyn took the opposite side. This marginally ensured their safety in case someone was standing behind the door with a loaded shotgun.

Evelyn raised her hand and knocked on the door with such force that the wood shook on its hinges. Her voice was entirely different—deeper, more masculine—when she shouted, "Atlanta Police Department!" She saw Amanda's expression and gave her a wink before banging again. "Open up!" she ordered.

Amanda listened to her own heartbeat, the quick gulps of breath. Seconds passed. Evelyn raised her hand again, then dropped it when a muffled woman's voice said, "Jesus," from behind the door.

There was a shuffling noise inside the apartment. A chain slid back. Then a lock turned. Then another lock. Then the handle moved as the thumb latch was toggled.

The girl inside was obviously a prostitute, though she was dressed in a thin cotton shift that was more appropriate for a ten-year-old girl. Bleach blonde hair hung to her waist. Her skin was so white it bordered on blue. Her age was between twenty and sixty. Track marks riddled her body—her arms, her neck, her legs, pricking open like wet, red mouths on the veins of her bare feet. Missing teeth gave her face a concave appearance. Amanda could see how the ball-and-socket joint in her shoulder worked as she folded her arms low on her waist.

Evelyn asked, "Kitty Treadwell?"

Her voice had a smoker's rasp. "Whatchu bitches want?"

"Good morning to you, too." Evelyn breezed into the apartment, which looked just as Amanda expected. Molded dishes filled the sink. Empty fast-food bags were everywhere. Clothes were strewn across the floor. There was a stained blue couch in the middle of the room with a coffee table in front. Syringes and a spoon rested on a dingy washrag. Matches. Pieces of cigarette filters. A small bag of dirty white powder was laid out beside two cockroaches that were either dead or so high they couldn't move. Someone had pulled the kitchen stove into the middle of the room. The oven door was open, the edge resting on the coffee table to support the large color television set on top.

"Is that Dinah?" Evelyn asked. She turned up the volume. Jack Cassidy was singing with Dinah Shore. "I just love her voice. Did you see David Bowie on here last week?"

The girl blinked several times.

Amanda checked for roaches before turning on the floor lamp. A harsh light filled the room. The windows were covered in yellow construction paper, but that only served to filter the bright morning sun. Perhaps that was why Amanda felt safer inside the apartment than she had in the stairwell. Her heartbeat was returning to normal. She wasn't sweating any more than dictated by the temperature.

"David Bowie," Evelyn repeated, turning off the TV. "He was on Dinah last week."

Amanda stated the obvious. "She's stoned out of her gourd." A heavy sigh came from deep inside her chest. They had risked their lives for this?

Evelyn patted the girl on the cheek. Her palm made a firm slapping sound against the skin. "You in there, sweetheart?"

"I'd soak that hand in Clorox," Amanda advised. "Let's get out of here. If this girl was raped, she probably deserved it."

"Hodge sent us here for a reason."

"He sent you and Vanessa here," Amanda countered. "I can't believe we've wasted our whole morning—"

"Fonzie," the girl mumbled. "He wa' talkin' to Fonzie."

"That's right," Evelyn said, smiling at Amanda as if she'd won a prize. "Bowie was on Dinah last week with Fonzie from Happy Days."

"I seen 'em." Kitty ambled over to the couch and collapsed onto the cushions. Amanda didn't know if it was the drugs or her circumstances that made the girl's speech almost unintelligible. She sounded as if someone had turned upside down the entire Flannery O'Connor canon and shaken her out. "I don't remember what he sang."

"You know, I don't either." Evelyn motioned for Amanda to check the rest of the place.

Amanda asked, "What am I looking for, back editions of Good Housekeeping?"

Evelyn smiled sweetly. "Wouldn't that be funny if you actually found some?"

"Just hilarious."

Reluctantly, Amanda did as she was asked, trying not to let her arms touch the walls of the narrow hallway as she walked to the back. The apartment was larger than her own. There was a proper bedroom separate from the living area. The door to the closet was off its hinges. Several torn black garbage bags seemed to hold the girl's clothing. The bed was a pile of stained sheets wadded up on the carpet.

Impossibly, the bathroom was even more disgusting than the rest of the apartment. Black mold had replaced the grout in the tile. The sink and toilet were serving double duty as ashtrays. The trashcan was overflowing with used sanitary napkins and toilet paper. The floor was smeared with something Amanda didn't want to know about.

Taking up every available surface were various personal grooming products, which, to Amanda's thinking, was the very definition of irony. Two cans of Sunsilks hairspray. Four Breck shampoo bottles at varying levels. A ripped box of Tampax. An empty bottle of Cachet by Prince Matchabelli. Two open pots of Pond's cold cream, both caked with a yellowed rind. Enough makeup to stock the Revlon counter at Rich's. Brushes. Pencils. Liquid eyeliner. Mascara. Two combs, both clumped with hair. Three very well used toothbrushes sticking out of a Mayor McCheese drinking glass.

The shower curtain was torn from the hooks, giving the cockroaches in the tub a clear view of Amanda. They stared at her intently as she shuddered uncontrollably. She gripped her purse, knowing she was going to have to shake it out before she even thought about putting it in the car.

Back in the living room, Evelyn had moved on from Arthur Fonzarelli to the reason for their visit. "Andy Treadwell is your cousin or your brother?"

"Uncle," the girl said, and Amanda assumed she meant the elder Andrew Treadwell. "What time is it?"

Amanda looked at her watch. "Nine o'clock." She felt the need to add, "In the morning."

"Shee-it." The girl reached down between the couch cushions and pulled out a pack of cigarettes. Amanda watched as, entranced, the girl studied the pack of Virginia Slims as if they'd just fallen like manna from heaven. Slowly, she took out a cigarette. It was bent at an angle. Still, she grabbed the matches off the table and with shaking hands lit the cigarette. She blew out a stream of smoke.

"I hear those will kill you," Evelyn said.

"It's waitin'," the girl answered.

Evelyn countered, "There are faster ways."

"You stick aroun', you see how fast."

Amanda detected an edge to the girl's tone. "Why is that?"

"Them kids done seen ya pull up. My daddy gonna wanna know why two white bitches chattin' me up."

Evelyn said, "I think your uncle Andy is worried about you."

"He want his dick suck again?"

Amanda exchanged a look with Evelyn. Most of these girls claimed an uncle or father had abused them. Around the sex crimes units they called it an Oedipal complex. Not technically correct, but close enough, and obviously a waste of police time.

Kitty said, "You cain't arrest me. I ain't did nothin'."

"We don't want to arrest you," Evelyn tried again. "We were told by our sergeant that you'd been raped."

"S'what I get pay for, ain't it?" She blew out another plume of smoke, this one straight into their faces.

Evelyn's sunny disposition faltered. "Kitty, we need to speak with you and take a statement."

"Ain't ma problem."

"All right. We'll just leave then." Evelyn snatched the bag of heroin off the coffee table and turned on her heel.

If Amanda hadn't been so surprised to see Evelyn take the drugs, she would've been heading toward the door herself. As it was, she saw everything—the shock on the girl's face, the way she sprang from the couch, fingers out like the claws on a cat.

Seemingly of its own volition, Amanda's foot rose up. She didn't trip the girl. She kicked her in the ribs, sending her straight into the stove. The blow was hard. Kitty slammed into the television, breaking off the stove door. The TV cracked against the floor. Tubes popped. Glass shattered.

Evelyn stared at Amanda in visible shock. "What was that?"

"She was about to jump you."

"You certainly stopped her." Evelyn knelt down on the floor. She took a handkerchief out of her purse and handed it to the girl.

"Bitches," Kitty slurred. Her fingers went to her mouth. She pulled out one of her last remaining teeth. "Got damn bitches."

Evelyn stood back up, probably thinking it wasn't wise to kneel in front of an angry prostitute. Still, she said, "You need to tell us what's going on. We're here to help you."

"'uck you," the girl mumbled, fingers feeling around inside her mouth. Amanda saw old scars across her wrist where Kitty had tried to slice open the veins. "'et the 'uck outta 'ere."

Evelyn's voice turned hard. "Don't make us drag you to the station, Kitty. I don't care who your uncle is."

Amanda thought of her car, the time it would take to wash away the grime from the back seat. She told Evelyn, "You can't seriously be considering—"

"Like hell I'm not."

"There's no way I'm letting this—"

"Shut up!" the girl yelled. "I ain't even Kitty. I's Jane. Jane Delray."

"Oh for the love of—" Amanda threw her hands into the air. All the terror she'd experienced on the stairwell turned into anger. "We don't even have the right girl."

"Hodge didn't give a name. Just an address."

Amanda shook her head. "I don't know why we even listened to him. He's been here less than a day. The same as you, I might add."

"I was in uniform for three years before—"

"Why are you back?" Amanda demanded. "Are you here to do the job or is it something else?"

"You're the one who wants to hightail it out of here."

"Because this whore can't tell us anything."

"Hey!" Jane screamed. "Who you callin' a whore?"

Evelyn looked down at the girl. Sarcasm dripped from her voice. "Really, darling? You want to make that argument now?"

Jane wiped the blood from her mouth. "Y'all ain't from the gubmint."

"Brilliant deduction," Evelyn said. "Exactly who from the government is looking for you?"

Her shoulders gave a slight shrug. "I might'a been down to the Five on account'a needin' s'money."

Evelyn put her hand to her head. "The Five" referred to the Five Points Station bus line that serviced the welfare office. "You were trying to cash Kitty's government assistance voucher."

Amanda asked, "Isn't it mailed?"

They both stared openly at Amanda. Evelyn explained, "The post office boxes here aren't exactly secure."

Jane said, "Kitty don't need it. She ain't never need it. She rich. Gotta family that's connected. Thass why you bitches here, ain't it?"

Evelyn asked, "Where is she now?"

"She be gone six months."

"Where did she go?"

"Dis'peared. Same wid Lucy. Same wid Mary. All dem jes up and dis'peared."

"These are working girls?" Evelyn asked. "Lucy and Mary?" The girl nodded. "Is Kitty on the game, too?" Again, the girl nodded.

Amanda had had quite enough of this. "Should I write this down for the newspaper? Three prostitutes are missing. Stop the presses."

"Ain't missin'," the girl insisted. "They gone. Real gone. Dis'peared." She wiped blood from her lips. "They's all livin' here. They stuff's here. They's puttin' down roots. They's cashin' they vouchahs from the Five."

Amanda said, "Until you tried to get their vouchers instead."

"Y'ain't lissenin' to me," Jane insisted. "They all gone. Lucy been gone a year. She here one minute, then—" She snapped her fingers. "Poof."

Evelyn turned to Amanda, and in a deadly serious tone said, "We need to put out an immediate APB on a man wearing a cape and a magician's hat." She stopped. "Hold that. Let's check to see if Doug Henning's in town."

Amanda couldn't help herself. She laughed at the joke.

They all jumped when the front door slammed open. Wood splintered. The knob dug into the wall. Plaster shattered. The air seemed to shake.

A well-built black man stood in the doorway. He was out of breath, probably from running up the stairs. His thick sideburns grew into a goatee and mustache that circled his mouth. His pants and shirt were a matching lime green. He was obviously a pimp, and clearly furious. "Whatchu honky bitches doin' here?"

Amanda could not move. She felt as if her body had turned to stone.

"We were looking for Kitty," Evelyn answered. "Do you know Kitty Treadwell? Her uncle is a very good friend of Mayor Jackson's." Her throat worked as she swallowed. "That's why we're here. They asked us to come. The mayor's friend. They're very concerned that Kitty is missing."

The man ignored her, grabbing Jane up by her hair. She screamed in pain, her fingers digging into his hands as she tried to keep her scalp from ripping. "You been talkin' to the po-lice, gal?"

"Ain't say nothin'. Honess." Jane could barely speak from terror. "They jes' show up."

He shoved her out into the hall. Jane stumbled, falling against the wall before she found her footing.

"We're leaving now." Evelyn's voice was shaking. She edged toward the door, motioning Amanda to follow. "We don't want trouble."

The man shut the door. The sound was like a gunshot. He stared at Amanda for a few intent seconds, then Evelyn. His eyes looked as if they were on fire.

Evelyn said, "Our sergeant knows we're here."

He turned around and slowly slid the chain into the track. And then he locked the deadbolt. And then the next one.

"We talked to dispatch before we—"

"I hear ya, Mrs. Pig. Lessee can the mayor get here 'fore I'm through." He took the key from the lock and slid it into his front pocket. His voice went into a deep baritone. "You a fine-lookin' woman. You know that?"

He wasn't talking to Evelyn. His eyes were trained on Amanda. He licked his lips, his gaze lingering on her chest. She tried to back up, but he followed. Her legs hit the arm of the couch. His fingers touched the side of her neck. "Damn, gal. So fine."

Amanda fought a wave of dizziness. She reached down to her purse, fidgeting with the zip, trying to get it to open. "Call for backup."

Evelyn already had her radio in her hand. She clicked the button.

The man's hand circled Amanda's neck. His thumb pressed under her chin. "Radio ain't gone work up here. We too high for the antennies."

Evelyn furiously clicked the button. There was only static. "Shit."

"We gone have some fun, ain't we, Fuzzy?" His hand tightened around Amanda's throat. She could smell his cologne and sweat. There was a birthmark on his cheek. A patch of hair showed where his shirt was unbuttoned. Gold chains. A tattoo of Jesus with a crown of thorns.

"Ev ...," Amanda breathed. She could feel the outline of the revolver inside her purse. She tried to force her finger into the trigger guard.

"Mmm-hmm," the pimp moaned. He unzipped his pants. "Fine-lookin' woman."

"Eh-eh-ev ...," Amanda stuttered. His hand slipped under her skirt. She could feel his fingernails scrape her bare flesh, the pressure of him against her thigh.

Evelyn jammed the radio back into her purse and zipped closed the bag as if she was preparing to leave. Amanda panicked. And then gasped as Evelyn gripped the straps with both hands, swung around and smashed her bag into the side of the man's head.

Gun. Badge. Handcuffs. Kel-Lite. Radio. Nightstick. Nearly twenty pounds of equipment. The pimp collapsed to the floor like a rag doll. Blood spurted from the side of his head. There were deep cuts across his cheek where the Indian tassels had sliced open the skin.

Amanda grabbed her revolver out of her purse. The bag fell to the floor. Her hands shook as she tried to grip the gun. She had to lean against the arm of the couch so she wouldn't fall down.

"Christ." Evelyn stood over the man, mouth agape. The blood was really flowing now.

"My God," Amanda whispered. She pushed down her skirt. Her pantyhose were ripped from his prying fingernails. She could still feel his hand on her throat. "My God."

"Are you okay?" Evelyn asked. She put her hands on Amanda's arms. "You're okay, all right?" Slowly, she reached down for Amanda's revolver. "I've got this, okay? You're fine."

"Your gun ..." Amanda was panting so hard she was going to hyperventilate. "Why didn't ... Why didn't you shoot him?"

Evelyn chewed her bottom lip. She stared at Amanda for what seemed like a full minute before finally admitting, "Bill and I agreed that we shouldn't keep a loaded gun in the house because of the baby."

Words clogged Amanda's throat. She screamed, "Your gun isn't loaded!"

"Well ..." Evelyn dug her fingers into the back of her hair. "It worked out, right?" She let out a strained laugh. "Sure, it worked out. We're both fine. We're both just fine." She looked down at the pimp again. His pants were splayed open. "I guess it's not true what they say about—"

"He was going to rape me! He was going to rape both of us!"

"Statistically ..." Evelyn's voice trailed off before she admitted, "Well, yes. It was bound to happen. I didn't want to tell you before, but ..." She picked up Amanda's purse from the floor. "Yeah."

For the first time in two months, Amanda wasn't hot anymore. Her blood had turned cold.

Evelyn kept babbling. She zipped Amanda's gun inside her purse, looped the strap over her shoulder. "We're both okay, though. Right? I'm okay. You're okay. We're all okay." She spotted a telephone on the floor by the couch. Her hand was shaking so hard that she dropped the receiver. It rattled in the cradle, dingling the bell. She finally managed to pick up the phone and put it to her ear. "I'll call this in. The boys will come running. We'll get out of here. We're both fine. All right?"

Amanda blinked sweat out of her eye.

Evelyn stuck her finger in the dial. "I'm sorry. I talk when I get nervous. It drives my husband crazy." The rotary slid back and forth. "What about those missing girls the whore mentioned? Do you recognize any of their names?"

Amanda blinked away more sweat. Her mind flashed up strange images. The disgusting bathroom. The shampoo bottles. The piles of makeup.

Evelyn said, "Lucy. Mary. Kitty Treadwell. Maybe we should write that down somewhere. I'm certain I'll forget the minute I get a drink in me. Two drinks. A whole bottle.” She huffed out a short breath. “It’s weird that Jane was worried about them. These girls usually don’t worry about anything but keeping their pimps happy.”

Three used toothbrushes in the glass. The long, dark hair clumped in one of the combs.

Amanda said, “Jane’s hair is blonde.”

“I wouldn’t bet on that.” Evelyn looked down at the unmoving man. “His wallet’s in his back pocket. Could you—”

“No!” The panic came back in full force.

“You’re right. Never mind. They’ll ID him at the jail. I’m sure he has a record. Hey, Linda.” Evelyn’s voice wavered as she spoke into the phone. “Ten-sixteen, my location. Hodge sent us in on a forty-nine and it turned into a fifty-five.” She looked at Amanda. “Anything else?”

“Tell them you’re twenty-four,” Amanda managed.

Duke Wagner was wrong about Evelyn Mitchell being pushy and opinionated. The woman was just plain crazy.

Present Day

SUZANNA FORD

Zanna fell back on the bed, her feet still on the floor. She held up her iPhone and checked her messages. No texts. No voicemail. No email. The asshole was already ten minutes late. If she showed up downstairs without any money, Terry was going to beat her ass. Again. He seemed to forget it was his job to screen these losers. Not that Terry ever took the blame for anything.

She looked out the window at the downtown skyline. Zanna was born and raised in Roswell, half an hour and a lifetime away from Atlanta. Except for the buildings that had names on them, she had no idea what she was looking at. Equitable. AT&T. Georgia Power. All she knew was she was going to be seriously screwed if her john didn't show.

The plasma TV on the wall flashed on. Zanna had rolled over on the remote. She saw Monica Pearson behind the news desk. Some girl was missing. White, blonde, pretty. They sure as shit wouldn't care if Zanna was gone.

She flipped around the channels, trying to find something more interesting, finally giving up when she got into the triple digits. She tossed the remote onto the bedside table. Her arms itched. She wanted a cigarette. She wanted more than that.

If she thought about the meth long enough, she could taste the powder in the back of her throat. Her freaking nose was rotting from the inside, but she couldn't stop snorting the stuff. Couldn't stop thinking about the smash cut to her brain. The way it shook through her body. The way it made the world so much more bearable.

That wasn't going to happen for at least an hour. To tide herself over, she went to the minibar and took out four small bottles of vodka. Zanna downed them in quick succession, then filled the empties in the bathroom sink. She was stacking the bottles back in the refrigerator when there was a knock at the door.

"Thank Jesus," she groaned. She checked herself in the mirror. Not too bad. She could still pass for sixteen if the lights were turned down low enough. She twisted the wand to close the blinds and turned off one of the bedside lamps before answering the door.

The man was massive. The top of his head almost touched the doorway. His shoulders were nearly as wide as the frame. Zanna felt a stir of panic, but then she remembered Terry was downstairs, and that he had cleared this guy, and that whatever was about to happen wouldn't matter when that first huff of meth snaked into her brain.

She said, “Hey, Daddy,” because he was older. Zanna didn’t want to think about the geezer using his social security check to pay for this. She looked at his face, which was pretty smooth considering his age. His neck was a little scrawny. You could really tell it in his hands. Liver spots. The hair on his arms was white, though what was left on his head was sandy brown.

Zanna threw open the door. “Come in, big boy.” She tried to swing her hips as she walked, but the carpet combined with her new high heels wasn’t a good mix. She ended up having to brace herself against the wall. She turned around and waited for him to come in.

He took his time. He didn’t seem nervous and God knew you didn’t pop your first whore at his age. He glanced up and down the hallway before finally shutting the door behind him. He was still in good shape despite the years on him. His hair was in a military cut. His shoulders were square. World War II, she thought, then her middle school history came back to her and Zanna figured he wasn’t old enough for that. Probably Vietnam. A lot of her customers lately were young guys just back from Afghanistan. She didn’t know which was worse—the sad ones who tried to make love or the angry ones who wanted to hurt her.

She got straight to the point. “You a cop?”

He said what they always said. “Do I look like a cop?” But he unzipped his pants without prompting. It was the last vestige of democracy. Even undercover, a cop wasn’t allowed to show you his junk. “All right?”

Zanna nodded, suppressing a shudder. He was huge. “Damn,” she managed. “That looks fun.”

The man zipped back up. “Have a seat.” He indicated the chair. Zanna sat, legs apart, so he’d have a good view from the bed. Only, he kept standing. His shadow stretched across the room, nearly reaching the edge of the door.

“How do you like it?” she asked, though Zanna had a sneaking suspicion he liked it rough. She pulled in her shoulders, tried to look smaller than she already was. “You wanna be gentle with me. I’m just a girl.”

His lip quivered, but that was the only reaction she got. He asked, “How did you get here?”

She thought he meant the literal path she’d taken—up Peachtree, left on Edgewood. Then she realized he meant her current state of employment.

Zanna shrugged. “What can I say? I love sex.” That’s what they wanted to hear. That’s what they tried to tell themselves when they ripped you apart and threw money in your face—that you loved it, couldn’t live without it.

“No,” he said. “I want the real story.”

“Oh, you know.” She blew out a puff of air. Her story was so boring. You couldn’t turn on the television without seeing some iteration of the same. Zanna hadn’t been tossed out on the streets. She hadn’t been abused. Her parents were divorced, but they were good people. The problem was Zanna. She’d started smoking weed so a boy would think she was cool. She’d started taking pills because she was bored. She’d started smoking meth to lose weight. And then it was too late to do anything else but hang on by her fingernails until the next hit.

Her mom let her live at home until she figured out Zanna was smoking more than Marlboros. Her dad let her live in his basement until his new wife found the blackened pieces of tinfoil that smelled like marshmallows. Then, they put her up in an apartment. Then they got all tough love, and two failed stints in rehab later, Zanna was out on the street, earning her fix between her legs.

"Tell me the truth," the man said. "How did you get here?"

Zanna tried to swallow. Her mouth was dry. She couldn't tell if it was from withdrawal or from the scary feeling she was getting off this guy. She told him what she knew he wanted to hear. "My daddy hurt me."

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"I didn't have a choice." She sniffed and looked down at the floor. She used the back of her hand to wipe away fake tears. Her jaw could've come unhinged like a boa constrictor's, so bored was Zanna with spinning this story. "I didn't have anywhere to go. I was sleeping on the streets. Sex is something I like. And I'm good at it, so ..."

He knelt down to look at her. Even on his knees, he was taller than her. Zanna glanced at him, then quickly looked away. It was shame this guy was looking for. Older generation. They lapped it up. Zanna could give him plenty of shame. Valerie Bertinelli. Meredith Baxter. Tori Spelling. Zanna had seen the look in every single Lifetime movie she'd ever watched.

She said, "I miss him. That's the sad part." She looked back up at the man, blinked her eyes a few times. "I miss my daddy."

He took her hand, gently sandwiching it between both of his. Zanna couldn't see anything but her wrist. His touch was light on her skin, but she felt like he'd trapped her. Her breath stuttered in her chest. Panic was a natural instinct she thought she'd learned to control. There was something about this man that set off what little warning system she had left.

He said, "Suzanna, don't lie to me."

Bile boiled up into her mouth. "That's not my name." She tried to pull away. His fingers clamped around her wrist. "I didn't tell you my name."

"Didn't you?"

She was going to kill that fucking pimp. He'd sell his mother for an extra twenty. "What did Terry tell you? My name is Trixie."

"No," the man insisted. "You told me your name is Suzanna."

She felt pain rush up her arm. She looked down. He held both her wrists in one hand. He leaned into her legs, trapping her against the chair. "Don't fight," he said, his free hand wrapping around her neck. The tips of his fingers touched in the back. "I want to help you, Suzanna. To save you."

"I-I-I'm not—" She couldn't speak. She was choking. She couldn't breathe. Panic jerked through her body like a live wire. Her eyes rolled upward. She felt a stream of urine dribble down her leg.

"Just relax, sister." He hovered above her. His eyes going back and forth as if he did not want to miss a second of her fear. A smile creased his lips. "The Lord will guide my hand."

Present DayMONDAY

Sara walked through the Grady Hospital emergency room, trying not to get pulled away on cases. Even if she tattooed “off duty” on her forehead, the nurses wouldn’t leave her alone. She shouldn’t blame them. The hospital was notoriously understaffed and overburdened. There had not been a time in Grady’s 120-year history when supply was able to keep up with demand. Working here was tantamount to signing away your life, which had been just what Sara needed when she’d taken the job. She hadn’t really had a life back then. She was newly widowed, living in a different city, starting over from scratch. Throwing herself into a demanding job was the only way she’d been able to cope.

It was amazing how quickly her needs had changed in the last two weeks.

Or the last hour, for that matter. Sara had no idea what was going on between Will and Amanda. Their relationship had always puzzled her, but the exchange in the hallway before the stairs collapsed had been downright bizarre. Even after the fall, when it was clear that Amanda had been badly injured, Will seemed more intent on questioning the woman than helping her. Sara still felt shocked by his tone of voice. She’d never heard such coldness from him before. It was like he was another person, a stranger she did not want to know.

At least Sara had finally figured out the root of their conversation, though it was through no brilliant deduction of her own. The television over the nurses’ station was always tuned to the news. Closed captioning scrolled mindlessly day and night. The missing girl from Georgia Tech had made the jump to the national news, courtesy of CNN, whose world headquarters was just down the street from the university. The video of Amanda leading the press conference played on an endless loop, reporters flashing up statistics and the sort of non-information required to fill twenty-four-hour programming.

The latest speculation held that perhaps Ashleigh Renee Snyder had faked her own abduction. Students claiming to be close friends of the missing girl had come forward, giving details about her life, Ashleigh’s fears that her grades were slipping. Maybe she really was hiding somewhere. The theory was not completely without foundation. Georgia had a short history of women pretending to be kidnapped, the most famous being the so-called Runaway Bride, a silly woman who’d wasted several days of police time hiding from her own fiancé.

“Sara.” A nurse rushed up with a lab report. “I need you to—”

"Sorry. I'm off duty."

"What the hell are you doing back here?" The woman didn't wait around for an answer.

Sara checked the board to see if Will had been assigned a room. Generally, a case as mundane as sutures would take hours to get to, but before Sara dealt with Amanda, she'd made certain the admitting nurse hadn't abandoned Will to the waiting room. He'd been assigned one of the curtains in the back. Sara felt her spine stiffen when she saw Bert Krakauer's name instead of her own adjacent to Will's.

She headed toward the back, a startling sense of ownership quickening her pace. The curtain was open. Will was sitting up in bed. A drape was around his foot. Worst of all, Krakauer had a pair of pick-ups in his hand.

"No-no-no," she said, jogging toward the two men. "What are you doing?"

Krakauer indicated the needle holder. "They didn't let you play with these in medical school?"

Sara gave him a tight smile. "Thanks. I'll take over from here." He took the hint, returning the instrument to the tray and taking his leave. Sara gave Will a sharp look as she closed the curtain. "You were going to let Krakauer sew you up?"

"Why not?"

"For the same reason you weren't left rotting in the waiting room." Sara washed her hands at the sink. "If someone broke into my apartment, would you let another cop investigate it?"

"I don't normally work burglaries."

Sara wiped her hands dry with a paper towel. Will wasn't normally this obtuse. "What's going on?"

"He said I need stitches."

"Not that." She sat down on the edge of the bed. "You've been acting strange since we got here. Is it Amanda?"

"Why? Did she say something to you?"

Sara had a creeping sense of déjà vu. She'd spoken briefly to Amanda and gotten the same question about Will. "What would Amanda tell me?"

"Nothing important. She wasn't making a lot of sense."

"She seemed pretty sharp to me." Sara resisted the urge to put her hands on her hips like a lecturing schoolmarm. "I saw Ashleigh Snyder on the news."

Will sat up. "Did they find her?"

"No. They're speculating that she might've staged her own kidnapping. One of her friends came forward and said she was about to flunk out of school."

Will nodded, but didn't offer his opinion.

"Are you working the case?"

"Nope." His tone was clipped. "Still keeping Atlanta's airport toilets safe from horny business travelers."

"Why aren't you on the kidnapping?"

"You'd have to ask Amanda."

Here they were, full circle again.

"Is she all right?" Will asked, though the question seemed obligatory. "Amanda, I mean."

Sara had never been good at staring contests, especially with someone as blatantly pigheaded as the man she'd been sleeping with for the last two weeks. "She has what's called a Colles' fracture. Ortho is reducing it right now. She'll get a cast. She's pretty banged up, but she'll be okay. Normally, she'd be sent home, but she lost consciousness, so she'll have to spend the night."

"Good." He stared at her blankly. Sara got the feeling that she might as well be talking to a brick wall. The tension between them was just as thick.

She took his hand. "Will—"

"Thanks for letting me know."

Sara waited for him to say more. Then she realized they only had twelve hours before it would be too late to suture his ankle. She slipped on a pair of surgical gloves. She could tell from the mess that Krakauer had already cleaned out the wound. "Your ankle is numb?"

Will nodded.

"Let's see what we have." She pressed her fingers around the open skin. The laceration was at least an inch long and half as deep. Fresh blood wept out when she forced together the skin. She asked, "You didn't think to tell me that a nail went into your ankle?"

"The other doctor said it barely needs a stitch."

"The other doctor is never going to have to see your ankle again." Sara rolled over the stool so she could sit down. She took the scalpel and used the edge to shape the jagged opening into an ellipse. "I'll make sure there isn't a scar."

"You know that doesn't matter."

Sara looked up at him. There were worse scars on his body. It was something they didn't talk about. One of the many things they didn't talk about.

She tried, again. "What's going on with you?"

Will shook his head, looking away. He was obviously still angry, but Sara had no idea why. There was no use asking him. As sweet and kind and gentle as Will Trent was, Sara had learned that he was about as forthcoming as an amnesiac with lockjaw.

She didn't know what else to do but start suturing. Her glasses were in her purse, which she assumed was still locked inside her car. Sara leaned in close and hooked the needle into the flesh just beneath Will's skin. The chromic thread dipped in and out as she placed a single row of interrupted sutures. Pull, knot, cut. Pull, knot, cut. Over the years, Sara's hands had performed this same action so many times that she went into autopilot, which, unfortunately, gave her mind plenty of time to wander.

The same question she'd been asking herself for the last two weeks popped into her head: What was she doing?

She liked Will. He was the first man Sara had really been with since her husband had died. She enjoyed his company. He was funny and smart. Handsome. Incredibly good in bed. He'd met her family. Her dogs adored him. Sara adored his dog. Over the last few weeks, Will had practically moved into her apartment, but in some ways, he still felt like a stranger.

What little he revealed about his past always came in sugarcoated sound bites. Nothing was ever too bad. No one was that horrible. To hear Will tell it, he'd lived a charmed life. Never mind the cigarette and electrical burns on his body. The jag to his upper lip where the skin had been busted in two. The deep gouge that followed his jawline. Sara kissed these places and rubbed her hands along them as if they didn't exist.

"Halfway there." Sara glanced up at Will again. He was still looking away.

She tied off the last knot and picked up a new needle threaded with Prolene. She started the running subcuticular row, zigzagging the thread back and forth, all the while berating herself for giving in to Will's silence.

When their relationship first started, none of this had mattered. There were far more interesting things Will could do with his mouth other than talk about himself. These last few days, his reticence had started to bother her. Sara found herself wondering if he was capable of giving more, and failing that, if she was willing to settle for less.

Even if by some miracle he decided to pour out his heart to Sara, there was still the larger problem of his wife. If Sara was being honest, she was afraid of Angie Polaski, and not just because the woman kept leaving nasty notes on the windshield of Sara's car. Angie lingered in Will's life like a vaporous poison. The joy that Sara felt as Will showed her around his old neighborhood had quickly dissipated when practically every memory he recalled had something to do with Angie. He didn't have to say her name. Sara knew that he was thinking about her.

Which left Sara questioning whether or not there was any space in Will's life for someone other than Angie Polaski.

"There." Sara pulled closed the skin and knotted the loop. "These need to stay in for two weeks. I've got some waterproof Band-Aids at home so you can shower. I'll get you some Tylenol for the pain."

"I've got some at home." He stared at his hands as he rolled down the leg of his pants. "I should probably stay there tonight." He slid on his sock, still not meeting her eyes. "I need to wash some of my shirts. Do the laundry. Check on the dog."

Sara stared openly. Will's jaw was clenched. He was a study in controlled anger. She wasn't sure if this was directed solely at Amanda anymore. "Are you mad at me?"

"No." The answer was short, quick, and obviously a lie.

"All right." Sara turned her back to him as she snapped off her gloves. She tossed them into the trashcan, then started cleaning up the suture kit. Behind her, she could hear Will moving around, probably looking for his shoe. Sara normally had a long fuse, but her bad day had made it considerably shorter. She reached under the bed and grabbed his shoe out of the basket.

She asked, "Do me a favor, sweetheart?"

He took his time answering. "What?"

"Don't talk about what happened tonight, all right?" She tossed the shoe in his general direction. He caught it with one hand, which only served to irritate her more. "Don't tell me what you think about Amanda, or the hammer, or what she was doing at the place where you grew up when she's supposed to be leading a case, and sure as hell let's not talk about whatever she said to you in the basement that has you so freaked out that you're emotionally catatonic. At least, more than usual." Sara stopped for a breath. "Let's just ignore everything. Okay?"

He stared at her for a few seconds, then said, "That sounds like an excellent idea." Will shoved his foot into his shoe. "I'll see you later."

"You bet." Sara looked down at the digital tablet as if she could actually read the words. Her fingers pressed random keys. She felt Will hesitate a moment, then he yanked back the curtain. His shoes snicked on the floor. Sara kept her head down, counting silently. When she reached sixty, she looked up.

He was gone.

"Asshole," Sara hissed. She slid the tablet onto the counter. Earlier, she'd felt tired, but now she was too wired to be anything but furious. She washed her hands. The water was hot enough to scald her skin, but she just scrubbed harder. There was a mirror over the sink. Her hair was a mess. Specks of dried blood dotted her sleeve. This was the first night she'd come straight home in her work clothes. For the last two weeks, she'd been showering at the hospital, changing into a dress or something more flattering, before seeing Will.

Was that part of the problem? Maybe the Amanda thing was another issue. There was an earlier moment on the street when Will had looked down at her. Sara had felt him taking in her scrubs, her hair, with a less-than-impressed expression. Will was always impeccably dressed. Maybe he was thinking that Sara hadn't made much of an effort. Or maybe it went back farther than that. He'd found her crying in her car. Was that what set him off? If so, why had he taken her to the children's home? The fact that he would share something so personal had made Sara feel as if their relationship was finally moving forward.

And here they were again, tripping over their feet as they took giant leaps back.

"Hey, you." Faith stood at the open curtain. Will's partner held her five-month-old daughter on one shoulder and a large diaper bag on the other. "What's going on?"

Sara cut straight to the point. "Do I look bad?"

"You're half a foot taller than me and ten pounds lighter. Do you really want to make me answer that question?"

"Fair enough." Sara held out her hands for Emma. "May I?"

Faith kept the baby on her shoulder. "Trust me, you don't want to be anywhere near this thing. I'm going to have to slap a hazmat sticker on her diaper."

The smell was pungent, but Sara took the baby anyway. It was a nice change to hold a healthy child in her arms. "I guess you're here to see Amanda?" Sara's husband had been a cop. She'd learned the rules long ago. If one of them was in the hospital, they were all in the hospital. "You just missed Will."

"I'm surprised he showed up. He hates this place." Faith took a diaper and some wipes out of her bag. "Do you know what happened to Amanda?"

"She fell on her wrist. She'll be in a cast for a while, but she's fine." Sara laid Emma down on the bed. Faith probably assumed Sara was working a shift. This was one of the problems with Will's myriad secrets—Sara found herself keeping them on his behalf. There was no way to tell Faith what had happened to Amanda without revealing why Sara had been there.

"Right on schedule." Faith indicated a group of older women who were clustered at the nurses' station. Except for a striking African American woman wearing a pink scarf around her neck, they were all dressed in monochromatic pantsuits and sporting the same short haircuts and ramrod-straight spines. "The good old gals," Faith explained. "Mom and Roz are already in with Amanda. I'm sure they'll be spinning war stories until the crack of dawn."

Sara wiped down Emma. The baby squirmed. Sara tickled her stomach. "How's it going with your mom in the house?"

"You mean do I want to strangle her yet?" Faith sat down on the stool. "I get maybe ten minutes, tops, every morning before Emma wakes up and I have to get her fed and ready and then get myself fed and ready and then my whole day starts and I'm at work and the phone is ringing and I'm talking to idiots who are lying to me and it's not until the next morning when I get that ten minutes to myself again."

Faith paused, giving Sara a meaningful look. "Mom's up at five o'clock every morning. I hear her poking around downstairs and I smell coffee and eggs and then I go down to the kitchen and she's all cheery and chatty and wants to talk about what she's got planned for the day and what she saw on the news last night and do I want her to cook me something for breakfast and what do I want for supper and I swear to God, Sara, I'm going to end up killing her. I really am."

"I have a mother, too. I completely understand." Sara slid a new diaper under the baby. Emma's feet kicked up as she tried to turn over. "What are you doing while Will's working at the airport?"

"I thought you knew."

"Knew what?"

"Amanda assigned him to toilet duty so my days are free to take Mom to her physical therapy appointments." Faith shrugged. "You know it's not the first time Mom or Amanda's bent the rules for each other."

"Amanda's not punishing Will because of his hair?"

"What's wrong with his hair? It looks great."

Yet again, Will's ability to read women was pitch-perfect. "I don't understand that relationship."

"Amanda and Will? Or Will and the world?"

"Either. Both." Sara buttoned up the onesie. She stroked her fingers along Emma's face. The baby smiled, showing two tiny white specks where her first pair of teeth were breaking through the bottom gum. Emma's eyes tracked Sara's fingers as they waved back and forth. "She's starting to be a real person."

"She's been laughing at me a lot lately. I'm trying not to take it personally."

Sara put Emma on her shoulder. The baby's arm looped around her neck. "How long has Will been working for Amanda?"

"As far as I know, he's followed her around his whole career. Hostage negotiation. Narcotics. Special crimes."

"Is that normal to stay with one boss your entire career?"

"Not really. Cops are like cats. They'd rather change owners than change houses."

Sara couldn't imagine Will asking to be transferred along with Amanda. He seldom sang her praises, and for Amanda's part, she seemed to delight in torturing him. Then again, if Will had one overriding characteristic, it was his resistance to change. Which fact Sara should probably take as a warning.

"Okay, my turn for questions." Faith crossed her arms. "Here's the big one: when are you going to grab him by the short hairs and tell him to get a fucking divorce?"

Sara managed a smile. "It's very tempting."

"Then why don't you?"

"Because ultimatums never work. And I don't want to be the reason he leaves his wife."

"He wants to leave her."

Sara didn't state the obvious. If Will really wanted to be divorced, then he would be divorced.

Faith hissed air through her teeth. "You probably shouldn't take advice from a woman who's never been married and has one kid in college and another in diapers."

Sara laughed. "Don't sell yourself short."

"Well, it's not like the good guys are lining up to date a cop, and I'm certainly not attracted to the type of useless asshole who'd want to marry a female police officer."

Sara couldn't argue with her. Not many men possessed the temperament for dating a woman who could arrest them.

"Does Will talk to you?" Faith amended, "I mean, about himself. Has he told you anything?"

"Some." Sara felt unreasonably guilty, as if it was her own fault that Will was so closed off. "We just started seeing each other."

"I've got this long list of questions in my head," Faith admitted. "Like, what happened to his parents? Where did he go when he aged out of the system? How did he manage college? How did he get into the GBI?" She studied Sara, who just shrugged. "Statistically, kids in state care have an eighty percent chance of getting arrested before they turn twenty-one. Sixty percent of them end up staying inside."

"Sounds about right." Sara had seen this scenario play out again and again with her kids in the ER. One day she was treating them for an earache, the next they were handcuffed to a gurney awaiting transport to jail. Will's transcendence of this soul-killing pattern was one of the things that she most admired about him. He had succeeded despite the odds.

Which Sara was fairly certain Will would not want her discussing with Faith. She changed the subject. "Are you working this Ashleigh Snyder case?"

"I wish," Faith said. "Though I don't see there's much hope. It hasn't broken on the news yet, but she's been missing for a while, and those so-called friends of hers who're hogging the camera have no idea."

"How long?"

"Since before spring break."

"That was last week." The ER had seen a resulting spike in alcohol poisoning and drug-induced psychosis. "No one noticed she was gone?"

"Her parents thought she went to the Redneck Riviera, her friends thought she was with her parents. Her roommate waited two days to report her missing. She thought Ashleigh had met a guy and didn't want to get her in trouble."

"So there's no chance she's faking it?"

"There was a lot of blood in her bedroom—on the pillow, the carpet."

"The roommate didn't think that was odd?"

"My son's that age. They're professionally obtuse. I doubt a spaceship landing on his forehead would strike him as odd." Faith returned to their earlier conversation. "Can you look at Will's medical records?"

Sara felt caught out by the question.

Faith added, "His juvenile files are sealed—trust me, I've tried—but there has to be something at Grady from when he was a kid."

A deep blush worked its way up Sara's chest and face. She'd actually considered this once, but common sense had won out. "It's illegal for me to access anyone's records without their permission. Besides—"

Sara stopped talking. She wasn't being completely honest. She'd made it as far as the records department. One of the secretaries had pulled Will's patient chart. Sara hadn't touched the file, but the name on the label listed him as Wilbur Trent. Will's license gave his legal name as William Trent. Sara had seen it the other night when he'd opened his wallet to pay for dinner.

So why had Amanda called him Wilbur?

"Hello?" Faith snapped her fingers. "You in there?"

"Sorry. I zoned out." Sara shifted Emma onto her other shoulder. "I'm just ..." She tried to remember what they'd been talking about. "I'm not going to spy on him." That, at least, was the truth. Sara wanted to know about Will because they were lovers, not because she was writing a salacious exposé. "He'll tell me when he's ready."

"Good luck with that," Faith said. "Meanwhile, if you find out anything good, let me know."

Sara chewed her lip as she stared at Faith. The overwhelming urge to strike a bargain started to well up from deep inside. Amanda showing up at the children's home. The hammer. Will's unexplained anger. His sudden desire to be alone.

Faith was whip-smart. She'd worked as a homicide detective on the Atlanta police force before becoming a special agent with the GBI. She'd been Will's partner for two years. Faith's mother was one of Amanda's oldest friends. If Sara shared what had happened at the children's home tonight, maybe Faith could help Sara put together the clues.

And then Will really would be lost to her forever.

"Faith," Sara began. "I'm glad we're friends. I like you a lot. But I can't talk about Will behind his back. He has to always know I'm on his side."

She took it better than Sara expected. "You're far too healthy to be in a relationship with a cop. Especially Will."

The thought occurred to Sara that they might not even be in a relationship anymore, but she said, "Thank you for understanding."

Faith waved to an older woman who was standing at the nurses' station. No pantsuit—she was dressed in jeans and a flowery blouse—but there was the unmistakable air of a police officer about her. It was the way she looked around the room, noting the good guys, singling out the possible bad ones. The woman waved at Faith, checked the patient board, then escorted herself toward Amanda's room.

"She trained with Mossad after 9/11," Faith provided. "Two kids. Three grandkids. Divorced five times. Twice from the same man. And did it all without ever wearing a pantsuit." Faith sounded reverential. "She's my role model."

Sara cradled Emma so she could look at her face. There was a soft, powdery scent coming off her, a mixture of baby wipes and sweat. "Your mom's a pretty good role model, too."

"We're too different." Faith shrugged. "Mom's quiet, methodical, always in charge, and I'm 'oh my God, we're all going to die.' "

The evaluation was strange coming from a woman who kept a loaded shotgun in the trunk of her car. Sara said, "I feel safe knowing you're with Will." Faith would never know what kind of compliment Sara had paid her. "You're pretty good under fire."

"Once I stop freaking out." She pointed toward Amanda's room. "You could blow up a bomb right now and as soon as the dust cleared, all of them would still be right there, guns drawn, ready to fight the bad guys."

Sara had seen Amanda in some tough situations. She didn't doubt it one bit.

"Mom told me when they joined up, the first question on the polygraph was about their sex lives. Were they virgins? If not, how many men had they been with—was it more than one? Was it less than three?"

"Is that legal?"

"Anything's legal if you can get away with it." She grinned. "They asked mom if she was joining the force so she could have sex with policemen. She told them it depended on what the policeman looked like."

Sara asked, "What about Amanda?" The fall in the basement had her recalling her early days on the force. Maybe there was a reason. "Was she always a cop?"

"Far as I know."

"She never worked for children's services?"

Faith narrowed her eyes. Sara could practically see her detective's brain click on. "What are you getting at?"

Sara kept her attention on Emma. "I was just curious. Will hasn't told me much about her."

"He wouldn't," Faith said, as if she needed reminding. "I grew up with Amanda. She dated my uncle for years, but the idiot never asked her to marry him."

"She never got married? Had kids?"

"She can't have children. I know she tried, but it wasn't in the cards."

Sara kept her gaze on Emma. There was one thing she shared with Amanda Wagner. It wasn't the kind of club you bragged about belonging to.

Faith said, "Can you imagine her as a mother? You'd be better off with Casey Anthony."

Emma hiccupped. Sara rubbed her tummy. She smiled at Faith, wishing—longing—to talk to her, but knowing she could not. Sara had not felt this cut off in a long while.

Of course, she could always call her mother, but Sara wasn't up for a lecture about right and wrong, especially because Sara could clearly see the difference, which made her less the subject of a torrid love affair and more like a woman who had resigned herself to being a doormat. Because that was exactly what Cathy Linton would say: why are you giving a man everything when he won't or can't give you anything in return?

Faith asked, "Was that you or Emma?"

Sara realized she'd grunted. "Me. I just figured out my mother was right about something."

"God, I hate when that happens." Faith sat up straight. "Speaking of ..."

Evelyn Mitchell was standing by the nurses' station. The woman was cut from the same cloth as her friends: matching pantsuit, trim figure, perfect posture even though she couldn't stand without crutches. She was obviously looking for her daughter.

Faith reluctantly stood. "Duty calls." Her feet dragged the floor as she headed toward the nurses' station.

Sara held up Emma and touched her nose to the baby's. Emma showed both rows of gums, squealing in delight. If there was any question about how good a mother Faith Mitchell was, one need only look at her happy baby. Sara kissed Emma's cheeks. The little girl giggled. A few more kisses and she started snorting. Her feet kicked in the air. Sara kissed her again.

"His what?" Faith shouted.

Her voice echoed through the ER. Both mother and daughter stared openly at Sara. From this distance, they could've been twins. Both around the same weight and height. Both with blonde hair and a familiar set to their shoulders. Faith's expression was troubled, and Evelyn's was as inscrutable as usual. The older woman said something, and Faith nodded before heading toward Sara.

"Sorry." Faith held out her hands for Emma. "I need to go."

Sara passed her the baby. "Is everything okay?"

"I don't know."

"Is it Ashleigh Snyder?"

"No. Yes." Faith's mouth opened again, then closed. Obviously, there was something wrong. Faith didn't shock easily, and Evelyn Mitchell wasn't one to casually dole out information.

Sara said, "Faith, you're scaring me. Is Will all right?"

"I don't—" She stopped herself. "I can't—" Again, she stopped. Her lips pressed together in a thin white line. Finally, she said, "You were right, Sara. Some things we have to keep separate."

For the second time that night, a person keeping a secret turned their back on Sara and walked away.

July 11, 1975

FRIDAY

Amanda scanned through her women's studies textbook, marking the paragraphs she needed to know for her evening class. She was sitting in the passenger's seat of Kyle Peterson's Plymouth Fury. The police radio was turned down low, but her ear had been trained long ago to tune out anything but the pertinent calls. She turned the page and started to read the next section.

To understand the far-reaching effects of the sex/gender system, one must first deconstruct the phallic hypothesis in relation to the unconscious.

"Brother." Amanda sighed. Whatever the hell that meant.

The car shook as Peterson turned over in the back seat. Amanda studied his reflection in the visor mirror, willing him not to wake. She'd already wasted nearly an hour this morning slapping away his hands, then another half hour had been consumed with apologies so that he would stop sulking. Thank God the flask in his pocket had been full enough to knock him out or Amanda would've never found time to read her assignment.

Not that she understood a word of it. Some of the passages were downright obscene. If these women were so eager to find out how their vaginas worked, they should start shaving their legs and find themselves husbands.

The radio clicked. Amanda heard the in-and-out of a man's voice. There were pockets all over the city where the radios had little or no reception, but that wasn't the problem. A black officer was calling for backup, which meant the white officers were blocking the transmission by clicking the buttons on their mics. In the next hour, a white officer would call for help and the blacks would do the same.

And then someone with the Atlanta Journal or Constitution would write an article wondering why there had been a recent spike in crime.

Amanda checked on Peterson again. He'd started snoring. His mouth gaped open beneath his shaggy, untrimmed mustache.

She read the next paragraph, then promptly forgot everything it said. Her eyes blurred from exhaustion. Or maybe it was irritation. If she never read the words "gynecocratic" and "patriarchy" again, it would be too soon. Send Gloria Steinem into Techwood Homes and see if she still thought women could run the world.

Techwood.

Amanda felt the panic rising up like bile. The pimp's hand around her throat. The feel of his erection pressing against her. The scrape of his fingernails as he tried to pull down her hose.

She gritted her teeth, willing her heart to settle. Deep breaths. In and out. Slow. "One ... two ... three ..." She whispered off the seconds. Minutes passed before she was able to unclench her jaw and breathe normally again.

Amanda had not seen Evelyn Mitchell in the four days since the awful ordeal. The other woman hadn't shown up for roll call. Her name wasn't on the roster. Even Vanessa couldn't find her. Amanda found herself hoping that Evelyn had come to her senses and gone back home to take care of her family. It was hard enough for Amanda to force herself out of bed every morning. She couldn't imagine the dread she'd feel leaving her family, knowing the sort of world into which she was thrusting herself.

But then, Evelyn wasn't the only officer who'd disappeared. The new sergeant, Luther Hodge, had been summarily transferred. His replacement was a white man named Hoyt Woody. He was from North Georgia, and his thick hill accent was made all the more unintelligible by the toothpick he kept in his mouth at all times. The tensions around the squad were still there, but they were the usual kind. Everyone was more comfortable with a known entity.

At least Hodge's disappearance wasn't into thin air. Vanessa had made more phone calls, which revealed the sergeant had been transferred to one of the Model City precincts. Not only was it a downward move, it took him out of Amanda's circle. Unfortunately, she hadn't the nerve to go to Hodge's new station and ask him why they'd been sent to Techwood Homes on such a fool's errand.

Not that Amanda wasn't capable of other useless errands. The last few days had been a test of her two warring sides. She longed to put the whole Techwood ordeal behind her, but her curiosity would not let it go. Her sleepless nights were not just filled with fear. They were filled with questions.

Amanda wanted to think that her cop's curiosity had been piqued, but the honest truth was that she was coasting on nothing more than woman's intuition. The whore who was living in Kitty Treadwell's apartment had put the bug in Amanda's ear. Something wasn't right there. She could feel it in her bones.

Which is why Amanda had done some poking around that had exacerbated her already frayed nerves. Stupid poking around that would probably get back to her father and land her in hot water not just with Duke, but with the higher-ups in the police force.

Amanda closed her textbook. And she especially hadn't the stomach to read Phyllis Schlafly's rebuttal to the Equal Rights Amendment. Amanda was sick and tired of being told how to live her life by women who never had to write their own rent checks.

"What's the skinny?"

Amanda jumped so hard she nearly slammed her book into her face. She shushed Evelyn Mitchell, then turned around to check on Peterson.

"Sorry," Evelyn whispered. She put her hand on the door handle, but Amanda slammed down the lock. Evelyn stood outside the car, unmoved. "You know the window is down, right?"

Behind her, Vanessa Livingston giggled.

Reluctantly, Amanda unlocked the door and got out of the car. She whispered, "What do you want?"

Evelyn whispered back, "We're trading. You for Nessa."

"No way." The brass wouldn't care, but Amanda had no intention of ever partnering with Evelyn Mitchell again. She started to get back into the car. Evelyn caught her arm, and Vanessa squeezed past, slipping into the seat and carefully latching the door.

Amanda stood in the empty parking lot, wanting to slap them both.

Evelyn told Vanessa, "We'll be back in a few hours."

"Take your time." Vanessa checked Peterson. "I don't think he's going anywhere."

Evelyn used her finger to swipe the side of her nose, à la Robert Redford in The Sting. Vanessa did the same.

"This is ridiculous," Amanda muttered, reaching into the car to retrieve her purse and textbook.

"Oh, cheer up," Evelyn said. "Maybe we'll find some mud for you to stick in."

Evelyn drove her Ford Falcon up North Avenue. The station wagon was now devoid of moving boxes and filled with various baby items. Except for the radio on the seat between them, there was nothing that would indicate a police officer drove this car. The vinyl seat felt sticky under Amanda's legs. As an only child with no cousins, she was seldom around children. Amanda could not help but think that Zeke Mitchell had secreted a vile substance onto the vinyl.

"Pretty day," Evelyn said.

She had to be joking. The noontime sun was so intense that Amanda's eyes were watering. She shielded her eyes from the glare.

Evelyn reached into her purse and slipped on a pair of Foster Grants. "I think I have another pair." She dug around in her bag.

"No, thank you." Amanda had seen the same glasses at Richway. They cost at least five dollars.

"Suit yourself." Evelyn zipped closed her purse. She drove like an old woman, slowing for yellow lights, letting anyone pass who showed the slightest desire. She kept one foot on the gas and one on the brake. By the time they pulled into the Varsity drive-in, Amanda was ready to grab the wheel and push her out of the car.

Evelyn mumbled, "Steady, Freddy." With great concentration, she angled the Falcon into a parking spot close to the North Avenue entrance. The brakes squealed as she pumped the pedal, inching up slowly until she felt the tires bump against the barrier. Finally, Evelyn shifted the gear into park. The engine knocked when she turned off the ignition. The car shook.

Evelyn turned in her seat, facing Amanda. "Well?"

"Why did you bring me here? I couldn't possibly eat."

"I think I prefer when you're not speaking to me."

"Your wish is my command," Amanda snapped back. But then she couldn't help herself. "You almost got me raped."

Evelyn leaned back against the door. "In my defense, both of us were going to be raped."

Amanda shook her head. The woman was incapable of taking anything seriously.

Evelyn said, "We made it through okay."

"Spare me your positive energy."

Evelyn was silent. She turned back around. She kept her hands in her lap. Amanda stared straight ahead at the menu board. The words jumbled around senselessly. In her head, Amanda listed again all the things she had to do before she could go to sleep tonight. The more she thought about it, the harder the tasks seemed. She was too tired to do any of it. She was too tired to even be here.

"Damn, gal." Evelyn's voice was deep, an approximation of the pimp's baritone. "You a fine-lookin' woman."

Amanda gripped the textbook in her lap. "Stop it."

Evelyn, as usual, was oblivious. "You is fi-ine."

Amanda turned her head away, leaning her chin on her hand. "Please, be quiet."

"Gone get me some'a that hog tush."

"Oh, for God's sakes," Amanda sputtered. "He didn't say that!" Her lips were trembling, but for the first time in four days it wasn't because she was forcing back tears.

"Mmm-hmm," Evelyn goaded, moving her hips obscenely in the seat. "Fine-lookin' woman."

Amanda couldn't stop her lips from curving upward. And then, she was laughing. There was no controlling it, even if she tried. Her mouth opened wide. She felt a lessening of pressure not just from the sound, but from the release of air that had been trapped in her lungs like a poison. Evelyn was laughing, too, which seemed the funniest part of all. Before long, they were both doubled over in their seats, tears streaming down their faces.

"Afternoon, ladies." The carhop was at Evelyn's window. His hat was rakishly tilted to the side. He slapped a number card on their windshield and smiled at them both as if he was in on the joke. "What'll ya have?"

Amanda wiped tears from her eyes. For the first time in days, she was hungry. "Bring me a Glorified Steak and some strings. And a P.C."

Evelyn said, "I'll have the same. Add a fried pie."

"Wait," Amanda called him back. "I'll have a fried pie, too."

Evelyn was still chuckling when he left. "Oh, Lord." She sighed. She tilted the mirror and used the tip of her pinky finger to fix her eyeliner. "Lord," she repeated. "I haven't been able to even think about eating since ..." She didn't have to finish the sentence. Neither of them would have to finish that sentence ever again.

Amanda asked, "What did your husband say?"

"There are some things I don't share with Bill. He likes to think I'm Agent 99, hiding safely behind the scenes while Max Smart does all the real work." She gave a short laugh. "It's not too off the mark. You know, they never even say her name on that dumb show. She's just a number."

Amanda didn't respond. It sounded like a chapter in her women's studies book.

Evelyn waited a beat. "What did your father say?"

"I wouldn't be here if I'd told him." Amanda picked at the edge of her book.

"Hodge got transferred to Model City."

"Where do you think I've been?"

Amanda felt her jaw drop. "They assigned you to Model City?"

"Hodge won't even talk to me. Every morning, first thing, I go into his office and I ask him what happened, who we ticked off, why he sent us to Techwood in the first place, and every day, he tells me to get the hell out of his office."

Amanda couldn't help but be impressed by the other woman's brashness. "You think you're being punished?" she asked. "That can't be true. The brass didn't move me. I was there, same as you."

Evelyn seemed to have an opinion on the matter, but she kept it to herself. "The boys took care of that pimp for us."

Amanda felt her heart go into her throat. "You didn't tell anyone?"

"No, of course not, but you don't have to be Columbo to figure it out—a pimp bleeding on the floor with his winky hanging out and both of us looking like we're about to have heart attacks."

She was right. At least Evelyn had saved them some face by managing to knock him out before the cavalry arrived.

"They let him out of jail long enough to get picked up again. Apparently, he resisted arrest. Up and down Ashby Street. Ended up in the hospital."

"Good. Maybe he learned his lesson."

"Maybe," Evelyn said, sounding doubtful. "He thought I'd just stand there while he raped you, waiting for my turn."

"He's probably done it hundreds of times before. You saw how Jane was with him. She was terrified."

Evelyn nodded slowly. "Dwayne Mathison. That's his name. He's been jammed up a couple of times for roughing up his girls. He runs mostly white women—tall blondes who used to be pretty. Goes by the name Juice."

"Like the football player?"

"Except one's a Heisman winner and the other likes to beat on women." Evelyn tapped her finger against the textbook in Amanda's lap. "This is surprising."

She covered the book with her hands, embarrassed. "It's a required course."

"Still, it's not a bad thing to know what's going on in other places."

Amanda shrugged. "It won't change anything."

"Don't you think it's kind of inevitable? Look at what happened to the coloreds." She indicated the restaurant. "Nipsey Russell used to be a curb man here, and now you can't turn on the TV without seeing his face."

This was true enough. Amanda didn't know which infuriated her father more, seeing Russell on every game show or finding Monica Kaufman, the new black anchor, on the Channel 2 news every evening.

Evelyn said, "Mayor Jackson's not doing such a bad job. Say what you will about Reggie, but the city hasn't burned down. Yet."

The carhop was back with their food. He hooked the tray through Evelyn's window. Amanda reached for her purse.

Evelyn said, "I've got this."

"I don't need you to—"

"Consider it buying your forgiveness."

"It's going to take more than that."

Evelyn counted out the dollar bills and left what seemed like a very generous tip. "What are you doing tomorrow?"

If her Saturday was like any other, Amanda would spend the day cleaning her father's house, then cleaning her own apartment, then while away the evening with Mary Tyler Moore, Bob Newhart, and Carol Burnett. "I hadn't thought about it."

Evelyn handed over her food. "Why don't you come to my house? We're having a barbecue."

"I'll have to check my schedule," Amanda managed, though she didn't think her father would approve. She was actually worried that he'd heard something. Without prompting, he'd seen fit to warn her off Evelyn Mitchell every morning this week. "Thank you for the invitation, though."

Evelyn said, "Well, let me know. I'd love for you to meet Bill. He's just—" Her voice took on a dreamy quality. "He's just the best. I know you'd like him."

Amanda nodded, unsure of what to say.

"You date much?"

"All the time," she joked. "Men just love it when they find out you're a cop." They loved it as they ran screaming for the door. "I'm too busy to date right now, anyway. I'm trying to finish my degree. There's just a lot going on."

Evelyn obviously saw right through her. "Working around jerks like Peterson all day, you forget what a nice, normal guy is like." She paused. "There are some good ones out there. Don't let the Neanderthals get you down."

"Mm-hm." Amanda put a french fry in her mouth, then another, until Evelyn did the same.

They both ate in silence, sticking their cups on the dashboard, balancing the paper containers in their laps. For Amanda's part, the greasy french fries and hamburger were exactly what she needed. The iced chocolate milk was as sweet as a dessert, but she ate the fried pie anyway. By the time she was through, she felt slightly nauseated again, but this time it was overindulgence rather than fear turning her stomach.

Evelyn transferred their empty containers back to the window tray. She put her hand to her stomach and groaned. "Mamma mia, that's a spicy meatball."

"I put a new bottle of Alka-Seltzer in my purse this morning."

Evelyn waved over the carhop and ordered two cups of water. "I'm beginning to think you and I are a bad influence on each other."

Amanda's eyelids dipped into a lengthy blink. "This is the first time I've ever wanted to be in the car with Peterson so I could lay down and go to sleep."

"You'd wake up with him on top of you." Evelyn tugged at the back of her hair. She was silent a few seconds, then asked, "Say, why do you think Hodge sent us to Techwood?"

Not for the first time, Amanda felt the danger behind her question. It was clear that someone very high up was pulling strings. Both Evelyn and Hodge had been transferred. There was no telling what would happen to Amanda, especially if anyone found out what she'd been doing.

Evelyn prodded, "Come on, girl. I know you've been thinking about it."

"Well." Amanda tried to make herself stop there, but she continued, "The guy in the blue suit bothers me. And not just because he's a lawyer."

"I know what you mean," Evelyn agreed. "He walked into the station like he owned it. He yelled at Hodge. You don't get to do that to a cop, even if you're white and in a fancy blue suit."

"Hodge called him by name. That's what he said during roll call: 'Mr. Treadwell, we can talk in my office.' "

"And then they went into the office, and Treadwell started ordering him around right off the bat."

"Evelyn, you're missing the point. Think about what you told me before. Andrew Treadwell, Sr., has friends in high places. He had his picture in the paper with Mayor Jackson. He worked on the campaign. Why would he reach out to a lowly sergeant with no pull who's only been in charge for less than an hour?"

She nodded. "Okay. You're right. Keep going."

"Treadwell-Price specializes in construction law. Andrew Senior is negotiating all those contracts for the new subway system nobody wants."

"How'd you hear that?"

"I went down to the newspaper and looked through some of the back issues."

"They let you do that?"

Amanda shrugged. "My dad worked on that kidnapping case last year." An editor from the paper had been held for a million-dollar ransom. One of Duke's last official duties was transporting the money from the C&S vault to the drop location. "I told them who I was and they let me look through the archives."

"Your father doesn't know you were there?"

"Of course not." Duke would've been livid that Amanda hadn't cleared it with him first. "He'd ask me what I was up to. I didn't want to open that can of worms."

"Phew." Evelyn leaned her head back against the seat. "What you found out is certainly interesting. Anything else?"

Amanda hesitated again.

"Come on, darlin'. You can't be a little pregnant."

Amanda sighed to make her reluctance known. She had a sneaking suspicion she was just stirring up trouble. "The man who was talking to Hodge isn't Treadwell Junior. According to the newspaper, Treadwell Senior has one child, a daughter."

Evelyn sat up again. "Named Kitty? Or Katherine? Kate?"

"Eugenia Louise, and she's at some girls' school in Switzerland."

"So, not shooting up Boy at Techwood."

"Boy?"

"It's what Negroes call heroin. Thank you." The carhop was back with their water. Amanda unscrewed the cap from the bottle of Alka-Seltzer and dropped two tablets into each cup. The fizzing was a welcome sound.

Evelyn said, "So, there's no Treadwell Junior. I wonder who the man in the blue suit was? And why Hodge thought he was Treadwell?" Evelyn smiled. "I'm sure Hodge thinks we all look alike."

Amanda smiled, too. "Blue Suit has to be a lawyer. Maybe he's from the firm and Hodge just assumed his name was Treadwell. But that doesn't make sense, either. We've already established Andrew Treadwell wouldn't send his minion to talk to a brand-new zone captain. He'd go straight to the mayor. The more delicate the situation, the more likely he'd be to let as few people know as possible.”

Evelyn made the obvious connection. “Which means either Blue Suit was taking initiative to help the boss or he was looking to make trouble.”

Amanda wasn’t so sure about that, but she said, “Either way, Hodge wasn’t telling him what he wanted to hear. Blue Suit was angry when he left. He yelled at Hodge, then stormed out of the building.”

Evelyn circled back to her earlier theory. “Blue Suit pressured Hodge to send us out to check on Kitty Treadwell. Treadwell isn’t a common name. She has to somehow be related to Andrew Treadwell.”

“I couldn’t find a connection in the newspapers, but they don’t keep all the back issues and they’re a bear to search through.”

“Treadwell-Price is in that new office building off Forsyth Street. We could sit outside during lunch. These guys don’t brown-bag it. Blue Suit will have to come out sooner or later.”

“And then what?”

“We show him our badges and ask him some questions.”

Amanda didn’t see that working. The man would probably laugh in their faces. “What if it gets back to Hodge that you’re snooping around?”

“I don’t think he cares so long as I stay out of his office and stop asking him questions. What about your new sergeant?”

“He’s one of the old guard, but he barely knows my name.”

“Probably drunk before lunchtime,” Evelyn said. She was likely correct. Once the older sergeants got past their morning duties, you were hard-pressed to find one behind his desk. There was a reason half the force could be found napping during shift. “We can get together Monday after roll call. They don’t care what we do so long as we’re on the streets. Nessa’s okay with Peterson.”

Amanda was slightly worried about how good Vanessa was being with Peterson, but she let it slide. “Jane wasn’t the only girl living in that apartment. There were at least two others.”

“How do you get that?”

“There were three toothbrushes in the bathroom. All of them well used.”

“Jane didn’t have that many teeth.”

Amanda stared into the fizzing seltzer. Her stomach was too full to laugh at Evelyn’s jokes. “Half of me thinks I’m crazy for wasting so much time tracking down a story off a junkie prostitute.”

Evelyn sounded apologetic. “You’re not the only one who’s been wasting time.”

Amanda narrowed her eyes at the other woman. “I knew it. What’ve you been up to?”

“I talked with a friend I know at the Five. Cindy Murray. She’s a good girl. I described Jane to her. Cindy says maybe she remembers her coming in last week. Lots of girls try to pick up vouchers that don’t belong to them. They have to show two forms of ID—a license, a blood donor card, electric bill, something with their picture and address on it. If Jane is the girl Cindy was thinking of, she tried to pass herself off with someone else’s license. When Jane saw the jig was up, she went bonkers. Started screaming and making threats. Security had to throw her out into the street.”

“What happened to the license?”

"They toss 'em into a box, wait to see if anyone tries to claim them. Cindy says there's at least a hundred licenses already. They tear them in half and throw them away at the end of every year."

"Are the welfare rolls organized by names or by addresses?"

"Numbers, unfortunately. Too many of them have the same last name or live at the same address, so they all get assigned an individual number."

"Social security number?"

"No such luck."

"It's got to be on computers, right?"

"They're in the process of changing over from punch cards to magnetic tape," Evelyn answered. "Cindy says it's a mess. She's basically working with a hammer and chisel while the boys try to figure it out. Which means even if we had access to the information, which they probably won't give us, we'd have to do it all by hand: get the welfare roll number first, then cross-reference the number to the name, then verify the name against the address, then match both against the benefits logs that verify whether the girls have collected their vouchers in the last six months, which we could then use to compare to the names on the licenses." Evelyn stopped for a breath. "Cindy says we'll need a staff of fifty and about twenty years."

"How long until the computers are up and running?"

"I don't think it would matter." Evelyn shrugged. "They're computers, not magic beans. We'd still have to do most of it by hand. Assuming they'd give us access. Does your father know anyone down at the Five?"

Duke would've taken a blowtorch to the Five if they let him. "It wouldn't matter. We can't even start the whole process until we find out Kitty Treadwell's roll number." Amanda tried to think this through. "Jane said three women were missing: Kitty Treadwell, Lucy, and Mary."

"I already checked missing persons in Zones Three and Four," Evelyn provided. "No Kitty Treadwell. No Jane Delray—which I thought I'd check on while I was there. What I did find were a dozen Lucys and about a hundred Marys. They never clean out their files. Some of these girls have died of old age by now. They've been missing since the Depression." She offered, "I can go to the other zones next week. Do you know Dr. Hanson?"

Amanda shook her head.

"Pete. Runs the morgue." She saw Amanda's expression. "No, he's a good guy. Kind of what you'd expect from a coroner, but very nice. I know a gal works for him, Deena Coolidge. She says he lets her do things sometimes."

"What things?"

Evelyn rolled her eyes. "Not what you're thinking. Lab things. Deena's real into that stuff. Likes chemistry. Pete's teaching her how to do the tests and some of the lab work on her own. She's going to Tech at night, too."

Amanda could guess why Dr. Hanson was letting her do these things, and it probably wasn't out of the kindness of his heart. "Did you check the DNF?"

"The what?"

The dead Negro file. Duke had told Amanda about the running list of unsolved black homicides. Amanda offered, "I'll check it."

"Check what?"

She changed the subject. "Do we know if the apartment is in Kitty's name?"

"Oh!" Evelyn seemed impressed. "That's a very good question." She grabbed one of the napkins off the dashboard and wrote herself a note. "I wonder if the number you get assigned for Section Eight housing is the same as the one they give you for collecting welfare vouchers? Do you know anyone at the Housing Authority?"

"Pam Canale." Amanda checked the time. "I need to study for my class tonight, but I can call her first thing Monday."

"You can tell me what you find out when we're staking out Mr. Blue Suit. Also —" She scribbled something else on the napkin. "Here's my number at home so you can let me know about tomorrow. The barbecue."

"Thank you." Amanda folded the napkin in two and stuck it in her purse. There was no lie she could tell Duke that could explain such a long absence. He was always calling her apartment to make sure she was home. If Amanda didn't pick up by the second ring, he hung up and drove over.

"You know," Evelyn began, "I read an article in the paper about this guy out West who's been killing college students."

"These girls aren't college students."

"Still, we've got three missing."

"This isn't Hollywood, Evelyn. There aren't serial killers lurking around Atlanta." Amanda changed the subject back to something more plausible. "I've been thinking about Kitty's apartment. There were three trash bags full of clothes in the bedroom. No woman can afford that many clothes, especially if she's living in the projects." Amanda felt her stomach rumble. She had forgotten about the paper cup in her hand. She downed the seltzer in one swallow and suppressed the resulting belch. "There was a lot of makeup in the bathroom, too. Way too much for one girl. Even a prostitute."

"Jane wasn't wearing any makeup. There was no smeared mascara under her eyes. I can't see her cleaning up with cold cream every night."

"There was cold cream in the bathroom," Amanda recalled, "but suffice it to say, no one was using it. There were used sanitary napkins in the trashcan, but a box of Tampax was on the shelf. So, obviously, someone was staying there who wasn't on the game. Maybe a little sister. Maybe even Kitty Treadwell."

Evelyn put the cup to her lips. "Why do you think that?"

"You can't wear Tampax if you're a virgin. So—"

Evelyn choked on the seltzer. The water spurted from her mouth and nose. She grabbed at the napkins on the dashboard, coughing so hard it sounded as if her lungs were trying to come out of her mouth.

Amanda patted her back. "Are you all right?"

She put her hand to her mouth and coughed again. "Sorry. Went down the wrong way." She coughed a third and fourth time. "What's that?"

Amanda looked out into the street. An Atlanta Police cruiser zoomed by, lights rolling, no siren. The next cruiser was the opposite: siren blaring, lights off.

"What on earth ...," Amanda began.

Evelyn turned up the police radio. All they could hear was the usual chatter, followed by mics being clicked so that the speakers could not be heard. "Idiots," Evelyn mumbled, turning the volume back down. Another cruiser screeched by. "What could it be?"

Amanda was sitting up in her seat, straining to see what was happening. Then she realized there was an easier way. She tossed her paper cup out the window and pushed open the door. By the time she reached the sidewalk, another car zoomed past, this one a Plymouth Fury like her own.

Evelyn joined her on the sidewalk. "That was Rick and Butch." Homicide. "They're going to Techwood. All of them are going to Techwood."

Neither woman said what they were thinking. They headed toward the station wagon. Amanda edged Evelyn toward the passenger's side, saying, "I'll drive."

Evelyn didn't offer protest. She rode shotgun as Amanda backed up the car, then headed up North Avenue. They turned on Techwood Drive. A police cruiser blew past on Amanda's left as she turned onto Pine.

Evelyn grabbed the dashboard. "My Lord. Why are they in such a hurry?"

"We'll find out soon enough." Amanda pulled up onto the familiar berm. There were already five cruisers and two unmarked Plymouths. Today, no children were playing in the courtyard of Techwood Homes, though their parents had finally made an appearance. Shirtless men in tight jeans stood with cans of beer in their hands. Most of the women were just as scantily clad, but a few looked as if they'd just returned home from office work. Amanda checked her watch. It was past one o'clock. Maybe they'd come home for lunch.

"Amanda." Evelyn's tone held a low tremor. She followed the other woman's gaze to the second apartment block on the left. A group of patrolmen were clustered outside the door. Butch Bonnie pushed past them as he ran out into the courtyard. He fell to his knees and spewed vomit onto the ground.

"Oh, no." Amanda searched in her bag for a tissue. "We can get some water from—"

Evelyn stopped her with a firm hand. "Stay exactly where you are."

"But he—"

"I mean it," she said, her voice taking on a tenor Amanda had not heard before.

Rick Landry exited the building next. He used his handkerchief to wipe his mouth, then tucked it into his back pocket. Had his partner still not been vocally ill, Landry probably would've never noticed Amanda and Evelyn. As it was, he walked right over to them.

"What the hell are you broads doing here?"

Amanda opened her mouth, but Evelyn beat her to a response. "We had a case here earlier this week. Top floor. Apartment C. Prostitute named Jane Delray."

Landry stuck his tongue into his cheek as he stared first at Evelyn, then Amanda. "And?"

"And, obviously something happened here."

"It's Techwood, darlin'. Something happens here all the time."

"Top floor?" Evelyn asked. "Apartment C?"

"Wrong and wrong," Landry said. "Behind the building. Suicide. Jumped off the roof and went splat."

"Fuck!" Butch Bonnie gave a heave that rivaled the sound of a pig rutting in the wild. Landry's gaze faltered. He didn't quite look back at his partner, but he wouldn't look at Evelyn or Amanda, either.

"You." Landry motioned over one of the uniformed patrolmen. "Get all these people outta here. Looks like we're filming a damn Tarzan movie." The cop rushed to disperse the group of onlookers. There were yells and protests.

Evelyn said, "Maybe someone saw—"

"Saw what?" Landry interrupted. "They probably didn't even know her. But, give 'em another minute, they'll all be wailin' and howlin' and flappin' their gums about what a tragedy it is." He shot Evelyn a look. "You should know better than that, Mitchell. Never let 'em crowd up. They get too emotional and pretty soon you're callin' in SWAT to thin 'em out."

Evelyn spoke so quietly that Amanda could barely hear her. "We'd like to see the body."

"We what?" Amanda's voice trilled around the words.

Landry grinned. "Looks like Ethel ain't up for this, Lucy."

Evelyn didn't back down. She cleared her throat. "We're working a case, Landry. Same as you."

"Same as me?" he echoed, incredulous. He glanced back at Butch, who was sitting back on his heels, chest heaving. Amanda could see the glint of the revolver he kept on his ankle. "You girls need to toddle on back and—"

"She's right." Amanda heard the words clear as a bell. They were spoken in her own voice. They had come out of her own mouth.

Evelyn seemed just as surprised as Amanda.

"We're working a case," Amanda told him. That was exactly what they were doing. They'd just spent the last half hour in the car talking it through. Something was going on with these women—Kitty, Lucy, Mary, and now possibly Jane Delray. Right now, Amanda and Evelyn were the only two officers on the entire force who even knew—or apparently cared—that they were missing.

Landry lit a cigarette. He let out a stream of smoke. "Same as me, huh?" he repeated, but this time he was laughing. "You skirts working homicide now?"

Evelyn shot back, "You just said it was a suicide. What are you doing here?"

He didn't like that. "You want some balls, Mitchell, you can always suck on mine."

Amanda looked down at the ground so her expression wouldn't give her away.

"I'm fine with my husband's, thank you." Evelyn reached into her purse and pulled out her Kel-Lite. "We're ready when you are."

Landry ignored her, telling Amanda, "Come on, gal. This ain't no place for you. That body's a mess. Guts all over the place. Nasty stuff. Too nasty for a lady to handle." He tilted his chin toward Butch, not stating the obvious. "Go on, get back in your car and scoot off. Nobody'll think nothin' about it."

Amanda felt her stomach start to unclench. He was giving them an out. A graceful exit. No one would know they had asked to see the body. They could leave with their heads held high. Amanda was about to take him up on the offer, but then Landry added, "God knows, I don't want your old man coming after me with his shotgun for scaring his baby girl."

There was an odd tingling in Amanda's spine. She felt as if every vertebra was locking into place. She spoke in a shockingly certain tone. "You said the victim is behind the building?"

Evelyn appeared just as surprised as Landry when Amanda started walking toward the apartment building. She kept pace with Amanda, whispering, "What are you doing?"

"Keep walking," Amanda begged her. "Please keep walking."

"Have you ever seen a dead body?"

"Never close up," Amanda admitted. "Unless you count my grandfather."

Evelyn muttered a curse. She spoke in a hoarse whisper. "Whatever you do, don't get sick. Don't scream. For God's sake, don't cry."

Amanda was ready to do all three and she hadn't even seen the body yet. What in the name of God was she thinking? Landry was right. If Butch Bonnie hadn't been able to handle it, there was no way in hell either of them would be able to.

"Listen to me," Evelyn ordered. "If you break, they'll never trust you again. You might as well join the typing pool. You might as well slit your wrists."

"I'm okay," she said, then because she knew Evelyn needed to hear it, she told her, "You're okay, too. You're absolutely okay."

Evelyn's heels kicked up dust as she walked beside Amanda. "I'm okay," she repeated. "You're right. I'm okay."

"We're both okay." So much sweat was dripping down Amanda's back that it was pooling into her underwear. She was glad she was wearing a black skirt. She was glad she had taken that Alka-Seltzer. She was very glad that she wasn't alone as she walked into the dark building.

The vestibule was cast in more shadow than Amanda remembered. She glanced up the stairwell. One of the panes in the skylight had been broken. A piece of wood was nailed in its place. They both stopped at the metal exit door at the end of the hall, waiting for Landry.

He put his hand on the door but didn't open it. "Lookit, girls, playtime is over. Go back to taking reports on poor little sluts got mixed up with the wrong fella and cried wolf."

"We're working a case," Evelyn told him. "It might have something to do with —"

"Whore took a long walk off a short plank. You seen this dump. I'm surprised everybody here don't jump off the roof."

"We still—"

He said, "Just turn around and walk back. This has gone far enough."

"I was—"

"Stop!" Landry banged his fist against the door. "Just shut your fucking mouth!" he shouted. "I told you to leave and you'd better goddamn leave."

Evelyn was visibly startled, but she tried, "We just—"

"You want me to make you?" He snatched the Kel-Lite out of Evelyn's hand and jabbed it into her chest. "You like that?" He jabbed her again, then again, until her back was to the wall. "Not so mouthy now, are you?"

Amanda tried, "Rick—"

"Shut up!" There was a flash of white skin as he jammed the flashlight up Evelyn's skirt and pressed it between her legs. He warned, "Unless you want that for real, you better do as I damn well say. You hear me?"

Evelyn didn't speak. She could only nod. Her hands shook as they went up in surrender.

"Don't fuck around with me," Landry warned. "You got that?"

"She's sorry," Amanda said. "We're both sorry. Rick, please. We're sorry."

Slowly, he pulled the flashlight out from under Evelyn's skirt. With one hand, he flipped it around and held out the handle to Amanda. He told her, "Get her the hell out of here.”

Which is exactly what Amanda did.

Present Day

MONDAY

The cabdriver gave Will a dubious look as he stopped in front of 316 Carver Street. "You sure this is the place, man?"

"I'm sure." Will checked the meter and handed him a ten. "Keep the change."

The guy seemed reluctant to take the money. "I know you're a cop and all, but that don't make much matter after dark. You feel me?"

Will opened the door. "I appreciate the warning."

"You sure you don't want me to wait?"

"No, but thank you." Will got out of the car. Still, the man dawdled. It wasn't until Will walked toward the side of the building that the cab slowly pulled away.

Will watched the taillights disappear down the street. Then he turned and picked his way past the tall weeds and brambles as he headed to the rear of the children's home. Between the moon and the streetlights, he had a pretty clear path to the back of the house. He stepped around syringes and condoms, broken glass and piles of trash.

He remembered Sara's earlier warning about all the dangers inside the house. She'd been full of observations tonight. And pretty pissed off. Will couldn't blame her. He was pretty pissed off himself. He was actually furious.

Hell, he was still furious.

Will's fists clenched as he rounded the house. He knew he was in an almost delirious state of denial about what was really bothering him. His father out of prison. That monster breathing free air. Will pushed this back down, just as he'd been pushing it down since he first found out.

The entire time Sara was stitching up his ankle, the only thing Will could think about was going into Amanda's hospital room and beating the truth out of her. Why did the parole board let his father out of prison? Why did Amanda find out before Will? What else was she hiding from him?

She had to be hiding something. She always hid something.

And she would die before she let Will in on it. She was tougher than any man Will had ever known. She wasn't exactly a liar, but she did things with the truth that made you think you were losing your mind. Will had given up on trying to be direct with Amanda a long time ago. Fifteen years of studying her personality had revealed nothing but the fact that she lived for subtleties and riddles. She delighted in tricking him. For every question Will had, she'd have another question, and pretty soon they'd be talking about things that would probably make him wish he hadn't gotten out of bed this morning. Or this year. Or ever in his life.

Why was she at the children's home tonight? What was she looking for? How much did she know about his father?

Will could already guess Amanda's answers. She was out for an evening drive. Who didn't enjoy a leisurely romp through the ghetto when they were supposed to be working a kidnapping case? She saw Will and Sara inside the house and wondered why they were there. Is it wrong to be curious? Of course she knew about his father. She was his boss. It was her job to know everything about Will.

Except for one thing. The old broad had knocked her head hard enough to lose her legendary control.

"I told Edna to shore up these steps a million times."

Edna, as in Mrs. Edna Flannigan.

Amanda was in the middle of a high-profile case. The press was all over her. The director of the GBI was probably breathing down her neck. Yet, she'd stopped everything, grabbed a hammer, and headed here. There was only one way to get an honest answer about what she'd been up to, and Will was going to tear apart the children's home with his bare hands if that's what it took to find it. And then he was going to throw it right back into Amanda's face.

He stared at the back of the house. There had been a deck here at one time, but now there was only a gaping hole where a basement window used to be. The paramedics hadn't been able to take Amanda out through the interior doorway. Instead, they'd kicked out the plywood covering the basement windows and chipped away the brick to enlarge one of the openings.

Will looked up at the streetlight. Moths fluttered around, creating a strobe. He looked back at the window opening.

In retrospect, there were better ways to do this. Will could've asked the cabdriver to drop him at home, which was less than a mile away. There were lots of tools in Will's garage. Two sledgehammers, several pry bars, even a jackhammer he'd picked up secondhand at the Habitat Store. They were all well worn and well used. Will had bought his house for back taxes on the courthouse steps. It had taken him three years and every spare dime to turn it back into a home.

The hardest part was convincing the drug addicts that the house was under new ownership. The first six months, Will had to sleep with his shotgun beside his sleeping bag. When he wasn't tearing down walls and soldering copper pipe, he was going to the door and telling whoever had knocked that they would have to find somewhere else to smoke crack.

Which was actually good preparation for what Will was about to do.

He climbed in through the opening. The strobing streetlight illuminated most of the basement. Will used his cell phone to supplement its reach, picking his way past the broken stairs. Amanda Wagner was the very definition of preparedness. Will couldn't imagine her going into the dark basement without her Maglite. He spotted the familiar metallic blue casing over by a set of empty shelves. He pressed the button. The flashlight was small enough to fit in his pocket, but the LCDs glowed like a headlamp on an old Chevy.

Will hadn't exactly been honest with Sara. He'd spent his fair share of time down in the basement with Angie. Of course, he hadn't been on his elbows and toes taking measurements, but his memory of the place had somehow reduced it to a shoebox when in fact it was as large as the upper floors.

Will ran his hand along the exterior walls. Smooth plaster was interrupted every sixteen inches by bumps from the studs underneath. A dividing wall split the center of the room. This construction was newer. The Sheetrock was edged with black mold. Chunks were missing at the bottom. Pairs of oddly spaced, yellow pine two-by-fours showed at the base like legs below a petticoat.

There was a small room in the back with a sink and toilet, probably for the help. The walls were exposed lumber with knotty pine paneling on the outside. Will checked behind the fixtures. With his foot, he kicked apart the P-trap under the sink. Nothing was in the drain.

He took off the lid on the toilet tank and found it empty. The bowl was filled with black water. He glanced around for something to search with other than his hand. The old knob-and-tube wiring hung limply from the joists. He pulled out a long section, folded it in lengths until it was stiff enough, and checked the bowl. Other than a noxious odor, there was nothing.

Overhead, the flashlight picked up spiderwebs and termite damage in the floor joists as he walked around the room. The wooden storage shelves were empty. The coal chute was filled with black dust along with a couple of syringes and a used condom. He used the Maglite to examine the flue. Bird droppings. Scratches. An animal had been trapped inside at some point. Will closed the metal door and twisted the handle to lock it into place.

He took off his suit jacket and hung it from a nail in one of the joists. His Glock stayed on his belt where it was handy. He found Amanda's hammer by the stairs. It had never been used. The price tag was still on. Midtown Hardware. Forty bucks.

Will slipped the Maglite into his back pocket. The streetlight was enough for now. He studied the hammer. Forged blue steel with a smooth face and nylon end cap. Shock-reduction grip. It was a bricklayer's tool, not something a framer would use. Will assumed Amanda had bought it for form, not function. Or maybe she'd picked it off the shelf because the blue matched her flashlight. Either way, there was a well-balanced heft to the tool. The claw was sharp and busted cleanly through the plaster when Will slammed it into the exterior wall.

He pulled back the hammer and pounded it into the wall again, enlarging the hole. He punched out a chunk of plaster. It crumbled between his fingers. There was horsehair in the mix, tiny, silk strands that had held together the clay and limestone for almost a century.

Will chipped away a large enough section to reach his hand behind the lath. The wood was rotted, still wet from rain that had poured through the foundation. He should probably be wearing gloves and goggles, or at least a mask. There was undoubtedly mold behind the plaster, maybe fungus from dry rot. The odor inside the wall was dank, the way houses smelled when they were dying. Will used the claw hammer to pry away another chunk of plaster. Then another.

Slowly, he made his way around the perimeter of the basement, pulling down the plaster chunk by chunk, row by row. Then removing the lath, then brushing out the shredded newspapers that had been used for insulation, then moving on to the next section.

He gripped Amanda's Maglite between his teeth when the streetlight couldn't reach the darkest corners. A white powder permeated the air. His eyes watered from the grit. His nose started to run from the dust and mold. The work wasn't difficult, but it was tedious and repetitive, and the temperature of the basement seemed to rise with every step as Will worked his way around the room. He was sweating profusely by the time he pounded off the last chunk of plaster. Again, the lath came apart in his hand, like wet paper. He used the claw hammer to pull out the rotted wood. As he had done with every section thus far, Will shone the flashlight onto the bare opening.

Nothing.

He pressed his palm to the cold wall. There was only a thin layer of brick holding back the dirt around the foundation. Will had broken through some sections to check anyway, then stopped for fear he might cause a cave-in. He took his phone out of his pocket and looked at the time. Two minutes past midnight. He'd been doing this for three hours.

All for nothing.

Will pushed away from the wall. He coughed and spit out a wad of plaster.

Three hours.

No scribbled notes, no hidden passages. No severed hands or bags of magic beans. As far as he could tell, nothing had been disturbed inside the walls since the house had been built. The wood was so old he could see the hatch marks where the axes had hewn down the studs from larger trees.

Will coughed again. The dust would not clear in the airless room. He used the back of his hand to wipe sweat off his forehead. His muscles were aching from the constant hacking of the hammer. Still, he started on the dividing wall down the center of the room. In many ways, the Sheetrock was harder to take down than the plaster. The paper was damp, but the gypsum was soaked through. The wall came down in tiny pieces. The pink insulation was filled with crawling bugs Will tried not to get in his mouth and nose. The studs were rotting from the floor up.

Another forty minutes went by.

Again, there was nothing.

Which meant that the nagging question that had been bouncing around Will's brain for the last two hours probably had to be asked: Why hadn't he started out on the floor?

Amanda had bought a bricklayer's hammer. The basement floor was comprised entirely of paved brick. Will recognized the Chattahoochee Brick Company logo on some of the pieces. It was similar to the brick in his own home—fired from red Georgia clay in an Atlanta manufacturing plant that had been turned into loft apartments during the financial boom times.

Will gripped the hammer in his hand. He'd thought Amanda had bought it because it was blue. He could hear her grating voice in his head: I thought you were a detective.

Will hadn't exactly been tidy as he'd destroyed the basement. There wasn't an inch of floor that was clean. He put his back to the corner and looked out into the room. Without the wall down the center, it was easy to plan the grid pattern. Each brick was approximately eight by four inches. He could clear out five-by-nine rows, which would roughly be three-by-three-foot sections. In a fifteen-hundred-square-foot room, that would take approximately eleven billion years.

He kicked away debris with his foot, then got down on his knees to start on the first section. There was no pleasure in knowing that he'd devised a logical plan for tearing up the basement floor. Will swung the hammer in tight arcs, using the claw to pry up pieces of brick, squinting his eyes to keep out flying shards. Of course the brick didn't come up easily. It was too late for easy. The clay was old. The firing technique back in the thirties wasn't exactly scientific. Immigrants had probably worked sunup to sundown, backs and knees bent as they filled wooden forms with clay that would be air-dried, then fired in a kiln.

The first row of bricks crumbled under the hammer's claw. The edges were weak. They would not hold the center. Will had to use his bare hands to scoop out the pieces. Finally, by the third row, he had found a more successful system. He had to use precision with every swing of the hammer in order to wedge the claw into the cracks. Sand was packed into the joints. It got into Will's eyes, flew up into his mouth. He clenched his teeth. He thought of himself as a machine as he worked back and forth across the room, clearing each section brick by brick, digging a few inches into the dirt to see what was underneath.

He was a third of the way through when the futility overwhelmed him. He kicked away the debris covering the next section, then the next. He used Amanda's Maglite to study each crack and crevice. The bricks were tight. Nothing had disturbed them—not in Will's lifetime, or the building's lifetime, or at any time at all.

Nothing. Just like the walls. There was nothing.

"Dammit!" Will flung the hammer across the room. He felt a tearing in his bicep. The muscle spasmed. Will clutched his arm. He stared into the loam, the useless fruits of his labor.

Will thought about his revenge fantasies from the Grady ER. His mind flashed up an image of Amanda—terrified, willing to answer any question he asked. He'd been in plenty of fights during his lifetime, but he'd never used his fists on a woman. Amanda was probably sleeping like a baby back in her hospital bed while Will was chasing ghosts that he wasn't even sure he wanted to find.

He clenched his hands. There were tiny rips up and down his fingers—like paper cuts, only deeper. His sutured ankle felt like it was on fire. He tried to stand, but his knees wouldn't hold him. He forced himself up to standing. This time he stumbled. He grabbed onto one of the studs. A splinter dug into his palm. He screamed just to let out some of the pain. There was not a muscle in his body that did not ache.

All for nothing.

Will took his handkerchief out of his pocket and wiped his face. He grabbed his jacket off the nail. The streetlight was no longer strobing when he pulled himself out of the basement. The air was so crisp that he started coughing. He spit out more chunks of plaster. Will went to the faucet in the middle of the yard. It was the same one he'd used as a kid during the summer months when Mrs. Flannigan locked them all out of the house and told them not to come back until suppertime. The pump handle was nearly rusted through.

Carefully, Will moved the lever up and down until a thin stream of water came out of the spigot. He put his mouth to the water and drank until he felt knives in his stomach. Then he put his head under the stream and washed off the grime. His eyes stung from the water. There were probably chemicals in there that he didn't want to know about. A tannery had operated down the street when he was growing up. Will had probably drunk enough benzene to fill a cancer ward.

Another souvenir from his childhood.

He pushed himself up, using the pump for leverage. The handle snapped off. Will could only shake his head. He tossed the handle into the yard and started the long walk home.

Will sat at his kitchen table, hands clutching a blue file folder. His eyes wouldn't stay open. He was punch-drunk from exhaustion. He hadn't bothered to go to bed. By the time he got home, it was already three in the morning. He had to leave by four to get to the airport in time for the business travelers. He'd taken a shower. He'd cooked a breakfast he couldn't eat. He'd walked the dog around the block. He'd shined his scuffed shoes. He'd put on a suit and tie. He'd used Bactine on the thousands of tiny cuts and blisters on his hands. He'd wiped away the weird pink fluid seeping through the Band-Aid on his ankle.

And now he couldn't make himself get up from the table.

Will picked at the edge of the file folder. His mother's name was neatly typed on the label stuck to the tab. Will had seen the letters so many times that they were burned into his retinas. He was twenty-two years old before he finally gained access to her information. There was a lot of paperwork that had to be filled out. He'd had to go down to the courthouse. There were other things, too, all of which involved navigating the juvenile justice system. The biggest obstacle was Will. He'd had to get to a point in his life where the prospect of going before a judge didn't bring on a cold sweat.

Betty came in through the dog door. She gave Will a curious look. The dog was adopted, an embarrassingly tiny Chihuahua mix that had come to Will through no fault of his own. She put her front feet on his thigh. She looked perplexed when Will didn't lean back to let her into his lap. After a while, she gave up, circling the floor three times before settling down in front of her food bowls.

Will let his gaze fall back to the file, his mother's name. The black typed letters were sharp on the white label. Not that it was white anymore. Will had rubbed his fingers along her name so many times that he'd yellowed the paper label.

He opened the file. The first page was what you'd usually find in a police report. The date was followed by the case number at the top. Then there was the section for the more salient details. Name, address, weight, height, cause of death.

Homicide.

Will stared at his mother's picture. Polaroid. It was taken years before her death. She was thirteen, maybe fourteen. As with the label, the photo was yellowed from being handled so much. Or maybe age had broken down the processing chemicals. She was standing in front of a Christmas tree. Will had been told the camera was a gift from her parents. She was holding up a pair of socks, probably another gift. There was a smile on her face.

Will wasn't the type of man to stare in the mirror, but he'd spent plenty of time examining his features one by one, trying to find similarities between himself and his mother. They had the same almond shape to their eyes. Even in the faded photo, he could see the color was the same blue. His blond hair was sandy, shaded more toward brown than his mother's almost yellow curls. One of his bottom teeth was slightly crooked like hers. She was wearing a retainer in the photo. The tooth had probably been pulled back into line by the time she was murdered.

Will lined up the photo to the edge of the front page, making sure to keep the paper clip in the same spot. He turned to the second page. His eyes couldn't focus on the words. The text jumped around. Will blinked several times, then stared at the first word of the first line. He knew it by heart, so it came easy to him.

"Victim."

Will swallowed. He read the next words.

"... was found at Techwood Homes."

Will closed the file. There was no need to read through the details again. They were ingrained in his memory. They were a part of his waking existence.

He looked at his mother's name again. The letters weren't so crisp this time. If his brain hadn't filled in the words, he doubted he'd be able to make them out.

Will had never been much of a reader. The words moved around the page. The letters transposed. Over the years, he'd figured out some tricks to help him pass for more fluent. A ruler under a line of text kept one row from blending in with another. He used his fingers to isolate difficult words, then repeated the sentence in his head to test for sense. Still, it took him twice as long as Faith to fill out the various reports that had to be submitted on a daily basis. That a person like Will had chosen a career that relied so heavily on paperwork was something Dante could've written about.

Will was in college by the time he figured out that he had dyslexia. Or, rather, he had been told. It was the fifteenth anniversary of John Lennon's death. Will's music appreciation professor was talking about how it was believed that Lennon had dyslexia. In great detail, she described the signs and symptoms of the disorder. She could've been reading from the book of Will's life. In fact, the woman had basically delivered a soliloquy directly to Will on the gift of being different.

Will had dropped the class. He didn't want to be different. He wanted to blend in. He wanted to be normal. He'd been told most of his school life that he didn't fit into the classroom structure. Teachers had called him stupid. They'd put him in the back of the room and told him to stop asking questions when he would never understand the answers. Will had even been called to the principal's office his junior year and had been told that maybe it was time for him to drop out.

If not for Mrs. Flannigan at the children's home, Will probably would have left school. He could vividly remember the morning she'd found him in bed rather than waiting outside for the school bus. Will had seen her slap other kids plenty of times. Nothing bad, just a smack on the bottom or across the face. He'd never been hit by her before, but she slapped him then. Hard. She had to stand on her tiptoes to do it. "Stop feeling sorry for yourself," she'd commanded. "And get your ass on that bus before I lock you in the pantry."

Will could never tell this story to Sara. It was yet another part of his life she would never understand. She would see this as abuse. She would probably say it was cruel. For Will, it had been exactly what he needed. Because if Mrs. Flannigan hadn't cared enough to climb those stairs and push him out the front door, no one else would have bothered.

Betty's ears perked up. Her tags jingled on her collar as she turned her head. A low growl came out of her throat. Will heard a key in the front door lock. For just a second, he thought it might be Sara. He was overwhelmed by a feeling of lightness. And then he remembered that Sara didn't have a key to his house. And then the darkness came back when he remembered why. Sara didn't need a key. They didn't spend much time here. They always stayed in her apartment because at Will's, there was the constant threat of Angie walking in on them.

"Willie?" Angie called as she made her way through the living room. She paused at the open kitchen doorway. Angie had always embraced her feminine side. She favored figure-hugging skirts and shirts that showed her ample cleavage. Today, she was wearing a black T-shirt and jeans that hung low on her hips. She had lost weight in the three weeks since he'd last seen her. The pants were loose, but not on purpose. Will could see a black thong peeking over the top of the waistband.

Betty started growling again. Angie hissed at the dog. Then she looked at Will. Then she looked at the light blue file folder in his hand. She asked, "Reading up, baby?"

Will didn't answer.

Angie walked to the refrigerator and took out a bottle of water. She unscrewed the cap. She took a long swig as she studied Will. "You look like shit."

He felt like shit. All he wanted to do was put his head down on the table and sleep. "What do you want?"

She leaned back against the counter. He should've been surprised by her words, but then, nothing Angie said ever really surprised him. "What are we going to do about your father?"

Will stared down at the file. The kitchen was quiet. He could hear the whistling sound of Betty's breathing, the tinkle of the tags on her collar as she settled back down.

Angie had never been good at waiting him out. "Well?"

Will didn't have an answer for her. Eighteen hours of thinking about it pretty much nonstop hadn't brought any solutions. "I'm not going to do anything."

Angie seemed disappointed. "You need to call your girlfriend and ask for your balls back."

Will glared at her. "What do you want, Angie?"

"Your father's been out for almost six weeks. Did you know that?"

Will felt his stomach clench. He hadn't bothered to look up the details in the state database, but he'd assumed the release was recent, in the last few days, not almost two months ago.

She said, "He's sixty-four now. Diabetic. Had a massive heart attack a few years ago. Old people are expensive to take care of."

"How do you know all this?"

"I was at his parole hearing. Thought I'd see you there, but no." She raised an eyebrow, waiting for him to ask the obvious question. When Will didn't, she volunteered, "He looks good for his age. Been keeping in shape. I guess the heart attack scared him." She smiled. "You've got his mouth. The same shape to your lips."

"Is there a point to this?"

"The point is, I remember our promise."

Will looked down at his hands. He picked at a torn cuticle. "We were kids back then, Angie."

"Put a knife in his throat. Jam a crowbar in his head. Shoot him up with H and make it look like an accident. That was your favorite one, right?" She leaned down, inserting herself in his line of sight. "You pussin' out on me, Wilbur?" He moved away from her. "Do I need to remind you what happened to your mother?"

Will tried to clear his throat, but something got stuck.

Angie dragged over a chair and sat a few inches away from him. "Listen, baby, you can have all the fun you want with your little doctor friend. You know I've had my share. But this is business. This goes back to you and me and a promise we made to each other." She waited another beat, then said, "What happened to your mother, what happened to you—all because of that bastard—we can't just let that go, Will. He has to pay."

Will's cuticle started to bleed, but he couldn't stop picking at the skin. Angie's words stirred up something familiar inside of him. The anger. The rage. The need for revenge. Will had spent the last ten years of his life trying to let that go, and now Angie was shoving it back in his face.

He told her, "You're not in a position to talk to me about broken promises."

"Ashleigh Snyder."

Will's head jerked up, surprised to hear her mention the missing girl.

Angie smiled as she tapped her finger on his mother's file. "You're forgetting that I know everything, baby. Every detail. Every last drop. You think he's changed his ways? You think he's too old to get around? Let me tell you, honey, he's been busy inside. He could outrun you, out-jump you, out-kill you. Just looking at him made me scared, and you know I don't scare easy."

Will looked at her finger. The nail polish was chipped.

"Are you listening to me, Will?"

He waited for her to stop touching his mother's file.

Slowly, she moved her hand away.

Angie had helped him fill out the paperwork to get the documents. Angie had been the first to show him his mother's photograph. Angie had read the autopsy report aloud when Will, so upset he could barely function, was unable to make sense of it. Lacerations. Abrasions. Scratches. Tears. Wounds. The indescribable rendered in cold, medical language. Like Will, Angie knew every word. She knew every awful thing. She knew the pain and the misery, just like she knew when she finished telling Will what had happened to his mother, he had been so violently ill that he'd started coughing up blood.

She said, "He's holed up at the Four Seasons on Fourteenth. I guess his money earned some interest over the years."

"You've been watching him?"

"I've got a friend in security keeping an eye on him for me." She pursed her lips. "It's not a bad life. Five-star hotel. He uses the gym every morning. He orders room service. He goes for walks. He hangs out at the bar.”

Will pictured every single tableau. The thought of this man living such an easy life put a fist in his stomach.

“It’s all right,” she soothed. Will couldn’t stop looking at the file. His hands were gripping the edge. “It’s me, baby. You don’t have to pretend with me.”

He flinched as Angie’s fingers traced down his neck, his back. Her fingernails lined up with the scars that mottled his skin. “You can talk to me about it. I was there. I know what went down. I’m not going to judge you.” Will shook his head, but she kept touching him, her hand going to the front of his chest, tips of her fingers finding the perfectly round circles where the tip of a burning cigarette had seared into his flesh. Her mouth was at his ear. “You think this would’ve happened to you if your mother had been around? You think she would’ve let them hurt her baby boy?”

This was what they had talked about for hours, days, weeks, years. The things that had been done to them. The things they would do to pay those people back. Childhood revenge fantasies. That’s all they were. And yet, it felt so good to give in to them now. So nice to enjoy the fantasy of doing to that bastard what the state had refused to do.

“Let me take care of it,” Angie said. “Let me make it all better for you.”

Will was so tired. He felt incapacitated. Every inch of his body was sore. His brain was filled with static that wouldn’t go away. When Angie pressed in closer, all he could think was how good it felt to be near another person. This was what being with Sara had done to Will. She’d taken away his ability to be alone. She’d broken through his solitude. She’d dragged him into a world where he didn’t just want things—he needed them. He needed to be touched. He needed to feel her arms around him.

“Poor baby,” Angie said. She kissed his ear, his neck. Will felt a familiar stirring in his body. When she slipped her hand inside his shirt, he didn’t stop her. When her mouth found his, he didn’t stop her. His hand went to her breast. She pressed closer against him.

But she tasted like nothing. Not mints or honey or those little sour candies Sara liked. Angie’s hands rested on his shoulders, palms flat, not wrapped around the back of his neck. Not pulling him closer. Pushing him away.

Will tried to kiss her again. Angie moved back out of his reach, just as he knew she would. That’s how she worked. Once she got something, she didn’t want it anymore.

Will breathed out a heavy sigh. “I don’t love you.” He corrected, “I’m not in love with you.”

She crossed her arms as she sat back in the chair. “Am I supposed to be hurt by that?”

Will shook his head. He didn’t want to hurt her. He just wanted her to stop.

“Get real, baby. Sara may be all lovey-dovey now and telling you she wants to know all about you, but what’s she really gonna do with that knowledge?”

He couldn’t answer the question, but he knew one thing for certain. “She won’t use it against me.”

“That’s sweet, but tell me this: how’s she gonna go to sleep beside you every night knowing your father’s DNA is swirling around inside you? Nature trumps nurture, baby. Sara’s a doctor. Eventually she’s gonna start to wonder what you're really capable of." She leaned closer. "Think about the terror you're gonna see in her eyes."

Will stared at her. There was a nasty twist to her mouth, a hollow look to her eyes. She wasn't just thinner. She was almost gaunt. For as long as Will had known her, Angie had always worn her makeup heavy—not because she needed to, but because she wanted the cover. Thick black eyeliner around her eyes. Dark brown eye shadow with a sparkle of glitter. Deep red lipstick. Blush on her high cheekbones. Her curly brown hair draped along the sides of her face. Her lips were a perfect bow tie. She was tall and thin with breasts that spilled out of the tight shirts she favored. She was the sort of woman that made men cheat on their wives. Literally. Angie loved taking things away from other people. She was a temptress. She was a siren. She was a thief.

She was also high as a kite. Her pupils were blown wide open.

He asked, "Are you taking pills again?" He tried to take her hand, but she jerked away. "Angie?"

She pushed herself up from the table and went back to the sink.

Will sat back in the chair. "What are you doing, Angie?"

She didn't answer him. Instead, she stared out the kitchen window. Her shoulder blades were sharp. The skull and crossbones tattoo she'd gotten when she was eighteen had faded to a light blue.

Will put his hand in his pocket. He felt the cold metal of his wedding ring. Sara kept her husband's wedding ring in a small wooden box on the mantel over the fireplace. Her ring was in there, too. They were tied together with a white ribbon, resting on a pillow of blue satin.

Will repeated, "What are you doing, Angie?"

Her shoulders went up. "I guess this is what happens to me without you."

"You've been without me lots of times."

"We both know this is different."

He couldn't argue with the truth. "Please stop hurting yourself."

"I will when you stop fucking your girlfriend."

Angie walked out of the kitchen. She picked up her purse where she'd dropped it on the couch. She turned around at the front door and blew him a kiss.

And then she was gone.

Will pressed his forehead to the table. The Formica was cold against his skin. Betty's paws tapped on his leg again. He let her into his lap. Her fur was wiry under his hand. She licked his fingers.

Angie's mother had killed herself with drugs. It was a twenty-seven-year-long suicide. That was what brought Angie to the children's home. Deidre Polaski had spent more than half of Angie's life in a vegetative coma, warehoused in a state hospital. She'd finally died a few months ago. Maybe that's what had gotten Angie back on the pills. Maybe she needed an escape.

Or maybe Will was to blame.

Three weeks ago in this very kitchen, Angie had put Will's gun in her mouth. She'd threatened to kill herself before. It was her go-to strategy when nothing else was working. Will thought about the wedding ring in his pocket. Maybe he was keeping it for the same reason Sara kept her husband's. Will had been mourning Angie for years. The only difference was that she hadn't died yet.

His phone rang. Not his cell, which was charging on his desk, but the landline. Will lifted his head from the table, but couldn't make himself stand. Maybe it was Sara calling. Though Will was pretty sure it was his responsibility to call her, not the other way around. He had stormed out last night. He had pissed her off. He had kissed Angie.

Will put his hand to his mouth. There was lipstick on his fingers. Jesus Christ, what had he done? Sara would be devastated. She would—Will didn't even want to think about what she would do. It would be the end of them. It would be the end of everything.

The phone stopped ringing. The house was completely silent. He could feel his heart jackhammering in his chest. There was no saliva left in his mouth. Betty stirred in his lap.

What the hell had he done?

His cell phone started chirping. Will had never seen himself as a coward, but the lure to just sit there and do nothing was strong. Unfortunately, he didn't have the willpower.

Will put Betty on the floor. He felt like he was dragging through quicksand as he walked into the living room. He picked up his cell phone, expecting to see Sara's number, but there was Amanda's instead.

He considered for a moment not answering the call, but if the last twenty-four hours had taught him anything, it was that Amanda always knew how to track him down.

Will grabbed his car keys and flipped open the phone. "I'm on my way to the airport."

"Stay where you are." Amanda's tone was off. "We found a body. Faith is on her way to pick you up."

Will braced his hand on the desk. His head started pounding. "Where?"

Amanda hesitated, something Will had never heard her do before. "Faith will loop you in on the details."

"Where?"

"You know where." Will made her say it. "Techwood."

November 15, 1974

MARY HALSTON

Mary had been robbed at the Union Mission last night, which was not unusual, but still annoyed her. It wasn't money that was stolen—her pimp kept all of that—but a locket that her high school boyfriend had given her. Jerry. He'd gone to Nam straight out of school. He'd held his own against Charlie, but got hooked on H so bad that he couldn't pass the drug test to get back into the U.S. Took him six more months of rotting in the jungle before he could get clean, then the minute the plane touched down, he grabbed Mary and a bag of H, and another six months later, Jerry was dead with a needle in his arm and Mary was face down in an alley gritting her teeth, praying for it to be over fast.

She preferred not to look at their faces. Their beady eyes. Their wet lips. Their brown teeth. She felt like their images were etched into a part of her brain that she would be able to access one day and then—puff. She would ignite like a Roman candle and flame out forever.

Mary had read a crazy book one time about scientists slicing off your retinas and sticking them into a big TV that showed everything you'd ever seen in your entire life. The book was a gas, but creepy, because Mary didn't want to think about her life. Strange she'd read the thing in the first place. Mary's speed was more the Dana Girls and Nancy Drew. She'd been on a sci-fi kick after watching 2001: A Space Odyssey. Not really watching it, because Jerry's hands were down her pants the entire time, but she got the gist of the movie: human beings were totally screwed by 2001.

Not that she would live to see it happen. Mary was nineteen years old. When she wasn't sleeping on a cot at the Union Mission, she was trolling the streets for trade. She'd lost some teeth. Her hair was coming out in clumps. She wasn't good enough to stand on the street corners. She had to walk around during the day looking for lawyers and bankers who turned her around and smashed her face into the wall while they did their business. It kind of reminded her of the way you held a kitten. Grab it by the back of the neck and it goes limp. None of these assholes were limp, though. That was for damn sure.

Mary darted into an alley and sat down by the Dumpster. Her feet hurt. There were blisters on her heels because her shoes were too tight. Not really her shoes. Mary wasn't just a victim at the Union Mission. She took what she needed, and she'd needed shoes. White patent leather. Chunky heel. They were very stylish, the sort of thing Ann Marie might wear to an audition on That Girl.

She heard heavy footsteps making their way toward her. Mary looked up at the man. It was like staring up at a mountain. He was tall with broad shoulders and a pair of hands that could easily snap her neck.

He said, "Good morning, sister."

And that was the last thing she heard.

July 12, 1975

SATURDAY

Amanda had never been particularly adept at lying, especially where her father was concerned. Since childhood, Duke could look at her a certain way and Amanda would burst into tears, pouring out her soul no matter the consequences. She couldn't even begin to predict how angry he would be if he found out Amanda was spending the afternoon at Evelyn Mitchell's house. It reminded her of all those stories from the Nixon scandal. The cover-up always brought you down.

And this one was a doozy. Not only had Amanda completely fabricated a church function, she'd dragged Vanessa Livingston into the mix, exacting a promise that the other woman would support the story no matter what. Amanda could only hope that Duke was too wrapped up in his court case to dig too deeply into her story. He'd been on the phone with his lawyer all morning. The state supreme court's decision for Lars Oglethorpe had shifted the winds at police headquarters. Duke had barely registered Amanda's presence as she cleaned his house and ironed his shirts.

All she wanted to do now was see Evelyn with her own two eyes to make certain the other woman was all right. After leaving Techwood yesterday, neither of them had said a word to each other. Evelyn had dropped off Amanda at the station and driven away without even saying goodbye. What Rick Landry had done to her in the hallway seemed to be stuck in her throat.

Amanda pulled out onto Monroe Drive. She wasn't often on this side of Piedmont Heights. In her mind, she still thought of it as barren farmland, though the area had been given over to industry some time ago. As a child, she'd visited Monroe Gardens with her mother, where they'd peruse the nursery for hours picking out pansies and roses to plant in the backyard. The land had been turned into office buildings for the Red Cross, but she could still recall the rows of daffodils.

She took a left onto Montgomery Ferry. Plaster's Bridge narrowed the road to one lane. The Plymouth's tires bumped over the rutted concrete. A cold sweat came on as she passed Ansley Golf Club, even though she knew her father wasn't playing today. She followed the dogleg to Lionel Lane and went right on Friar Tuck, which cut straight through the heart of Sherwood Forest.

Evelyn's house was one of those ranch-style homes they'd built by the thousands for returning veterans. One story with a carport on the side, just like the house next door, which in turn was an exact duplicate of the next house, and the next.

Amanda parked on the street behind Evelyn's station wagon and checked herself in the rearview mirror. The heat had done her makeup no favors. Her hair was flat and lifeless. She had planned on washing it today, but the thought of sitting under the dryer was nauseating and she couldn't let her hair dry naturally because it would sour.

She cut the engine and heard the whir of a circular saw. The driveway was taken up with a black Trans Am and a convertible Ford Galaxie like Perry Mason used to drive. As she approached the house, Amanda saw that a shed was being built on the open side of the carport. The wall supports and roof were up, but little else. There was a man in the carport leaning over a piece of plywood resting on a pair of sawhorses. He was dressed in cutoff jeans and no shirt. The logo on his orange sun visor was easily recognizable, though it wasn't until Amanda was halfway up the drive that she could make out the Florida Gator.

"Hello!" he called, setting down the saw. Amanda guessed this was Bill Mitchell, though she realized that somewhere in the back of her mind she had imagined a more glamorous man. He was plain looking, about Evelyn's height with wispy brown hair and a bit of a belly. His skin was bright red from the sun. There was a welcoming smile on his face, though Amanda felt immensely uncomfortable talking to a man who wasn't fully clothed.

"Amanda." He held out his hand as he walked toward her. "I'm Bill. So pleased to meet you. Ev's told me a lot about you."

"You as well." Amanda shook his sweaty hand. Sawdust was stuck to his chest and arms.

"Let's get out of this sun. It's a scorcher." He cupped his hand to her elbow as he led her into the shade of the carport. Amanda saw a picnic table laid out in the backyard. The Weber was already belching smoke. She felt a brief flash of guilt. She'd been so worried about Evelyn's state of mind that she'd forgotten this was a party. She should've brought a hostess gift.

"Bill?" Evelyn came into the carport holding a jar of mayonnaise. She was barefoot, dressed in a bright yellow sundress. Her hair was perfect. She wasn't wearing any makeup, but she didn't seem to need any. "Oh, Amanda. You made it." She handed the mayonnaise to her husband. "Sweetheart, put a shirt on. You're red as a lobster."

Bill rolled his eyes at Amanda. He popped open the jar before handing it back to his wife.

Evelyn asked Amanda, "Did you meet Kenny? Bill, where's Kenny?" She didn't give him time to answer. "Kenny?"

"Under here," a deep voice called from beneath the shed. Amanda saw a pair of hairy legs, then cutoff jeans, then a man's naked torso as Kenny pushed himself out from beneath the plywood floor. He smiled at Amanda, said, "Hello," then told Bill, "Looks like we could use some more bracing."

Evelyn explained, "They're building a shed so we have a safe place to keep my gun."

"And potting soil," Kenny added. He held out his hand to Amanda. "Kenny Mitchell. I'm this character's brother."

Amanda shook his hand. It was warm. The palms were rough. She felt herself blushing in the heat. Kenny Mitchell was the most beautiful man she'd ever seen outside of a Hollywood movie. His chest and stomach rippled with muscles. His mustache was trimmed above what could only be called sensual lips.

He said, "Ev, you didn't tell me your friend was so pretty."

The blush ignited into a raging fire.

"Kenny!" Evelyn chastised. "You're embarrassing her."

"Sorry, ma'am." He winked at Amanda as he dug into his pocket and pulled out a packet of cigarettes. Amanda forced herself not to look at the trail of hair that started at his navel and worked its way down.

Evelyn said, "Kenny's a pilot with Eastern. He looks like that hunk from the Safeguard commercials, doesn't he?" She motioned for Amanda to follow her into the house. "We'll leave the boys to it."

Bill stopped them, telling Amanda, "Thanks for taking care of my girl yesterday. She's an awful driver. Too busy checking her makeup to look at the road."

Evelyn spoke before Amanda could. "I told him about almost hitting that man in the street." She put her hand to her chest, the exact spot where Rick Landry had jabbed her with the Kel-Lite. "The steering wheel left a terrible bruise."

"You should be more careful." Bill patted his wife on her bottom. "Now, get inside before I ravage you."

Evelyn kissed his cheek. "Be sure to drink plenty of Coke. You don't want to get dehydrated in this heat." She hugged the mayonnaise jar to her stomach as she walked across the carport. Amanda followed her into the house. Her plan was to ask Evelyn why she had lied to her husband, but the cool temperature inside left her momentarily speechless. For the first time in months, Amanda wasn't sweating.

"You have air-conditioning?"

"Bill bought it when I got pregnant, and neither one of us can give it up." Evelyn put the jar on the counter by a large Tupperware bowl that was already filled with chopped potatoes, eggs, and peppers. She stirred in the mayonnaise, saying, "Potato salad is the only thing I can make. I'm not a fan, but Bill loves it." The smile on her face seemed almost rapturous. "Isn't he wonderful? He's a perfect Libra."

Bill was a very happy Libra, judging by Evelyn's beautiful home. The kitchen was extremely modern—white laminate countertops with matching avocado green appliances. The chrome handles on the cabinets gleamed in the sunlight. The linoleum had a subtle flower pattern. The Perma-Prest ruffled curtains on the window filtered a soft light. There was a room off the kitchen with a washer and dryer. A pair of toddler's jeans hung from the indoor clothesline. It was the sort of thing Amanda thought only existed in magazines.

Evelyn put the potato salad in the refrigerator. "Thanks for not telling Bill about—" She put her hand to her chest. "He would only worry."

"Are you all right?"

"Oh." She sighed, but she didn't add more. She put the mayonnaise by the salad, but stopped shy of shutting the refrigerator door. "You want a beer?"

Amanda had never tasted beer in her life, but obviously Evelyn needed something. "All right."

Evelyn took two cans of Miller out of the door. She pulled the rings and tossed them into the trashcan. She was handing Amanda one of the cans when the circular saw started up again. "In here." Evelyn waved for Amanda to follow her through the dining room, then into a large foyer.

The living room was a step down. The temperature was almost frigid, courtesy of the large air-conditioning unit mounted into one of the windows. Amanda felt the sweat on her back start to chill. Her shoes sank into the lush ochre-colored carpet. The ceiling was beautifully textured. There was a chintz green and yellow sofa. Matching wingback chairs framed the sliding glass doors. The hi-fi was softly playing a track from McCartney. One wall was taken up entirely with books. A console television the size of a baby carriage served as a centerpiece. The only thing out of place was the large tent in the middle of the room.

"We sleep in here because of the AC," Evelyn explained, taking a place on the couch. Amanda sat down beside her. "We had the unit in the bedroom, but that wasn't fair to Zeke, and his crib is too big to fit in our room, so ..." She took a healthy drink of beer.

Amanda grasped at conversational straws. She was awful at small talk. "How old is he?"

"Almost two." Evelyn groaned, and Amanda gathered this was a bad thing. "When he was little, Bill would stick him in the bottom drawer of the bureau and shut it when we needed privacy. But now that he's walking around—" She indicated the tent. "Thank God he's a heavy sleeper. Though you wouldn't know it this morning. He was screaming his head off. Bill took him off to his mother's before I started screaming, too. I'll change the record over." She got up and walked to the stereo. "Have you heard what John Lennon's doing?"

It sounded like he'd put a cat in a bag and swung it around a small room, but Amanda mumbled, "Yes. It's very interesting."

"I think Bill loaned the album to Kenny." She started thumbing through the records, talking to herself. Or maybe she was talking to Amanda. It didn't seem to matter that Evelyn wasn't getting a response. "Simon and Garfunkel?" she asked, but she was already putting on the record.

Amanda stared at the cocktail table, trying to think of a good excuse to leave. She could not remember a time in her life when she'd ever felt so out of place. She wasn't used to socializing, especially not with strangers. There was church, work, school, and her father. Not much else fit between. Evelyn was obviously fine after yesterday's experience. She had her husband and her brother-in-law. She had her living room sex tent and her beautiful home. She had her Cosmo magazine on the cocktail table where anyone could see it.

Amanda felt her cheeks burning again as she scanned the lurid headlines. It would be just her luck that lightning would strike them both right now and her father would find her in Evelyn Mitchell's house with a can of beer in her hand and a Cosmopolitan magazine in front of her.

Evelyn sat back down on the couch. "You okay?"

Amanda said, "I should leave."

"But you just got here."

"I just wanted to make sure you were okay after what Rick—"

"You smoke?" She reached for a metal box on the cocktail table.

"No, thank you."

"I gave them up when I got pregnant with Zeke," Evelyn admitted. "For some reason, I couldn't stand the taste anymore. Funny, I used to love it." She returned the box to its place. "Please don't leave, Amanda. I'm so glad you're here."

Amanda felt embarrassed by the statement. And trapped. Now she couldn't leave without being rude. She returned to the subject of Evelyn's child because that seemed the only safe topic. "Is Zeke a family name?"

"It's Ezekiel. I tried not to let Bill shorten it, but ..." Her voice trailed off. "Bill's only criteria for picking a name was asking how it would sound coming out of the stadium speakers when he's playing for Florida." Instead of laughing at her joke, she went uncharacteristically quiet. She studied Amanda.

"What is it?"

"Are we still going to do our thing?"

Amanda didn't have to ask what thing. They were going to stake out the office building to find Mr. Blue Suit. Amanda was going to make a call to the Housing Authority. Evelyn was going to check missing persons reports at the other zones. Yesterday, this had seemed like a solid plan. From this distance, it appeared amateur and dangerous. "Do you think we should go through with it?"

"Do you?"

Amanda could not answer her. After what had happened with Rick Landry, she was scared. She was also worried about all the snooping around she'd done thus far. They had both made calls to people they had no business talking to. Amanda had spent a full morning reading back issues of the Journal and the Constitution. If Duke was right about getting his job back, the first thing he'd do was find out what Amanda had been up to. And he would not be happy.

Evelyn began, "You know, I was thinking ..." She put her hand to her chest. Her fingers picked at one of the pearl buttons. "What Landry did to me. What Juice tried to do to you. It's funny how, black or white, they go straight for what's between our legs. That's the sum total of our worth."

"Or lack of it." Amanda finished the beer. She felt lightheaded.

Evelyn asked, "Why did you sign up for the job? Was it your dad?"

"Yes," she answered, though that was only partly true. "I really wanted to be a Kelly girl. Work in a different office every day. Go home to a nice apartment." She didn't completely sketch out the fantasy. There would be a husband there, maybe a child, someone she could take care of.

Amanda admitted, "I know it sounds flighty."

"It sounds better than my reason." Evelyn sat back against the arm of the couch. "I used to be a mermaid."

"A what?"

She laughed, seemingly delighted by Amanda's surprise. "Ever hear of Weeki Wachee Springs? It's about an hour outside Tampa."

Amanda shook her head. She'd only been to the Florida Panhandle.

"They gave me the job because I could hold my breath for ninety seconds. And these." She indicated her breasts. "I swam all day." She floated her arms up through the air. "And drank all night." Her arms went down. She was smiling.

All Amanda could think to say was, "Does Bill know?"

"Where do you think we met? He was visiting Kenny at McDill Air Force Base. It was love at first sight." She rolled her eyes. "I followed him to Atlanta. We got married. I was bored staying home all day, so I decided to try for a job with the state." She smiled, as if in anticipation of a funny story. "I went downtown to the courthouse to fill out an application. I'd seen an ad in the paper that the tax commissioner was hiring, only I went into the wrong room. And there was this man in a patrol uniform. Such an ass. He took one look at me and said—"she puffed out her chest, " 'Little gal, you gots the wrong place. This here room is for the po-lice, and I can tell just by lookin' at ya that you ain't got it in ya.' "

Amanda laughed. She was a very good mimic. "What did you do?"

"Well, I was furious." Evelyn straightened her shoulders. "I said, 'No, sir, you're the one who's wrong. I'm here to join the police, and I have every right to take the test.' " She sank back down. "I assumed I wouldn't pass, but a week later, they called me to come back in for the interview. I wasn't sure whether or not I should go. I hadn't even told Bill. But I showed up for the interview, and I guess I passed that, because they told me to report to the academy the following week."

Amanda couldn't imagine such brazenness. "What did Bill say?"

"He said, 'Have fun and be careful.' " She held out her hands in an open shrug. "And that's how I became a police officer."

Amanda shook her head over the story. At least it was better than Vanessa's, who'd seen a sign on the bulletin board inside the jail, where she was being processed for a DUI.

Evelyn said, "I wasn't sure I could go back after Zeke." She took a deep breath. "But then I thought about how good it feels when I roll up on a call and a woman sees that I'm in charge, and she sees that her boyfriend or husband or whoever's been whaling on her has to answer my questions. It makes me feel like I'm doing something. I guess it's how the coloreds feel when a black cop shows up. They feel like they're talking to somebody who understands them."

Amanda had never thought about it that way, but she supposed it made sense.

"I want to do this. I really want to do it." Evelyn took her hand. There was an urgency to her tone. "Those girls. Kitty, Mary, Lucy, Jane—rest her soul. They aren't very different from us, are they? Someone along the way decided that they don't matter. And that made it true. They don't matter. Not in the scheme of things. Not when the Rick Landrys of the world can say a Jane Delray committed suicide and the only problem is who's gonna clean up the mess."

Amanda didn't respond, but Evelyn had gotten good at reading her moods.

"What is it?"

Amanda told her, "It wasn't Jane."

"What do you mean? How do you know that?"

"I type all of Butch's reports. It wasn't Jane who jumped off the building. The woman's name is Lucy Bennett."

Evelyn looked confused. She took a moment to process the information. "I don't understand. Did someone identify her? Did her family come forward?"

"They found Lucy's purse in apartment C on the fifth floor."

"That's Jane's place."

"Butch's notes say that the victim was the only inhabitant. Her purse was on the couch. He found her license and made a positive ID."

"Did they do fingerprints?"

"Lucy doesn't have a record. There are no fingerprints to match up."

"That doesn't add up. She's a whore. They all have records."

"No, it doesn't add up." Unless she was new to the game, there was no way

Lucy Bennett had avoided an arrest. Some of the girls voluntarily gave themselves up to spend the night in jail. It kept them safe when their pimps were mad.

"Lucy Bennett. Her license was in her purse?" Evelyn thought it through. "There's no way Jane would leave a license lying around like that. She said those girls have been missing for months, Lucy for a full year. Jane was trying to get their government vouchers. Either Lucy's license is in Jane's possession or it's in a cardboard box at the Five."

Amanda had already considered this. "Butch always gives me evidence receipts so I can note them in the report." The purse had been taken to central lockup, where the desk sergeant catalogued every item that went into storage. "According to the receipt, Lucy's purse didn't have a license."

"The desk sergeants never lie about that. It's their ass if something goes missing."

"Right."

"Was there cash in the wallet?"

Amanda was relieved not to be the naïve one for a change. Every purse or wallet homicide checked into lockup was miraculously absent any cash.

"Never mind," Evelyn allowed. She repeated the girl's name. "Lucy Bennett. All this time I assumed it was Jane."

"Does the name mean anything to you? Do you remember a Lucy Bennett from any of the missing persons reports?"

"No." Evelyn chewed her lip. She stared blankly at Amanda. Finally, she said, "Do you mind if I introduce you to someone?"

Amanda felt a familiar sense of dread. "Who?"

"My neighbor." She got off the couch. She took Amanda's beer can and put it beside hers on the table. "She's worked with APD for years. Her husband's been banished to the airport. Drinks too much. A real piece of work." She walked toward the sliding glass door. Amanda had no choice but to follow her. Evelyn kept up her chatter as she walked across the backyard. "Roz is a bit grumpy, but she's a good gal. She's seen her share of dead bodies, believe you me. Does it bother you that she's Jewish?"

Amanda couldn't figure out which tangent to start with. "Why would it bother me?"

Evelyn hesitated before she continued her trek across the yard. "Anyway, Roz is a crime scene photographer. She develops all the photos at her house. They won't have her at headquarters because she's too mouthy. I think she's been doing the job for ten years now. I'm sure your father's mentioned her?"

Amanda shook her head when Evelyn glanced back.

Evelyn continued, "I saw her earlier this morning and she was already in a state." They made their way past a green Corvair parked in the carport. The home was set up similar to Evelyn's, except there was a screened porch between the carport and house.

Evelyn lowered her voice. "Don't say anything about her face. Like I said, her husband's a real piece of work." She pushed open the screen door and tapped her fingers on the kitchen window. "Hello?" she called, her tone upbeat. "Roz? It's Ev again." After a few seconds without a response, she told Amanda, "I'll go around to the front."

"I'll be here." Amanda rested her hand on the washing machine that took up half the porch. Her sense of discomfort started to amplify as she thought about what she was doing. Amanda had never been inside a Jew's home before. She didn't quite know what to expect.

Evelyn was right; Amanda didn't get out much. She hadn't been to a party in years. She didn't drop in on neighbors. She didn't sit around plush living rooms listening to records and drinking alcohol. There were very few dates in her past. Any boy who wanted to ask her out had to go through Duke first. Not many had survived his scrutiny. There was one boy in high school who'd managed to persuade Amanda to go all the way. Three times, and then she couldn't take it anymore. She'd been so terrified of getting pregnant that the whole ordeal was only slightly more pleasant than getting a tooth drilled.

Evelyn was back. "I know she's here." She knocked on the kitchen door this time. "I don't know why she isn't answering."

Amanda looked at her watch, praying she could think of a good excuse to leave. Standing next to Evelyn Mitchell only heightened her sense of mortification. She felt like an old maid. The clothes Amanda was wearing—a black skirt, short-sleeved white cotton shirt, heels and pantyhose—exemplified the difference. Evelyn looked like a carefree flower child. Kenny must have taken one look at Amanda and pegged her for exactly what she was: a square.

"Hello?" Evelyn knocked on the door again.

From inside the house, a voice called, "Hold your horses, for God's sakes."

Evelyn grinned at Amanda. "Don't let her get to you. She can be nasty."

The door swung open. An older woman dressed in a brown housecoat and slippers glared at them. Her face was a mess: broken lip, blackened eye. "Why'd you knock on the front door, then run around to the side?"

Evelyn ignored her question. "Roz Levy, this is my friend Amanda Wagner. Amanda, this is Roz."

Roz narrowed her eyes at Amanda. "Duke Wagner's girl, right?"

Normally, people said this with respect. There was something close to hate in the woman's voice.

Evelyn said, "She's a good gal, Roz. Give her a break."

Roz was unmoved. She asked Amanda, "You know they call you Wag, right? Always waggin' your tail, tryin' to please."

Amanda felt sucker-punched. Her stomach dropped.

"Oh, hush up, Roz." Evelyn grabbed Amanda's arm and pulled her inside the house. "I want Amanda to see the photos you showed me."

"Doubt she can handle it."

"Well, I think you'll be surprised. Our gal can handle more than you think." She squeezed Amanda's arm as she dragged her through the kitchen.

The house was nothing like Evelyn's. There was no coolness from a running air conditioner. As a matter of fact, it felt as if all the air had been pulled out. Heavy brown curtains lined all the windows, blocking the sun. The living room was sunken, three steps down, and decorated in more dark browns. Evelyn pulled Amanda past a large couch that stank of body odor. Beer cans were on the floor beside a reclining chair. Cigarette butts spilled from the ashtray. Three steps back up. Evelyn forced Amanda to walk down the hallway. She only let go when they were in Roz Levy's spare bedroom.

As with the rest of the house, the room was dark and airless. The closet door hung open. A red lightbulb hung from a cord over various trays and chemicals. A rumpled daybed held cameras of all shapes and sizes. The desk was overflowing with paperwork. There were tennis rackets and roller skates in small piles around the room.

"She does yard sales," Evelyn explained. "The first time Bill met her, he said she reminded him of the guy who works for Baroness Bomburst in Chitty Chitty Bang Bang." She saw Amanda's expression and said, "Sweetie. Don't be upset. She says awful things sometimes. That's just her way."

Amanda crossed her arms, feeling exposed. Wag. She'd never heard the nickname before. She knew that people around the station considered her a goody-two-shoes. Amanda had come to terms with the reputation. There were worse things they could call her. She wasn't trim. She wasn't bad at her job. She was helpful. Courteous.

They called her Wag because she was always trying to please people.

Amanda's throat worked as she tried to swallow back tears. She did try to please people. Please her father by doing everything he told her to. Please Butch by typing his reports. Please Rick Landry by taking Evelyn away from Techwood. Why had Amanda done that? Why hadn't she told Landry to stop? He had practically assaulted Evelyn with her own flashlight. She was bruised on her chest and God only knew where else. And Amanda's response had been to grab her and run away like a puppy with its tail between its legs.

Wagging her tail.

Roz Levy finally deigned to join them. Amanda saw the reason for her delay when she entered the room. She'd stopped to get a Tab.

"So." Roz pulled the ring from the can. She dropped it into a mason jar on the desk. "You gals playing cops and robbers today?"

"I told you we're working a case." Evelyn's voice was surprisingly terse.

"Look at this one," Roz told Amanda. "Thinks they're gonna let her work homicide one day."

Amanda said, "Maybe they will."

"Ha." She didn't really laugh. "Women's lib, right? You can do anything you want so long as you do exactly as you're told."

Evelyn snapped, "We're out there on the streets every day just the same as they are."

"You gals just watch. Think you're hot shit because they let you go to the academy, gave you a badge and a gun. Mark my word. They only let you climb high enough so it breaks your back when you fall." She took a sip of her Tab. Her next words were addressed to Amanda. "You think your old man's gonna win his case?"

Amanda said, "If you're curious, you should ask him yourself."

"I already got one black eye, thank you very much." She put the Tab to her forehead. The can was cold. Sweat dripped down the sides. She glared at Amanda. "What's your problem?"

"Nothing. I'm just starting to understand why your husband beats you."

Evelyn gasped.

Roz glared at her. "That so?"

Amanda bit her tongue to stop the apology that wanted to come. She forced herself to stare the woman straight in the eye.

Roz gave a sharp laugh. "Ev's right. You're tougher than you look." She drank from the can, wincing as the liquid went down. There were yellowed bruises around her neck. "Sorry about before. I've been having hot flashes all morning. Turns my bitch on."

Amanda looked at Evelyn, who shrugged.

"The change. You'll find out for yourselves soon enough." Roz went inside the closet and started going through a stack of photos. "Shit. I left them in the kitchen."

Amanda waited until she left the room. "Tell me what she's talking about?"

"I think it's something old Jewish women get."

"Not that. Have you heard other people calling me that name? Wag?"

Evelyn had the grace not to look away. It was Amanda who couldn't hold her gaze. She stared into the closet, the stacks of photographs showing gory scenes in sharp Kodachrome.

"Photos," Amanda mumbled. Now it made sense. That's why Evelyn had brought her here. "Roz was the crime scene photographer at Techwood yesterday."

"The pictures are bad. Really bad. Jane—I mean Lucy—jumped from the top floor."

"The roof," Amanda provided. She had all the details from Butch's report. "There's an access ladder at the end of the hall. It goes up to a trapdoor in the roof. Lucy managed to bust off the padlock. Butch thinks she used a hammer. They found one on the floor at the bottom of the ladder. Lucy went to the roof and jumped."

"Where would she get a hammer?"

"There weren't any tools lying around the apartment," Amanda remembered. "Maybe the repairmen used it for the broken skylight?"

"I suppose you'd need a hammer for that." Evelyn sounded dubious. "Can a hammer bust a padlock?"

"Hammer?" Roz Levy was back. She held a manila envelope in her hand. "Those jackasses think she banged open the roof access with a hammer? Why not just jump out the window? She's on the top floor. They think she's so stoned she doesn't take the easy way out?" She started to open the envelope, but stopped. Her eyes drilled into Amanda. "If you throw up on my carpet, you're going to have to clean every inch. I don't care if you have to use a toothpick."

Amanda nodded, even as she felt a wave of nausea building. Her stomach was already sour. She dreaded to think what the beer would taste like coming back up.

"Are you sure?" Roz asked. "Because I'm not cleaning up after you. It's bad enough I have to clean up after that jackass I married."

Amanda nodded again, and the older woman pulled out the photographs. They were image side down.

Roz said, "A fall that high, you land on your feet, your intestines squirt out your ass like icing from a pastry bag."

Amanda pressed her lips together.

"Your ears bleed. Your face rips off your skull like a mask. Your nose and mouth and eyes—"

"Oh, for goodness sakes." Evelyn snatched the photos from Roz's hand. She showed them to Amanda one by one. "Breathe through your mouth," she coached. "Nice and easy. In and out."

Amanda did just that, taking in gulps of stale air. She expected to faint. Honestly, she expected to end the afternoon on her hands and knees with a toothpick cleaning Roz Levy's shag carpet. But neither of those things happened. The photos were unreal. What had happened to Lucy Bennett was too horrific for Amanda's brain to accept that she was still looking at an actual human being.

Amanda took the photos from Evelyn. They were in vivid color, the flash so bright that every single detail was on display. The girl was fully clothed. The material of her red-checkered cotton shirt was stiff, glued to her skin. Her skirt was hanging down, the waistband broken. Amanda assumed this was subsequent to the fall, as was the girl's missing left shoe.

She studied Lucy Bennett's face. Roz had been right about a lot of things, but none more so than what jumping from a five-story building did to the skin on your skull. Lucy's flesh looked to be dripping from the bone. Her eyes bulged from their sockets. Blood poured from every opening.

It looked fake, like something out of a horror movie.

Evelyn asked, "You okay?"

Amanda said, "Now I see why you thought this was Jane Delray." Except for the bleached blonde hair, the Halloween mask of her face could've belonged to any girl walking the street. The track marks up her arms were the same. The open wounds on her feet. The red pricks along her inner thigh.

Evelyn said, "I wonder if she has family."

Roz stated the obvious. "Everyone has family. Whether they admit it or not is an entirely different question."

Amanda ran through the pictures again. There were only five of them. Three were of the girl's face—left, right, center. One showed a close-up of her mangled body, probably taken from a ladder. The last was a more widely framed shot with the Coca-Cola building on the horizon. Lucy's hand was turned out, her wrists exposed.

Amanda asked Roz, "Do you have any more photos?"

The older woman smiled. One of her upper teeth was missing. "Look at the bloodlust. Who would've guessed it?"

Amanda made her request more specific. "Do you have any close-ups of her wrists?"

"No. Why?"

"Does that look like a scar to you? There, along her wrist?" She showed Evelyn the photo.

Evelyn squinted, then shook her head. "I can't tell. What are you getting at?"

"Jane had scars on her wrist."

"I remember." Evelyn studied the photo more carefully. "If this is Lucy Bennett, why would she have scars on her wrists like Jane Delray?"

"Whoring's not exactly something to live for." Still, Roz opened one of her desk drawers and found a magnifying glass. Each woman took turns holding the glass to the picture.

Finally, Evelyn said, "I still can't tell. It looks like a scar, but maybe it's the light?"

"That's my fault." Roz sounded uncharacteristically apologetic. "My flash was acting up and Landry was pushing me to hurry so he could clock in to his other job."

Amanda supplied, "Butch didn't say anything in his notes about scars."

"That idiot wouldn't." Contrary to her words, Roz Levy seemed delighted. "All right, Wag. Time to see what you're really made of."

Another wave of dread washed over Amanda. She felt as if she was on a roller coaster.

Evelyn said, "Roz, there's no need to—"

"Shut your pie hole, blondie." Roz cackled like a witch. "Pete's cutting up your dead whore this afternoon. You hotshot lady dicks want, I can make a call and get you a ringside seat to the autopsy."

Amanda knew some of the patrolmen used the morgue as their crack, or on-duty hiding place, especially during the summer. It was easier to sleep in an air-conditioned building, so long as you didn't mind laying up next to a dead body.

She'd been to the Decatur Street building many times to pick up reports and drop off evidence, but she'd never before been into the back. Just the thought of what went on there gave Amanda the heebie-jeebies. Still, she kept her mouth closed as Evelyn led her deep inside the building, even though every step felt as if it was ratcheting down a clamp around her rib cage.

The two beers Amanda drank on the drive over were not helping matters. Instead of relaxed, she felt both lightheaded and extremely focused. It was a miracle she hadn't driven her Plymouth up a telephone pole.

"Do you know Deena?" Evelyn asked, pushing open a swinging door. They were in a small lab. Two tables were shoved into opposite corners in the back of the room. There was a microscope on each. Various medical tools were laid out beside them. A large window took up the back wall. The hospital-green curtains were pulled back to show what must be the autopsy room. Yellow tile ran along the floor and up to the ceiling. There were two metal sinks. Two scales that seemed more appropriate for a grocer's produce section.

And a body. A green drape covered the figure. A large light like a dentist used was overhead. One hand dropped down beside the table. The fingernails were bright red. The hand was turned inward. The wrist did not show.

Evelyn said, "I hate autopsies."

"How many have you seen?"

"I don't actually look at them," she confessed. "You know how you can blur your eyes on purpose?"

Amanda nodded.

"That's what I do. I just blur my eyes and say 'mm' and 'yes' when they ask questions or point out something interesting, and then I go to the bathroom afterward and throw up."

That seemed like as good a plan as any. They heard footsteps in the hallway behind them.

Evelyn said, "Deena's got a bad scar on her neck. Try not to stare."

"A what?" Evelyn's words got jumbled up in Amanda's brain, so they didn't make sense until a striking black woman came through the door. She was wearing a white lab coat over blue jeans and a flowing orange blouse. Her hair was in full Afro. Blue eye shadow adorned her eyelids. The skin around her neck was marred as if by a noose.

"Hey, Miss Lady," Deena said, setting down a tray on one of the tables. There were slides laid out, splatters of white and red sandwiched between the glass. "What are you doing here?"

Evelyn said, "Roz called in a favor for me."

"Why you still talkin' to that nasty old Jew?" She smiled warmly at Amanda. "Who's your pretty friend?"

Evelyn looped her arm through Amanda's. "This is Amanda Wagner. She's my partner now."

The smile dropped. "Any relation to Duke?"

For the first time in her life, Amanda felt the compulsion to lie about her father. Maybe if they'd been alone, she would have, but she confessed, "Yes. I'm his daughter."

"Hm." She shot Evelyn a look and turned back around to her slides.

"She's all right," Evelyn said. "Come on, Dee. Do you think I'd bring someone here who'd—"

The woman spun back around. Her lip trembled with rage. "You know how I got this?" She pointed to the ugly scar on her neck. "Working at the cleaners down on Ponce, pressing Klan robes nice and stiff for people like your daddy."

Evelyn tried, "That's hardly her fault. You can't blame her for her father's—"

Deena held up a hand to stop her. "One day, my mama got her arm caught in one'a the machines. Ain't no way to turn 'em off. Mr. Guntherson's too cheap to pay for an electrician. I grab the cord and it swings back on my neck. Live wires. Boom, there's an explosion—one'a them transformers gives out. Shut down the whole block for two days. Saved my life, but not my mama's."

Amanda didn't know what to say. She'd been to that same dry cleaners many times, had never given a thought to the black women working in the back. "I'm sorry."

Evelyn said, "She can't control what her father does."

Deena leaned back against the table. She crossed her arms. "You remember what I told you about my scar, Ev? I said I'd cover it up the day it don't matter anymore." She glared at Amanda. "It still matters."

Evelyn stroked Amanda's back. "This is my friend, Deena. We're working a case together, trying to find some missing women." Her words were rushed. "Kitty Treadwell. Someone named Mary. They might be connected to Lucy Bennett."

"You check the dead nigger file?" She was talking to Amanda. "That's what y'all call it, right? The DNF? Got one at every station house. Ain't that right, Wag?"

Amanda was too embarrassed to look at her. She told Deena, "I think you probably know that I lost my mother, too." What had happened to Miriam Wagner was common knowledge around the force. With enough whiskey in him, Duke relayed the story with a heady machismo. Amanda said, "You're not the only one here with scars."

Deena tapped her fingers on the table. The staccato started strong, then died down to nothing. "Look at me."

Amanda forced herself to look up. It had been so easy with Roz, but with the old Jew, there had been a sense of righteousness. Now, there was only guilt.

Deena studied her for a bit longer. The anger that had burned so hotly in her eyes started to fade. Finally, she nodded. "All right," she said. "All right."

Evelyn slowly exhaled. She had a tight smile on her face. As usual, she tried to smooth things over. "Dee, did I tell you what Zeke did the other day?"

Deena turned back to the trays. "No, what'd he do?"

Amanda didn't listen to the story. She stared back into the morgue. Her mind was still clouded from the beer, or maybe just the traumas of the day. She felt as if something was shifting inside of her. The last few days had called into question the previous twenty-five years of her life. Amanda wasn't sure whether or not this was a good thing. Truthfully, she wasn't sure about anything anymore.

"Hello-hello!" a man's voice boomed from inside the morgue.

"That's Pete," Evelyn supplied.

The coroner was pudgy, with a ponytail and beard that looked days past washing—as did his tie-dyed T-shirt and faded, torn blue jeans. His white lab coat was tight through the sleeves. A cigarette dangled from his lip. He stood at the window, showing his yellow teeth. Amanda was not one to believe in vibes, but even with a thick piece of glass between them, she could almost feel the creepiness radiating off Pete Hanson's body.

He said, "Deena, my love, you're looking beautiful as ever this afternoon."

Deena laughed even as she rolled her eyes. "Shut up, fool."

"Only a fool for you, my dear."

Evelyn supplied, "They do this all the time."

"Oh." Amanda tried to pretend she heard white men flirting with black women every day.

"Come on, Dee." Pete tapped on the window. "You gonna let me buy you that drink?"

"Meet me outside at ten-after-never." She snatched the drapes closed. "Y'all go on in." She told Amanda, "When you throw up, aim for the floor drain. It's easier to hose down that way."

"Thank you," Amanda managed.

She followed Evelyn into the autopsy room. The temperature was as cold as expected, but it was the odor that caught Amanda off guard. It was clean, like Clorox and Pine-Sol mixed with apples; nothing like what she expected.

There had been two calls during her uniform days wherein she was sent out to take a missing persons report and found that person not far from the house. One had been a man who'd been locked in his trunk. The other had been a child who'd gotten trapped inside an old refrigerator on the family's shed porch. Each time, Amanda had taken one whiff and called for backup. She did not know what happened to the cases. She was at the station filling out reports by the time the bodies were removed.

"Who is this elegant lady?" Pete Hanson asked, his eyes on Amanda.

"This is—"

"Amanda Wagner," Amanda told him. "I'm Duke Wagner's daughter."

He paused a beat. "So you are," he finally said. "Duke's quite a character, isn't he?"

Amanda shrugged. She was bruised enough about her father for one day.

"Pete." Evelyn put on her cheery voice again, but her fingers snaked into her hair, giving a telltale sign of her discomfort. "Thanks so much for letting us watch. We were in Lucy's apartment last Monday. We never met her, but it was quite a shock to learn about the suicide."

"Lucy?" Pete's brow furrowed. "Where did you get that?"

"It was in Butch's report," Amanda supplied. "He ID'd her off her license."

Pete walked over to a large, cluttered desk underneath the window. There were piles of papers stacked in a hodgepodge, but he somehow found the right one.

Smoke drifted from his cigarette as he read the preliminary report. The paper was thin. Amanda recognized Butch Bonnie's scrawl reversed on the back where he'd turned the carbon paper the wrong way.

"Bonnie. Not the sharpest tack in the box, but at least it wasn't that jackass Landry." Pete put the report back on his desk. "In a case like this, the license ID is a last resort. I generally prefer dental records, fingerprints, or a family member coming in before I feel comfortable signing off on the identity." He explained, "Learned my lesson in Nam. You don't send someone home in a body bag unless you know the right family's waiting on the other end."

Amanda found relief in his words. For all his eccentricities, the man was at least good at his job.

"So." Pete flicked ash off his cigarette. "What's Kenny been up to? I haven't seen him around."

"This and that," Evelyn said. She was watching Pete's every move—the way he wiped his nose with a tissue from his pocket, the bobbing of his cigarette as he talked. Meanwhile, she pulled so hard at her hair that Amanda was certain she was going to yank some out. "He's working with Bill on a shed at the house today." She chewed her lip for a few seconds. "We're having a barbecue later. You should come."

Pete smiled at Amanda. "Will you be there?"

She got a sinking feeling. It was her lot in life to be attracted to the Kenny Mitchells of the world while the Pete Hansons were the only ones who ever bothered to ask her out. "Maybe," she managed.

"Excellent." He rolled over a metal tray. There were scalpels, scissors, a saw.

Evelyn stared at the instruments. Her face was pale. "You know, maybe I should give Bill a call. We dashed out without telling him when we'd be back."

This wasn't actually the truth. Evelyn had been clear that they weren't sure what time they would return. Bill, unsurprisingly, had been very accommodating to his beautiful wife.

"I should go call," Evelyn repeated. She practically ran out of the room.

Which left Amanda alone with Pete.

He was looking at her, but this time she saw the kindness in his eyes. "She's a great lady, but this is one of the more challenging spectator sports."

Amanda swallowed.

"Would you like me to take you through the process?"

"I—" She felt her throat tighten. "Why do you have to do an autopsy if it's a suicide?"

Pete considered her question before walking across the room. There was a light box mounted on the wall. He flipped the toggle, and the lights flickered on.

"The word 'autopsy' means, literally, 'to see for oneself.' " He waved her over. "Come, my dear. Contrary to rumor, I don't bite."

Amanda tried to conceal her trepidation as she joined him. The X-ray showed a skull. The holes where the eyes and nose were supposed to go looked eerily empty.

"Do you see here?" he asked, pointing to the neck on the X-ray. Pieces of vertebrae flexed apart the way a cat's paw opened when you pressed the pad. "This bone here is called the hyoid. That's pronounced 'hi-oid.' It's horseshoe shaped, and free-floats at the anterior midline between the chin and thyroid." He showed on his own neck. "Here."

Amanda nodded, though she wasn't quite sure she grasped the point of his lecture.

"The wonderful thing about your neck is that you can move it up and down and side to side. The cartilage helps make that possible. The hyoid itself is fairly fascinating. It's the only jointless bone in your entire body. Supports your tongue. Jiggles when you move it. Now, as I said, it's right here—" He pointed to his neck again. "So, if someone is choked with a ligature, you'll generally find bruising around the hyoid. But here"—he moved his fingers up—"is where you'll find bruising if someone is hanged, above the hyoid. That's a classic sign of hanging, actually. I'm sure you'll see it more than once in your career."

"You're saying she tried to hang herself first?"

"No." He pointed to the X-ray of the neck. "See this darker line here that bisects the hyoid?" Amanda nodded. "That indicates a fracture, which tells me she was choked, probably with great force."

"Why great force?"

"Because she's a young woman. Your hyoid starts out as two pieces. The bone doesn't fully fuse until around the age of thirty. Feel for yourself."

She thought he meant for her to touch his neck. Amanda desperately did not want to touch him. Still, she started to reach out.

Pete smiled, saying, "I believe you have your own neck."

"Oh. Right." Amanda laughed through her discomfort. She gently touched her fingers to her throat. She palpated the area, feeling things shift back and forth. The noise clicked in her ears.

Pete said, "You can feel there's a lot of movement in there. So, you'd have to have significant pressure to fracture the hyoid."

He motioned her to follow him over to the body. He stubbed out his cigarette in an ashtray on the table. Without preamble, he pulled back the sheet, exposing Lucy Bennett's head and shoulders. "See these bruises here?"

Amanda felt her eyes blur, but not on purpose. She blinked, focusing only on the neck. There were deep purple and red marks around the woman's throat. They reminded her of Roz Levy. "She was choked."

"Correct," Pete agreed. "Her attacker wrapped his hands around her neck and strangled her. See the fingerprints here?"

Amanda leaned in for a closer look. Now that he'd put the thought into her head, she could see the individual strands of bruises that formed the fingers of a hand.

"Carotids," Pete explained. "Arteries. One on each side of the neck. They deliver oxygenated blood to the brain. Very important. No oxygen, no brain."

“Right.” Amanda remembered the lesson from her police academy days. They got to watch the men learn how to do choke holds one morning.

“Now.” Pete wrapped both his hands loosely around the woman’s neck. “See where my hands are?” Amanda nodded again. “See how pressing her carotid arteries in order to strangle her exerts enough force on the front of the neck to fracture the hyoid?” Again, she nodded. “Which tells me that this woman was strangled into unconsciousness.”

Amanda looked back at the X-ray. “The fall from the roof wouldn’t break the bone?”

“You’ll see when I open the neck that it’s highly improbable.”

Amanda could not suppress the shudder that came.

“You’re really doing quite well.”

Amanda ignored the compliment. “Could she live with a broken Hy ...”

“Hyoid.”

“Right. Could she live with that?”

“Most certainly. A hyoid fracture or break isn’t necessarily fatal. I saw it often in Nam. The officers were trained in hand-to-hand combat, which of course they loved showing off. You hit a man here—” he chopped at his own neck—“with your elbow or even an open hand, and you can stun him or, with enough force, break the bone.” He cupped his hand to his chin like a tweedy college professor. “You feel a very distinctive sensation when you run your fingers along the neck, as if hundreds of bubbles are bursting under the skin. This comes from the air leaking out of the larynx into the tissue planes. In addition to the obvious panic, there’s tremendous pain, bleeding, bruising.” He smiled. “It’s a nasty little injury. Almost totally incapacitating. They’ll just lay there wheezing high up in their throats, praying for someone to help them.”

“Are they able to scream?”

“I’d be shocked if they could manage more than a hoarse whisper, but people surprise you sometimes. Everyone is different.”

Amanda tried to process all this new information. “But what you’re saying is that Lucy Bennett was choked.” She remembered Pete’s earlier terminology. “Strangled to death.”

He shook his head and shrugged at the same time. “I’ll need to see the lungs. Strangulation causes aspiration pneumonitis—the inhalation of vomit into the lungs. The gastric acids eat into the tissue. This gives us something of a timeline. The more tissue damage, the longer she was alive. Was she strangled into unconsciousness and then thrown off the roof or was she strangled to death and then thrown off the roof?”

“Why does it matter?” Either way, Lucy had been murdered.

“When you catch your perpetrator, you’re going to want to know the details of the crime. That way, you can make sure you’ve got the right guy and not some nut looking for a headline in the newspaper.”

Amanda didn’t see a scenario where she would be catching any perpetrator. She wasn’t even sure why Pete was answering her questions. “But why would the killer give details of the crime? That would just make the case against him stronger.”

“He won’t realize he’s walking into the trap you set.” Pete told her, “You are a lot smarter than he is. Your perpetrator is a man who cannot control himself.”

Amanda considered the statement, which didn't strike her as wholly true. "He was smart enough to try to cover the crime."

"Not as smart as you think. Throwing her off the roof was risky. It called attention to the crime. It opened up the possibility of witnesses. Why not leave her in the apartment and let a neighbor report the smell a few days—weeks—later?"

He was right. Amanda remembered the Manson murders, the way the bodies were posed. "Do you think the killer was sending a message?"

"Possibly," Pete allowed. "We can also assume that he knew the victim fairly well."

"Why do you say that?"

Pete gripped his hands around the top of the sheet. "Remember to breathe." He pulled away the covering, exposing the rest of the body.

Amanda put her hand to her mouth. Nothing rushed up her throat. She didn't pass out. She wasn't even woozy. As with Roz Levy's photos, she expected a violent reaction inside her body but was met instead with steely resolve. That same locking sensation from Techwood ran up Amanda's spine. Her stomach actually stopped churning. Instead of fainting, she felt her vision sharpen.

Amanda had never seen another woman entirely nude before. There was something sad about the way her breasts hung to the side. Her stomach was saggy. Her pubic hair was short, as if it had been trimmed, but the hair on her thighs was grotesquely unshaven. Blood and viscera leaked between her legs. Her body had been pummeled. Bruises blackened her stomach and ribs.

Pete said, "In order to hurt somebody like this, you have to hate them. And hate does not come without familiarity. Just ask my ex-wife. She tried to strangle me once."

Amanda glanced up at him. There was no suggestion behind his smile. He wasn't just creepy, he was downright strange. And polite. Amanda could not recall the last conversation she'd had with a man where she wasn't constantly interrupted or talked over.

Pete said, "You could be very good at this."

Amanda didn't know if that was much to write home about. It certainly wasn't conversation for the dinner table. "Can you tell me anything about the nail polish?"

He took a latex glove out of his pocket. "Why don't you tell me?"

Amanda didn't want to, but she took the glove. She tried to shove her hand into the stiff latex.

"Wipe your palm first," Pete advised.

Amanda wiped her sweaty hand on her skirt. The glove was still a tight fit, but once she managed to force her fingers into the tips, the rest of her hand easily followed.

Gently, she reached out for Lucy's hand. The skin felt cold through the glove, or maybe Amanda was just imagining that. Instead of being limp, the body was stiff.

"Rigor mortis," Pete explained. "The skeletal muscles contract, locking the joints. Onset varies depending on temperature and lesser factors. It starts in as little as ten minutes and lasts for up to seventy-two hours."

"You can tell how long she's been dead by how stiff she is."

"Precisely," he confirmed. "By the time I got to our victim yesterday afternoon, she had been dead approximately three to six hours."

"That's quite a window."

"Science is not as precise as we'd like to believe."

Amanda tried to turn the arm. It wouldn't move.

"Don't worry about being gentle. She can't feel pain anymore."

Amanda heard the sound of her throat working as she swallowed. She wrenched up the arm. There was a loud popping sound that sent a knife into Amanda's chest.

"Breathe in and out," Pete advised. "Remember, it's just tissue and bone."

Amanda swallowed again. The sound echoed in the room. She looked at Lucy Bennett's fingers. "There's something under her fingernails."

"Very good catch." He went over to the cabinet in the corner. "We can send it to the lab for analysis."

Amanda wished she had Roz Levy's magnifying glass. It wasn't grime under the girl's fingernails. "What do you think it is?"

"If she fought back, it's probably skin scratched off her attacker. Let's hope she managed to draw blood." Pete was back with a glass slide and something that looked like an oversized toothpick. "Hold her steady." Pete scraped the wooden pick under the fingernail. A long piece of skin came out. "If there's enough blood in this skin tissue, and you find a suspect, we can analyze his blood and see if it's the same type, whether he's a secretor or nonsecretor."

"We'd need more than blood to convict him."

"The FBI is doing amazing work with enzymes right now." He tapped the skin tissue onto the slide. "In ten years' time, they'll have samples from everyone in America stored on thousands of different computers all around the country. All you'll have to do is send the sample around to each computer and bingo, within months you'll know your perpetrator's name and address."

"You should tell that to Butch and Rick." The two homicide detectives would probably laugh in his face. "This is their case."

"Is it really?"

She didn't bother answering the question. "I guess I don't have to tell you how much trouble Evelyn and I would be in if they found out we were down here poking around."

Pete put the slide on the counter. "You know, the GBI can't find enough women to meet their quotas. They're going to lose their federal grants if they don't fill up the slots by the end of the year."

"I work for the Atlanta Police Department."

"You don't have to."

Pete obviously didn't know Duke Wagner as well as everyone else she'd met today. Forget Butch and Rick. Her father would have a canary if he knew Amanda was at the morgue. Touching a dead person. Talking to a hippie about leaving her steady job to be the token woman on the state's police force.

In for a penny, she supposed. There was still the reason they'd come here in the first place. Amanda turned the woman's hand out, exposing the wrist to the light. There they were—the familiar white scars. "She tried to kill herself before."

"Maybe," Pete allowed. "A lot of young women cut themselves. Generally, it's for attention. Your victim was obviously an addict. You can see that from the track marks. If she wanted to kill herself, she would've doubled down with the needle and her old friend H."

Amanda realized, "You washed her."

"Yes. We took photographs and X-rays, then we cut off her clothes and washed her down in preparation for the procedure. She'd urinated on herself—an unfortunate by-product of strangulation. Though one could point out this pales in comparison to the intestinal prolapse." He added, "I should point out that she was remarkably clean considering her occupation and addiction."

"What do you mean?"

"There was the expected results of the fall—picture a water balloon being dropped from that height—but in my experience, addicts don't favor bathing. The natural oils clog the skin. They think it holds the drug in longer. I'm not sure if there's a scientific basis for that, but someone who injects drain cleaner into their veins isn't necessarily troubled by facts. You can see the trimming—" He indicated the short pubic hair. "That's unusual, but I've seen it before. Some men are drawn to women who appear more infantilized."

"Child molesters?"

"Not necessarily."

Amanda nodded, though her eyes avoided the area Pete was talking about. Instead, she studied Lucy's hands again. The fingernail polish was perfect except for the chip. The strokes were even. It had taken a lot of time and patience to apply such a thick coat. Even Amanda, who buffed and clear-coated her nails in front of the television every night, couldn't manage such an expert job.

Pete asked, "Did you find something else?"

"Her fingernails."

"Are they fake? I've been seeing a lot of those plastic ones out of California lately."

"It looks like—" Amanda shook her head. She didn't know what it looked like. The nails were trimmed in a straight line. The cuticles were neat. The red polish was evenly within the margins. She'd never met a woman who could afford a professional manicure. She doubted a dead prostitute would be the first.

Amanda walked around the table and looked at Lucy's other hand. Again, the polish was perfect, as if someone else had applied it for her.

Amanda opened her mouth to speak, then stopped herself.

"Go on," Pete said. "There are no silly questions in here."

"Can you tell if she's left- or right-handed?"

Pete beamed at Amanda as if she was his star pupil. "There will be more muscle attachment to the bone on the dominant side."

"From holding a pen?"

"Among other things. Why are you asking?"

